✓ 43031

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation132jannewy

4271

RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION LIBRARY

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43031

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXXII

JANUARY 7, 1931, TO JUNE 24, 1931

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXII

JANUARY 7, 1931, TO JUNE 24, 1931

(Nos. 3418-3442)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
I	International Relations, Documents
IP	International Relations, Foreign Press
IS	International Relations, Signed Article
M	Music
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Academic freedom
  Dismissal of H. A. Miller of Ohio state university; EP...................... 595
  "Hire learning" at Ohio state university. N. Thomas; S..654; see also EP.... 667
  Miller dismissal decided on a year ago; EP 622
Adler, Herman
  Music and the Metropolitan; C....451; see also 390
Admirable Crichton, the. M. Van Doren; D 336
Advertising
  Honest? T. S. Harding; S............ 555
  Sex-mad; E........................ 318
Æ. See Russell, G. W.
Aeronautics
  Airship construction to be abandoned by Great Britain; EP................. 571
  Flights, future; EP................. 666
  Industry returning to sanity; EP...... 314
  Italian transatlantic flight; EP........ 59
  Piccard ascent into stratosphere; EP... 623
  Stunts, value of, doubted; EP......... 623
Africa. See West Africa
"After the ball." See Songs
Agricultural relief
  Dirt farmer wonders. G. W. Birkett; S.....241; see also C.....329....... 505
  Farm board failure; E................ 233
  Farm board plan to export wheat; EP.. 257
  Farm board speculation in wheat at end; EP 339
Agricultural research
  Purpose. L. De Savoye; C.....505; see also 241
Aiken, Conrad
  Four preludes; P.................... 183
  Prelude; P........................ 453
Aikman, Duncan
  California optimism; S................ 448
  California's sun god; Governor Rolph; S 35
Airplanes. See Aeronautics
Airships. See Aeronautics
Al-Yemen. A. Bakshy; D................ 135
Alabama negro boys' case. See Negroes Scottsboro
Album, family; Dt...................... 70
Alderman, Edwin A.
  Death; E........................ 522
Alexander, Ed. F.
  Criticizes B. Stolberg on use of terms "Greek gerunds" and "trivia"; C.328; see also........................ 175
Alexander, Hartley
  Art of the American Indian, exposition; S 501
Alexander, R. S.
  South Africa, new; IS............... 592
Alford, Theodore C.
  Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C..... 155
Aliens
  And the courts; EP..2; see also C, 128, 243
  Michigan law; EP.................... 648
Alison's house. M. Van Doren; D....... 590
All quiet on the western front (film)
  Producers on The Nation's honor roll for 1930 8
Allen, Devere
  Aid for the jobless—or an alibi? S.... 403
  Spain, behind the revolution; S....... 500
  Spanish revolution; IS................ 540
Aluminum company of America
  Establishes branch in Canada; EP...... 665
Ambassadors' salaries, R. Koeninger; C..329; see also........................ 239
American civil liberties union
  Membership campaign. H. Winner; C. 408
American legion
  Dinner to former foes; EP............ 570
Americans. See United States
America's sweetheart. H. H.; D.......... 251
Anatol. M. Van Doren; D.............. 134
Anderson, Paul Y.
  Congress, adjournment; both sides blamed for failure to call extra session; S... 268
  Congress, extra session needed; S...... 93
  Congress, "lame duck" session; S...... 268
  Corn sugar, Hyde action on; S......... 39
  Curtis, vice-president, retirement at end of term reported; S................ 207
  Democratic party, Raskob program; S 326; see also C..................... 477
  Drought relief; conflict over; S........ 150
  Drought relief, Hoover and. S.......... 93
  Drought relief; Hoover "victory"; S... 207
  Hoover administration suffers in house of representatives; S................ 268
  Hoover, plight after two years in office; S.........326; see also C.......... 477
  Mellon, A. W., loss of prestige; S..... 268
  Morrow, Dwight Whitney, as senator; S 207
  Moses, George Higgins, misrepresents Nye campaign expenditures; S....... 207
  Muscle shoals compromise; S........... 268
  Norris, George W., Lucas attempt to defeat senator; S.................... 39
  Post-office lease scandals; S........... 207
  Power commission, controversy between president and senate over appointments; S........................ 93
  Power trust attempt to wreck Norris plan for Muscle shoals; S............... 39
  Progressives' conference, Washington; S......326; see also C.............. 477
  Prohibition, Hoover hedging on; S...... 150
  Railroad consolidation; Hoover attitude; S 39
  Wages on public works cut by contractors; S........................ 150
  Washington correspondents, honor roll for 1930; S........................ 93
  Washington newspaper correspondents, honor roll; additions suggested. E. Gruening; C........................ 155
  Wickersham commission report; S...... 150
  Young, Owen D., for president? S..... 207
Anti-fascism. See Italy
Appalachian power company. See Power and power industry
Appointments, presidential. See President, United States
Architecture
  American and European. D. Haskell; S......55; see also C.............. 274
  "Metropolis of tomorrow," by H. Ferriss. D. Haskell; S..55; see also C...... 274
Arkansas
  Drought sufferers demand relief; EP... 29
  Drought relief delayed by Hoover; EP. 85
Armament limitation
  Agreement on naval reduction "in principle" between France and Italy; EP 259
  Appointment of American to preside over conference suggested; EP............ 114
  Conference of February, 1932. Viscount Cecil; S........................ 319
  Crisis in naval reduction; E........... 521
  Diplomats and peace; E............... 171
  Franco-Italian agreement on naval reduction; EP......285; E........... 317
  Groener calls France to account; EP.... 314
  Misunderstandings on naval reduction between nations; EP.................. 396
  Naval parity, end of, unseen; EP...... 492
  United States navy should not be built to limit permitted; E............... 205
Armaments
  Expenditures, national; E............. 547
Army, United States
  Expenditure; E...................... 547
Arno, Peter
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
Art, American Indian. See Indians
Arthur, Ben
  Labor, a wasteful system; C.......... 631
As husbands go. M. Van Doren; D....... 336
As you desire me. M. Van Doren; D..198; see also C........................ 409
Athletics
  Emory university, athletics at. V. Woodward; C......478; see also E...... 172
  Pennsylvania university's new policy of less emphasis on sport; E.......172; see also C........................ 478
Auer, Constance
  I became a librarian, S..213; see also C 381, 532
Australia
  Wool scheme. C. H. Grattan; C..558; see also book review................ 506
Austria
  Brighter days in. J. Gunther; S....... 65
Austro-German customs agreement
  Challenge to Europe; E............... 371
  Discussed. F. Hertz; IS.............. 461
  Hertz; IS........................ 461
  Opposition; EP...................... 544
  Terms; EP........................ 339
Automobiles
  Campbell's racing a useless performance; EP 169
  Cow-catchers for pedestrians. B. Shadwell; C..72; see also C............. 129
Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

B., M.
  Unemployment; remedy; C............. 47
Bach festival. A. Mendel; M............. 618
Bacon, Peggy, "characturist." P. Rosenfeld; A........................ 617
Bailey, Mrs. F. K.
  On Marion, Indiana, lynching; C..452; see also........................ 406
Bailey, Josiah William
  New senator from North Carolina. W. Jones; S........................ 11
Bakeman, Robert A.
  Lawrence decides; S.................. 404
Baker, George Fisher, sr.
  Death; EP........................ 519
Baker memorial hospital, Boston
  Reasonable fees; EP.................. 341
Bakshy, Alexander
  Beggar's opera, the; D................ 645
  Birds of a feather; D................ 485
  Blue angel, the; D.................... 25
  Born to love; D...................... 590
  Cimarron; D........................ 199
  Cities and years; D.................. 485
  City lights; D........................ 250
  "Comedies," moving-picture; S........ 687
  Comrades of 1918; D................. 305
  Criminal code, the; D................. 80
  Dirigible; D........................ 485
  Easiest way, the; D.................. 305
  Fighting caravans, the; D............. 199
  Films with music; D.................. 359
  Five-year plan, the; D............... 687
  Front page, the; D................... 428
  German film invasion of America; S... 538
  H_2O; D........................ 359
  How he lied to her husband; D........ 135
  Le Million; D........................ 645
  Liebeswalzer; D...................... 645
  Mädel von der Reeperbahn, das; D..... 538
  Mechanical principles; D.............. 359
  Millionaire, the; D................... 590
  Pagliacci; D........................ 305
  Paid; D........................ 80
  Rango; D........................ 305
  Royal family, the; D.................. 25
  Skandal um Eva; D................... 538
  Skippy; D........................ 485
  Smiling lieutenant, the; D............ 645
  Sous les toits de Paris; D............. 25
  Subway express; D................... 590
  Surf and seaweed; D.................. 359
  Svengali; D........................ 590
  Tabu; D........................ 428
  Trader Horn; D...................... 250
  Wien, du stadt der lieder; D.......... 538
  Zwei herzen im ¾ takt; D............. 538
Balch, Emily G.
  International conference on world economic crisis; C...................... 274
Baldwin, Roger
  Venezuela, tyranny of J. V. Gomez; EP......231; C.................... 243
Ballyhoo. H. Broun; D.................. 24
Bank, international
  Senate disapproves state department's forbidding federal reserve officials to serve; EP........................ 258

43031

- Bank of United States. N. Thomas; S..147; correction, S. Rosoff not a director, C 243
  - Failure brings demand for new banking laws; EP 58
  - Investigation drags along; EP 315
- Banks
  - National banking law; O. D. Young's recommendations; EP 168
  - New York. N. Thomas; S..147; correction, S. Rosoff not a director of Bank of United States; C 243
  - Recommendations by J. A. Broderick, New York superintendent of banks; EP 58
- Banque Oustric scandal; EP 368
- Bar, the. See Legal profession
- Barnard summer school for workers; appeal for aid. H. W. Smith; C 659
- Barnes, Harry Elmer
  - On "Coming of the war," by B. Schmitt; C......127; replies, C 128
- Barr, Stringfellow
  - "No north, no south!" S 67
- Barretts of Wimpole street, the. M. Van Doren; D 224
- Beach, Joseph Warren
  - Novel from James to Joyce; S 634
- Beans, too many. Workless; S 95
- Beardsley, John
  - Aliens and the courts; C......128; see also EP, 2; C 243
- Beffel, John Nicholas
  - Political prisoners, 1931; S......475; correction, C 532
- Beggar's opera, the. A. Bakshy; D 645
- Belasco, David
  - Death; EP 571
- Belgium
  - Alliance with France combated by socialists and Flemings; EP 3
- Bellamy trial, the. M. Van Doren; D 538
- Bennett, Arnold
  - Biography and work. D. Van Doren; S 401
  - Death; EP 369
- Bennett, Charles H.
  - Ideals and meals; C..129; see also C... 71
- Bennington college
  - To open in September; EP 649
- Berger, Victor L., foundation, to be established. M. Lewis; C 216
- Berliner, Helene
  - Laymen and museums; C..477; see also 160
- Bethlehem steel corporation
  - Bonus battle won by C. M. Schwab; EP 464
  - Bonus system defended by C. M. Schwab EP 286
  - Bonuses; E 669
  - Correction of figures on earnings; EP... 203
  - Wage reduction, virtual; EP 142
- Bicycling days. R. Kirby; S..126; see also C 181
- Billings, Henry. M. Josephson; A 196
- Billings, Josh. See Shaw, H. W.
- Birds of a feather. A. Bakshy; D 485
- Birkett, Glenn W.
  - Dirt farmer wonders; S..241; see also C 329, 505
- Birth control
  - Bill to be introduced into senate; EP.. 143
  - Church views on; EP 341
  - Presbyterian church commission approval; EP 493
- Black, Ruby A.
  - Hoover's public-buildings bluff; S 656
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents by E. Gruening; C... 155
- Blackmore, Richard Doddridge
  - Biographical material sought. W. H. Dunn; C 659
- Blackwell, Alice Stone
  - Making of a pacifist; C 243
- Bland, Miss M. A.
  - Citizenship denied to her by United States supreme court; EP 595
  - Presbyterian general assembly opposes supreme court opinion; EP 623
- Block, Paul
  - Discharges employees; EP 142
- Blue angel, the. A. Bakshy; D 25
- Bonus, veterans'. See Veterans
- Bonuses. See Bethlehem steel corporation
- Books
  - Advertising and selling; E 600
  - Censorship. See Censorship, book
  - Criticism. See Criticism
  - Dollar Books: An autopsy. H. Hazlitt; S 18
  - Fine, in dispraise of. H. Hazlitt; S... 559
  - Spring books, notable 432
  - See also Literature
- Born to love. A. Bakshy; D 590
- Borreson, B. C.
  - Farmers and politics; C 71
- Boyd Mary Sumner
  - Why mothers die; S..293; see also C.. 451
- Boyle, Kay
  - Career; P 414
  - Hunt; P 245
- Brandt, Raymond P.
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Brass ankle. M. Van Doren; D 538
- Bread line; Dt 242
- Bread lines and a museum. P. Rosenfeld; A......160; see also C 477
- Briand, Aristide. See France
- Broderick, Joseph A.
  - Recommends changes in New York banking law; EP 58
- Brok, Otto
  - Unemployment relief in Germany; S... 237
- Broke at fifty-five. F. G. Moorhead; S.... 528
- Brookwood labor college
  - Muste, A. J., dinner in honor of. I. Mufson; C 216
- Broun, Heywood
  - Ballyhoo; D 24
  - Drama, deflating; S 78
  - Five star final; D 53
- Bruckner, Anton; neglected composer. A. Mendel; M 334
- Brüning, Chancellor
  - Invited with Foreign Minister Curtius to visit England; EP 438
- Bülow, Fürst Bernhard von
  - Denkwürdigkeiten. O. G. Villard; S.. 211
- Burgess, F. W.
  - Veterans' adjusted compensation not a bonus; C 273
- Burns, James
  - Canada first; IS 488
- Business
  - Condition not reassuring; EP 2
  - On the defensive; E 520
- Business depression
  - Farrell, J. A., and C. M. Schwab, views of; EP 596
  - Forecasting discredited; EP 58
  - Government officials see "favorable factors"; EP 621
  - Hard times and hard facts. M. A. Hallgren; S 266
  - Hard times in the west. B. L. Coleman and Old Reader; C 680
  - Hoover, H., views 297
  - Hoover, H., views; denies aid to Europe; EP 624
  - Public works not immediate cure, engineers say; EP 85
  - Remedies proposed; E 573
  - Reveals bankruptcy of American leadership; EP 86
  - Schwab, C. M., and J. A. Farrell, views of; EP 596
  - Tilson, J. Q., views of; EP 569
  - Views of business leaders show lack of knowledge; E 625
- "Busyness," American; Dt 98
- Butler, General Smedley Darlington
  - Court-martial avoided, for story about Mussolini; EP 168
  - Criticism of Mussolini; EP 142
  - Fort Rivière exploit; EP 492
- Buttons, 2 per cent. U. Sinclair; C 659
- Byington, Steven T.
  - English, correct, in advertising of books on correct usage; C 352
  - Purity, racial; C..631; see also C..... 382

C

- Cabrera, Luis, "plot." A. Harris; IS..... 688
  - See also Mexico
- California
  - Civilization questioned. R. Whitaker; S......347; see also C 451
  - Optimism. D. Aikman; S 448
  - Red flag law held invalid in certain respects; EP 597
  - Rolph, James, jr., Governor. D. Aikman; S 35
  - Spector sentence under syndicalism law reversed; EP 649
- California, university of
  - Higher education. One who used a chair; C 352
- Camille. M. Van Doren; D 198
- Campaign expenditures. See Elections
- Campbell, Captain Malcolm
  - Racing, automobile, a useless performance; EP 169
- Canada
  - Canada first. J. Burns; IS 488
  - Embargo on Russian goods ordered; EP 258
  - Tariff; United States companies establish branches in Canada; EP 656
- Cancer
  - Cure of Doctors Coffey and Humber; Secretary Wilbur and the cure. M. A. Hallgren; S 373
- Candy
  - White list grows. F. Kelley; C 452
- Cane, carrying; Dt 679
- Capital punishment
  - Gangi case an argument for abolition; EP 31
- Capitalism
  - Must reconsider economic position; EP 285
  - Willard, D., opinion; EP 367
- Cass, Frank H.
  - Student strikes; C 631
- Castle, William R., jr.
  - Succeeds J. P. Cotton as undersecretary of state; EP 395
- Catholic Action. See Italy
- Catholic church
  - News from Vatican city; EP 31
  - Revival. J. C. Menzel; C...328; see also E 206
  - Socialism and communism, views on, in papal encyclical; EP 597
  - See also Italy; Pius XI; Spain
- Cecil, Viscount, of Chelwood
  - Disarmament conference of February, 1932; S 319
- Censorship, book
  - Married love. M. W. Dennett; S.... 579
- Censorship, mail. See Censorship, press
- Censorship, plays
  - Street scene, play, censored by organized charity. E. Rice; S 628
- Censorship, press
  - Post office censorship again. L. Rogin; S 379
  - Revolutionary Age and Class Struggle lose mailing privilege; EP 621
- Central America
  - Unrest; EP 30
  - See also Latin America
- Chadbourne plan. See Sugar
- Chain stores
  - Indiana law for license fees held constitutional; EP 569
  - Negro; Colored merchants' association. H. M. Foster; S 271
- Channing, Edward
  - Death; EP 59
- Chaplin, Charlie, legends; Dt 583
- Chesterton, Gilbert Keith
  - Debate on religion with C. Darrow; C.. 130
- Chicago
  - Election; Chicago goes Tammany. M. A. Hallgren; S 446
  - Election; circus. W. A. S. Douglas; S 269
  - Election; socialists barred; EP 369
  - Election; socialists seek another election; EP 438
  - Liberal press needed. T. Rylands and H. G. Wexler; C 505
  - Unemployment and crime. R. W. Shoemaker; C 352
- Chicago world's fair. D. Haskell; S 55
- China
  - Civil war begins anew; EP 518
  - Extraterritoriality; move against; EP.. 438
  - Opium—China's ancient enemy. E. N. La Motte; IS 514
- Chinese in the United States
  - On the Pacific coast. H. Phillips; S.... 12
- Christmas dinner; Dt 15
- Cimarron. A. Bakshy; D 199
- Circus, the; Dt 272
- Circus, attacked and defended; Dt 610
- Cities and years. A. Bakshy; D 485
- Citizenship
  - Denied to D. C. Macintosh and M. A. Bland by United States supreme court; EP 595
  - Naturalization law needs amendment. A. Hirst; C 659
  - Presbyterian general assembly opposes supreme court opinion in Macintosh and Bland cases; EP 623
- City lights. A. Bakshy; D 250
- Civic federation. See National civic federation
- Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
- Civil liberty
  - Violations in 1930; EP 230
- Clarke, Lois
  - Librarians; C......381; see also 213
- Class Struggle
  - Loses mailing privilege; EP 621
- Classics. See Yale university
- Clemens, Cyril
  - Seeks material on H. W. Shaw (Josh Billings); C 72
- Coal and iron police. See Pennsylvania
- Coal miners, American
  - Hunger and tragedy in Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania; EP 666
  - Illinois; Howat issues call for convention; EP 369
  - Illinois, "mysterious peace" effected; EP 341
  - West Virginia conditions. N. Thomas; C 477
- Coal miners, German
  - Ruhr strike; EP 30
- Coal, miners, Welsh
  - Strike; EP 30
- Coden, Martin
  - On the air; C..273; see also E 146
- Coffey, Doctor Walter B. See Cancer
- Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
  - Grindstone, the; P 130
  - Man indoors, the; P 660
- Coleman, B. L.
  - Hard times in the west; C 680

- College athletics. See Athletics
- College, experimental. See Wisconsin university
- Colleges and universities
  - Graduates; E........ 649
- College students
  - Saint Lawrence university students threaten strike; EP........ 519
- Colonel Satan. M. Van Doren; D........ 134
- Colored merchants' association. See Chain stores
- Communists
  - Exposed again by H. Fish; EP........ 57
  - Fish committee report; E........ 89
  - Fuller, H. R., arrested in Memphis for inquiries; EP........ 287
  - Kulikoff, M., confined with Oregon insane for radical activity. I. Goodman; C......298; EP........ 340
  - Literature and the reds. C. J. Finger; S........ 350
  - Roman catholic views on, in papal encyclical; EP........ 597
  - Wyoming, and the Daughters of the American revolution. W. W. Wolfe; C........ 99
- Company's coming. M. Van Doren; D........ 512
- Comrades of 1918. A. Bakshy; D........ 305
- Conductorless orchestra. A. Mendel; M... 223
- Conference, world, another wanted. O. G. Villard; E........ 291
- Conference, world, on economic crisis. See Economic conditions, world
- Congress
  - Adjournment; both sides blamed for failure to call extra session. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 268
  - Adjournment; near; EP........ 257
  - Adjournment; record; E........ 260
  - Extra session demanded; E........ 6
  - Extra session needed. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 93
  - Extra session needed; E........ 204
  - "Lame duck" session. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 268
  - Measures may be held up; EP........ 201
  - Senate defended by C. Coolidge; EP... 313
  - Senate, demand for curb; EP........ 29
  - Session, busy; EP........ 29
- Connelly, Marc
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Conover, Elbert M.
  - "Wozzeck"; C......505; see also...... 390
- Consent decree. See Meat
- Constitution, United States. See United States
- Consumers' research; Dt........ 380
- Coolidge, Calvin
  - Afterthoughts. M. M. Johnson; C..... 17
  - Czarship of New England dairy industry offered to him; EP........ 231
  - Defends senate; EP........ 313
  - Entourage. R. B. Kersey; C......477; see also........ 326
- Copyright and common sense. T. Solberg; S........ 678
  - Vestal bill passed by house of representatives; EP........ 87
- Corn sugar
  - Presence in food need no longer be declared on label; EP........ 2
  - Secretary Hyde's action on. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 39
- Cornell university
  - Faculty recommends abolition of compulsory military training; EP........ 570
  - War memorial, German name omitted; EP..545; see also E..344; C..451, 631
  - See also Militarism
- Corporations
  - Control of business wealth; EP........ 464
- Correspondents, Washington. See Newspapers
- Cotton, Joseph Potter
  - Death; EP........ 315
- Cotton
  - Consumption drop, and market glut; EP........ 86
- Couch, Harvey Crowley
  - Drought relief victory. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 207
- Couzens, James
  - Views on economics; E........ 467
- Crane, Hart
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.. 8
- Craven, Thomas. P. Rosenfeld; A........ 510
- Credit, international
  - Allocation; EP........ 492
  - Norman, M. C., visit to United States; EP........ 464
- Criminal code, the. A. Bakshy; D........ 80
- Criticism
  - Literary; how novels get bad Marx. H. Hazlitt; S........ 354
- Cronin, J. F.
  - Seattle readers of The Nation asked to meet; C........ 680
- Cross, Gertrude M.
  - Massingham, H. W., correct initials; C 216
- Cuba
  - Dictatorship. M. Kaufman; IS........ 309
  - Rights in. L. H. Jenks; C......154; see also C........ 328
  - Washington support of Machado fails to protect American property; EP...... 115
- Cunard company
  - Liners, new; EP........ 438
- Currency
  - Silver price collapse; EP........ 202
- Curtis, Anna L.
  - School for peace workers; C........ 584
- Curtis, Charles
  - Retirement as vice-president at end of term reported. P. Y. Anderson; S... 207
- Curtius, Foreign Minister
  - Invited with Chancellor Brüning to visit England; EP........ 438
- Customs agreement, Austro-German. See Austro-German customs agreement
- Cycling. See Bicycling days.

D

- Dairy industry, New England. See Coolidge, C.
- Danubian states. See Grain
- Danville, Virginia. See Strikes—textile mills, southern
- Darrow, Clarence
  - Debate on religion with G. K. Chesterton; S........ 130
- Daughters of the American revolution
  - Wyoming, and communism. W. W. Wolfe; C........ 99
- Davies, Louise
  - Librarians; C......532; see also...... 213
- Deaf, appeal to. L. M. Neuschutz; C...... 680
- Debates. H. Hazlitt; S........ 130
- Debts, repudiation; EP........ 397
- de Forest, Robert W.
  - Death; EP........ 545
- Degrees, honorary
  - Views of W. Rogers; EP........ 597
- Democratic party
  - National committee; Chairman Raskob evokes row over prohibition; EP..... 286
  - Raskob program. P. Y. Anderson; S......326; see also C........ 477
- Dennett, Mary Ware
  - "Married love" and censorship; S..... 579
- Dennett, Tyler
  - Leaves State department for Princeton university chair; reasons for step; EP 517
- Denny, Ludwell
  - Praises Hallgren articles; C........ 659
- Deportation
  - Aliens and the courts; EP......2; see also C........128, 243
  - Doak the deportation chief. G. Jackson; S........ 295
  - Number expected to reach 20,000 in present year; EP........ 437
  - Oppenheimer report on immigration and deportation laws; EP........ 463
  - Protest meeting broken up by police, New York; EP........ 570
  - Radical aliens, cases of; EP........ 597
- Depression. See Business depression; Economic conditions, world
- Dessoff choirs. A. Mendel; M........ 509
- Detroit's liberal mayor. M. A. Hallgren; S 526
- Devil in the mind. M. V. D.; D........ 590
- Dictionary of American biography
  - Allen Johnson, editor, dies; EP........ 87
- Dirigible. A. Bakshy; D........ 485
- Dirt farmers. See Agricultural relief
- Disarmament. See Armament Limitation; Armaments
- Disgusted ex-colonel A. E. F.
  - Pershing war memoirs; C........ 99
- Dividends
  - And wages. J. C. Menzel; C........ 71
- Divorce
  - Nevada and other states contend for business; EP........ 259
- Doak, Secretary W. N. See Deportation
- Doctor X. M. Van Doren; D........ 251
- Dole. See Unemployment
- Dominican republic
  - Trujillo dictatorship; EP........ 231
- Dos Passos, John
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Douglas, Stephen A.
  - Biographical material sought. G. F. Milton; C........ 329
- Douglas, W. A. S.
  - Chicago election circus; S........ 269
- Doumer, Paul. See France
- Drama. See Theater, the
- Drifter, the; difficulties; Dt........ 44
- Drought
  - Anarchy and the Red cross; E........ 144
  - Conditions. A. Robbins; S........ 151
  - Hoover muddle. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 93
  - Hoover "victory." P. Y. Anderson; S.. 207
  - Relief; "compromise" plan; EP........ 167
  - Relief; conflict in Washington. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 150
- Duffy, Edmund.
  - You're a menace; Ct........ 601
- Dunn, Waldo H.
  - Requests material for biography of R. D. Blackmore; C........ 659

E

- Easiest way, the. A. Bakshy; D........ 305
- Eastman, Max
  - Egrets; P........ 299
  - Trotzky, L., books for; C........ 611
- Eckstein, Moses
  - Defends Jewish teaching on alleviation of pain; C......451; see also....... 293
- Economic conditions, American. See Business; Business depression
- Economic conditions, world
  - Depression caused by war debts and high tariffs; EP........ 464
  - International conference to be held in Paris. E. G. Balch; C........ 274
  - United States blocks way to rehabilitation; E........ 546
  - See also Business depression
- Economics
  - Questions raised by Senator Couzens; E 467
- Editor and Publisher, the
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Edman, Irwin
  - After a Mozart quartet; P........ 217
  - Suddenly in the desert; P........ 585
- Education
  - Ballyhoo and the higher learning. B. Stolberg; S..175; see also C........ 328
  - Experimental College. See Wisconsin University
  - Higher; Dt........ 407
  - Higher, at University of California. One who used a chair; C........ 352
  - "Higher" in United States; EP....... 667
  - "Hire learning" at Ohio state university. N. Thomas; S........ 654
  - Progressive, at Bennington college; EP 649
  - See also Colleges and universities
- Einstein, Albert
  - Verses on; Dt........ 297
- Elections
  - Nye committee expense account; EP.... 142
  - Nye campaign accounts misrepresented. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 207
- Elliott, Grace
  - Marion, North Carolina, strikers' families make hooked rugs for sale; C.... 17
- Elliott, John
  - Germany's bid for independence; IS... 566
- Emigration. See Immigration
- Emory university
  - Athletics at. V. Woodward; C..478; see also E........ 172
- Empire state building
  - Architecture. D. Haskell; S........ 589
- Employment exchange bill, Wagner. See Unemployment
- England. See Great Britain
- English language
  - Incorrect usage in advertising of books on good English. S. T. Byington; C. 352
- Englishmen
  - Self-sufficiency; Dt........ 450
- Epstein, Jacob
  - Verses on; Dt........ 297
- Espionage
  - War-time act still in force; EP....... 167
- Ethel, Garland O.
  - Soup line in Seattle; S........ 208
- Europe
  - Broaden, or die! R. Rolland; S...443; letter of correction........ 532
  - Darkest hour. O. G. Villard; S....... 549
  - Grain conference. See Grain
  - Hoover administration moves at last; E 668
  - Sees bankruptcy of leadership in United States; EP........ 86
  - United States of Europe plan strikes snags; EP........ 86
- European war
  - Harvard memorial, and others; German names on; E......344; EP, 545; see also C........451, 631
  - Kaiser, the, and King George. P. Wilmot; C........ 129
  - Responsibility for; "Coming of the war," by B. Schmitt. H. E. Barnes; C.127; letters in reply........ 128
  - Treaty revision urged by American legion post; EP........ 570
  - Versailles treaty; Prince Max of Baden and the treaty; IP........ 166
- Expenditures, for luxuries and for necessities; Dt........ 658
- Experimental college. See Wisconsin university

F

- Farm board and relief. See Agricultural relief
- Farmers
  - And politics. B. C. Borreson; C...... 71
- Farming. See Agricultural research

- Farson, Negley
  - Ukraine, "pacification" by Poles; S.... 14
- Fascism. See Italy; Toscanini, A.
- Federal power commission
  - Controversy between president and senate; P. Y. Anderson; S.... 93
  - Controversy between president and senate; E 60
  - Employees dismissed summarily; EP.... 1
  - Nominations, action on; EP.... 168
  - Rate control decision; EP.... 141
- Ferm, Alexis C.
  - Hoover and Proudhon; C.... 408
- Fiction
  - Novel from James to Joyce. J. W. Beach; S 634
- Fighting caravans, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 199
- Filipinos in the United States
  - On the Pacific coast. H. Phillips; S.... 12
- Films. See Moving pictures
- Finances, United States. See United States
- Finger, Charles J.
  - Literature and the reds; S.... 350
- Finney, Ruth
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Fischer, Louis
  - One hundred thousand, not 1,000,000, Fords from Russia; C.... 72
  - Russia's five-year plan, chances for success; S 119
  - Trial of Ramzin and others, Moscow; S.. 41
- Fish committee. See Communists
- Five star final. H. Broun; D..53; see also EP 287
- Five-year plan, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 687
- Fletcher, John Gould
  - Meditation in Forty-second street; P.... 415
- Flexner, Abraham
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Food
  - Corn sugar, use of, need no longer be declared on label; EP.... 2
  - Unattainable; Dt 242
- Foreign policy association
  - C. Merriman, former secretary, dies; EP 3
- Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign
- Fortune (magazine). M. St. John; S...239; see also C.... 329
- Foster, H. M.
  - Negro chain stores; Colored merchants' association; S 271
- Four preludes. C. Aiken; P.... 183
- France
  - Alliance with Belgium combated by Belgian socialists and Flemings; EP.... 3
  - Disarmament. See Disarmament
  - Economic depression hits country; EP ..115; EP 231
  - Loans to foreign countries; EP.... 169
  - Navy. See Armament Limitation
  - Presidency; A. Briand defeated; P. Doumer elected; E 573
  - To negotiate trade agreement with Russia; EP.... 518
  - Unemployment; figures; EP.......115, 231
- Franco-Italian naval agreement. See Naval reduction
- Frankfurter Zeitung
  - Sells large part of stock to dye trust; EP......169; correction; stock not sold to dye trust; EP.... 287
- Frantz, Harry
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C.... 155
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom of the press
  - Minnesota "gag" law upset by United States supreme court; EP.... 621
  - War-time restriction still in force; EP.. 167
- Freud, Sigmund
  - Seventy-first anniversary; EP.... 545
- Frick, Wilhelm. See Germany
- Friends of music, society of. A. Mendel; M 509
- Front page, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 428
- Frost, Frances M.
  - Poets; P 48
- Fuller, Buckminster
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Fuller, Henry R.
  - Arrested in Memphis for inquiries about communism; EP 287
- Fulton, Vera
  - On rational evolution, by R. Briffault; C......532; see also 333

G

- Gambel, Marie
  - Ukrainians, not Ruthenians; C.... 72
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
- Gangi, Cero
  - Freed after serving time for murder, although innocent; EP.... 31
- Garman, Allen D.
  - Nivernais sheep; C......532; see also.. 443
- Garrison, William Lloyd
  - Career; centenary of the Liberator. H. R. Mussey; S 9
  - Influence in making of a Japanese pacifist. A. S. Blackwell; C.... 243
  - Liberator, the, centenary; E.... 4
- Gasoline
  - Control of market. L. M. Hughes; S.. 178
- George V
  - And Emperor William, in war time. P. Wilmot; C 129
- George Washington (Hudson river) bridge. D. Haskell; S 334
- Germany
  - Bülow, Fürst Bernhard von; Denkwürdigkeiten. O. G. Villard; S.... 211
  - Food tariffs; going through the rye. H. Klein; S 377
  - German - Austrian customs union. See Austro-German customs agreement
  - German front, on the. O. G. Villard; S 37
  - Government by emergency decree; EP... 368
  - Hoover administration moves at last; E.. 668
  - Independence, bid for. J. Elliott; IS... 566
  - In the last ditch; E.... 651
  - Loans from France and America. F. Wertgen; C 353
  - National socialists, led by A. Hitler, fail to keep W. Frick in office; EP.... 396
  - Oberlaender fund for understanding with the United States; EP.... 397
  - Parliamentary government wins victory; EP 203
  - Political parties and the government; EP 286
  - Politics. O. G. Villard; S.... 37
  - Unemployment relief. O. Brok; S.... 237
  - War debts and reparations, Germany's ability to pay. O. G. Villard; S.... 91
- Getting married. M. Van Doren; D.... 430
- Gibernau, Joseph
  - Tariff commission again; C.... 611
- Giddings, Franklin Henry
  - Death; EP 667
- Gilbert, Joseph
  - Lincoln, Nebraska, readers of The Nation asked to meet; C.... 680
- Gilbert and Sullivan light operas. M. Van Doren; D 619
- Give me yesterday. M. Van Doren; D.... 306
- Gold
  - Russian, seizure in litigation; EP.... 666
- Goldberg, Isaac
  - Noah, M. M., biographical material sought; C 409
- Goldfish and liberty; E 62
- Gomez, Juan Vicente. See Venezuela
- Goodman, Irvin
  - Insanity in Oregon; confinement of M. Kulikoff for radical activity; C...... 298; EP 340
- Gordon, Vivian
  - Murdered; daughter commits suicide; EP 287
- Gorki, Maxim
  - Biographical material sought. A. Kaun; C 329
- Governors' conference
  - Roosevelt, Ritchie, and Pinchot; E.... 650
- Grain
  - London conference; hard job; EP.... 569
  - London conference to discuss surplus; EP 518
  - News, prices, acreage, Rome conference, etc.; EP 368
  - Paris conference intended to stabilize politically the Danubian states; EP.. 257
  - Rome conference makes suggestions only; E 399
- Grattan, C. Hartley
  - Australia's wool scheme; C......558; see also book review.... 506
- Gray shadow. M. Van Doren; D.... 336
- Great Barrington, the. M. Van Doren; D... 282
- Great Britain
  - Brüning and Curtius invited for visit; EP 438
  - Budget, Snowden; EP 491
  - Coal and textile strikes; EP.... 30
  - England fights on. O. G. Villard; S... 263
  - Industry reorganization plan; EP.... 202
  - Labor government wins on unemployment issue; EP 465
  - Labor or a coalition; E.... 343
  - Labor party's future; E.... 145
  - Labor-Liberal schism; EP.... 368
  - Land-value taxation, Snowden proposals; E 547
  - MacDonald government tenure uncertain; EP 230
  - New party called for by Sir O. Mosley; EP 258
  - Politics; article by Mrs. S. Webb in Political Quarterly; E.... 442
  - Unemployment; dole not ruining Great Britain; EP 230
  - Unemployment relief measures, royal; Dt 154
- Greater love. M. Van Doren; D.... 306
- Greek language. See Yale university
- Greenburg, Sophie
  - Nation club of San Francisco, annual dinner; C 99
- Green grow the lilacs. M. Van Doren; D... 164
- Gregg, Richard B.
  - India, struggle; C.... 215
- Gregory, Horace
  - Birthday in April; P.... 506
  - New mythology, the; S.... 413
- Grover, Edwin D.
  - Professor of books replies to criticism; C......328; see also 175
- Gruening, Ernest
  - Adds to Anderson's Washington honor roll of newspaper correspondents; C... 155
  - Haiti marches toward freedom; IS.... 362
- Guatemala
  - Orellana, President, takes office with Washington's approval; EP.... 3
  - Seizure of power by Orellana; EP.... 30
- Gunther, John
  - Austria, brighter days in; S.... 65
- Gustav Adolf, king of Sweden; Dt.... 327

H

- H_2O. A. Bakshy; D.... 359
- H., H.
  - America's sweetheart; D.... 251
  - Inspector general, the; D.... 53
  - Meet my sister; D.... 53
  - Privilege car; D.... 308
  - Truth game, the; D.... 53
- Haiti
  - Forbes commission recommendations; EP. 492
  - Freedom, plans for; EP.... 622
  - Marches toward freedom. E. Gruening; IS 362
  - Protests against American occupation expected; EP 570
- Haitian commission
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Haldane, J. B. S.
  - What I think about; S.... 525
- Hale, William Harlan
  - Yale's cathedral orgy; S......471; see also C 631
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.
  - Articles praised. L. Denny; C.... 659
  - Cancer cure of Doctors Coffey and Humber; Secretary Wilbur and the cure; S 373
  - Chicago goes Tammany; S.... 446
  - Detroit's liberal mayor; S.... 526
  - Hard times and hard facts; S.... 266
  - La Follette, Philip Fox; S.... 473
  - La Follette, Robert Marion, jr.; S.... 235
  - Middletown (South Bend, Indiana), easy times in; S.... 496
  - Poland courts a new war; IS.... 80
  - Power regulation, farce of; S.... 673
  - Progressives' conference, Washington; S. 320
  - War policies commission, meeting; S.... 575
- Hand, Learned
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Hard, Anne
  - Hard, Billie, and Mr. Hoover; C.... 215
- Hard, Billie, and Mr. Hoover. A. Hard; C 215
- Hard, William
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Harding, T. Swann
  - Is advertising honest? S.... 555
  - One of the six million; S.... 676
  - Praises The Nation; C.... 72
- Harding, Warren Gamaliel
  - Hoover address that was not delivered; E 670
- Harris, Albert
  - Cabrera "plot," Mexico; IS.... 688
- Harris, Charles K.
  - Death; E 7
- Harris, Frank
  - Seeks material for biography of G. B. Shaw; C 17
- Hartogensis, B. H.
  - Maryland, religious liberty in; C.... 680
- Harvard university
  - Scrubwomen get back pay; EP.... 3
  - War memorial, and other memorials; E......344; see also C.... 451
  - War memorial, not to contain German soldiers' names; EP.... 545
- Harwood, Ruth
  - California not civilized; C......451; see also 347
- Haskell, Douglas
  - Chicago world's fair; S.... 55
  - Empire state building; S.... 589
  - George Washington (Hudson river) bridge; S 334
  - Metropolis of tomorrow; S......55; see also C 274
  - New school for social research building; S 221
- Hawks, Frank Monroe
  - Flights; EP 666
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Hayti. See Haiti

- Hazlitt, Henry
  - Books, fine, in dispraise of; S........ 559
  - Constitution, United States, obsolete; S. 124
  - Criticism, literary; how novels get bad Marx; S........................ 354
  - Debates; S 130
  - Dollar books: An autopsy; S.......... 18
- Heat wave. M. Van Doren; D............ 251
- Heath, Louis
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C...... 155
- Henderson, Arthur
  - Denounces tariffs; E.................. 598
- Herbst, Josephine
  - Replies to I Schneider on simplicity in writing; C......275; see also........ 184
- Hertz, Friedrich
  - German-Austrian customs agreement; IS. 461
- Hessian hills school, fire; pupils offer aid in rebuilding; EP.................... 143
- Hevia, Manuel G.
  - Trial, delayed, of A. Hevia and others; C.,....328; see also 154
- Higher education; Dt..................... 407
- Hindenburg, von, President
  - Peace, New Year's day address; EP.... 29
- Hirst, Albert
  - On naturalization law; C.............. 659
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- Hobo. M. Van Doren; D................ 251
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell
  - Ninetieth anniversary; E.............. 262
- Hoover, Herbert
  - Administration moves at last on Europe; E 668
  - Administration suffers in house of representatives. P. Y. Anderson; S...... 268
  - Administration; two years of; E........ 288
  - "American system" still favored by president; EP........................ 665
  - And Proudhon. A. C. Ferm; C....... 408
  - Business depression, views on.......... 297
  - Business depression, views on; denies aid to Europe; E...................... 624
  - Colonial possessions, opinion on; EP... 367
  - Congress; president refuses again to call extra session; EP 595
  - Drought relief and unemployment, plays politics with; EP 85
  - Drought relief, conflict with congress. P. Y. Anderson; S................. 150
  - Drought relief muddle. P. Y. Anderson; S 93
  - Government structure; president's lack of information. P. Y. Anderson; S...... 39
  - Hard, Billie, and Mr. Hoover. A. Hard; C 215
  - Harding, W. G.; an address that was not delivered; E 670
  - In action; E.......................... 399
  - Lincoln Day radio talk; EP............ 201
  - Neglect of suffering; EP.............. 201
  - Plight after two years in office. P. Y. Anderson; S......326; see also C.... 477
  - Prohibition, hedging on. P. Y. Anderson; S 150
  - Public-buildings bluff. R. A. Black; S.. 656
  - Railroad consolidation; President's attitude. P. Y. Anderson; S........... 39
  - Record. I. Tragedy of Herbert Hoover. O. G. Villard; S.................... 671
  - To inspect West Indies; EP............ 313
  - Unemployment and drought relief, plays politics with; EP.................. 85
  - Unemployment, views on reprinted...... 297
  - Unemployment, views on. A. Pinchot; S. 43
- Horne, Richard Hengist
  - Material for biography sought. E. J. Shumaker; C 72
- Hospitals
  - Baker memorial hospital, Boston, reasonable charges; EP.................. 341
- House, Edward Mandell
  - Supports F. D. Roosevelt for presidency; EP 666
- House beautiful, the. M. Van Doren; D... 359
- How he lied to her husband. M. Van Doren; D 135
- Howland, Emily
  - Biographical material sought. H. M. Mills; C 244
- Hudson river bridge. See George Washington bridge
- Hughes, Lawrence M.
  - Your gasoline tank; S................ 178
- Humber, Doctor John D. See Cancer
- Hutchins, Robert Maynard
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Hyde, Arthur M.
  - Corn sugar, action on. P. Y. Anderson; S 39
- Hyde, Henry
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents; E. Gruening; C...... 155
- Hydroelectric power. See Power and power industry

I

- Ideals and meals. C. H. Bennett; C........ 129
- Idleness in college; Dt.................... 180
- Illinois state prison, Joliet. See Prisons
- Illinois state prison, Stateville. See Prisons
- Illness, monetary measure; E.............. 468
- Immigration
  - Oppenheimer report on immigration and deportation laws; EP.............. 463
  - Restriction still irks Japanese; EP...... 114
- In the best of families. M. Van Doren; D.. 198
- Income tax
  - Inequalities of income revealed by returns; EP 1
- India
  - Complications piling up; EP............ 314
  - Conditions for negotiations laid down by Gandhi; EP........................ 143
  - Conference, London, results; E........ 89
  - Conference, London, results; criteria for judging. G. Slocombe; S........... 173
  - Constitution, proposed; EP............. 58
  - Gandhi and Irwin seek compromise; EP. 259
  - Gandhi and other nationalists released from prison; EP.................... 113
  - Gandhi counsels his followers; IP...... 394
  - Gandhi to visit London; EP........... 396
  - Gandhi, triumph of; E................ 372
  - Progress in; E....................... 289
  - Struggle. R. B. Gregg; C............ 215
- Indians
  - Arts, tribal, exposition. J. Sloan; C.... 478
  - Arts, tribal, exposition. H. Alexander; S 501
- Individualism
  - Attacked at International labor conference; EP......................... 622
  - Rugged if not ragged. F. L. Spackman, jr.; C 477
- Inferiority, modern; Dt.................... 215
- Injunctions
  - Yellow-dog. Subscriber; C............ 71
- Inspector general, the. H. H.; D.......... 53
- Institute for advanced study
  - Announcement of purpose; E......... 146
- Institute of international relations
  - To be held at Haverford college. A. L. Curtis; C 584
- Insurance, unemployment
  - Governors' conference stimulates discussion; EP 114
  - Socialist proposals. A. B. Lewis; C.... 16
- Insurance, wage. J. C. Menzel; C......71; see also C 129
- International bank. See Bank, international
- International chamber of commerce
  - Convention; United States blocks way; E 546
  - Convention, Washington; EP.......... 492
- International conference on economic crisis. See Economic conditions, world
- International labor conference
  - Individualism attacked; EP............ 622
- Investment trusts
  - Listing on New York stock exchange; EP 492
  - Regulation needed; EP................ 2
- Iraq
  - British preserve, a. D. W. Wainhouse; IS 27
- Ireland
  - Proportional representation; IP........ 410
- Irwin, Lord. See India
- Italian-French naval agreement. See Armament limitation
- Italy
  - Anti-fascism; appeal stays deportation of G. Serio; EP......2; see also C.... 128
  - Navy. See Armament limitation
  - Transatlantic flight; EP.............. 59
  - Vatican and state conflict; Catholic Action dissolved; EP................ 622
  - See also Toscanini, A.

J

- Jackson, Gardner
  - Doak, the deportation chief; S........ 295
  - Wickersham commission; report and work; S........................... 63
- Japanese in the United States
  - Immigration restriction still irks Japan; EP 114
  - On the Pacific coast. H. Phillips; S.. 12
- Jenks, Leland H.
  - Cuba, rights in; C...154; see also C... 328
- Jennings, Leslie Nelson
  - Descent from the tower; P............ 100
  - Hour of the lizard; P................ 383
- Jews
  - Teaching on alleviation of pain defended. M. Eckstein; C..451; see also....... 293
- Jobless. See Unemployment
- Joffre, Marshal
  - Death; E.......................... 34
- Johnson, Allen
  - Death: EP......................... 87
- Johnson, James Weldon
  - Dinner in his honor; EP............. 571
- Johnson, Myron M.
  - On afterthoughts of C. Coolidge; C.... 17
- Johnson, Nelson Trusler
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Johnston, Esther
  - Librarians; C..381; see also.......... 213
- Johnston, Mercer G.
  - Red cross finances; C................ 181
- Joliet, Illinois. See Prisons
- Jones, Weimar
  - North Carolina's new senators; S..... 11
- Jones-Cooper bill. See Maternity protection
- Josephson, Matthew
  - Billings, Henry; A.................. 196
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Joy of living. M. Van Doren; D......... 460
- Jugoslavia
  - Sufflay murder, and others; EP....... 544

K

- Kalamazoo public library, staff of
  - Librarians; C......381; see also 213
- Kassay, Paul F.
  - Indictment on sabotage charge dismissed; EP 518
- Kaufman, Malwon
  - Cuban dictatorship; IS............... 309
- Kaun, Alexander
  - Seeks Gorki biographical material; C... 329
- Kelley, Florence
  - Candy white list grows; C............ 452
- Kelley, Robert M.
  - Automobiles, causes of personal injuries by; C......129; see also C......... 72
- Kemal Pasha, Mustapha. See Turkey
- Kenmatsu, Sadaichi
  - Deportation; EP.................... 597
- Kersey, R. B.
  - Coolidge, C., and his entourage; C..477; see also.......................... 326
- King. Carol Weiss
  - Serio, Guido, case of; C......243; see also EP......2, and C.............. 128
- Kings and grandmothers. P. Wilmot; C... 129
- Kirby, Rollin
  - Bicycling days; S......126; C........ 181
- Klein, Herbert
  - Going through the rye; Germany's food tariffs; S.......................... 377
- Knickerbocker, H. R.
  - Pulitzer award commended; EP........ 545
- Koeninger, Rupert
  - Ambassador's salary; C..329; see also.. 239
- Kraus, Dr. Siegfried
  - Vienna, social welfare in; IS.......... 138
- Kuczynski, Robert R. See Population, United States
- Kulikoff, Mike. See Communism

L

- Labor
  - System, wasteful. B. Arthur; C...... 631
  - Wage reduction, campaign rumored; EP 395
  - Wage reduction continues; EP......... 648
  - Wage reduction, virtual; EP........... 142
  - Wages and dividends. J. C. Menzel; C......71; see also C.............. 129
- Labor party (British). See Great Britain
- Lady beyond the moon. M. Van Doren; D. 430
- La Follette, Philip Fox. M. A. Hallgren; S 473
- La Follette, Robert Marion, jr.
  - M. A. Hallgren; S.................. 235
- "Lame ducks." See Congress
- La Motte, Ellen N.
  - Opium—China's ancient enemy; IS.... 514
- Land taxation. See Great Britain
- Langdon, William Henry
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Lands, public. See Public lands
- Latin America
  - Loans and revolutions. D. Pearson; S. 45
  - Recognition of governments by the United States; EP................. 30
  - United States in. E. J. Segal; C..531; see also E......................... 467
- Latin language. See Yale university
- Lawlessness. See United States
- Lawrence, Massachusetts. See Strikes—Textile mills—Massachusetts
- Lawyers. See Legal profession
- Laymen and museums. H. Berliner; C..477; see also.......................... 160
- League of composers, concert. A. Mendel; M 106
- Learning, higher, ballyhoo and. B. Stolberg; S......175; see also C........ 328
- Leblang, Joseph
  - Death; EP......................... 465
- Le Gallienne, Eva
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Legal profession
  - Bar for sale, New York city; E........ 117
- Leitzel, Lillian
  - Death; EP......................... 203
- Le Million. A. Bakshy; D.............. 645
- Lewis, Alfred Baker
  - Party, new; C..274; see also E....... 88
  - Unemployment insurance, socialist proposals; C......................... 16
- Lewis, Marx
  - Berger, Victor L., foundation; C...... 216

- Lewys, Georges. See Plagiarism.......... 315
- Liberal party. See Third party
- Liberator, the
  - Centenary; E.......... 4
  - Centenary; career of W. L. Garrison. H. R. Mussey; S.......... 9
- Liberia
  - Slavery; EP......59; EP.......... 87
- Liberty and goldfish; E.......... 62
- Liberty, civil. See Civil liberty
- Libraries and librarians
  - I became a librarian. C. Auer; S..213; see also C..........381, 532
  - Louisiana experiment with establishment of libraries; E.......... 371
- Liebeswalzer. A. Bakshy; D.......... 645
- Lindsey, Ben B.
  - Upheld in controversy with Bishop Manning. E. J. Ostrow; C.......... 17
- Literature
  - Simplicity, fetish of. I. Schneider; S......184; reply by J. Herbst...... 275
  - See also Books; Criticism; Fiction
- Llewellyn, K. N.
  - Foreigners' criticisms of Americans; C. 329
- Loans, foreign
  - And revolutions; an explanation. D. Pearson; S.......... 45
  - Senate disapproves State department control; EP.......... 258
- London conference on India. See India
- Longworth, Nicholas
  - Death; E.......... 441
- Los Angeles Record
  - War, rules for; EP.......... 439
- Louisiana
  - Libraries, experiment with establishment; E.......... 371
- Lucas, Robert H. See Norris, G. W.; Republican party
- Lynchings
  - Marion, Indiana; aftermath of a lynching. W. Pickens; S..406; see also C 452
  - Missouri and North Dakota; EP...... 142
- Lyons, Barrow
  - Wheat chaos—pool or ruin? S.......... 581

M

- MacDonald government. See Great Britain
- Macintosh, Douglas C.
  - Citizenship denied to him by United States supreme court; EP.......... 595
  - Presbyterian general assembly opposes supreme court opinion; EP.......... 623
- Macleod, Norman
  - American, did not write "German lyric poetry"; C.......... 505
  - Inquest; P.......... 354
- MacMickle, Virgil
  - Oregon vote for public hydroelectric power; S.......... 96
- Mādel von der Reeperbahn, das. A. Bakshy; D.......... 538
- Magnes, Judah L.
  - Welcome to United States; EP.......... 315
- Manning, William Thomas
  - Lindsey, B. B., upheld in controversy with Bishop Manning. E. J. Ostrow; C... 17
- Manton, Martin Thomas
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Maracaibo. See Venezuela
- Margold, Nathan R.
  - Pueblo Indians, plight of; S.......... 121
- Marines, United States. See Nicaragua
- Marion, Indiana. See Lynchings
- Marion, North Carolina. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern
- Marx, Guido H.
  - How to control public utilities; S..... 348
- Maryland
  - Religious liberty in. B. H. Hartogensis; C.......... 680
- Mason, Genevieve W.
  - "Free" slaves in West Africa; IS..... 254
- Massingham, H. W., correct initials. G. M. Cross; C.......... 216
- Maternity
  - Death rate. C. A. Orr; C.......... 46
  - Death rate. M. S. Boyd; S......293; see also C.......... 451
  - Protection; Jones-Cooper maternity and infancy bill passes senate; EP....... 58
- Matson, Carlton K.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Matthews, Annie
  - Tells of Tammany methods in judgeship selections; EP.......... 465
- Max. Prince, of Baden
  - And the Versailles treaty; IP.......... 166
- Mayors' tour of France
  - Manners, bad; E.......... 623
- Mead, Margaret
  - Samoa, civil government for; IS...... 226
- Meat
  - Packers' consent decree modified; EP.. 57
- Mechanical principles. A. Bakshy; D..... 359
- Medical profession
  - Medical care, cost of; EP.......... 493
- Meet my sister. H. H.; D.......... 53
- Meiklejohn, Alexander
  - Wisconsin university's experimental college; S..325; rejoinder to S. Vivas on page.......... 322
- Mellon, Andrew William
  - Loss of prestige. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 268
  - Taxation, views on; EP.......... 596
- Melo. M. Van Doren; D.......... 512
- Memorials, war. See European war
- Mendel, Arthur
  - Bach festival; M.......... 618
  - Bruckner, neglected composer; M...... 334
  - Conductorless orchestra; M.......... 223
  - Dessoff choirs. A. Mendel; M.......... 509
  - Friends of music, society of; M....... 509
  - Metropolitan opera; if it should go musical; M..390; see also C..........451, 505
  - Music from behind a screen; M....... 106
  - Society of friends of music; M........ 509
  - Stokowski; M.......... 458
  - Stravinsky; M.......... 279
  - Tonality; M.......... 54
  - Toscanini; M.......... 163
- Menzel, J. C.
  - Better ideals than regular meals; C..71; see also C.......... 129
  - Municipally owned and managed utilities pay, Ames, Iowa; C..328; see also E 233
  - Roman catholic revival; C..328; see also E.......... 206
- Merriman, Christina
  - Death; EP.......... 3
- Metropolitan opera; if it should go musical. A. Mendel; M..390; see also C..451, 505
- Mexico
  - Cabrera, L., critic of present regime, arrested; EP.......... 571
  - Cabrera "plot" makes country giggle. A. Harris; IS.......... 688
- Michelson, Albert Abraham
  - Death; E.......... 548
- Michigan alien law; EP.......... 648
- "Micky mouse" (films)
  - Creator on The Nation's honor roll for 1930.......... [illegible]
- Middletown
  - Easy times (South Bend, Indiana). M. A. Hallgren; S.......... 497
- Midnight. D.V.D; D.......... 78
- Midwest
  - Discontent in; E.......... 495
- Mikado, the. M. Van Doren; D.......... 565
- Militarism
  - Cornell and Ohio state universities vote to abolish compulsory drill; EP...... 570
  - Drafting of American man power and materials resources proposed; E...... 572
  - Ohio state university faculty reverses decision; votes for drill; EP..595; EP.. 622
  - Sentiment against, increasing; EP...... 570
  - See also Miller, Herbert Adolphus
- Milk Monopoly. L. M. Rachofsky; C...... 352
- Millennium—why not? F. Wells; C........ 611
- Miller, Herbert Adolphus
  - Dismissal from Ohio state university for opposing militarism; EP.......... 595
  - Dismissal decided on a year ago; EP.. 622
  - In defense of surveys; C..611; see also 503
  - Ohio state university; "hire learning" at. N. Thomas; S..654; EP........ 667
- Millionaire, the. A. Bakshy; D.......... 590
- Mills, Harriet May
  - Howland, Emily; biographical material requested; C.......... 244
- Milton, George F.
  - Seeks biographical material on S. A. Douglas; C.......... 329
- Milton, John
  - Works published by Columbia university press; EP.......... 439
- Minnesota
  - Press "gag" law upset by United States supreme court; EP.......... 621
- Miracle at Verdun. M. Van Doren; D.... 360
- Modern inferiority; Dt.......... 215
- Money measures all; E.......... 468
- Mooney and Billings
  - Montana defenders called upon to meet; W. R. Parks; C.......... 505
  - Precedent, play based on Mooney case; EP.......... 667
- Moore, John Bassett
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Moore, Virginia
  - Tragic conclusions; P.......... 177
- Moorhead, Frank G.
  - Broke at fifty-five; S.......... 528
- Morrison, Cameron
  - New senator from North Carolina. W. Jones; S.......... 11
- Morrow, Dwight Whitney
  - As senator. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 207
- Morrow, Irving F.
  - Architecture, American; C..274; see also 55
- Morton, David
  - When the snow goes; P.......... 330
  - Winter's end; P.......... 613
- Mosley, Sir Oswald
  - Calls for new British party; EP........ 258
- Mothers. See Maternity
- Moving pictures
  - Films with music. A. Bakshy; D...... 359
  - German, invasion of America. A. Bakshy; S.......... 53[illegible]
  - Short comedies. A. Bakshy; D........ 687
- Mufson, Israel
  - Muste, A. J., in honor of; C.......... 216
- Müller, Hermann
  - Death; EP.......... 341
- Murphy, Frank
  - Detroit's liberal mayor. M. A. Hallgren; S.......... 526
- Murphy, M. Farmer
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Murphy, William C., jr.
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Murray, William H.; Dt.......... 127
- Muscle shoals
  - Compromise bill passed; EP.......... 229
  - Compromise on. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 268
  - Government operation, step toward; EP 57
  - Power trust attempt to wreck Norris plan. P. Y. Anderson; S.......... 39
  - Veto of bill; E.......... 289
- Museum of modern art
  - Bread lines and [illegible] museum. P. Rosenfeld; A......160; see also C........ 477
  - Defended. H. Berliner; C..477; see also.......... 160
- Museums
  - Laymen and museums. H. Berliner; C......477; see also.......... 160
- Music
  - From behind a screen. A. Mendel; M. 106
- Mussey, Henry Raymond
  - Garrison, breaker of chains; S......... 9
- Mussolini, Benito
  - Butler, General S. D., court-martial avoided, for story about Mussolini; EP 168
  - Criticism by General S. D. Butler; EP 143
  - Peace; New year's day address; EP... 29
- Muste, A. J.
  - Dinner in his honor. I. Mufson; C.... 216
- Mustapha Kemal Pasha. See Turkey
- Myers, William Starr
  - Demands curb on senate; EP.......... 29

N

- Napi. M. Van Doren; D.......... 359
- Nation, The
  - Hallgren articles praised. L. Denny; C 659
  - Honor roll for 1930.......... 8
  - San Francisco club, annual dinner. S. Greenburg; C.......... 99
  - Seattle and Lincoln, Nebraska, readers asked to meet; C.......... 680
  - Word of cheer from a subscriber. T. S. Harding; C.......... 72
- Nation and Athenaeum, the (London)
  - Merger with the New Statesman; EP... 115
- National civic federation
  - Calls for conference to work out ten-year plan for United States; EP.......... 665
- National commission on law observance and enforcement
  - Report. P. Y. Anderson; S.......... 150
  - Report and work. G. Jackson; S...... 63
  - Report; confusion worse confounded; E. 116
- National foreign trade council
  - Attacks tariff; EP.......... 621
- National recreation association
  - Twenty-fifth anniversary; E.......... 290
- Naturalization. See Citizenship
- Naval reduction. See Armament Limitation
- Navy, United States
  - Big-navy propaganda fails; EP........ 258
- Negroes
  - Alabama boys' case. See Negroes. Scottsboro
  - Among those surveyed. G. A. Steward; S....503; see also C.......... 611
  - Chain stores; colored merchants' association. H. M. Foster; S.......... 271
  - Literature; reply to criticism of Black no more. J. Schuyler; C..382; see also..........218, 631
  - Lynchings. See Lynchings
  - Miscegenation, Alabama justice. H. R. Shapiro; C......679; see also....... 608
  - Scottsboro, Alabama, case; eight boys sentenced to death; EP.......... 465
  - Scottsboro, Alabama, case; eight who must not die. D. Van Doren; S..608; see also C.......... 679
  - Unemployment; E.......... 441
- Neuschutz, Louise M.
  - Deaf, appeal to; C.......... 680
- Nevada. See Divorce
- New England dairy industry. See Coolidge, C.
- New party. See Progressives
- New river, Virginia. See Power and power industry
- New school for social research building. D. Haskell; S.......... 221
- New Statesman and Nation, the (London)
  - Formed by merger of the Nation and Athenaeum and the New Statesman; EP.......... 115

New York city
  Bar. See Legal profession
  Cleaning up government; E........... 370
  Corruption, political; E............... 317
  Investigations of government; EP..339; E 521
  Judiciary scandals; V. Gordon murdered; daughter commits suicide; EP....... 287
  Scandals, and Mayor Walker's breakdown; EP........................ 86
  Tammany ways with judgeships revealed by A. Matthews; EP............... 465
  Walker defense; EP.................. 491
  Walker replies to City affairs committee; EP 463
New York state
  Judiciary appointments approved; EP... 397
  Power. See Power and Power Industry
New York Times
  News, presentation of; EP............ 369
New York World
  End; sale; history; E................ 261
New York World almanac; E.............. 90
Newspaper censorship. See Censorship, press
Newspapers
  Chicago liberal press needed. T. Rylands and H. G. Wexler; C.............. 505
  National newspaper, a; E............. 495
  Washington correspondents, honor roll. P. Y. Anderson; S................. 93
  Washington correspondents, honor roll, additions suggested by E. Gruening; C 155
  See also Censorship, press; Freedom of the press
Nicaragua
  Americans in; E..467; see also letter.. 531
  Americans in; new governmental policy announced; E...................... 467
  Battle; occupation by United States marines; EP........................ 31
Nicholl, Louise Townsend
  Her pain; P......................... 240
Nilsson, B. E.
  Russia's economic program; C......... 16
Noah, Mordecai Manuel
  Biographical material sought. I. Goldberg; C.......................... 409
Norman, Montagu Collet
  Visit to United States; EP........... 464
Norris, George William
  Defeat attempted by R. H. Lucas by disreputable methods; E............... 6
  Indictments of opponents returned in Nye investigation of campaign; EP...... 113
  Lucas attempt to defeat him. P. Y. Anderson; S...................... 39
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
  Plot to defeat, details revealed; EP... 258
North Carolina
  Senators, new. W. Jones; S.......... 11
Norway
  Election. L. L. Unstad; C........... 46
Novák, Sonia Ruthèle
  Hunted fox, the; P.................. 73
Novels. See Criticism; Fiction
Nudism; Dt............................ 530
Nye committee. See Elections

O

Oberlaender, Gustav
  Gives $1,000,000 to further American-German understanding; EP.......... 397
Ohio
  Criminal-syndicalism act declared unconstitutional; EP..................... 518
Ohio state university
  Compulsory military training to be abolished; EP......................... 570
  Compulsory military training; university reverses action on abolition; dismisses Professor H. A. Miller for opposing it; EP............................ 595
  Dismissal of Miller decided on a year ago; EP.......................... 622
  "Hire learning" at. N. Thomas; S.654; EP 667
Oil. See Petroleum
O'Keeffe, Georgia
  Show. P. Rosenfeld; A.............. 388
Old-age pensions
  Spreading rapidly; EP............... 518
Old man Murphy. M. Van Doren; D..... 619
Old Reader
  Hard times in the cattle country; C.... 680
Oliver, D. Harold
  On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
Once in a lifetime. M. Van Doren; D.... 391
One of the six million. H. S. Harding; S 676
One who used a chair
  Education, higher, at University of California; C......................... 352
O'Neill, Eugene
  Sued by G. Lewys, who alleges plagiarism; EP......................... 315
  Lewys suit dismissed; litigation plan proposed; EP...................... 493
Opium
  China's ancient enemy. E. N. La Motte; IS.......................... 514
Oppenheimer, Robert. See Immigration
Oregon
  Hydroelectric power, public, vote for. V. MacMickle; S.................. 96
  Insanity in; confinement of M. Kulikoff for radical activity. I. Goodman; C......298; EP.................... 340
Orellana, Manuel. See Guatemala
Oriental on the Pacific coast. H. Phillips; S 12
Orr, Charles A.
  Maternity mortality; C............... 46
Ostrow, E. J.
  Upholds B. B. Lindsey; C............ 17
Oustric, Banque. See Banque Oustric

P

Pach. Walter
  False art; C..631; see also............ 471
Pacifism
  Buttons, 2 per cent. misconstrued in Los Angeles. U. Sinclair; C....... 659
  Church pacifist, the; E.............. 494
  Citizenship denied to D. C. Macintosh and M. A. Bland by supreme court; EP 585
  Making of a Japanese pacifist. A. S. Blackwell; C........................ 243
  Organizations plan counter-demonstration to army air show; EP............. 544
  Presbyterian general assembly opposes supreme court opinion in Macintosh and Bland cases; EP............... 623
  School for workers. A. L. Curtis; C.. 584
Packers. See Meat
Pagliacci. A. Bakshy; D................. 305
Paid. A. Bakshy; D.................... 80
Palestine
  MacDonald letter to Weizmann makes concessions; EP.................... 203
Panama
  Revolution; EP....................... 30
Parks, Wade R.
  Mooney and Billings defenders in Montana called upon to meet; C......... 505
Party, new. See Progressives
Party of privilege, the; E................. 61
Paterson, Isabel
  Soliciting, inequitable law on; S....... 153
Pavlowa, Anna
  Death; E........................... 118
Peace
  Diplomats and peace; E............... 171
  Hindenburg and Mussolini addresses; EP 29
  See also Pacifism
Peace treaty with Germany. See European war
Pearson, Drew
  Loans and revolutions; S.............. 45
  Suggested for honor roll of Washington correspondents. E. Gruening; C..... 155
Pennsylvania
  Coal and iron police to be abolished; EP 142
Pennsylvania, university of
  Athletics, new policy of less emphasis on sport; E..172; see also C........... 478
Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
Perkins, Frances
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
Pershing, John Joseph
  Memoirs. Disgusted Ex-Colonel A. E. F.; C............................ 99
Peter Ibbetson. M. Van Doren; D........ 486
Petroleum
  Merger of Standard oil company of New York and Vacuum oil company; EP.. 168
  Mergers, renewed talk follows government decision; EP................. 648
  Stabilization conference; EP.......... 438
Philip goes forth. M. Van Doren; D..... 107
Philippine islands
  Independence movement; EP........... 596
Phillips, Hubert
  Oriental on the Pacific coast; S........ 12
Physicians. See Medical profession
Piccard, Auguste
  Ascent into stratosphere; EP.......... 623
Pickens, William
  Aftermath of a lynching; S.......406; see also C......................... 452
Pinchot, Amos
  Hoover, H., meeting with; S........... 43
Pinchot, Gifford
  At governors' conference; presidential possibility; E...................... 650
Pius XI
  Encyclical on socialism and communism; EP 597
  Radio address; E..206; see also C..... 328
Plagiarism
  O'Neill, Eugene, sued by G. Lewys, who alleges plagiarism; EP.............. 315
  Lewys suit dismissed; litigation plan proposed; EP..................... 493
Plays, censorship. See Censorship, plays
Poems
  After a Mozart quartet. I. Edman..... 217
  Ambition. M. Van Doren............. 559
  Before dawn. L. Untermeyer.......... 415
  Birthday in April. H. Gregory........ 506
  Career. K. Boyle..................... 414
  Descent from the tower. L. N. Jennings 100
  Earth is no symbol. H. S. White...... 681
  Egrets. M. Eastman................. 299
  Going home. M. Van Doren.......... 174
  Graves in China. L. Speyer........... 18
  Grindstone, the. R. P. T. Coffin....... 130
  Her pain. L. T. Nicholl............. 240
  Hour of the lizard. L. N. Jennings.... 383
  Hunt. K. Boyle...................... 245
  Hunted fox, the. S. R. Novák......... 73
  Inquest. N. Macleod................. 354
  Man indoors, the. R. P. T. Coffin..... 660
  Meditation in Forty-second street. J. G. Fletcher 415
  Poets. F. E. Frost................... 48
  Praise. M. Van Doren............... 275
  Prelude. C. Aiken.................. 453
  Sic semper. L. Untermeyer........... 636
  Silent land, the. J. Rorty............ 533
  Spring gardening. H. S. White....... 479
  Suddenly in the desert. I. Edman...... 585
  Tragic conclusions. V. Moore......... 177
  We part the husks. H. S. White...... 156
  When the snow goes. D. Morton....... 330
  Winter's end. D. Morton............ 613
Poetry
  American; the new mythology. H. Gregory; S........................ 413
  Light; Dt........................... 297
Poland
  Courts new war. M. A. Hallgren; IS.. 82
  Ukraine, "pacification" by Poles. N. Farson; S.......................... 14
Political prisoners, 1931. J. N. Beffel; S......475; correction, C........... 532
Pope, the. See Pius XI
Population, United States
  Decline forecast by R. R. Kuczynski; EP 464
Porto Rico
  Hoover opinion on; EP............... 367
Postley, Maurice G.
  Power for public profit; S............. 553
Post office department
  Lease scandals. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 207
Poverty ball, Saint Louis, Missouri; EP.... 115
Power and power industry
  Appalachian electric power company fights against federal supervision over New river plant; EP..................... 230
  Appalachian electric power company; "minor-part" license denied; EP.... 396
  Commission denies application for "minor-part" license by Appalachian power company; EP......................... 396
  New York state power authority appointed; EP......................... 544
  Oregon vote for public ownership and operation. V. MacMickle; S........ 96
  Power for public profit; report of the Saint Lawrence power development commission. M. G. Postley; S...... 553
  Rate control, sensible decision on; EP... 141
  Regulation, farce of. M. A. Hallgren; S 673
  Saint Lawrence power commission's engineering board proposes plant construction; EP..................... 31
  Saint Lawrence power commission's report; EP......................... 86
  Trust attempt to wreck Norris plan for Muscle shoals. P. Y. Anderson; S... 39
  See also Federal power commission
Power commission. See Federal power commission
Poynter, Mrs. Charles W. M.
  Seeks biographical material on Dr. Mary E. Walker; C....................... 72
Precedent; play based on Mooney case. M. Van Doren; D......486; EP........ 667
Presbyterian church
  General assembly opposes supreme court opinion in Macintosh and Bland cases; EP 623
  Special commission on marriage, divorce, and remarriage approves birth control; EP......................... 493
Presidential campaign of 1932
  Curtis, vice-president, retirement at end of term reported. P. Y. Anderson; S 207
  House, E.M., supports F. D. Roosevelt for presidency; EP................. 666
  Roosevelt, Ritchie, and Pinchot; E...... 650
  Young, Owen D., for president? P. Y. Anderson; S....................... 207
President, United States
  Appointments; E...................... 33
  See also Hoover, H.
Press, the. See Newspapers
Press censorship. See Censorship, press
Press, freedom. See Freedom of the press
Priestley, J. B.
  On reading by Americans; E..234; see also C........................... 329
Prisons
  Riots, Joliet, Illinois; EP............. 343
  Stateville, Illinois, "model" prison; E.. 343
Private lives. M. Van Doren; D.......... 164
Privilege car. H. H.; D................. 308

- Privilege, party of; E........ 61
- Professor of books replies to criticism. E. D. Grover; C..328; see also........ 175
- Progressives
  - Constitution, obsolete, an obstacle to a third party. H. Hazlitt; S........ 124
  - New party, toward a; E........ 32
  - Obstacles; E........ 117
  - Party for the people; E..88; see also C 274
  - Toward a new party; E........ 32
  - Washington conference; E........ 316
  - Washington conference. M. A. Hallgren; S........ 320
  - Washington conference. P. Y. Anderson; S......326; see also C........ 477
- Prohibition
  - Hoover hedging. P. Y. Anderson; S... 150
  - Wickersham commission report. See National commission on law observance and enforcement
  - See also Democratic party
- Prostitution
  - Soliciting, inequitable law on. I. Paterson; S........ 153
- Proudhon, Joseph Pierre
  - And Hoover. A. C. Ferm; C........ 408
- Public buildings. See United States
- Public lands
  - Transfer to states proposed; EP........ 287
- Public utilities
  - Control. G. H. Marx; S........ 348
- Public works
  - Not immediate cure for depression, engineers say; EP........ 85
  - Wages cut by contractors. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 150
- Pueblo Indians
  - Plight. N. R. Margold; S........ 121
- Puget sound, college of
  - "Higher" learning; EP........ 667
- Pulitzer awards
  - Prizes awarded; EP........ 517
  - Knickerbocker, H. R., award to, commended; EP........ 545
- Purity, racial. S. T. Byington; C..631; see also C........ 382

R

- Races, "pure." S. T. Byington; C..631; see also C........ 382
- Rachofsky, L. M.
  - Milk monopoly; C........ 352
- Radicals. See California
- Radio
  - Programs, American and British; E.146; C. 273
- Radio city
  - Plans arouse adverse criticism; E........ 400
- Railroads
  - Competition by other forms of transportation; EP........ 229
  - Consolidation plan, another; E........ 33
  - Holding companies, bill for control by Interstate commerce commission; EP.. 229
  - Plight; E........ 599
  - Statistics for 1930; EP........ 492
- Ramsay, Marion L.
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Ramzin, Professor. See Russia
- Rango. A. Bakshy; D........ 305
- Raskob, John J. See Democratic party
- Razors; Dt........ 556
- Reading, Americans'. See United States
- Red cross
  - Finances; EP..57; see also C........ 181
- "Red flag law." See California
- Reds. See Communists
- Relief, farm. See Agricultural relief
- Religion
  - Debate between C. Darrow and G. K. Chesterton; S........ 130
- Religious liberty in Maryland. B. H. Hartogensis; C........ 680
- Republican party
  - Lucas, R. H., despairs of making good Republicans of university students; EP 439
- Revolutionary Age
  - Loses mailing privilege; EP........ 621
- Revolutions, loans and. D. Pearson; S........ 45
- Rhapsody in black. M. Van Doren; D........ 565
- Rice, Elmer
  - Censorship of play, Street scene, by organized charity; S........ 628
- Right of happiness. M. Van Doren; D.... 460
- Ritchie, Albert Cabell
  - At governors' conference; presidential possibility; E........ 650
- Roads, curves; Dt........ 504
- Robbins, A.
  - Drought area; S........ 151
- Rock me, Julie. M. Van Doren; D........ 224
- Rogers, H. O.
  - Vanishing job, the; S........ 375
- Rogers, Will
  - Views on honorary degrees; EP........ 597
- Rogin, Lawrence
  - Post-office censorship again; S........ 379
- Rolland, Romain
  - Broaden, Europe, or die; S..443; letter of correction........ 532
- Rolph, James, jr. Governor. D. Aikman; S 35
- Roman catholic church. See Catholic church; Italy; Pius XI; Spain
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  - At governors' conference; presidential possibility; E........ 650
  - Judiciary appointments approved; EP... 397
- Rorty, James
  - Silent land, the; P........ 533
- Rosenfeld, Paul
  - Bacon, P., "characturist"; A........ 617
  - Bread lines and a museum; A..160; see also C........ 477
  - Craven, Thomas. "Men of art"; S.... 510
  - O'Keeffe, G., show; A........ 388
  - Russian icons, exhibition; A........ 280
- Rosoff, Samuel
  - Not a director of Bank of United States. N. Thomas; C..243; see also........ 147
- Royal mail steam packet company
  - Collapse; EP........ 202
- Ruhr. See Coal
- Rukeyser, Walter Arnold
  - I work for Russia. I. State trust and five-year plan; S........ 523
  - II. The five-year plan in action; S... 551
  - III. The worker at work; S........ 577
  - IV. How the worker lives; S........ 606
  - V. American engineer at work; S.... 626
  - VI. Life of the engineer; S........ 652
- Rumania
  - Dictatorship; EP........ 519
  - Election; EP........ 647
- Russell, Bertrand
  - Beliefs; S......469; see also C........ 558
- Russell, George W. (Æ)
  - On American "busyness"; Dt........ 98
- Russia
  - Class war enters science; E........ 440
  - Collectivization of farms goes forward; EP 314
  - Convict labor; Commissioner Eble finds "evidence"; E........ 205
  - Cooperation, not competition, sought; EP 141
  - Drive against, new. O. G. Villard; S. 345
  - Economic program. B. E. Nilsson; C.. 16
  - Embargo on imports by Canada; action by United States stopped; EP........ 258
  - Five-year plan, chances for success. L. Fischer; S........ 119
  - Five-year plan needs technical men; EP 114
  - Fords; 100,000, not 1,000,000, in five years; C........ 72
  - France to negotiate trade agreement; EP 518
  - Gold. See Gold
  - I work for Russia. I. State trust and five-year plan. W. A. Rukeyser; S.. 523
  - II. The five-year plan in action. W. A. Rukeyser; S........ 551
  - III. The worker at work. W. A. Rukeyser; S........ 577
  - IV. How the worker lives. W. A. Rukeyser; S........ 606
  - V. American engineer at work; W. A. Rukeyser; S........ 626
  - VI. Life of the engineer. W. A. Rukeyser; S........ 652
  - Menace; Ct........ 601
  - Menace and yellow journalism. O. G. Villard; S........ 602
  - Soviet government a reality, according to United States court; EP........ 666
  - Technical experts, foreign; EP........ 141
  - Trade rebuffed by United States; EP... 396
  - Trial for inefficiency and waste; EP... 544
  - Trial of Professor Ramzin and others. L. Fischer; S........ 41
  - United States needs Russia; E........ 669
  - United States to make study; EP........ 285
  - United States, trade with; EP........ 168
- Russian icons, exhibition. P. Rosenfeld; A 280
- Rye, going through the; Germany's food tariffs. H. Klein; S........ 377
- Rylands, Tom
  - Chicago liberal press needed; C........ 505

S

- Saarinen, Eliel
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... ■
- Sabin, S. H.
  - Townley the crusader; C........ 584
- Safety razors; Dt........ 351
- Saint John, Milton
  - Fortune (magazine); S..239; see also C. 329
- Saint Lawrence power commission. See Power and power industry
- Saint Lawrence University
  - Students threaten strike; EP..519; see also C........ 631
- Saint Louis, Missouri
  - Poverty ball; EP........ 115
- Saint Louis Post-Dispatch, the
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... ■
- Saint Paul, Minnesota, post-office lease; court gives possession to government; EP 314
- Samoa
  - Civil government for. M. Mead; IS... 226
  - Students threaten strike; EP......519; see also C........ 631
- Santo Domingo. See Dominican republic
- Savoye, Louis de
  - Agricultural research, purpose of; C..505; see also........ 241
- Schmitt, Bernadotte
  - Book, Coming of the war. H. E. Barnes; C......127; see also C........ 128
- Schneider, Isidor
  - Fetish of simplicity; S...184; reply by J. Herbst........ 275
- Schools
  - Hessian hills school burns; pupils offer aid in rebuilding; EP........ 143
- Schuman, Frederick L.
  - Reply to criticism of his review of Coming of the war, by B. Schmitt; C.... 128
- Schuyler, Josephine
  - Replies to criticism of book, Black no more; C......382; see also.....218, 631
- Schwab, Charles M. See Bethlehem steel company
- Science and the class war; E........ 440
- Scott, William
  - Work and overproduction; C........ 46
- Scottsboro case. See Negroes
- Seattle, Washington
  - Nation readers asked to meet. J. F. Cronin; C........ 680
  - Soup line. G. O. Ethel; S........ 208
- Segal, Eugene Jay
  - Latin America, United States in; C.531; see also E........ 467
- Seltzer, Louis B.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... ■
- Senate. See Congress
- Serio, Guido
  - Appeal stays deportation; EP..2; see also C........128, 243
  - Deportation; EP........ 597
- Shadwell, Bertrand
  - Cow-catchers for pedestrians; C...72; see also C........ 129
- Shapiro, Harold Roland
  - Alabama justice; C..679; see also..... 608
- Shaw, George Bernard
  - Biography; F. Harris seeks material; C 17
  - First movie. How he lied to her husband. A. Bakshy; D........ 135
- Shaw, Henry Wheeler (Josh Billings)
  - Material for biography sought. C. Clemens; C........ 72
- She means business. M. Van Doren; D.... 164
- Shipping. See Steamship lines
- Shoemaker, Robert W.
  - Unemployment and crime in Chicago; C 352
- Shumaker, Eri J.
  - Seeks material on R. H. Horne; C..... 72
- Silent witness, the. M. Van Doren; D..... 391
- "Silly symphony" (film)
  - Creator on The Nation's honor roll for 1930 .... ■
- Silver
  - Conference, international, likely; EP.... 570
  - Price collapse; EP........ 202
- Simple Simon. M. Van Doren; D........ 336
- Simplicity, fetish of. I. Schneider; S.184; reply by J. Herbst........ 275
- Sinclair, Upton
  - Two per cent buttons; C........ 659
- Six characters in search of an author. M. Van Doren; D........ 512
- Skandal um Eva. A. Bakshy; D........ 538
- Skippy. A. Bakshy; D........ 485
- Skyscrapers
  - Tengbom, I., views; Dt........ 476
- Slavery
  - "Free" slaves in West Africa. G. W. Mason; IS........ 254
  - See also Liberia
- Sloan, John
  - Indian tribal arts, exposition; C........ 478
- Slocombe, George
  - India and the round table conference; S 173
- Smiling lieutenant, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 645
- Smith, Elmer Stuart
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
- Smith, Hilda W.
  - Barnard summer school for women workers; C........ 659
- Smith, Robert B. ("Red")
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
- Snowden, Philip. See Great Britain—Budget
- Snure, John
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C..... 155
- Socialism
  - Roman catholic views on, in papal encyclical; EP........ 597
- Socialist party
  - Chicago, barred from municipal election; EP 369

Society of friends of music. See Friends of music
Solberg, Thorvald
  Copyright and common sense; S...... 678
Soliciting. See Prostitution
Songs
  "After the ball"; C. K. Harris, writer, dies; E........ 7
Soup line. See Unemployment
Sous les toits de Paris. A. Bakshy; D.... 25 South, the
  "No north, no south!" S. Barr; S..... 67
South Africa
  New. R. S. Alexander; IS.......... 592
South America. See Latin America
South Bend, Indiana (Middletown)
  Easy times in. M. A. Hallgren; S.... 497
Soviets. See Russia
Spackman, Ellis L., jr.
  Individualism, rugged if not ragged; C 477
Spain
  Absolutism doomed; EP.............. 231
  Catholic church, outbreaks against; EP. 543
  Elections; EP........................ 340
  Elections to be held; EP............. 169
  Political disorganization; EP.......... 202
  Republic makes progress; EP.......... 493
  Revolution; EP......437; E.......... 466
  Revolution. D. Allen; IS............ 540
  Revolution, behind the. D. Allen; S.... 500
  Vatican, relations with; E............ 625
Spector, Frank
  Sentence for criminal syndicalism reversed; EP........ 649
Spencer, Anna Garland
  Death; EP........................... 203
Spending, for necessities and for luxuries; Dt 658
Speyer, Leonora
  Graves in China; P.................... 18
Spies. See Espionage
Sport. See Athletics
Sprague, Oliver M. W.
  Speaks on business depression and proposed remedies; E.......... 573
Standard oil company of New York. See Petroleum
Stanley, Louis
  Danville: Labor's southern outpost; S 68
State debt repudiation; EP................ 397
State department
  Castle, W. R., jr., succeeds J. P. Cotton as undersecretary; EP.............. 395
  Control over foreign loans disapproved by senate; EP.................... 258
Stateville, Illinois. See Prisons
Steamship lines
  Depression; EP..................... 367
Stedman, Alfred D.
  On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S 93
Steward, Gustavus Adolphus
  Surveys; S......503; also C........... 611
Stimson, Henry L.
  Recognition policy; E................. 171
  Talk on foreign policy of United States; EP 543
  Visit to Europe, projected; EP....... 647
Stokowski. A. Mendel; M............... 458
Stolberg, Benjamin
  Ballyhoo and the higher learning; S.175; see also C........ 328
Stores, chain. See Chain stores
Straus, Nathan
  Death; EP........................... 59
Stravinsky. A. Mendel; M............... 279
Streit, C. K.
  On Schuman review of Coming of the war, by B. Schmitt; C............. 128
Strikes, student. F. H. Cass; C.......... 631
  See also St. Lawrence university
Strikes—textile mills, Great Britain
  Lancashire strike threatened; EP...... 30
Strikes—textile mills, Massachusetts
  Lawrence decides. R. A. Bakeman; S.. 404
Strikes—Textile mills, southern Danville: Labor's southern outpost. L. Stanley; S........ 68
  Danville, strike ends; EP............ 143
  Marion, North Carolina, strikers' families offer hooked rugs. G. Elliott; C 17
Stromberg, Yetta
  Conviction for displaying red flag in California held invalid; EP......... 597
Student strikes. F. H. Cass; C........... 631
  See also St. Lawrence university
Subscriber
  Yellow-dog injunction; C............. 71
Subway express. A. Bakshy; D........... 590
Sufflay, Milan. See Jugoslavia
Sugar
  Chadbourne marketing plan criticized by E. D. Babst; EP.................. 313
  Pact, Brussels; EP................... 543
Supreme court, United States
  Division between liberals and conservatives; EP........ 569
Surf and seaweed. A. Bakshy; D.......... 359
Surveys. G. A. Steward; S..503; see also C 611
Svengali. A. Bakshy; D.................. 590
Swan, Thomas Walter
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... [illegible]
Syndicalism
  Ohio act declared unconstitutional; EP.. 518
  Spector sentence under California law reversed; EP........ 649

T

Tabu. A. Bakshy; D..................... 428
Tammany hall. See New York city
Tao Hsuan Li
  Deportation; EP..................... 597
Tariff, Canada. See Canada
Tariff commission. See Tariff, United States
Tariff, United States
  Commission; again. J. Gibernau; C... 611
  Making, technique; EP............... 437
  Mellon, Secretary, establishes branch of Aluminum company of America in Canada; EP........ 665
  National foreign trade council attacks tariff; EP........ 621
  Rate changes; EP.................... 167
  Republican attitude changing; EP...... 491
  Smoot-Hawley act denounced by Republicans; EP........ 517
  United States companies establish branches in Canada; EP........ 665
Tariffs
  Denounced by A. Henderson; E....... 598
Taxation, land. See Great Britain
Taxation, United States
  Deficit or taxes; E.................. 398
  Increase, need for; EP.............. 517
  Mellon, A. W., views; EP........... 596
Teachers' union of New York; fiftieth anniversary; EP........ 287
Tengbom, I., views on skyscrapers; Dt..... 476
Ten-year plan. See United States
Textile mills. See strikes
Theater, the Deflating the drama. H. Broun; S..... 78
  Summary of season. M. Van Doren; S 644
  See also Censorship, plays
Theater Guild, the
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930... 8
Theater tickets
  Cut rates, and speculation; EP........ 465
  League of New York theaters gives up fight against speculation; EP......... 87
Third party. See Progressives
Thistlethwaite, Mark
  Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C...... 155
Thomas, Norman
  Banks of New York; S..147; correction, S. Rosoff not a director of Bank of United States; C........ 243
  Coal miners' condition, West Virginia; C 477
  Ohio state university, "hire learning" at; S......654; EP........ 667
Tilson, John Q.
  Views on depression; EP............. 569
Tomorrow and tomorrow. M. Van Doren; D 107
Tonality. A. Mendel; M................ 54
Toscanini, Arturo
  Assaulted at Bologna for refusal to open concert with fascist hymn; EP....... 667
  Success. A. Mendel; M.............. 163
Townley, A. C.
  Crusader. S. H. Sabin; C........... 584
Trade, foreign
  Decline, continued; EP............... 647
Trader Horn. A. Bakshy; D............. 250
Transportation
  Recapture clause, repeal urged, with other changes in act; EP........ 114
Treasury, United States. See United States
Treaties, war. See European war
Trees. sacrifice of; Dt.................... 504
Trotzky, Leon
  Appeal for books for. M. Eastman; C.. 611
Trueblood, Louise N.
  Play, As you desire me, not Pirandello; C 409
Trujillo, President. See Dominican republic
Truth game, the. H. H.; D.............. 53
Turkey
  Mustapha Kemal's efforts for westernization bring trouble for him; EP...... 3
Tuska, B.
  Greeks had no victory monuments; C......451; see also E........ 343
Tuskegee Institute
  Fiftieth anniversary; EP............ 439

U

Ukraine
  "Pacification" by Poles. N. Farson; S. 14
  Ukrainians, not Ruthenians. M. Gambel; C 72
Unemployment
  Aid—or an alibi? D. Allen; S........ 403
  Anarchy and the Red cross; E....... 144
  Beans, too many. Workless; S....... 95
  California. D. Aikman; S.......... 446
  Chicago, and crime. R. W. Shoemaker; C 352
  Doubts of American business mind; Dt. 154
  France. See France
  Germany. See Germany
  Great Britain. See Great Britain
  Hard times and hard facts. M. A. Hallgren; S........ 266
  Hoover, H., interview with. A. Pinchot; S 43
  Hoover, H., investigation; EP.......... 339
  Hoover, H., politics; EP.............. 85
  Hoover H., refuses again to call emergency session of congress; EP....... 595
  Hoover, H., substitute for Wagner bill; EP 463
  Hoover, H., views.................... 297
  Insurance. See Insurance, unemployment
  Job, vanishing. H. O. Rogers; S..... 375
  Millions, jobless; E.................. 62
  Negro; E........................... 441
  One of the six million. T. S. Harding; S 676
  Public-buildings bluff. R. A. Black; S 656
  Public works not immediate cure, engineers say; EP........ 85
  Relief, royal measures; Dt............ 154
  Remedies proposed. E. Wye; C....... 17
  Six-hour day only remedy. M. B.; C.. 47
  Soup line in Seattle. G. O. Ethel; S.. 208
  United States; E.................... 342
  Wagner bills, veto by President Hoover; EP 339
  Wagner employment-exchange bill; action not likely; EP........ 229
  Wagner employment-exchange bill, veto; EP 286
  Work and overproduction. W. Scott; C 46
Unemployment insurance. See Insurance, unemployment
United States
  "American system" still favored by President Hoover; EP............... 665
  Americans, reading by, as seen by J. B. Priestley; E........ 234
  Business depression reveals bankruptcy of leadership; EP........ 86
  Colonial possessions; EP.............. 367
  Constitution, obsolete, an obstacle to a third party. H. Hazlitt; S......124; see also E........ 117
  Economy program; EP............... 648
  Finances; deficit; E.................. 232
  Follies, as seen by S. Untermyer; E.233; see also C........ 328
  Foreign policy told by Stimson; EP... 543
  Foreigners' criticisms of Americans. K. N. Llewellyn; C........ 329
  Lawlessness, examples set by officials; EP 570
  Millennial measures proposed. F. Wells; C 611
  Navy. See Navy, United States
  "No north, no south." S. Barr; S..... 67
  Oberlaender fund for understanding with Germany; EP........ 397
  Party, new. See Progressives
  Population. See Population, United States
  Public-buildings bluff. R. A. Black; S. 656
  Recognition policy explained by Secretary Stimson; E........ 171
  Recreation; E....................... 290
  Russia, needed by United States; E.... 669
  Russia, trade with; EP.............. 168
  Ten-year plan, conference called for by National civic federation; EP....... 665
  Treasury; deficit; EP................ 340
  Treasury; deficit or taxes; E.......... 398
  Unemployment. See Unemployment
  Wealth, national; EP................ 340
United States of Europe. See Europe Universe
  Russell, B., views; S..468; see also C.. 558
Universities. See Colleges and universities, and names of institutions.
Unstad, Lyder L.
  Norwegian election; C................. 46
Untermeyer, Louis
  Before dawn; P..................... 415
  Sic semper; P....................... 636
Untermyer, Samuel
  America's follies; E..233; see also C.. 328
Upper Silesia
  Poland censured by A. Henderson; EP. 596
Utilities, public. See Public utilities

V

V. D., D
  Midnight; D 78
V. D., M
  Devil in the mind; D................. 591
Vacuum oil company. See Petroleum
Van Doren, Carl
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
Van Doren, Dorothy
  Bennett, Arnold; S 401
  Eight who must not die; S......608; see also C 679

- Van Doren, Mark
  - Admirable Crichton, the; D........ 336
  - Alison's house; D........ 590
  - Ambition; P........ 559
  - Anatol; D........ 134
  - As husbands go; D........ 338
  - As you desire me; D......198; see also C........ 409
  - Barretts of Wimpole street, the; D..... 224
  - Bellamy trial, the; D........ 538
  - Brass ankle; D........ 538
  - Camille; D........ 198
  - Colonel Satan; D........ 134
  - Company's coming; D........ 512
  - Doctor X; D........ 251
  - Getting married; D........ 430
  - Gilbert and Sullivan light operas; D.... 619
  - Give me yesterday; D........ 306
  - Going home; P........ 174
  - Gray Shadow; D........ 336
  - Great Barrington, the; D........ 282
  - Greater love; D........ 306
  - Green grow the lilacs; D........ 164
  - Heat wave; D........ 251
  - Hobo; D........ 251
  - House beautiful, the; D........ 360
  - In the best of families; D........ 198
  - Joy of living; D........ 460
  - Lady beyond the moon; D........ 430
  - Melo; D........ 512
  - Mikado, the; D........ 565
  - Miracle at Verdun; D........ 359
  - Napi; D........ 359
  - Old man Murphy; D........ 619
  - Once in a lifetime; D........ 391
  - Peter Ibbetson; D........ 486
  - Philip goes forth; D........ 107
  - Praise; P........ 275
  - Precedent; D........ 486
  - Private lives; D........ 164
  - Rhapsody in black; D........ 565
  - Right of happiness; D........ 460
  - Rock me, Julie; D........ 224
  - She means business; D........ 164
  - Silent witness, the; D........ 391
  - Simple Simon; D........ 336
  - Six characters in search of an author; D 512
  - Summary of theatrical season; S........ 644
  - Tomorrow and tomorrow; D........ 107
  - Venetian glass nephew, the; D........ 282
  - Wiser they are, the; D........ 460
  - Woman denied, a; D........ 306
- Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Vatican. See Italy; Spain; Catholic church
- Venetian glass nephew, the. M. Van Doren; D........ 282
- Venezuela
  - Gomez, J. V., tyranny. R. Baldwin; EP......231; C........ 243
  - Maracaibo, "modern Babylon"; EP.... 231
- Versailles treaty. See European war
- Vestal bill. See Copyright
- Veterans
  - Bonus; intellectuals and the bonus. W. L. Werner; C........ 409
  - Bonus a raid on United States treasury; E........ 170
  - Bonus bill will be repassed over veto; EP. 229
  - "Bonus" called misnomer; "adjusted compensation" proper term. F. W. Burgess; C........ 273
  - Bonus payments, immediate, demanded by American legion; EP........ 113
  - Compensation, adjusted, not a bonus. F. W. Burgess; C........ 273
  - Loan bill; administration efforts to discredit. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 268
- Vickery, Arthur C.
  - Cycling; C......181; see also........ 126
- Vienna
  - Social welfare in. Dr. S. Kraus; IS... 138
- Viking (Sealer)
  - Hope abandoned for victims of explosion; EP........ 369
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Bülow, Fürst Bernhard von; Denkwürdigkeiten; S........ 211
  - England fights on; S........ 263
  - Europe's darkest hour; S........ 549
  - German ability to pay war reparations and debts; S........ 91
  - Hoover, President, record of. I. Tragedy of Herbert Hoover; S........ 671
  - On the German front; S........ 37
  - Red menace and yellow journalism; S... 602
  - Russia, new drive against; S........ 345
  - World conference, another, wanted; S.. 291
- Virgin Islands of the United States
  - Hoover opinion on; EP........ 367
- Vivas, Eliseo
  - Wisconsin university's experimental college; S......322; rejoinder by A. Meiklejohn........ 325

W

- Wage insurance. See insurance, wage
- Wages. See Labor
- Wagner bills. See Unemployment
- Wainhouse, David W.
  - Iraq: A British preserve; IS........ 27
- Walker, Mayor James John. See New York city
- Walker, Dr. Mary E.
  - Material for biography sought. Mrs. C. M. Poynter; C........ 72
- Waltman, Franklyn, jr.
  - Suggested for Washington honor roll of correspondents. E. Gruening; C..... 155
- War
  - Greeks had no victory monuments. B. Tuska; C......451; see also E........ 343
  - Rules for, by Los Angeles Record; EP.. 439
  - See also Militarism; Pacifism; Peace
- War debts and reparations
  - German ability to pay. O. G. Villard; S. 91
- War memorials. See European war
- War policies commission
  - Meeting. M. A. Hallgren; S........ 575
  - Peace advocates not adequately heard; EP........ 648
- War treaties. See European war
- War, world. See European war
- Ward, Christopher
  - Dutch and Swedes on the Delaware, the; AN........ 105
- Ward, Gordon H.
  - Reply to dirt farmer; C......329; see also........ 241
- Washington correspondents. See Newspapers
- Webb, Mrs. Sidney (Beatrice)
  - Article on British government in Political Quarterly; E........ 442
  - What I believe; S........ 603
- Weed, Mrs. Helena Hill
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... 8
- Weitzenkorn, Louis
  - Play, Five-star final; EP........ 287
- Wells, F.
  - Proposes millennial measures for United States; C........ 611
- Werner, W. L.
  - Intellectuals and the bonus; C........ 409
- Wertgen, F.
  - French and American loans to Germany; C........ 353
- West
  - Hard times in. B. L. Coleman and Old Reader; C........ 680
- West Africa
  - "Free" slaves. G. W. Mason; IS...... 254
- West Indies
  - Hoover to inspect islands; EP........ 313
- West Virginia. See Coal miners, American
- Wexler, Harry G.
  - Chicago liberal press needed; C........ 505
- Wheat
  - Chaos. B. Lyons; S........ 581
  - Conferences. See Grain
  - Crisis; E........ 599
  - Farm board speculation at end; EP.... 339
  - Price drops to lowest in thirty years; EP........ 1
  - Surplus, European, and Farm board's export plan; EP........ 257
- Whitaker, Robert
  - Is California civilized? S......347; see also C........ 451
- White, Hal Saunders
  - Earth is no symbol; P........ 681
  - Spring gardening; P........ 479
  - We part the husks; P........ 156
- Wickersham commission and report. See National commission on law observance and enforcement
- Wien, du stadt der lieder. A. Bakshy; D... 538
- Wiesner, Frank
  - Universe, order, unity and continuity; C 558; see also........ 468
- Wilbur, Ray Lyman
  - And cancer cure of Doctors Coffey and Humber. M. A. Hallgren; S....... 373
- Willard, Daniel
  - Opinion on capitalistic system; EP.... 367
- William II of Germany
  - And King George, in war time. P. Wilmot; C........ 129
- Williams, Mathilde D.
  - Librarians; C......381; see also....... 213
- Wilmot, Percival
  - Kings and grandmothers; C........ 129
- Winner, Helen
  - American civil liberties union; C...... 408
- Wisconsin, university of
  - Experimental college. E. Vivas; S...... 322; rejoinder by A. Meiklejohn; S... 325
- Wiser they are, the. M. Van Doren; D.... 460
- Wolfe, W. W.
  - Daughters of the American revolution and communism, in Wyoming; C..... 99
- Woman denied, a. M. Van Doren; D.... 306
- Woodward, Vann
  - Emory university, athletics at; C..478; see also E........ 172
- Wool
  - Australian control scheme. C. H. Grattan; C......558; see also B........ 506
- Work. See Labor; Unemployment
- Workless
  - Beans, too many; S........ 95
- Works, public. See Public works
- World. See New York World
- World almanac; E........ 90
- World conference, another, wanted. O. G. Villard; S........ 291
- World war. See European war
- "Wozzeck." E. M. Conover; C......505; see also........ 390
- Wright, Frank Lloyd
  - Omission from architectural committee of Chicago world's fair; EP........ 259
- Wright, Henry
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1930.... [illegible]
- Wye, E.
  - Unemployment remedies; C........ 17
- Wyoming
  - Daughters of the American revolution and communism. W. W. Wolfe; C.. 99

Y

- Yale university
  - Architecture; Dt........ 630
  - Cathedral orgy. W. H. Hale; S...... 471; see also C........ 631
  - Classics, Latin and Greek, dropped as required subjects for degree; E...... 574
  - Revolt; E........ 496
- Yellow-dog injunction. See Injunctions
- Young, Ella
  - Admission to United States denied; EP. 397
- Young, Marguerite
  - On P. Y. Anderson's 1930 honor roll; S. 93
- Young, Owen D.
  - Banking law, recommendations; EP.... 168
  - For president? P. Y. Anderson; S..... 207
- You're a menace. E. Duffy; Ct........ 601
- Yugoslavia. See Jugoslavia

Z

- Zionism. See Palestine
- Zwei herzen im ¾ takt. A. Bakshy; D..... 538

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Abercrombie, Lascelles
  - Poems; B........ 587
- Above the dark tumult. H. Walpole; B.... 507
- Abraham Cowley: The muse's Hannibal. A. H. Nethercot; B........ 426
- Adams, James Truslow; R........384, 561, 682
- Adventure or experience. D. Brewster and A. Burrell; AN........ 457
- Æ
  - Vale and other poems; AN........ 564
- Afterthoughts. L. P. Smith; B........ 479
- Aldington, Richard
  - Roads to glory; B........ 301
- Allen, Devere
  - Fight for peace, the; B........ 76
- Altamira, Rafael
  - History of Spanish civilization, a. P. Volkov, translator; AN........ 160
- Ambrose Holt and family. S. Glaspell; AN 616
- America moves west. R. E. Riegel; AN..... 52
- American caravan IV: A yearbook of American literature. Edited by A. Kreymborg, L. Mumford, and P. Rosenfeld; B........ 420
- American humor: A study of the national character. C. Rourke; B........ 456
- American negro poetry. Edited by J. W. Johnson; AN........ 588
- America's way out: A program for democracy. N. Thomas; B........ 418
- Amerikanische theater und kino, das. J. Gregor and R. Fülöp-Miller; AN.... 564
- Among the nudists. F. and M. Merrill; B 562
- Angoff, Charles
  - Literary history of the American people, a; B........ 331
- Aphrodite in Aulis. G. Moore; B........ 416
- Apple cart, the: A political extravaganza. B. Shaw; B........ 453
- Approach to Shakespeare, the. J. W. Mackail; AN........ 104
- Aristocratic journey, the. Being the outspoken letters of Mrs. B. Hall; AN.. 563
- Arnold, Benedict, biography. C. C. Sellers; AN........ 588
- Ashmun, Margaret
  - Singing swan, the. An account of Anna Seward; B........ 508

Index

Ashton, Helen
  Mackerel sky; AN.................... 386
Atkinson, J. Brooks
  East of the Hudson; AN.............. 387
Austen, Jane, biography. R. B. Johnson; B 615
Australia, two books on; B................ 219
Australia. W. K. Hancock; B............ 219
Autobiography of L. Steffens; B........... 415
Axel's castle. E. Wilson; B............... 245

B

Back street. F. Hurst; AN............... 195
Baker, Howard
  Orange valley; B..419; (correction, name of author Baker not Baxter, 584)
Bakshy, Alexander; R.................... 425
Ballads and poems, 1915-30. S. V. Benét; AN 160
Barber, Jeanne C., and others
  Unemployment benefits in the United States; AN......................... 304
Barron, Clarence W.
  They told Barron. Edited and arranged by A. Pound and S. T. Moore; B.... 50
Bates, Ernest Sutherland
  This land of liberty; B................ 303
Baudelaire, Charles Pierre
  Intimate journals. C. Isherwood, translator. Introduction by T. S. Eliot; B 20
Baudelaire, Charles Pierre. Biography: Gardener of evil. P. Loving; AN...... 305
Beals, Carleton; R........................ 73
Becker, Beril
  Paul Gauguin: The calm madman; B... 455
Benedict Arnold, the proud warrior. C. C. Sellers; AN......................... 588
Benét, Stephen Vincent
  Ballads and poems, 1915-30; AN...... 160
Bennett, Arnold, in Four contemporary novelists, by W. L. Cross; AN........... 104
Bercovici, Konrad
  That royal lover; AN................. 509
Best poems of 1930, the. Edited by T. Moult; AN........................ 52
Beveridge, W. H.
  Unemployment: A problem of industry; B 300
Bisland, Elizabeth
  Three wise men of the east; B......... 20
Bitter tea of General Yen, the. G. Z. Stone; B 20
Black bread and red coffins. N. Farson; AN 78
Black no more. G. S. Schuyler; B..218; see also letter 382
Black worker, the. S. E. Spero and A. L. Harris; B........................ 385
Bloch, Jean-Richard
  Night in Kurdistan, a. S. Haden-Guest, translator; B................ 192
Blue ghost: A study of Lafcadio Hearn. J. Temple; B........................ 277
Blunden, Edmund
  Leigh Hunt and his circle; B.......... 133
Bodenheim, Maxwell
  Naked on roller skates; AN............ 195
Boswell, James. Everybody's Boswell. Edited by F. V. Morley; B................ 299
Boyle, Kay
  Plagued by the nightingale; AN....... 509
Braden, Charles S.
  Religious aspects of the conquest of Mexico; B.......................... 101
Branch, E. Douglas
  Westward. The romance of the American frontier; AN................... 52
Brandeis, Louis Dembitz
  Social and economic views. Collected by A. Lief; B...................... 156
Brandes, Georg
  Voltaire. O. Kruger and P. Butler, translators; B..................... 193
Brewster, Dorothy, and A. Burrell
  Adventure or experience; AN......... 457
Briffault, Robert
  Rational evolution; B..333; correction; C 532
  Sin and sex; B....................... 614
Bright, John, diaries of. Edited by R. A. J. Walling; B..................... 533
Brinig, Myron
  Wide open town; AN................. 386
Britt, George, and H. Broun
  Christians only; B.................... 586
Broun, Heywood, and G. Britt
  Christians only; B.................... 586
Brown, John Mason
  Upstage; B.......................... 425
Brown, Ray C. B.; R..................... 483
Brown, W. Norman; R.................... 639
Buchanan, Scott; R..190; 333; correction, C 532
Buck, Pearl S.
  Good earth, the; B................... 534
Budish, J. M., and S. S. Shipman
  Soviet foreign trade—menace or promise; B............................. 423
Bulwer: A panorama. I. Edward and Rosina, 1803-1836. M. Sadleir; B...640
Bülow, Fürst Bernhard von
  Denkwürdigkeiten von. O. G. Villard; S 211
Bülow, Hans von
  Letters. H. Waller, translator; B..... 483
Burdett, Osbert
  Two Carlyles, the; B................. 424
Burn, A. N.
  Minoans, Philistines and Greeks; AN... 105
Burns, Emile
  Russia's productive system; B........ 247
Burrell, Angus, and D. Brewster
  Adventure or experience; AN......... 457
But it still goes on. R. Graves; B........ 301
Byrd. Richard Evelyn
  Little America; AN.................. 22

C

Caliph of Bagdad, the: Being Arabian nights flashes of the life, letters, and work of O. Henry—William Sydney Porter. R. H. Davis and A. B. Maurice; B.. 660
Calverton, V. F.; R..................132, 615
Cambridge ancient history, the. Volume VIII: Rome and the Mediterranean, 218-133 B. C. Edited by S. A. Cook, F. E. Adcock, M. P. Charlesworth; AN 427
Campbell, Dorothy de Brissac
  Intriguing duchess, the; B............. 50
Cantwell, Robert; R...................... 419
Carlisle, Helen Grace
  Together again; AN.................. 159
Carlyle, Thomas and Jane, book on. O. Burdett; B.......................... 424
Cather, Willa. R. Rapin; AN............. 22
Catlin, George E. G.; R...............75, 661
Cattle car express. E. Lengyel; AN....... 685
Chamberlain, George Agnew
  River to the sea; AN................ 160
Chardonne, Jacques
  Eva; B.............................. 220
Charlemagne, first of the moderns. C. E. Russell; AN......................... 134
Chase, Stuart
  Nemesis of American business, the; B......506; see also C............ 506
Chase, Stuart; R......................... 562
Chatterton, E. Keble
  England's greatest statesman: A life of William Pitt, 1759-1806; AN..... 133
Chevreuse, Duchesse de; biography. D. de Brissac Campbell; B................ 50
Chi-Chao, Liang
  History of Chinese political thought during the early Tsin period; B......... 20
Child's conception of physical casuality, the. J. Piaget; AN..................... 334
Childs, Harwood Lawrence
  Labor and capital in national politics; B 75
China, six books on; B.................... 20
Chingis-Khan. B. Ya. Vladimirtsov; AN... 78
Christians only. H. Broun and G. Britt; B 586
Christina Rossetti. D. M. Stuart; B...... 508
Churchill, Winston Spencer
  Roving commission, a. My early life; AN 194
City bosses in the United States. H. Zink; B 454
Civilizations of the east. Volume I. The near and middle east. R. Grousset; AN 484
Cohen, Morris Raphael
  Reason and nature; B................ 411
Colette
  Gentle libertine, the. R. C. B., translator; AN 196
Collected poems of Robert Frost, the; B.... 101
Collier, John; R.......................... 277
Colum, Padraic
  Orpheus. Myths of the world; AN.... 77
Comedy of manners from Sheridan to Maugham, the. N. W. Sawyer; AN. 428
Conrad, Joseph, in Four contemporary novelists, by W. L. Cross; AN........... 104
Contemporary and his soul, the. I. Edman; B 636
Contemporary social movements. J. Davis; AN 588
Conversations of Goethe with Eckermann. Edited by J. K. Moorhead; B....... 299
Cooper, James Fenimore. H. W. Boynton; B 586
Cooper, Lyle W.; R....................... 75
Cooper, William A.; R.................... 482
Coronado's children. J. F. Dobie; AN.... 536
Counts, George S.
  Soviet challenge to America, the; B.... 423
Counts, George S.; R..................... 637
Cowley, Abraham: The muse's Hannibal. A. H. Nethercot; B................ 426
Craven, Thomas
  Men of art; B....................... 510
Cresson, W. P.
  Francis Dana; AN.................... 357
Crime and destiny. J. Lange. Translated by C. Haldane; B................... 49
Criminal justice in America. R. Pound; B.. 663
Croker, Richard, biography. L. Stoddard; B 454
Cromwell. E. Momigliano. Translated by L. E. Marshall; B.................. 21
Cross, Wilbur L.
  Four contemporary novelists; AN....... 104
Cross roads of the Java sea. H. De Leeuw; AN 428
Crouse, Russel
  Mr. Currier and Mr. Ives. A note on their lives and times; AN.......... 250
Curti, Merle; R.......................... 76

D

Dana, Francis. W. P. Cresson; AN....... 357
Dandieu, Arnaud
  Marcel Proust: Sa révélation psychologique; AN........................ 194
Dante
  Inferno. L. Lockert, translator; AN... 334
Davis, Jerome
  Contemporary social movements; AN.... 588
Davis, Owen
  I'd like to do it again; AN........... 303
Davis, Robert H., and A. B. Maurice
  Caliph of Bagdad, the: Life of O. Henry; B.......................... 660
Dawn, T. Dreiser; B...................... 613
De Casseres, Benjamin
  Mencken and Shaw; AN............... 664
Decline of merry England, the. S. Jameson; B 74
De la Mare, Walter
  On the edge; B...................... 356
Denkwürdigkeiten von Bernhard, Fürst von Bülow. O. G. Villard; S............ 211
D. H. Lawrence. R. West; B............. 75
Diaries of John Bright, the. Edited by R. A. J. Walling; B.................. 533
Discords mingled. C. Engel; AN.......... 358
Dixon, W. Macneile
  Englishman, the; AN................. 685
Dobie, J. Frank
  Coronado's children; AN.............. 536
Dogs, the. I. Nazhivin; B................ 643
Down the red lane. H. Nadel. Translated by B. Taylor; AN................. 134
Draft of XXX cantos, a. E. Pound; B.... 632
Dreiser, Theodore
  Dawn; B............................ 613
Dry decade, the. C. Merz; B............. 188
Du Bois, W. E. B.; R..................... 385
Dumb-animal and other stories. O. Sitwell; B 454
Dunn, Robert W., and J. Hardy. Labor and textiles; B......................... 535
Dutch and Swedes on the Delaware, the. C. Ward; AN 105

E

Early poems. H. Wolfe; AN............. 685
Easier motherhood. C. Todd; AN......... 616
East of the Hudson. J. B. Atkinson; AN.. 387
Ebisch, Walter, and L. L. Schücking
  Shakespeare bibliography, a; AN...... 664
Eckermann, Johann Peter
  Conversations of Goethe with Eckermann; B.......................... 299
Economic history of Australia, an. E. Shann; B.......................... 219
Economic life of Russia, the. C. B. Hoover; B 247
Ede, H. S.
  Savage messiah; B.................. 301
Edinger, George, and E. J. C. Neep
  Nelson; B.......................... 248
Edman, Irwin
  Contemporary and his soul, the; B..... 636
Education of a princess. Marie, Grand duchess of Russia; B............... 190
Egil's saga. Translated by E. R. Eddison; AN 160
Eight Victorian poets. F. L. Lucas; AN.... 51
Eliot, T. S.
  Introduction to Intimate journals, by C. Baudelaire; B..................... 20
Engel, Carl
  Discords mingled; AN................ 358
England's crisis. A. Siegfried; B.......... 561
England's greatest statesman: A life of William Pitt, 1759-1806. E. K. Chatterton; AN........................... 133
Englishman, the. W. Macneile Dixon; AN 685
Epochs of German history, the. J. Haller; AN 78
Equality. R. H. Tawney; B............. 356
Eva. J. Chardonne; B.................... 220
Everybody's Boswell. Edited by F. V. Morley; B............................ 299
Ewen, David; R.......................... 248

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.; R......156, 193, 422, 585
Farbman, Michael
  Piatiletka—Russia's five-year plan; B... 423
Farson, Negley
  Black bread and red coffins; AN....... 78
Fatal interview. E. St. V. Millay; B..... 480
Faulkner, William
  Sanctuary; B........................ 422

Faust. J. W. von Goethe. Translated by A. Raphael; B.................... 482
Federal India. Haksar, K. N., and K. M. Panikkar; AN.................... 358
Feiler, Arthur
  Russian experiment, the. H. J. Stenning, translator; B.................. 247
Ferris, Hugh
  Metropolis of tomorrow..55; see also C 274
Festival. S. Burt; AN.................. 279
Fight for peace, the. D. Allen; B......... 76
Firebird and other poems. H. J. Seligmann; AN 358
Fischer, Louis
  Why recognize Russia? B............ 614
Fischer, Louis; R................423, 534, 587
Flame of Islam, the: The later crusades. H. Lamb; AN.................... 485
Flexner, Abraham
  Universities—American, English, German......175; see also C........... 328
Flights from chaos: A survey of material systems from atoms to galaxies. H. Shapley; B........................ 508
Foch, Ferdinand
  Memoirs of. Translated by Colonel T. B. Mott; B........................ 456
Folk-Say: A regional miscellany; B....... 383
Fool of the family, the. M. Kennedy; B... 102
Fort, Charles
  Lo! B............................ 482
Four contemporary novelists. W. L. Cross; AN 104
Francis Dana. W. P. Cresson; AN........ 357
Frankfurter, Felix
  Public and its government, the; B...... 158
Frank, Tenney
  Life and literature in the Roman republic; AN.......................... 304
Fremont, John Charles
  Biography. C. Goodwin; B............ 51
Friend of Shelley, the. J. J. Massingham; B 133
Frost, Robert
  Collected poems, the; B.............. 101
Fülöp-Miller, René, and J. Gregor
  Amerikanische theater und kino, das; AN 564

G

Galsworthy, John, in Four contemporary novelists, by W. L. Cross; AN...... 104
Gann, Thomas, and E. Thompson
  History of the Mayas; From the earliest times to the present day; AN....... 664
Gardener of evil. P. Loving; AN......... 305
Garrod, H. W.
  Poetry and the criticism of life; AN.... 564
Garrod, H. W.; R....................... 681
Gaudier-Brezeska, Henri. Savage messiah; biography. H. S. Ede; B........... 301
Gauguin, Paul: The calm madman. B. Becker; B......................... 455
Genius of Mexico, the. Edited by H. C. Herring and K. Terrill; B.......... 682
Gentle libertine, the. Colette. Translated by R. C. B.; AN...................... 196
German lyric poetry. N. Macleod; AN.... 686
Gessner, Robert
  Massacre. A review of today's American Indian; B..................... 277
Gezeichneten, die. G. Grosz; B........... 158
Gilbert, Stuart
  James Joyce's Ulysses; B............. 130
Gilson, Mary W., and others
  Unemployment benefits in the United States; AN 304
Gin and bitters. A. Riposte; AN.......... 484
Ginzburg, Benjamin; R.................. 482
Glaspell, Susan
  Ambrose Holt and family; AN......... 616
Goblin woman, the. R. O'Neill; AN...... 196
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von. Conversations with Eckermann; B................ 299
  Faust. A. Raphael, translator; B...... 482
Goldberg, Isaac
  Tin-pan alley; B..................... 248
Golden grove, the: Selected passages from the sermons and writings of Jeremy Taylor. Edited by P. Smith; AN... 333
Goldmark, Josephine
  Pilgrims of '48. One man's part in the Austrian revolution of 1848 and a family migration to America; B..... 662
Good earth, the. P. S. Buck; B.......... 534
Goodwin, Cardinal
  John Charles Frémont: An explanation of his career; B.................... 51
Gorki, Maxim
  Magnet, the. A. Bakshy, translator; AN 536
Grass roof, the. Y. Kang; B............ 332
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.................. 219
Graves, Richard
  But it still goes on; B................ 301
Great crusade and after, 1914-1928, the. P. W. Slosson; AN.................. 134
Green river: A poem for Rafinesque. J. Whaler; AN........................ 537
Greene, Lorenzo J., and C. G. Woodson
  Negro wage earner, the; B............ 385
Gregor, Joseph, and R. Fülöp-Miller
  Amerikanische theater und kino, das; AN 564
Gregory, Horace; R.......22, 133, 301, 480, 660
Grosz, George
  Gezeichneten, die; B.................. 158
  Neue gesicht der herrschenden klasse, das; B........................... 158
Grousset, René
  Civilizations of the east. Volume I. The near and middle east; AN....... 484
Growing up in New Guinea. M. Mead; B.. 131
Gruening, Ernest; R..................101, 682
Guedalla, Philip, and others
  If, or history rewritten; B.......... 682
Guérard, Albert; R...................... 560
Gulab Singh, founder of Kashmir. K. M. Panikkar; AN...................... 250
Gutman, Walter; R...................... 332

H

Hacker, Louis M.; R..................... 683
Haksar, K. N., and K. M. Panikkar
  Federal India; AN.................. 358
Hall, Mrs. Basil
  Aristocratic journey, the; AN.......... 563
Haller, J. Epochs of German history; AN.. 78
Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R.................. 303
Hancock, W. K.
  Australia; B.......................... 219
Hardy, Jack, and R. W. Dunn
  Labor and textiles; B................ 535
Harper, Samuel N.
  Making bolsheviks; B................ 423
Harris, Abram L.; R..................... 247
Harris, Abram L., and S. E. Spero
  Black worker, the; B............... 385
Hazlitt, Henry; R..48, 100, 186, 217, 245, 299, 330, 411, 453, 479, 506; see also 558, 613, 636
Hazlitt, William
  Selected essays; AN................. 304
Hearn, Lafcadio. Blue ghost: A study of Lafcadio Hearn. J. Temple; B...... 277
Hecht, Ben
  Jew in love, a; AN.................. 333
Henry, O.; biography. R. H. Davis and A. B. Maurice; B................. 600
Henry White. Thirty years of American diplomacy. A. Nevins; B.......... 384
Herbert, A. P.
  Water gipsies, the; AN............... 159
Herford, C. H.
  Wordsworth; B....................... 384
Herskovits, Melville J.; R................ 131
Hicks, Granville; R..........20, 103, 188, 386
Hill, John Louis
  Negro. National asset or liability? B.. 385
Hindus, Maurice
  Red bread; B........................ 587
Hirst, Francis W.
  Wall street and Lombard street; AN... 537
History of Chinese political thought during the early Tsin period. L. Chi-Chao; B 20
History of the Mayas, the: From the earliest times to the present day. T. Gann and E. Thompson; AN............. 644
History of Spanish civilization, a. R. Altamira. Translated by P. Volkov; AN 160
Holcombe, Arthur N.
  Spirit of the Chinese revolution; the; B 20
Hoover, Calvin B.
  Economic life of Russia, the; B........ 247
Hopkins, Gerard Manley
  Poems. Edited by R. Bridges; AN.... 105
Hunt, Leigh, and his circle. E. Blunden; B 133
Hurst, Fannie
  Back street; AN..................... 195
Hutchinson, Paul
  World revolution and religion; B...... 684
Huxley, Julian S., H. G. Wells, and G. P. Wells
  Science of life, the; B............... 217

I

I. Americans. S de Madariaga; B......... 561
I remember. O. Read; AN............... 563
I'd like to do it again. O. Davis; AN.... 303
If, or history rewritten. P. Guedalla, and others; B.......................... 682
I'll take my stand: The south and the agrarian tradition. By twelve southerners; B 48
In defense of sensuality. J. C. Powys; AN. 249
Industrial revolution in the south, the. B. and G. S. Mitchell; AN............ 617
Inferno of Dante. L. Lockert, translator; AN 334
Inner history of the Chinese revolution, the. T. Leang-Li; B................... 20
International mandates, the. A. M. Margalith; AN......................... 387
Intimate journals. C. Baudelaire. Translated by C. Isherwood. Introduction by T. S. Eliot; B.................. 20
Intriguing duchess, the. D. de Brissac Campbell; B....................... 50
Iron dish, the. L. Riggs; B.............. 22
Isabella of Spain. W. T. Walsh; AN...... 77

J

James Fenimore Cooper. H. W. Boynton; B 586
James Joyce's Ulysses. S. Gilbert; B...... 130
Jameson, Storm
  Decline of merry England, the; B...... 74
Jane Austen. R. B. Johnson; B......... 615
Jealous ghost, the. L. A. G. Strong; AN... 685
Jeans, Sir James
  Stars in their courses, the; B......... 508
Jennings, H. S.; R...................... 49
Jew in love, a. B. Hecht; AN............ 333
John Charles Frémont: An explanation of his career. C. Goodwin; B............. 51
John Marsh, pioneer. The life story of a trail blazer on six frontiers; AN..... 52
Johnson, Edgar
  Unweave a rainbow; AN............. 221
Johnson, R. Brimley
  Jane Austen; B...................... 615
Johnston, Henry Alan
  What rights are left? B............. 303
Jonathan Gentry. M. Van Doren; B....... 355
Josephson, Matthew; R.................. 277
Joyce, James, Ulysses. S. Gilbert; B...... 130

K

Kaiser's coolies, the. T. Plivier. Translated by M. Green; B.............. 276
Kalckreuth, Dunbar von
  Three thousand years of Rome. C. Frederick, translator; AN.............. 359
Kang, Younghill
  Grass roof, the; B................... 332
Karsavina, Tamara
  Theatre street; B.................... 190
Keats, John, letters of. Edited by M. B. Forman; AN....................... 562
Keats, studies in. J. M. Murry; B......... 220
Kennedy, Margaret
  Fool of the family, the; B............. 101
Kien, Walter; R........................ 158
Kirchwey, Freda; R..................... 190
Knickerbocker, H. R.
  Red trade menace, the; B............ 423
Komroff, Manuel
  Two thieves; AN..................... 221
Kootz, Samuel M.
  Modern American painters; B......... 332
Kreymborg, Alfred
  Lyric America; AN 77

L

Labor and capital in national politics. H. L. Childs; B.......................... 75
Labor and coal. A. Rochester; B.......... 535
Labor and lumber. C. Todes; B.......... 535
Labor and textiles. R. W. Dunn and J. Hardy; B......................... 535
Lafitte the pirate. L. Saxon; AN......... 53
Lagerlöf, Selma
  Ring of the Löwenskölds the; B....... 157
Lamb, Harold
  Flame of Islam, the: The later crusades; AN 485
Lange, Johannes
  Crime and destiny. C. Haldane, translator; B.......................... 49
Laski, Harold J.
  Liberty in the modern state; B........ 100
  Politics; AN......................... 427
Last days of Shylock, the. L. Lewisohn; B 187
Lawrence, D. H.; biography. J. M. Murry; B 661
Lawrence, D. H. R. West; B............. 75
Lawrence, William Witherle
  Shakespeare's problem comedies; AN... 104
Leang-Li, Tang
  Inner history of the Chinese revolution, the; B........................... 20
Lehman, Lucien
  Seule issue, la; AN.................. 387
Leigh Hunt and his circle. E. Blunden; B. 135
Lemont, Jessie
  White nights; AN.................... 304
Lengyel, Emil
  Cattle car express; AN.............. 685
Lenin. D. S. Mirsky; B................. 534
Lenin. God of the godless. F. A. Ossendowski; B......................... 534
Lenin, red dictator. G. Vernadsky; B..... 534
Leslie. Henrietta
  Mrs. Fischer's war; B.............. 536
Letters of Hans von Bülow. Translated by H. Waller; B..................... 483
Letters of John Keats, the. Edited by M. B. Forman; AN...................... 562
Levin, Meyer
  Yehuda; B........................... 684
Levine, Isaac Don
  Stalin; B........................... 637
Lewisohn, Ludwig
  Last days of Shylock, the; B.......... 187
Liberty in the modern state. H. J. Laski; B 100

Life and literature in the Roman republic. T. Frank; AN........ 304
Lincoln and his cabinet. C. E. Macartney; B 246
Lincoln the man. E. L. Masters; B....... 246
Lincoln the politician. D. C. Seitz; B...... 246
Literary history of the American people, a. C. Angoff; B........ 331
Little America. R. E. Byrd; AN......... 22
Lo! C. Fort; B........ 482
Lockhart's literary criticism. Selected by M. C. Hildyard; B........ 641
Loeb classical library; seven new volumes; AN 686
Lõhrke, Eugene; R........276, 536
Lord Melbourne. B. Newman; AN........ 588
Loving, Pierre
  Gardener of evil; AN........ 305
Lucas, F. L.
  Eight Victorian poets; AN........ 51
Ludwig, Emil
  Schliemann: The story of a gold-seeker; B 660
Lyric America. A. Kreymborg; AN....... 77

M

Macartney, Clarence Edward
  Lincoln and his cabinet; B........ 246
MacDonald, William; R..51, 158, 246, 456, 481, 561, 662
Mackail, J. W.
  Approach to Shakespeare, the; AN..... 104
McKee, William J.
  New schools for young India; AN.... 457
Mackerel sky. H. Ashton; AN........ 386
Macleod, Norman
  German lyric poetry; AN........ 686
McWilliams, Carey; R........ 383
Macy, John; R........331, 640
Madariaga, Salvador de
  I. Americans; B........ 561
Magnet, the. M. Gorki. Translated by A. Bakshy; AN........ 536
Makers of modern Europe. Count C. Sforza; AN 249
Making bolsheviks. S. N. Harper; B...... 423
Mann, Thomas
  Mario and the magician. H. T. Lowe-Porter, translator; B........ 156
Mansfield, Katherine
  Novels and novelists; AN........ 249
Marcel Proust: Sa révélation psychologique. A. Dandieu; AN........ 194
Margalith, Aaron M.
  International mandates, the; AN....... 387
Marie, grand duchess of Russia
  Education of a princess; B........ 190
Mario and the magician. T. Mann. Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter; B..... 156
Married love. M. Stopes; censorship....... 579
Marsh, Fred T., R........580, 660
Martial spirit, the: A study of our war with Spain. W. Millis; B........ 683
Massacre. A review of today's American Indian. R. Gessner; B........ 277
Massingham, H. J.
  Friend of Shelley, the; B........ 133
Master of Manhattan. The life of Richard Croker. L. Stoddard; B........ 454
Masters, Edgar Lee
  Lincoln the man; B........ 246
Matchless Orinda. P. W. Souers; B...... 508
Maurice, Arthur B., and R. H. Davis
  Caliph of Bagdad, the: Life of O. Henry; B........ 660
Mayo, Katherine
  Volume two; B........ 639
Mead, Margaret
  Growing up in New Guinea; B........ 131
Meagher, Maude
  White jade; AN........ 159
Meaning of the glorious Koran. An explanatory translation by M. Pickthall; AN.. 457
Melbourne, Lord. B. Newman; AN....... 588
Melody of chaos, the. H. Peterson; B.... 330
Memoirs of Marshal Foch, the. Translated by Colonel T. B. Mott; B........ 456
Men and memories. Sir W. Rothenstein; B 480
Men of art. T. Craven; B........ 510
Mencken and Shaw. B. De Casseres; AN.. 664
Merrill, Frances and Mason
  Among the nudists; B........ 562
Merz, Charles
  Dry decade, the; B........ 188
Metropolis of tomorrow. H. Ferriss.....55; see also C........ 274
Mexico and her foreign creditors. E. Turlington; B........ 682
Mexico, two books on; B........ 682
Meyer, Johann
  Sexual life in ancient India; AN...... 24
Midsummernight. C. Wilhelmson; AN..... 221
Milburn, George
  Oklahoma town; AN........ 278
Millay, Edna St. Vincent
  Fatal interview; B........ 480
Millis, Walter
  Martial spirit, the: A study of our war with Spain; B........ 682
Minoans, Philistines and Greeks. A. R. Burn; AN 105
Mirsky, D. S.
  Lenin; B........ 534
Mitchell, Broadus, and G. S. Mitchell
  Industrial revolution in the south, the; AN 617
Modern American painters. S. M. Kootz; B 332
Modern galaxy, a. Assembled by D. Warren; AN........ 160
Moley, Raymond
  Our criminal courts; B........ 663
Molière. J. Palmer; AN........ 686
Momigliano, Eucardio
  Cromwell. L. E. Marshall, translator; B 21
Monelli, Paolo
  Toes up: A chronicle of gay and doleful adventures of alpini and mules and wine. O. Williams, translator; AN.. 134
Monografia de 406 grabados de José Guadalupe Posada. Introductions by F. Toor and D. Rivera; B........ 73
Moore, George
  Aphrodite in Aulis; B........ 416
Morrison, Theodore
  Serpent in the cloud, the; B........ 386
Mosaic. G. B. Stern; AN........ 77
Mr. Currier and Mr. Ives. A note on their lives and times. R. Crouse; AN.... 250
Mrs. Fischer's war. H. Leslie; B........ 536
Murry, J. Middleton
  Studies in Keats; B........ 220
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R......300, 356, 418
My experiences in the world war. J. J. Pershing; B........ 560

N

Nadel, Henri
  Down the red lane. B. Taylor, translator; AN........ 134
Naked heel L. Speyer; B........ 684
Naked on roller skates. M. Bodenheim; AN 195
Nathan, George Jean
  Testament of a critic; B........ 186
Natives of England, the. H. W. Nevinson; B 417
Nazhivin, Ivan
  Dogs, the; B........ 643
Neep, E. J. C., and G. Edinger. Nelson; B 248
Neff, Emery; R........ 424
Negro. National asset or liability? J. L. Hill; B........ 385
Negro, three books on; B........ 385
Negro wage earner, the L. J. Greene and C. G. Woodson; B........ 385
Nelson. G. Edinger and E. J. C. Neep; B 248
Nemesis of American business, the. S. Chase; B......506; see also C...... 588
Nethercot, Abraham
  Abraham Cowley: The muse's Hannibal; B 426
Neue gesicht der herrschenden klasse, das. G. Grosz; B........ 158
Nevins, Allan
  Henry White. Thirty years of American diplomacy; B........ 384
Nevinson, Henry W.
  Natives of England, the; B........ 417
Newman anthology, a. Arranged by E. Przywara, S. J.; AN........ 686
New American literature, the. F. L. Pattee; B 103
Newman, Bertram
  Lord Melbourne; AN........ 588
New schools for young India. W. J. McKee; AN 457
Night in Kurdistan, a. J.-R. Bloch. Translated by S. Haden-Guest; B........ 192 Novels and novelists. K. Mansfield; AN... 249

O

Odegard, Peter H.; R........ 188
Oklahoma town. G. Milburn; AN........ 278
On the edge. W. de la Mare; B........ 356
On the old west coast. Being further reminiscences of a ranger, Major Horace Bell; AN........ 52
One man's gold. Letters and journals of a forty-niner. Compiled and edited by F. M. Christman; AN........ 52
O'Neill, Rose
  Goblin woman, the; AN........ 196
Orange valley. H. Baker; B..419; (correction, author H. Baker, not H. Baxter), ... 584
Orpheus. Myths of the world. P. Colum; AN 77
Ossendowski, Ferdinand A.
  Lenin, god of the godless; B........ 534
Oteyza, Luis de
  White devil, the. F. T. Cooper, translator; AN........ 160
Our criminal courts. R. Moley; B........ 663
Our gods are not born. C. R. Walker; AN 278
Out of soundings. H. M. Tomlinson; B... 662

P

Pagan's pilgrimage, a. L. Powys; AN.... 428
Page, Elizabeth
  Wagons west. A story of the Oregon trail; AN........ 52
Palmer, John
  Molière; AN........ 686
Panikkar, K. M.
  Gulab Singh, founder of Kashmir; AN 250
Panikkar, K. M., and K. N. Haksar
  Federal India; AN........ 358
Parkes, Henry Bamford; R.........74, 248, 661
Pattee, Fred L.
  New American literature, the; B........ 103
Paul Gauguin: The calm madman. B. Becker; B........ 455
Pershing, General John J.
  My experiences in the world war; B... 560
Peterson, Houston
  Melody of chaos, the; B........ 330
Philips, Katherine, biography. P. W. Souers; B 508
Physical basis of personality, the. C. R. Stockard; AN........ 588
Piaget, Jean
  Child's conception of physical causality, the; AN........ 334
Piatiletka—Russia's five-year plan. M. Farbman; B........ 423
Pilgrims of '48. One man's part in the Austrian revolution of 1848 and a family migration to America. J. Goldmark; B 662
Pipkin, Charles W.
  Social politics and modern democracies; B 661
Pitt, William; biography. E. K. Chatterton; AN 133
Plagued by the nightingale. K. Boyle; AN 509
Plato. The republic. Translated by P. Shorey; B........ 190
Plays of the restoration and eighteenth century. Edited by D. MacMillan and H. M. Jones; AN........ 617
Plivier, Theodor
  Kaiser's coolies, the. M. Green, translator; B........ 276
Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the. Edited by R. Bridges; AN........ 105
Poems of Lascelles Abercrombie; B........ 587
Poetry and the criticism of life. H. W. Garrod; AN........ 564
Politics. H. J. Laski; AN........ 427
Porter, William Sydney (O. Henry); biography. R. H. Davis and A. B. Maurice; B 660
Posada, José Guadalupe
  Engravings, monograph on. Introductions by F. Toor and D. Rivera; B........ 73
Pound, Roscoe
  Criminal justice in America; B....... 663
Pound, Ezra
  Draft of XXX cantos, a; B........ 632
Powys, John Cowper
  In defense of sensuality; AN........ 249
Powys, Llewelyn
  Pagan's pilgrimage, a; AN........ 428
Powys, T. F.
  White paternoster, and other stories; AN 386
Proust, Marcel: Sa révélation psychologique. A. Dandieu; AN........ 194
Pruette, Lorine; R........ 586
Public and its government, the. F. Frankfurter; B........ 158

Q

Quest for literature, the. J. T. Shipley; AN 304
Quest of pan, the. C. P. Smith; AN....... 359

R

Ralston, Jackson H.
  What's wrong with taxation? AN..... 685
Rapin, René
  Willa Cather; AN........ 22
Rappard, William E.
  Uniting Europe; AN........ 77
Rational evolution. R. Briffault; B..333; letter of correction........ 532
Read, Herbert
  Wordsworth. The Clark lectures, 1929-1930; B........ 384
Read, Herbert; R........ 641
Read, Opie
  I remember; AN........ 563
Reason and nature. M. R. Cohen; B...... 411
Red bread. M. Hindus; B........ 587
Red trade menace, the. H. R. Knickerbocker; B 423
Religion on the American frontier. The Baptists; AN........ 536
Religious aspects of the conquest of Mexico. C. S. Braden; B........ 101
Remarque, Erich Maria
  Road back, the. A. W. Wheen, translator; B........ 585

Republic, the. Plato. Translated by P. Shorey; B.......................... 190
Revolt in the arts. O. M. Sayler; AN.... 357
Richter, Gisela M.
    Sculpture and sculptors of Greece, the; AN 77
Riegel, Robert E.
    America moves west; AN............. 52
Riggs, Lynn
    Iron dish, the; B..................... 22
Ring of the Löwenskölds, the. S. Lagerlöf; B........................... 157
Riposte, A.
    Gin and bitters; AN.................. 484
River to the sea. G. A. Chamberlain; AN. 160
Road back, the. E. M. Remarque. Translated by A. W. Wheen; B.......... 585
Roads to glory. R. Aldington; B......... 301
Roberts, Donald A.; R.................... 21
Rochester, Anna
    Labor and coal; B.................... 535
Roman holiday; U. Sinclair; B............ 132
Rosenfeld, Paul; R....................... 510
Rossetti, Christina, biography. D. M. Stuart; B 508
Rothenstein, Sir William
    Men and memories; B................. 480
Rourke, Constance
    American humor: A study of the national character; B....................... 456
Roving commission, a. My early life. W. S. Churchill; AN.................. 194
Russell, Charles Edward
    Charlemagne, first of the moderns; AN 134
Russia, five books on; B.................. 423
Russia, three books on; B................. 247
Russian experiment, the. A. Feiler. Translated by H. J. Stenning; B.......... 247
Russia's productive system. E. Burns; B.. 247
Ryunosuke, Akutagawa
    Tales grotesque and curious. G. W. Shaw, translator; AN................ 509

S

Sadleir, Michael
    Bulwer: A panorama. I. Edward and Rosina, 1803-1836; B............... 640
Sanctuary. W. Faulkner; B............... 422
Sands, William Franklin
    Undiplomatic memories; AN.......... 334
Savage messiah. H. S. Ede; B............ 301
Sawyer, Newell W.
    Comedy of manners from Sheridan to Maugham, the; AN................. 428
Saxon, Lyle
    Lafitte the pirate; AN................. 53
Sayler, Oliver M.
    Revolt in the arts; AN............... 357
Schappes, Morris U.; R.................. 587
Schliemann: The story of a gold-seeker. E. Ludwig; B.......................... 660
Schneider, Herbert W.; R................. 74
Schneider, Isidor; R................21, 101, 416
Schücking, Levin L., and W. Ebisch
    Shakespeare bibliography, a; AN....... 664
Schuman, Frederick L.; R................. 614
Schuyler, George S.
    Black no more; B..218; see also letter. 382
Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R........... 533
Science of life, the. H. G. Wells, J. S. Huxley, and G. P. Wells; B........ 217
Sculpture and sculptors of Greece, the. G. M. Richter; AN.................. 77
Seagle, William; R....................156, 663
Second Elizabethan journal, a. G. B. Harrison; AN.......................... 616
Seitz, Don C.
    Lincoln the politician; B.............. 246
Selected essays of William Hazlitt; AN.... 303
Sellers, Charles Coleman
    Benedict Arnold, the proud warrior; AN 588
Seligmann, Herbert J.
    Firebird and other poems; AN......... 358
Serpent in the cloud, the. T. Morrison; B.. 386
Seule issue, la. L. Lehman; AN.......... 387
Seward, Anna, biography. M. Ashmun; B 508
Sexual life in ancient India. J. Meyer; AN 24
Sforza, Count Carlo
    Makers of modern Europe; AN....... 249
Shakespeare bibliography, a. W. Ebisch and L. L. Schücking; AN.............. 664
Shakespeare's problem comedies. W. W. Lawrence; AN.................... 104
Shakespeare, W., two books on; AN....... 104
Shakespeare, two books on; AN........... 104
Shapley, Harlow
    Flights from chaos: A survey of material systems from atoms to galaxies; B... 508
Shaw, George Bernard
    Apple cart, the: A political extravaganza; B 453
Shipley, Joseph T.
    Quest for literature, the; AN......... 304
Shipley, Maynard; R...................... 508
Shipman, Samuel S., and J. M. Budish
    Soviet foreign trade—promise or menace; B 423
Siegfried, André
    England's crisis; B................... 561
Sin and sex. R. Briffault; B............. 615
Sinclair, Upton
    Roman holiday; B.................... 132
Singing swan, the. An account of Anna Seward. M. Ashmun; B............ 508
Sitwell, Osbert
    Dumb-animal and other stories; B..... 454
Slosson, Preston William
    Great crusade and after, 1914-1928; AN 134
Smith, Chard Powers
    Quest of pan, the; AN................ 359
Smith, Logan Pearsall
    Afterthoughts; B..................... 479
Social and economic views of Mr. Justice Brandeis. Collected by A. Lief; B... 156
Social politics and modern democracies. C. W. Pipkin; B..................... 661
Son of woman: The story of D. H. Lawrence. J. M. Murry; B............ 661
Souers, Philip Webster
    Matchless Orinda, the; B............. 508
Soviet challenge to America, the. G. S. Counts; B......................... 423
Soviet foreign trade—menace or promise. J. M. Budish and S. S. Shipman; B.... 423
Spero, Sterling E., and A. L. Harris
    Black worker, the; B................. 385
Speyer, Leonora
    Naked heel; B........................ 684
Spirit of the Chinese revolution, the. A. N. Holcombe; B...................... 20
Spring books, notable..................... 432
Stalin. I. D. Levine; B................... 637
Stars in their courses, the. Sir J. Jeans; B. 508
Stecker, Margaret L.
    Unemployment benefits in the United States; AN........................ 304
Steffens, Lincoln
    Autobiography; B..................... 415
Stern, G. B.
    Mosaic; AN.......................... 77
Stewart, Bryce M., and others
    Unemployment benefits in the United States; AN........................ 304
Stockard, Charles R.
    Physical basis of personality, the; AN.. 588
Stoddard, Lothrop
    Master of Manhattan. The life of Richard Croker; B................. 454
Stolberg, Benjamin; R..................... 50
Stone, Grace Zaring
    Bitter tea of General Yen, the; B...... 20
Stopes, Marie
    Married love; censorship.............. 579
Story of religions in America, the. W. W. Sweet; B.......................... 74
Strong, L. A. G.
    Jealous ghost, the; AN............... 685
Stuart, Dorothy Margaret
    Christina Rossetti; B.................. 508
Studies in Keats. J. M. Murry; B....... 220
Survey of American foreign relations, 1930; AN 458
Sweet, William Warren
    Story of religions in America, the; B.. 74
Sykes, Gerald; R.......130, 192, 356, 420, 643

T

Tales grotesque and curious. A. Ryunosuke. Translated by G. W. Shaw; AN..... 509
Tate, Allen; R............................ 632
Tawney, R. H.
    Equality; B.......................... 356
Taylor, Jeremy. Golden grove, the: Selected passages from the sermons and writings of Jeremy Taylor. Edited by P. Smith; AN 333
Temple, Jean
    Blue ghost: A study of Lafcadio Hearn; B 277
Testament of a critic. G. J. Nathan; B.... 186
That royal lover. K. Bercovici; AN....... 509
Theatre street. T. Karsavina; B.......... 190
They told Barron. Notes of the late Clarence W. Barron. Edited and arranged by A. Pound and S. T. Moore; B.... 50
This land of liberty. E. S. Bates; B...... 303
Thomas, Helen
    World without end; AN.............. 484
Thomas, Norman
    America's way out: A program for democracy; B....................... 418
Thomas, Norman; R..................454, 684
Thompson, Eric, and T. Gann
    History of the Mayas, the: From the earliest times to the present day; AN 664
Three thousand years of Rome. D. von Kalckreuth. Translated by C. Frederick; AN 359
Three wise men of the east. E. Bisland; B 20
Tin-pan alley. I. Goldberg; B............ 248
Todes, Charlotte
    Labor and lumber; B................. 535
Toes up: A chronicle of gay and doleful adventures of alpini and mules and wine. P. Monelli. Translated by O. Williams; AN.................... 134
Together again. H. G. Carlisle; AN....... 159
Tomlinson, H. M.
    Out of soundings; B.................. 662
Trelawny, Edward John; biography. H. J. Massingham; B..................... 133
Trilling, Lionel; R....................... 684
Troy, William; R......................... 426
Turlington, Edgar
    Mexico and her foreign creditors; B.... 682
Twelve southerners
    I'll take my stand: The south and the agrarian tradition; B................ 48
Two Carlyles, the. O. Burdett; B......... 424
Two thieves. M. Komroff; AN........... 221

U

Undiplomatic memories. W. F. Sands; AN 334
Unemployment: A problem of industry. W. H. Beveridge; B.................. 300
Unemployment benefits in the United States. B. M. Stewart, J. C. Barber, M. W. Gilson and M. L. Stecker; AN...... 304
Uniting Europe. W. E. Rappard; AN...... 77
Universities—American, English, German. A. Flexner......175; see also C....... 328
Unrest: The rebel poets' anthology for 1930. Edited by R. Cheyney and J. Conroy; AN 616
Unweave a rainbow. E. Johnson; AN.... 221
Upstage. J. M. Brown; B................. 425

V

Vale and other poems. Æ; AN............ 564
Van Doren, Dorothy; R..101, 218 (see also C, 382), 454, 615
Van Doren, Mark
    Jonathan Gentry; B.................. 355
Van Doren, Mark; R..............19, 384, 508
Vernadsky, George
    Lenin, red dictator; B................ 534
Vladimirtsov, B. Ya.
    Chingis-Khan; AN.................... 78
Voltaire. G. Brandes. Translated by O. Kruger and P. Butler; B............ 193
Volume two. K. Mayo; B................ 639

W

Wagons west. A story of the Oregon trail. E. Page; AN...................... 52
Walker, Charles R.
    Our gods are not born; AN........... 278
Wall street and Lombard street. F. W. Hirst; AN.......................... 537
Walpole, Hugh
    Above the dark tumult; B............. 507
Walsh, William Thomas
    Isabella of Spain; AN................ 77
Walton, Eda Lou; R..157, 220, 301, 332, 355, 456, 480, 534, 684
Warne, Colston E.; R..................... 535
Warner, Arthur; R........................ 662
Water gipsies, the. A. P. Herbert; AN... 159
Wells, G. P., H. G. Wells and J. S. Huxley
    Science of life, the; B............... 217
Wells, Herbert George, in Four contemporary novelists, by W. L. Cross; AN...... 104
Wells, Wells
    Wilson the unknown; B.............. 481
West, Rebecca
    D. H. Lawrence; B................... 75
Westermarck, Edward
    Wit and wisdom of Morocco. A study of native proverbs; AN............... 537
Westward. The romance of the American frontier. E. D. Branch; AN........ 52
Whaler, James
    Green river: A poem for Rafinesque; AN 537
What rights are left? H. A. Johnston; B.. 303
What's wrong with taxation? J. H. Ralston; AN 685
Wheel of fire, the. Essays in interpretation of Shakespeare's sombre tragedies. G. W. Knight; B...................... 19
White devil, the. L. Oteyza. Translated by F. T. Cooper; AN.............. 160
White, Henry. Thirty years of American diplomacy. A. Nevins. B.......... 384
White jade. M. Meagher; AN............ 159
White nights. J. Lemont; AN............ 304
White paternoster, the, and other stories. T. F. Powys; AN................. 386
Why recognize Russia? L. Fischer; B..... 614
Wide open town. M. Brinig; AN......... 386
Wilhelmson, Carl
    Midsummernight; AN................ 221
Willa Cather. R. Rapin; AN............ 22
William Shakespeare. A study of facts and problems. E. K. Chambers; B...... 19
Wilson, Edmund
    Axel's castle; B..................... 245
Wilson the unknown. W. Wells; B....... 481
Winter miscellany, a. Edited and compiled by H. Wolfe; AN.................. 105

Wit and wisdom of Morocco. A study of native proverbs. E. Westermarck; AN 537
Wolfe, Humbert
  Early poems; AN.................... 685
Wordsworth. C. H. Herford; B............ 384
Wordsworth. The Clark lectures, 1929-1930. H. Read; B....................... 384
Works of John Milton, the. Volumes I and II; B 681
World revolution and religion. P. Hutchinson; B............................ 684
World without end. H. Thomas; AN...... 484
Wright, Cuthbert; R....................50, 507

Y

Yankee trader in the gold rush, a. Letters of Franklin A. Buck. Complied by K. A. White; AN................. 52
Year on the Great Barrier Reef, a. C. M. Yonge; AN........................ 358
Yehuda. M. Levin; B.................... 684
Yonge, C. M.
  Year on the Great Barrier Reef, a; AN 358

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R................ 220
Zink, Harold
  City bosses in the United States; B.... 454

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1931 No. 3418

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1

EDITORIALS:

The Liberator: 1831-1931 4
The First Page of the First Issue of The Liberator 5
Political Thuggery 5
Call an Early Session 6
Heartache Preferred 7
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1930 8
GARRISON, BREAKER OF CHAINS. By Henry Raymond Mussey 9
NORTH CAROLINA'S NEW SENATORS. By Weimar Jones 11
THE ORIENTAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST. By Hubert Phillips 12
"PACIFICATION" OF THE UKRAINE. By Negley Farson 14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 15
CORRESPONDENCE 16

BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:

Graves in China. By Leonora Speyer 18
Dollar Books: An Autopsy. By Henry Hazlitt 18
Shakespeare as He Was. By Mark Van Doren 19
T. S. Eliot's Baudelaire. By Granville Hicks 20
About China. By Isidor Schneider 20
"Our Chief Men." By Donald A. Roberts 21
Lynn Riggs as Poet. By Horace Gregory 22
Books in Brief 22
Drama: W. C. Fields and the Cosmos. By Heywood Broun 24
Films: A Notable Achievement. By Alexander Bakshy 25
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 26

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Iraq: A British Preserve. By David W. Wainhouse 27

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
DOROTHY VAN DOREN FREDA KIRCHWEY
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

* Absent in Europe.

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per [illegible] postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

BY ABRUPTLY DISMISSING Charles A. Russell, solicitor, and William V. King, chief accountant of the old Federal Power Commission, the two men in the old organization specially notable for their zeal in defending the public interest, Commissioners Smith, Garsaud, and Draper, who took action without even waiting for their two colleagues, have done much to confirm our worst fears regarding the reorganized Power Commission. It is hard, despite their denial, to avoid the conclusion that they acted on orders from the White House, and Progressive Senators are so aroused that they are reported as planning to move on January 5 for a reconsideration of the vote confirming the three commissioners. Senator Walsh with great moderation said everything that needs be said:

> I am unable to interpret this action [the dismissal] in any light except as punishment of two devoted public servants for the faithful discharge of the duties that devolved upon them. So far as I have been able to learn, not a word has ever been uttered against either implying anything more than excessive zeal in safeguarding the interests of the public. It is a matter of profound regret to me that the confidence I hoped the country would have in the new commission should be so early and so rudely disturbed.

When the Senate considered the nomination of the three commissioners, it apparently felt that it had no evidence of anything worse than lack of fitness for the job; if it reconsiders them, it will have in this action abundant evidence of unfitness.

INCOME MILLIONAIRES during 1928, according to the final statistics of income for that year just made public, numbered 511, of whom 26 received $5,000,000 or more. The net income of the 511 amounted to $1,109,000,000, out of a total of $25,226,000,000 reported by 2,523,063 individuals. While the income millionaires numbered but one in 5,000 of those reporting, they received 4 per cent of the reported income and paid 16 per cent of the income tax. Of the net income of $8,270,000,000 received by persons having incomes below $5,000, $5,854,000,000 represents salaries and wages, most of the remainder presumably being the income of farmers and small business men. Comparing the 2,523,063 returns with the total number of families in the United States, we find that less than one family in ten makes a return for income-tax purposes, while the $25,000,000,000 reported by the lucky tenth must cover more than one-fourth of our total income. It is seldom realized how small is the proportion of the population liable to individual income tax or how great is the inequality of income disclosed by the figures. Corporation returns from 495,892 concerns reporting net income of about $10,618,000,000 and paying a tax of $1,184,000,000 are accompanied by returns from 174,826 other corporations showing a deficit of $2,391,000,000. Thus, in the boom year 1928 more than one-fourth of the corporations reporting showed an actual loss. On the same day that these facts are made public, income tax refunds of nearly $127,000,000 to individuals and corporations during 1930 are reported in detail by the Treasury; and despite much Congressional criticism Secretary Mellon insists that the results justify the settlement of disputed cases by administrative action instead of litigation.

ON THE SAME DAY that Congress voted the Farm Board another $150,000,000 to continue its market speculation, the price of July wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade fell to 66⅝ cents, the lowest price since 1901. On December 26, it went down even farther, to 62¾ cents. Since the aim of the board's speculative activities is to keep up prices, the ordinary citizen may be pardoned for not understanding exactly what is happening. Acting through the Grain Stabilization Corporation, the board with its practically unlimited buying power has pegged the price of December wheat in Chicago at about 76 cents, and the price for other deliveries during the present crop year at corresponding figures, but it is not yet operating in the 1931-32 crop; hence the July price quoted above. Chicago prices on the current crop are already so far out of line with world prices that there has been talk within the past few days of the possibility of imports even over our forty-two-cent tariff. Mr. Legge, accordingly, with the courage of his convictions, has suggested an actual embargo on wheat imports.

To subsidize farmers to grow an unprofitable crop without any possibility of restricting production is a suicidal arrangement for farmers and Treasury alike; yet that seems to be the Farm Board's wheat policy.

THE PRESENCE OF CORN SUGAR (dextrose) in prepared foods need no longer be declared on the label, according to a ruling made by Secretary Hyde on December 26. Ever since the enactment of the Food and Drug Act in 1906 attempts have been made by the glucose interests to remove the restrictions of the use of corn sugar, which has often been used as an adulterant for cane sugar; but all efforts to let down the bars in Congress have been futile. The late Dr. Wiley characterized a bill "permitting dextrose to function as sucrose without notice to the consumer" as "a deliberate fraud upon the housewife." Mrs. Wiley in a public statement now declares that officials charged with the enforcement of federal and State food laws are strongly opposed to the present ruling, which, she says, is an attack on the pure food law. Secretary Hyde, on the other hand, asserts that his ruling weakens neither the Food and Drug Act nor its administration. His positive reason for action is in the added market he hopes to create for corn. The ruling is another example of that tenderness for the interests of producers which has marked the administration of a measure intended to protect the health and pocket-book of consumers. For the Secretary of Agriculture thus to take action which Congress has refused to take is to stretch administrative discretion to a highly dangerous point, and is not to be defended on the ground of possible aid to our harassed agriculture. If the ruling stands, the whole principle that the consumer is entitled to know what he is buying would appear to be endangered.

IT SEEMS HARD to draw any reassuring conclusions from the financial and industrial record of recent weeks. The steel industry operating at only one-third of capacity; crude oil production at the lowest point in four years; a substantial pre-Christmas reduction of prices by the large mail-order houses; wheat "futures" at the lowest prices in thirty-four years, with such other leading commodities as copper, silver, and cotton also at almost their lowest points since the declines began; receivership for the Seaboard Air Line Railway; two more large bank failures, the Bankers Trust Company of Philadelphia and the Chelsea Bank and Trust Company in New York—all this makes a depressing record, and to many persons a most disquieting one. Yet failures often follow rather than precede the worst conditions, and there is no reason for supposing that recent bank suspensions reflect anything but bad special situations, brought about in most cases by unsound banking practice. Certainly there is every ground for believing the general banking situation to be remarkably strong; the reduction of the rediscount rate of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to 2 per cent, the lowest rate in its history, is sufficient indication in itself of the great volume of free funds that the banks as a whole now have at their disposal. As for the price collapse, its very violence and extent seem likely soon to bring at least a moderate recovery. Even though retail business has been greatly reduced, moreover, most retailers seem to have been selling more goods than they have been buying. This situation cannot continue much longer. Retailers must soon replenish their stocks. An improvement both in wholesale trade and in the production of basic materials may be close at hand.

IN HIS FINAL REPORT to the Attorney General of New York, Watson Washburn, Assistant Attorney General, has recommended that investment trusts be regularly compelled to publish a full statement of their holdings of securities every three months. Such a regulation has long been necessary; the chief criticism of it must be that it deals with only one aspect of a grave and complex problem. Investment trusts have grown enormously in the last five years. In 1927 there were 102 with total resources under $600,000,000. In May of last year, according to Mr. Washburn's figures, there were 270 investment trusts with resources of more than $4,500,000,000. In spite of a few well-managed exceptions, these unregulated trusts as a whole have not only lost hundreds of millions of dollars for their security holders, but have raised the most serious economic issues. The investment trust was originally designed as a haven for perplexed investors, and the case for regulating it is quite as clear in some respects as that for regulating the insurance companies and savings banks. We need to consider not only the question of publicity of holdings, but such questions as intricate capital structures, hidden fees to managers, the use of the trust as a dumping ground for otherwise unsalable securities, and its use as a tool for employing other people's money to buy voting control in corporations. So far virtually the only institution to attempt to regulate investment trusts has been the New York Stock Exchange, which has done some commendable but necessarily limited work.

GUIDO SERIO, the Italian anti-Fascist whom the Department of Labor has ordered deported to Italy notwithstanding the practical certainty that he will there be condemned to death because of his political activities, has obtained at least a temporary respite through an appeal to the United States Circuit Court from the adverse decision which Judge Bondy of the District Court for the Southern District of New York handed down on December 22. It will be recalled that a few weeks ago, when the case was heard in the District Court, Judge Bondy postponed decision in the hope that the Department of Labor might, as he said, "use a little common sense" in interpreting the law, and allow Serio to depart voluntarily and at his own expense to Russia. The appeal to common sense, however, fell upon deaf ears at Washington, and Judge Bondy has now decided that his court has no power to overrule the Secretary of Labor. The immigration laws, he points out, provide that aliens who are deported shall be sent, "at the option of the Secretary of Labor," either to the country from which they came or to the port from which they embarked; and although permission to depart voluntarily to a country of their choice has "on many occasions" been allowed, Judge Bondy now intimates a doubt as to whether such discretion is warranted by the statutes. In other words, a strict interpretation of a statutory provision by an administrative officer is to be upheld, notwithstanding repeated deviations from it in the past, as beyond judicial review even when its application is shocking to humanity. Thus do the federal courts of the United States aid in enforcing the political laws of Italy.

MUSTAPHA KEMAL PASHA'S efforts to expedite the westernization of Turkey by dictatorial decree have brought fresh troubles to that once powerful country. The latest difficulties, according to dispatches cabled from Istanbul, are of a religious nature, the dispatches stating that a widespread movement to overthrow Kemal Pasha and to restore the caliphate has been discovered. The Turkish President has decided to suppress the movement by force. This method of dealing with religion has served him well, at least on the surface, during the seven years of his dictatorship. His absolute control of the political and military machinery of Turkey was the sole basis for the laws or decrees which abolished the caliphate, the Ottoman dynasty, the various religious offices and orders, the monasteries, polygamy, and other Islamic institutions. Although the process was one-sided and was carried forward very hastily, opposition to it has been successfully parried by wholesale arrests, executions, and deportations. Thus far there has been no noticeable effort made to educate the people into accepting these questionable reforms. Other dictators have proceeded with more wisdom; Mussolini has stepped cautiously where the church has been concerned, and the Communists in Russia have depended upon educational methods to a large extent in their war on religion. Kemal Pasha may have to pay for his rashness with a religious war.

SHOULD BELGIUM decide to renounce its military alliance with France, as the Socialist and Flemish parties desire, the French network of military agreements, which embraces a large part of Europe, would be struck a serious blow. The immediate damage would not be so much material as moral. The mere fact of renunciation, quite apart from its effect on any war plans France might have worked out in collaboration with Belgium, would weaken French hegemony in Europe and undermine the military agreements with Poland and the Little Entente countries. It is readily understandable then that France will do its utmost to prevent the Socialist-Flemish campaign from succeeding. Its influence in Brussels is already great, and it is probable that there will be no renunciation. Nevertheless the Belgian Socialist Party, the second largest in the country, has itself political power that cannot be lightly ignored. Its moderation has won for it the respect, if not the active support, of a large section of the non-Socialist population. A complicating factor is the Flemish problem. Although the Flemish Party, which advocates separation of Flanders from Belgium, is small, its political strength is likely to grow to unprecedented proportions in the near future because of the inability of the Belgian government to solve the Flemish difficulty. A threatened revolt of the Flemings might persuade Brussels to renounce the alliance despite French influence. It is not only possible, but probable, that its renunciation would lead to a general cleaning up of the European political situation.

ALTHOUGH WASHINGTON has not yet sent its blessing to the new President of Guatemala, it is a fair guess that if Orellana continues in power all will be forgiven shortly, in spite of the fact that he disobeyed parental instructions in taking his job by force. Indeed, if Orellana's recent statement to the Associated Press is correct, the way to family reconciliation is not hard to travel. Orellana says that the Council of Ministers violated the constitution in two ways in choosing Palma, whom Orellana overthrew. The ministers were empowered to act only if the President died. In case of his incapacity—which was the situation in regard to Chacon—the President himself was authorized to appoint his successor. And besides, says Orellana, the ministers went wrong in naming the second designate (second vice-president) instead of the first designate. Meanwhile the de facto President of Guatemala may look back wistfully upon the good old days of 1921 when the State Department extended the glad hand to another Orellana, a kinsman of the present executive, although he too had taken office by violence. At that time Washington wanted to kill, without appearing to do so, the embryo Central American Union, which espoused the naughty doctrine of Latin America for Latin Americans. Orellana seemed to be the man to do that—and did.

THE SCRUBWOMEN OF HARVARD have their back pay but not through any grace on the part of the Harvard Corporation or the Minimum Wage Commission of Massachusetts which for nine long years let the university pay the women two cents an hour less than they should have received. Two cents an hour seems very little, but apparently the business men who run Harvard thought it was worth saving even at the expense of lowly scrubwomen. When the matter was brought sharply to their attention they declared with unexampled calm that the underpayment was made up for by the fact that the women had had half-hour rest periods even though the law didn't require it! Certain students and alumni of Harvard, however, were not so imperturbable. Headed by Corliss Lamont, a group of 268 of them contributed $3,880, the sum necessary to pay the nineteen scrubwomen their back wages. The money reached them on the day before Christmas in the form of savings-bank account books. To make sure that it would not be mistaken for charity, each book was accompanied by a letter which recited at length the "neglect and niggardliness" of the corporation and stated that its attitude throughout the episode was unrepresentative of Harvard and its students and alumni. And for fear the scrubwomen would neglect to show the letter to the members of the Harvard corporation, Mr. Lamont sent it to the newspapers.

CHRISTINA MERRIMAN, who died on December 23, was secretary of the Foreign Policy Association of New York from its inception in 1919 until her resignation on account of ill health three years ago. She was one of those comparatively little-known Americans to whom her countrymen owe a great debt. In the words of James G. McDonald and Paul U. Kellogg, "There was something at once vivid, daring, and constructive in the contribution which she made to the life of New York and to the newer forces that have gathered head in the field of international relations since the World War." She played an important part in the creation and development of the organization which, through its various agencies of publicity and research, has already done so much toward the building up of an informed and liberal public opinion on international relations in this country. The most fitting memorial to such a brave and liberal spirit is the carrying forward of the work of enlightenment and international understanding in which her interest was so deeply engaged.

The Liberator: 1831-1931

ONE hundred years ago there was founded a journal of liberty without exact parallel in American history. With his own hands William Lloyd Garrison set the type for this first issue of his little weekly, working in a garret without a single subscriber obtained in advance to give him hope. So limited were their means that he and his partner, Isaac Knapp, slept upon the floor of their composing room; for nearly ten months they lived only upon what they could purchase at a nearby bakery. To quote the lines of James Russell Lowell:

> In a small chamber, friendless and unseen,
> Toiled o'er his types one poor, unlearned young man;
> The place was dark, unfurnitured, and mean;
> Yet there the freedom of a race began.

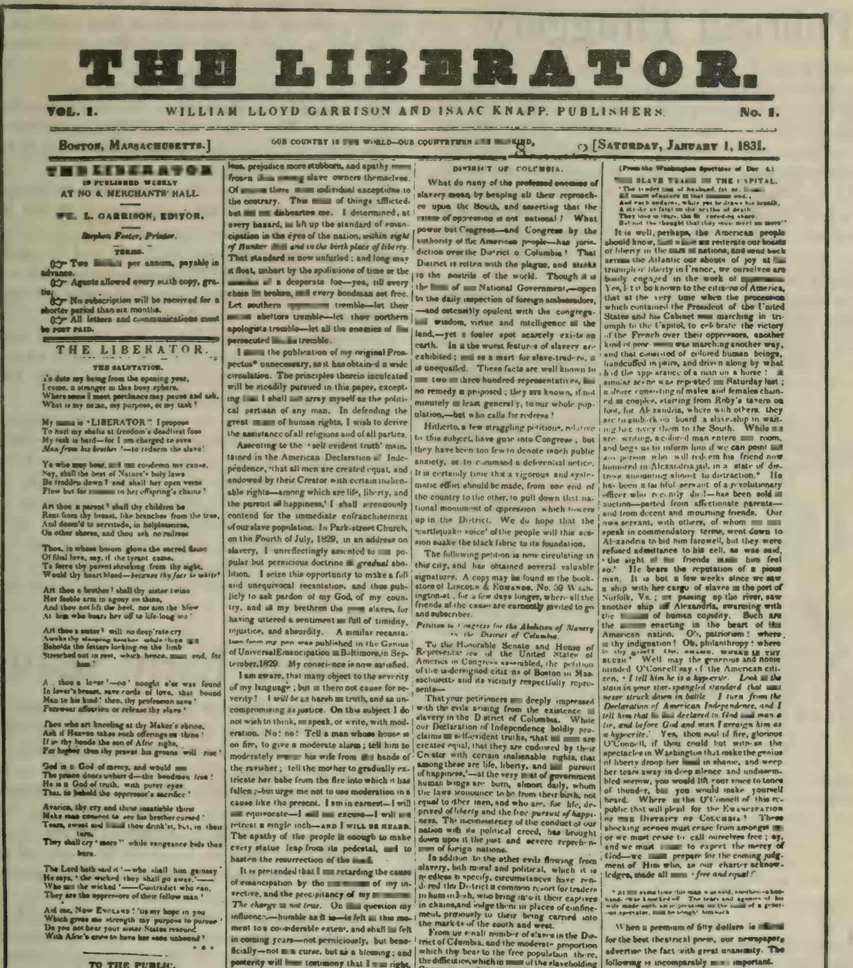
It is a tradition that Lincoln himself once said that without the preparatory work of the Liberator the Emancipation Proclamation would never have been signed in 1863.

Nine biographies have now been written of this militant unschooled young man—he was twenty-five years old when he founded his Liberator—and no history of the Abolition era fails to record the career of this weekly and its editor. Over him and his methods controversies still rage. There are teachers in plenty to lay at the doors of this nonresistant the responsibility for the bloodshed of 1861-65 which he abhorred. The violence of his language is deplored today as it was in his own time. His "wild words," it is again the fashion to say, stirred men's passions, roused their hatreds, and drove them at one another's throats in 1861. This is the power attributed to the man whose main arguments were thunderbolts drawn from the Bible, in the polemical use of which he was, declares his latest biographer, unequaled in our history. This control of American public opinion, of the emotions of his fellow-citizens, is attributed to an editor the circulation of whose weekly never went above three thousand copies, whose tiny budget never balanced, who was destitute when in 1865 he suspended publication because the great liberation had come. Happiest of reformers, both by temperament and because of his convictions, his was the rare good fortune to see victory achieved within the span of his best years for a cause for which no Boston church would open its doors in 1831, for which he was mobbed by his fellow-townsmen—because of his advocacy of which an American legislature, to use Garrison's own phrase, set a price upon his head.

The critics attribute to William Lloyd Garrison's clarion voice and pen far too much power. They would assign to him sole responsibility for a result for which there were dozens of other causes. They forget the nature of the slave power itself, whose very wickedness drove it to its doom. They forget the inevitable passions aroused by any attempt to perpetuate a system that strikes at everything sacred in human nature—at the right to possess one's own body and soul, at the right to insure bodily and spiritual freedom for the members of one's own family, at the right to order one's own way of life by one's own wishes and one's own conscience. The critics forget the aggression in Texas; the crime of the Mexican War, which Ulysses S. Grant, a participant in it, declared to be the least excusable in history; they forget the theft of Arizona, New Mexico, and southern California; they forget the economic urge for new lands to devastate with a fatal single-crop system and wasteful unpaid labor, which urge had within it the seeds of certain death; they forget Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska. All this in awe of a single man's words, because those words, blazing with the inextinguishable fire of the moral law, seared and maddened the guilty at whom they were directed—the guilty in Boston and New York and in the halls of Congress as well as in Richmond and New Orleans. Those words infuriated because they were the truth; they burnt men's consciences to the raw.

Let who will deprecate the spiritual violence of a Garrison. We are content to believe that had there not been violence plus sincerity and conviction and justice and truth in the words of the Liberator, their author must have failed in his task and his journal would today be earning not a line in the histories of his country. We of The Nation have little patience, as our readers must be aware, with the mealy-mouthed advocacy of reforms, with the good-Lord, good-Devil methods of those who would advance the world by never attributing motives, or describing evil deeds in ultimate terms. We only wish that The Nation, this child of the Liberator—for The Nation was founded by Godkin and the third son of Garrison as soon as the Liberator ceased, and Garrison himself wrote for an early issue—might have inherited more of its passion and its "destructive" power of anathema. There are and always will be times and wrongs that call for another Book of Jeremiah, for violent words that, like those of Garrison, come from men ready like him to declare that they will be "as harsh as truth, as uncompromising as justice." Indeed, if the Liberator's critics would seek the source of its extraordinary power, it lies in this declaration—not merely in the violence of its thunderbolts, but in its glorious refusal to deal with any compromisers in or out of office, or to strike any bargain, or accept any compromise whatsoever.

Surely never were qualities like those of Garrison more needed than today, in this hour of national suffering, in this time of hesitation. In the highest places sit men who temporize, who bear false witness, who compromise, and compromise, and compromise—none more so than the Quaker Herbert Hoover, who, thank fortune, bears no resemblance to the noble band of that faith who were the backbone of Abolition and insured Garrison's success. Mr. Hoover sins steadily, we believe, against his own knowledge as he does against his readopted faith. It is still a fight as to whether this nation shall remain half slave and half free; still a battle whether the men who possess shall hold the race in servitude by reason of their laws and their wars; still a question whether freedom shall not perish from this earth. Hence we have deemed it but our duty to recall for a moment a man who dared stake his conscience against the whole world.



THE LIBERATOR.

VOL. I. WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON AND ISAAC KNAPP, PUBLISHERS. No. 1.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.] OUR COUNTRY IS [redacted] WORLD—OUR COUNTRYMEN [redacted] [redacted]KIND. [SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1831.

[redacted]
IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY
AT NO 6, MERCHANTS' HALL.

[redacted] L. GARRISON, EDITOR.

Stephen Foster, Printer.

TERMS.

☞ Two [redacted] per annum, payable in advance.

☞ Agents allowed every sixth copy, gratis.

☞ No subscription will be received for a shorter period than six months.

☞ All letters and communications must be POST PAID.

THE LIBERATOR.

THE SALUTATION.

I date my being from the opening year,
I come, [redacted] stranger [redacted] this busy sphere,
Where some [redacted] meet perchance may pause and ask,
What is my name, my purpose, or my task?

My [redacted] is 'LIBERATOR'! I propose
To hurl my shafts at freedom's deadliest foes!
My task is hard—for I [redacted] charged to save
Man from his brother!—to redeem the slave!

Ye who [redacted] hear, [redacted] [redacted] condemn my cause,
Say, shall the best of Nature's holy laws
Be trodden down? and shall her open veins
Flow but for [redacted] to her offspring's chains?

Art thou [redacted] parent? shall thy children be
Rent from thy breast, like branches from the tree,
And doom'd to servitude, in helplessness,
On other shores, and thou ask no redress?

Thou, in whose bosom glows the sacred flame
Of filial love, say, if the tyrant came,
To force thy parent shrieking from thy sight,
Would thy heart bleed—because thy face is white?

Art thou a brother? shall thy sister twine
Her feeble arm in agony on thine,
And thou not lift the heel, nor aim the blow
At [redacted] who bears her off to life-long woe?

Art thou a sister? will no desp'rate cry
Awake thy sleeping brother, while thine [redacted]
Beholds the fetters locking on the limb
Stretched out in rest, which hence, [redacted] end, for him?

Art thou a lover?—no! naught e'er was found
In lover's breast, save cords of love, that bound
Man to his kind! then, thy professions save!
Forswear affection or release thy slave!

Thou who art kneeling at thy Maker's shrine,
Ask if Heaven takes such offerings [redacted] thine!
If in thy bonds the son of Afric sighs,
Far higher than thy prayer his groans will rise!

God is [redacted] God of mercy, and would [redacted]
The prison doors unbarr'd—the bondmen free!
He is [redacted] God of truth, with purer eyes
Than to behold the oppressor's sacrifice!

Avarice, thy cry and thine insatiable thirst
Make man consent to see his brother cursed!
Tears, sweat and [redacted] thou drink'st, but, in their turn,
They shall cry 'more!' while vengeance bids thee burn.

The Lord hath said it!—who shall him gainsay?
He says, 'the wicked they shall go away,'—
Who [redacted] the wicked?—Contradict who can,
They are the oppressors of their fellow man!

Aid me, NEW ENGLAND! 'tis my hope in you
Which gives me strength my purpose to pursue!
Do you not hear your sister States resound
With Afric's cries to have her sons unbound?

* * *

TO THE PUBLIC.

In the month of August, I issued proposals [redacted] publishing 'THE LIBERATOR' in Washington City; but the enterprise, though hailed [redacted] different sections of the country, was palsied by public indifference. Since that time, the removal of the Genius of Universal Emancipation to the Seat of Government has rendered less imperious the establishment of a similar periodical in that quarter.

During my recent tour for the purpose of exciting the minds of the people by a series of discourses on the subject of slavery, every place that I visited gave fresh evidence of the fact, that a greater revolution in public sentiment was to be effected in the free states—[redacted] particularly in New England—than at the South. I found contempt [redacted] bitter, opposition more active, detraction [redacted] relentless, prejudice more stubborn, and apathy [redacted] frozen [redacted] [redacted] slave owners themselves. Of [redacted] there [redacted] individual exceptions to the contrary. This [redacted] of things afflicted, but [redacted] [redacted] dishearten me. I determined, at every hazard, [redacted] lift up the standard of emancipation in the eyes of the nation, within sight of Bunker [redacted] and in the birth place of liberty. That standard is now unfurled; and long may it float, unhurt by the spoliations of time or the [redacted] [redacted] a desperate foe—yea, till every chain [redacted] broken, [redacted] every bondman set free. Let southern [redacted] tremble—let their [redacted] abettors tremble—let their northern apologists tremble—let all the enemies of [redacted] persecuted [redacted] tremble.

I [redacted] the publication of my original Prospectus* unnecessary, as it has obtained [redacted] wide circulation. The principles therein inculcated will be steadily pursued in this paper, excepting [redacted] I shall [redacted] array myself as the political partisan of any man. In defending the great [redacted] of human rights, I wish to derive the assistance of all religions and of all parties.

Assenting to the 'self-evident truth' maintained in the American Declaration [redacted] Independence, 'that all men are created equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit [redacted] happiness,' I shall strenuously contend for the immediate enfranchisement of our slave population. In Park-street Church, on the Fourth of July, 1829, in an address on slavery, I unreflectingly assented to [redacted] popular but pernicious doctrine [redacted] gradual abolition. I seize this opportunity to make a full and unequivocal recantation, and thus publicly to ask pardon of my God, of my country, and [redacted] my brethren the [redacted] slaves, for having uttered a sentiment [redacted] full of timidity, injustice, and absurdity. A similar recantation from my pen was published in the Genius of Universal Emancipation [redacted] Baltimore, in September, 1829. My conscience is now satisfied.

I am aware, that many object to the severity of my language; but [redacted] there not cause for severity? I will be [redacted] harsh [redacted] truth, and as uncompromising as justice. On this subject I do not wish to think, [redacted] speak, or write, with moderation. No! no! Tell a man whose house is on fire, to give [redacted] moderate alarm; tell him to moderately [redacted] his wife from [redacted] hands of the ravisher; tell the mother to gradually extricate her babe from the fire into which it has fallen;—but urge me not to use moderation in a cause like the present. I am in earnest—I will [redacted] equivocate—I [redacted] [redacted] excuse—I will [redacted] retreat [redacted] single inch—AND I WILL BE HEARD. The apathy of the people [redacted] enough to make every statue leap from its pedestal, [redacted] to hasten the resurrection of the [redacted]

It is pretended that I [redacted] retarding the cause of emancipation by the [redacted] of my invective, and the precipitancy of my [redacted] The charge [redacted] not true. On [redacted] question my influence,—humble as it is,—is felt [redacted] this moment to a considerable extent, and shall [redacted] felt in coming years—not perniciously, but beneficially—not [redacted] curse, but as a blessing; and posterity will [redacted] testimony that I [redacted] right. I desire to thank God, that he enables me to disregard 'the fear of man which bringeth a snare,' and to speak [redacted] truth in its simplicity and power. [redacted] here I close with this [redacted] dedication:

'Oppression! I have seen thee, face to face,
And met thy cruel eye [redacted] cloudy brow;
But thy soul-withering glance I fear not [redacted]—
For dread to prouder feelings doth give place,
Of deep abhorrence! Scorning the disgrace
Of slavish knees that at thy footstool bow,
I also kneel—but with far other vow
Do hail thee and thy herd of hirelings base:—
I swear, while life-blood warms my throbbing veins,
Still to oppose and thwart, with heart and hand,
Thy brutalising sway—till Afric's chains
Are burst, and Freedom rules the rescued land,—
Trampling Oppression and his iron rod:
Such is the vow I take—SO HELP ME GOD!'

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.
Boston, January 1, 1831.

---

* I would here offer my grateful acknowledgments to those editors who so promptly and generously inserted my Proposals. They must give me an available opportunity to repay their liberality.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

What do many of the professed enemies of slavery mean, by heaping all their reproaches upon the South, and asserting that the [redacted] of oppression is not national? What power but Congress—and Congress by the authority of the American people—has jurisdiction over the District of Columbia? That District is rotten with the plague, and [redacted] to the nostrils of the world. Though [redacted] is the [redacted] of [redacted] National Government,—open to the daily inspection of foreign ambassadors,—and ostensibly opulent with the congrega[redacted] wisdom, virtue and intelligence [redacted] the land,—yet [redacted] fouler spot scarcely exists on earth. In [redacted] the worst features of slavery are exhibited; [redacted] as a mart for slave-traders, [redacted] is unequalled. These facts are well known to [redacted] two [redacted] three hundred representatives, [redacted] no remedy [redacted] proposed; they [redacted] known, if not minutely [redacted] least generally, to our whole population,—but who calls for redress!

Hitherto, a few straggling petitions, relative to this subject, have gone into Congress; but they have been too few to denote much public anxiety, or to command a deferential notice. It is certainly time that a vigorous and systematic effort should be made, from one end of the country to the other, to pull down that national monument of oppression which towers up in the District. We do hope that the 'earthquake voice' of the people will this session shake the black fabric to its foundation.

The following petition is now circulating in this city, and has obtained several valuable signatures. A copy may [redacted] found [redacted] the bookstore of LINCOLN & EDMANDS, No. 59 Washington-st., for a few days longer, where all the friends [redacted] the cause are earnestly invited to go and subscribe.

Petition to Congress for the Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, the petition of the undersigned citizens of Boston in Massachusetts and its vicinity respectfully represents—

That your petitioners [redacted] deeply impressed with the evils arising from the existence [redacted] slavery in the District of Columbia. While our Declaration of Independence boldly proclaims [redacted] self-evident truths, 'that [redacted] [redacted] are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and [redacted] pursuit of happiness,'—at the very [redacted] of government human beings are born, almost daily, whom the laws pronounce to be from their birth, not equal to other men, and who are, for life, deprived of liberty and the free pursuit of happiness. The inconsistency of the conduct of our nation with its political creed, has brought down upon it the just and severe reprehen[redacted] of foreign nations.

In addition to the other evils flowing from slavery, both moral and political, which it is needless to specify, circumstances have rendered this District [redacted] common resort for traders in human flesh, who bring into it their captives in chains, and lodge them in places of confinement, previously to their being carried into the markets of the south and west.

From the small number of slaves in the District of Columbia, and the moderate proportion which they bear to the free population there, the difficulties which in [redacted] of the slaveholding States oppose the restoration of this degraded class of men to their natural rights, do not exist.

Your petitioners therefore pray that Congress will, without delay, take such measures for the immediate or gradual abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and for the preventing of bringing slaves into that District for purposes of traffic, in such mode as may be thought advisable; and that suitable provision be made for the education of all free blacks and colored children in the District, thus to preserve them from continuing, even as free men, an unenlightened and degraded caste.

If any individual should [redacted] unmoved, either by the petition or the introductory remarks, the following article will startle [redacted] apathy, unless he be morally dead—dead—dead. Read it—read it! The language of the editor is remarkable [redacted] its [redacted] considering [redacted] quarter [redacted] [redacted]. After [redacted] [redacted] not the only [redacted] [redacted] the [redacted]!

(From the Washington Spectator of Dec. 4.)

[redacted] SLAVE [redacted] [redacted] THE CAPITAL.

'The tender [redacted] of husband, father, [redacted]
[redacted] [redacted] of nature [redacted] that [redacted] end,
And each endures, while yet he draws his breath,
A stroke as fatal [redacted] the scythe of death.
They lose in tears, the [redacted] receding shore,
But not the thought that they must meet [redacted] more!'

It is well, perhaps, the American people should know, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] reiterate our boasts of liberty in the [redacted] [redacted] nations, and send back [redacted] the Atlantic our shouts of joy at [redacted] triumph of liberty in France, we ourselves are busily engaged in the work of [redacted] Yes, let it be known to the citizens of America, that at the very time when the procession which contained the President of the United States and his Cabinet [redacted] marching in triumph to the Capitol, to celebrate the victory of the French over their oppressors, another kind of procession [redacted] was marching another way, and that consisted of colored human beings, handcuffed in pairs, and driven along by what had the appearance of a man on a horse! [redacted] similar scene was repeated [redacted] Saturday last; [redacted] drove consisting of males and females chained [redacted] couples, starting from Roby's tavern on foot, for Alexandria, where with others they are to embark on board a slave-ship in waiting to convey them to the South. While [redacted] are writing, a colored man enters [redacted] room, and begs us to inform him if we can point [redacted] any person who will redeem his friend now immured in Alexandria jail, in a state of distress amounting almost to distraction.* He has been [redacted] faithful servant of a revolutionary officer who recently died—has been sold [redacted] auction—parted from affectionate parents—and from decent and mourning friends. Our own servant, with others, of whom [redacted] [redacted] speak in commendatory terms, went down to Alexandria to bid him farewell, but they were refused admittance to his cell, as was said, 'the sight [redacted] [redacted] friends [redacted] him feel so.' He bears the reputation of [redacted] pious man. It is but [redacted] few weeks since we saw [redacted] ship with her cargo of slaves [redacted] the port of Norfolk, Va.; [redacted] passing up the river, saw another ship [redacted] Alexandria, swarming with the [redacted] of human cupidity. Such [redacted] the [redacted] enacting in the heart of [redacted] American nation. Oh, patriotism! where [redacted] thy indignation! Oh, philanthropy! where is thy grief? Oh, shame, WHERE [redacted] THY BLUSH? Well may the generous and noble minded O'Connell say of the American citizen, 'I tell him he is a hypocrite. Look [redacted] the stain in your star-spangled standard that [redacted] never struck down in battle. I turn from the Declaration of American Independence, and I tell him that [redacted] [redacted] declared to God [redacted] man a lie, and before God and man I arraign him as a hypocrite.' Yes, thou soul of fire, glorious O'Connell, if thou could but witness the spectacles in Washington that make the genius of liberty droop her [redacted] in shame, and weep her tears away in deep silence and undissembled sorrow, you would lift your voice to tones of thunder, b[redacted] you would make yourself heard. Where [redacted] the O'Connell of this republic that will plead for the EMANCIPATION OF [redacted] DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA? These shocking scenes must cease from amongst [redacted] or we must cease to call ourselves free; ay, and we must [redacted] to expect the mercy of God—we [redacted] prepare for the coming judgment of Him who, as our charter acknowledges, made all [redacted] 'free and equal!'

* At [redacted] same time this man was sold, another—a husband—was knocked off. The tears and agonies of his wife made such an impression on the [redacted] of a generous spectator, [redacted] he bought him back.

When [redacted] premium of fifty dollars is [redacted] for the best theatrical poem, our newspapers advertise the fact with great unanimity. The following is incomparably [redacted] important.

PREMIUM.

[redacted] Premium of Fifty Dollars, the Donation of a benevolent individual in the State of Maine, and [redacted] deposited with the Treasurer of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Aboli[redacted] of Slavery, &c. [redacted] offered to the author [redacted] the best Treatise [redacted] the following subject: 'The Duties of Ministers and Churches of all denominations to avoid the stain of Slavery, and to make the holding of Slaves a barrier to communion and church membership.'

The compositions to [redacted] directed (post-paid) to either of the subscribers—the name of the author in a separate sealed paper, which will be destroyed if the work shall be rejected.

Six months from this date are allowed for the purpose of receiving the Essays.

The publication and circulation of the preferred Tract will be regulated by the Pennsylvania Society above mentioned.

W. RAWLE,
J. PRESTON,
THOMAS SHIPLEY, } Committee.

The first page of the first issue of The Liberator

Political Thuggery

ROBERT H. LUCAS, executive director of the Republican National Committee, is an instructive political exhibit. By secretly sending out reprints of a fake letter and a scurrilous and lying circular he tried to defeat Senator Norris in the recent campaign. Senator Norris has characterized his action as "disreputable, dishonorable, and damnable," because "not done openly, but like a snake in the grass," while Senator Cutting has described his performance accurately as "political thuggery." Anyone who wants a first-class example of that kind of action will know, therefore, exactly in what direction to look.

The instruction to be derived from Mr. Lucas does not stop at this point. If we accept at face value his unwilling testimony before the Nye committee, these admirable activities of his were carried on with his own money—money borrowed, it appears, on the strength of a special fund of $40,000 put at his disposal by J. R. Nutt, treasurer of the Republican National Committee, according to the testimony of Wade H. Cooper, president of the Commercial National Bank of Washington. Now nobody is going to doubt the self-proclaimed ignorance of Chairman Fess on this or any other subject under heaven; but when Chairman Fess states flatly on the Senate floor that he does not intend to do anything about the matter, he publicly ratifies the responsibility of the Republican National Committee for the action of Mr. Lucas.

Instruction does not stop even here. Mr. Lucas, caught with the goods, brazens it out before the Nye committee, and attempts to read Senator Norris out of the party. Thereupon Representative Will R. Wood, chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, emerges from a conference with President Hoover, and at the door of the White House characterizes Senator Norris as neither a Republican nor a Democrat, but a "consummate demagogue," at the same time declaring that "Mr. Lucas has expressed the sentiment of every Republican in the country." Despite all protestations, the President, who was responsible for Mr. Lucas's appointment, is thus involved by silence if by nothing more. We are, of course, aware that Messrs. Lucas and Wood both absolve the President of all responsibility for their actions and their words. Of course they do. But even assuming, as we must, Mr. Hoover's complete lack of knowledge of the activities of his appointee, Mr. Lucas, when those disreputable proceedings were brought to his attention why did he not disown Mr. Lucas or have him dismissed, as honest Republican newspapers demanded, and as any honest man must have desired? We answer in the words of the conservative and Republican-minded New York Evening Post: "Prompt and courageous action is simply not in the character of Mr. Hoover. It is perhaps unfair to expect it of him. He has again taken the course of indirection which is all too familiar, and all too costly for him."

Into the larger possibilities of this attack it is as yet too early to enter deeply. The inclination of the Republican organization to apply the lash to all the Progressives apparently contends with a more sober calculation of possible consequences. There is an effort to isolate Senator Norris by casting him into outer darkness, and inviting his associates to remain at the wedding feast. Divide et impera is an ancient and honorable rule whose possible application in the present case is all too apparent. Professor Dewey's call to Senator Norris to get out of the Republican Party and put himself at the head of a third-party movement suggests another possibility that the Republican organization may well view with dread, remembering what happened in 1912. In view of the manifold complications of the present political situation, Senator Norris's refusal is altogether understandable. Of one thing we are well assured, and that is that his action is dictated by no considerations of expediency, but by his deliberate judgment of all the public interests involved.

The forces behind this vicious attack on the Nebraska Senator are by no means fully revealed. In view of his long struggle with the power interests, and in consideration of their grip on the Republican organization, there is likely to be widespread belief that power influences are responsible. But in any case the issues involved transcend in importance the fortunes of any individual. We are in the midst of a highly important political battle in which the clear duty of the Progressives in Washington is to stand solidly behind the man whose sturdy and courageous fighting has now made him the center of attack. In carrying on the struggle we may reasonably ask the group to furnish the progressive political leadership of which the country is so sorely in need. Such leadership, to be effective, must be based upon the judgment of the experienced men in Washington, but must also have the support of liberals throughout the country. It is a time for Progressive unity, for cooperation among legislators and laymen who will work together for the formulation of a program on which the battles of the future may be fought.

Call an Early Session

SENATOR BORAH has given five reasons why, in his opinion, there should be an early meeting of the Seventy-second Congress, namely, the need of legislation regarding power, the regulation of buses in interstate commerce, injunctions in strikes, the railway situation, and the farm question. None of these matters, he insists, can possibly be dealt with in what remains of the present short session, and all of them are imperatively in need of attention. He leaves out the appropriation bills, against which he says he is not going to filibuster, and the World Court resolution, about which he "has no threat" and which is purely a Senate matter anyway. Representative Wood of Indiana, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, announces, after the usual call at the White House, that as far as he is concerned "there will be no extra session," and professes to speak with authority in adding that there "will be no need" of one. Mr. Hoover, who never seems quite at ease when Congress is near by, has not only let it be known that he does not intend to call a special session of the Senate to consider the World Court, but has tried to stave off an early meeting of Congress by proposing the little-used "continuing resolution" under which, if the appropriation bills now pending seem by the middle of February likely to fail of passage, a continuance for another year of the appropriations for the current fiscal year shall be duly authorized. Presumably he thinks there would be no difficulty in getting such a resolution through.

We think that Senator Borah has the right of it, not merely for the reasons which he cites, but for another which is fundamental. If there is legislative work of importance to be done, as there certainly is at all the points which Senator Borah adduces as well as at others which he might have indicated, it is proper that Congress should be given a chance to attend to it without interposing months and months of delay. Mr. Hoover, of course, with his ingrained notions of efficiency, does not think so at all. He would like to have Congress vote as soon as possible all the money that has been asked for, and then go home and let him run the show. It is highly probable that the polished mirror of his mind reflects in this the traditional attitude of "business" and "Wall Street" which deplores the activity of Congress when times are good and dreads it when times are bad. Yet even Mr. Hoover must know that the Constitution devolves the legislative power upon Congress and that the function of the President in the matter is limited to giving information, offering recommendations, and interposing a veto if he thinks bills are unwise. Deliberately to stand off a meeting of Congress when there is weighty legislative work to be done is to deprive the people of a constitutional right, and it was not to interfere with the normal working of the Constitution that Mr. Hoover was elected.

There might be some shadow of justification for keeping the new Congress away from Washington for eight months in a time of national crisis if Mr. Hoover had shown himself a statesman of large caliber and an administrator of distinguished ability, bereft of political ambition and cold to the influences of the party machine, although even so the precedent would be a dangerous one. Unfortunately, respect for the Hoover tradition of greatness has dwindled materially, and the market quotation of that particular stock is at the moment pretty low. If Mr. Hoover has any views about the power question except such as important sections of the country do not want, or about interstate commerce except to let the Interstate Commerce Commission go on fiddling with railways and buses, or about federal injunctions in labor disputes except to support more Judge Parkers, or about farm relief except to continue pouring Treasury money into the Chicago wheat pit, the country does not know what they are; while if he had on all these topics the wisest ideas to be found anywhere, it is not for him but for Congress to give them form and effect.

We hope, therefore, that Senator Borah and those who think as he does will press with all their strength the demand for an early Congressional session. Whatever the shortcomings of Congress, and they have been many, it is the only body that can remove legislative obstacles to economic recovery or permit the healthy processes of economic life to go on unimpeded under the sanction of law. We are far from thinking that the present depression in business can be dispelled only through federal legislation, but in so far as such legislation is needed to restrain private or corporate greed, insure justice between workers and employers, facilitate the search for employment or make employment more secure, provide a fair return for transportation service, or free legitimate industry or trade from governmental annoyance, Congress should be invited to act. Mr. Hoover will assume a grave responsibility if he deprives the new Congress of the opportunity of doing what good it can in order that he, with his disheartening record, may boss the works.

Heartache Preferred

"AFTER THE BALL" was the great popular song of the Gay Nineties. The newspapers tell us that 3,000,000 copies of the words and music were sold, and the song must have been sung, hummed, or whistled—chiefly the two latter—by at least 30,000,000 persons. Most of them, if alive today, can still recall the music of the chorus and at least some of the words, although to save themselves from the pillory they couldn't recollect a single member of the Cabinet of Grover Cleveland's second administration or tell you who was President of France at that time.

Of course they couldn't tell you the author of the song, either. Not one in a thousand of them ever knew—the author of a popular song must enjoy fame anonymously if at all—and most of those who did know had imagined that the composer must long since have passed into the shadows. So it arouses queer, unreal memories of a now nebulous and almost legendary past to learn through the newspapers that Charles K. Harris, the head of a successful music-publishing business in New York City, has just died. For he wrote the words and music of "After the Ball."

The song was not only the most memorable popular ballad of the Mauve Decade, but according to the estimate of Sigmund Spaeth in "Read 'Em and Weep" it was the first great financial success of its kind. It set song-writing up as a job at which one could work and still eat, and it established the publication of popular music on a sound business footing. The story is of a man at a ball who, leaving his sweetheart for a few moments, returns to find her (Great heavens!) kissing another. He believes her to be "faithless," refuses to hear explanations, and leaves her. Years later he learns that the intruding man (What the heck!) was the girl's brother. The chorus of the song went:

> After the ball is over,
> After the break of morn,
> After the dancers' leaving,
> After the stars are gone;
> Many a heart is aching,
> If you could read them all;
> Many the hopes that have vanished
> After the ball.

That was enough to set 30,000,000 Americans singing, humming, or whistling until the song became more tiresome in its day than have become in ours the predictions of big-business men of an early return of "prosperity." One may call the words drivel and the music dross. But that is a verdict rather than an explanation. It is a statement of taste, not an answer to the question why the song had a hold on 30,000,000 people. The significant lines of the chorus are the fifth and sixth. They carry the note of frustration without which a sentimental song cannot be a tophole success. The public may like its magazine stories to have a happy ending, but it wants its songs to have a sad one. Tin-Pan Alley has its favorite issues as well as Wall Street. The public can always be counted on to buy Mother Love, Wandering Boy, Erring Daughter, and Days That Are Gone. But the two prime securities are Sweetheart common and Heartache preferred.

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1930

We print below the names of a group of Americans who have, during the past year, performed some distinguished public service, who have made a contribution to art or to literature, or who have merely done something interesting. Without pretending that this list is all inclusive, we offer it as one deserving the grateful recollection of other Americans.

Public Service

JOHN BASSETT MOORE, who added to a long career of distinguished public service by his recent speech exposing the fallacies of the present American recognition policy, particularly with regard to Soviet Russia and the republics of Central America.

GEORGE WILLIAM NORRIS, Senator from Nebraska, for his election victory over the political machine and the power interests, and for his continued devotion to the cause of honesty in government.

WILLIAM HENRY LANGDON, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of California, for his outspoken and courageous dissenting opinion in the recent review of the Billings application for pardon.

MARTIN THOMAS MANTON, LEARNED HAND, and THOMAS WALTER SWAN, Justices of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, for reversing the decision denying citizenship to Douglas Clyde Macintosh and Marie Averill Bland because of their refusal to bear arms in time of war.

NELSON TRUSLER JOHNSON, whose appointment as Minister to China brought to the Far East an American diplomatic representative whose diplomacy is not only thoroughly honest and sound, but is based on a rare understanding of the people of the Orient.

The HAITIAN COMMISSION, for its understanding investigation of conditions in Haiti, and for its courage in recommending that the United States substitute justice for paternalism in its relations with that country.

MRS. HELENA HILL WEED, for her invaluable assistance to the Haitian Commission during its investigation.

FRANCES PERKINS, chairman of the New York State Industrial Board, for challenging the Administration's underestimates of the extent of unemployment and calling public attention to the true state of affairs.

ELMER STUART SMITH, for his uncompromising ten-year fight for justice to Washington's Centralia prisoners, even at the cost of his own disbarment, now happily ended.

ROBERT MAYNARD HUTCHINS, president of the University of Chicago, for his scheme of reorganization for the university, in which he plans to put routine in the background and bring education and enlightenment to the fore.

ABRAHAM FLEXNER, for his book, "Universities, American, English, German," in which he dares outspokenly to criticize the crassness and commercialization of American universities.

FRANK MONROE HAWKS, for his numerous record-breaking flights made in the course of the day's work, showing the present possibilities of the airplane in the hands of a skilled aviator.

Journalism

THE Editor and Publisher, for its quiet but unyielding defense of the rights of free speech and a free press.

THE ST. LOUIS Post-Dispatch, for maintaining its high standards of journalism, and particularly for its effective and unremitting battle to protect the people of Missouri from exploitation by public-utility corporations.

LOUIS B. SELTZER and CARLTON K. MATSON, editors of the Cleveland Press, who preferred jail to submission to a judicial tyranny that sought to silence them by injunction.

Books

PETER ARNO, for his collection of joyously original illustrated jokes entitled "Hullabaloo," which satirize the spirit of their time with unique skill.

HART CRANE, for "The Bridge," a poem unusual in technique, original in imagery, and affirmative in tone.

JOHN DOS PASSOS, for "The Forty-Second Parallel," a remarkably rich cross-section of the chaos of contemporary American life.

CARL VAN DOREN, for "Swift," the best biography of the subject in our generation, and a model of biographical method.

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON, for "R. V. R., the Life and Times of Rembrandt van Rijn," which contains the great deal that the author knows about human life and about the seventeenth century, and all his loyalty and affection for one of the greatest painters who ever lived.

Drama

MARC CONNELLY, who, with the help of ROARK BRADFORD as author and RICHARD HARRISON as chief performer, produced, in "The Green Pastures," a play that in its unfailing gentleness and tender humor has moved New York theatergoers to enthusiasm and piety.

THE THEATER GUILD OF NEW YORK, for producing, among other plays, "Red Rust," "The Apple Cart," "A Month in the Country," and "Roar China."

EVA LE GALLIENNE, who, with her associates in the Civic Repertory Theater, has capped her productions by a fresh and beautiful performance of "Romeo and Juliet."

The producers of "All Quiet on the Western Front," for their cinematic craftsmanship and for the courageous fidelity with which they adhered to Remarque's vivid record of the sheer bestiality and horror of war.

The creators of the animated motion picture cartoons, particularly as exemplified in the MICKY MOUSE and SILLY SYMPHONY series.

Architecture

BUCKMINSTER FULLER, engineer, of New York, for his pioneering work in developing the potentialities of mass production, new materials, and new engineering principles for housing that is practical, cheap, and of good design.

HENRY WRIGHT, of New York, for his attempt to cope with the congested living conditions of the American city.

ELIEL SAARINEN, now of Detroit, for the delightful character of the Cranbrook School near that city.

Garrison, Breaker of Chains

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

THE place of William Lloyd Garrison in American history is secure. When his interest in chattel slavery was first strongly aroused by Benjamin Lundy in 1828, that institution was enshrined in the American Constitution, moral and religious sentiment in opposition to it was almost non-existent, and nothing could have appeared more improbable than its early overthrow. Garrison established the Liberator on January 1, 1831; in little more than a third of a century thereafter, following a tremendous civil war, legal slavery came forever to an end in the United States by the process of constitutional prohibition. Rarely in history has an equal change in public sentiment and in political institutions taken place in an equally short space of time. It was the work of no one man; yet for that change William Lloyd Garrison, as no other individual, was responsible. Well he deserves his title of the Liberator. The generous words of his great coworker, Wendell Phillips, spoken at the end of the Civil War, are scarcely an exaggeration:

> He [Garrison] is, in so full and true a sense, the creator of the anti-slavery movement, that I may well say I have never uttered an anti-slavery word which I did not owe to his inspiration; I have never done an anti-slavery act of which the primary merit was not his. More than that: in my experience of nigh thirty years, I have never met the anti-slavery man or woman who had struck any effectual blow at the slave system in this country, whose action was not born out of the heart and conscience of William Lloyd Garrison.

It was not the Negro slave alone, however, to whom Garrison brought liberty, though it is with that fundamental change in American policy that his name will forever be most intimately associated. His ideas of the sinfulness of slavery came to be connected with other views of human life and duty that have already made him a powerful liberating force in other fields as well, and the influence of those views widens with the years. The essential spirit of his work and its immediate influence outside the field in which his energies were most directly engaged were admirably stated by John Stuart Mill, who, at the great testimonial given to Garrison on the occasion of his third visit to England in 1867, drew two chief lessons from his career as "specially deserving to be laid to heart by all who would leave the world better than they found it":

> The first lesson is: Aim at something great; aim at things which are difficult; and there is no great thing which is not difficult. Do not pare down your undertaking to what you can hope to see successful in the next few years, or in the years of your own life. Fear not the reproach of quixotism or of fanaticism; but after you have well weighed what you undertake, if you see your way clearly, and are convinced that you are right, go forward, even though you, like Mr. Garrison, do it at the risk of being torn to pieces by the very men through whose changed hearts your purposes will one day be accomplished. . . .
>
> The other lesson . . . is this: If you aim at something noble and succeed in it, you will generally find that you have succeeded not in that alone. . . . The heart and mind of a nation are never stirred from their foundations without manifold good fruits. In the case of the great American contest, these fruits have already been great, and are daily becoming greater. . . . The chains of prescription have been broken; it is not only the slave who has been freed—the mind of America has been emancipated. The whole intellect of the country has been set thinking about the fundamental questions of society and government; . . . and that great nation is saved, probably for a long time to come, from the most formidable danger of a completely settled state of society and opinion—intellectual and moral stagnation.

Garrison's power arose from his absolutely clear conviction of certain fundamental truths, his complete fearlessness in following his conviction, and (strange though it may sound to those who have not studied his life) his extraordinary judgment in choice of the means to his ends. To quote one of his hostile newspaper critics, the Boston Courier:

> His path of duty lies as clear before him as the traveled highway. He has no temptation to turn to the right hand or the left. He has no doubts, no misgivings, no questionings. Onward, straight onward, like the flight of an arrow through the air, does he move to his aim.

In regard to slavery, as a youth of twenty-three, in the year 1829, when the popular conscience had scarcely begun to stir, Garrison came to the conclusion that human bondage was inherently sinful, and that therefore the only thing to do was to demand immediate and unconditional emancipation. In that conviction he never wavered. By that compass he steered his craft. Every thought of compromise he scorned. Every man who countenanced any dealing with the accursed thing he held a traitor to the cause. The Constitution of the United States, recognizing slavery, was "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." He would have "no union with slaveholders," and from 1844 on he boldly and uncompromisingly advocated the repeal of the federal union, in order to free the North from its partnership in the sin of slavery (and incidentally, as he believed, to bring about the immediate downfall of that institution). Small wonder that the wise and the conventionally righteous regarded him as a fanatic, a madman, an atheist. Small wonder that Baltimore threw him into jail, that Boston dragged him through the streets with a rope about him, that Georgia publicly offered a reward of $5,000 for his arrest and conviction. And small wonder that a little but growing band who really understood him followed him almost as a prophet, or that his name came to be spoken with reverence and hope in slave huts and humble colored homes throughout the whole country.

There is no space to recount the details of his life, fascinating and instructive as they are. Let who will read them in the four volumes in which Garrison's children have told his story, largely in the words of the Liberator and of his voluminous correspondence. We see him beginning life as a printer's apprentice without the advantages of formal education; at sixteen starting his career as a writer; four years later launching out as an editor, a Federalist in politics, a Baptist in religion, a protectionist in economics; in 1829 joining Benjamin Lundy to carry on the Genius of Universal Emancipation and nailing to the mast the banner of immediate emancipation, to the horror of his subscribers; in 1830 beginning his lifetime of agitation in Boston and almost immediately launching the Liberator on its thirty-five-year career; going steadily forward through the succeeding thirty years of misunderstanding, persecution, and venomous personal hatred without swerving a hair's breadth from the path to his goal; single-handed attacking an entire army without fear; scarifying indifferently the little and the great in whatever measure they compromised with the sin of slavery; forever fighting the foes of his cause, yet without personal hostility; in the trying days of the Civil War maintaining his principle of non-resistance, yet sending his son to the front as lieutenant in the second colored regiment of Massachusetts and helping to hold the abolitionist movement steady when it threatened to jump the track by opposing Lincoln's second election; and so passing on to the great day of final triumph of emancipation, followed by world-wide recognition of his immense services to the cause. Through it all he himself constantly grew more and more free in mind and spirit, breaking the old chains of theological, political, and social intolerance.

It was not in his anti-slavery work alone, therefore, that Garrison's services to the cause of freedom consisted. He occupies an honorable place also in the history of religious liberty in the United States. Always a man of profoundly religious character, he gradually developed from the theological narrowness of his earlier years to a belief that had much in common with that of the more liberal members of the Society of Friends, among whom he always found his staunchest supporters. He early aroused bitter clerical antagonism by his savage attacks on the churches for their refusal to attack the sin of slavery, and during most of his mature life he was the object of unmitigated reprobation on the part of orthodox religious teachers, who stigmatized him as an atheist or, to quote a reviewer in the New York Independent in 1856, as one of a group of "infidels . . . of a most degraded class." To quote his official biography:

> The more he used the Scriptures in his agitation, the more he appeared to them a poacher on their preserves; and his secular agitation was a standing irritation to them as an obvious work of Christian charity conducted without the aid and direction of the cloth.

The influence of his thought in the religious field, despite such opposition, is suggested in the enthusiastic words of Elizabeth Cady Stanton:

> In the darkness and gloom of a false theology I was slowly sawing off the chains of my spiritual bondage when, for the first time, I met Garrison in London. A few bold strokes from the hammer of his truth, I was free. . . . To Garrison we owe, more than to any other one man of our day, all that we have of religious freedom.

Garrison's work for women is known to every student. To one of his sympathies and ideas, their legal and political disabilities were bound to appear unjust and immoral, and he lost no chance to plead their cause by word and deed. When the so-called woman's-rights agitation took definite form in the thirties, it was the Liberator that published in thirteen successive issues the letters in which Angelina Grimké set forth the case. In the first issue of the year 1838 Garrison declared: "As our object is universal emancipation—to redeem woman as well as man from a servile to an equal condition—we shall go for the Rights of Woman to their utmost extent." Braving the disapproval of even his liberal colleagues, Garrison early insisted on women's being associated on terms of equality with men in the work of the anti-slavery societies, and his action at the World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London in 1840 constituted a master-stroke of effective agitation in behalf of women. Arriving in London to find the floor barred to the American women delegates, he refused his own seat and took his place in the gallery alongside Lucretia Mott and the other American women—an act which scandalized the convention and drew world-wide attention to the disabilities of women. Throughout his long and busy life he lost no opportunity of urging the absolute equality of rights as between men and women; in the faith that such equality would be early achieved he never wavered. How largely the events of the half-century since his death have vindicated that faith is known by all men.

Garrison's lifelong devotion to total abstinence, as well as his interest in free trade, a universal language, and the multitude of other reforms that enlisted his enthusiasm, must be passed over with a mere mention; for our brief remaining space must be given to the third of the great causes with which his name will always be associated—that is, non-resistance. As early as 1829 he declared: "I am not professedly a Quaker; but I heartily, entirely, and practically embrace the doctrine of non-resistance." During his subsequent fifty years of unending struggle, he never swerved from that principle, no matter what the temptation; and even amid the thunders of the Civil War he never ceased to bear testimony against the wickedness of organized government violence. The most striking expression of his views is found in the Declaration of Sentiments adopted by the Peace Convention in 1838: "We cannot acknowledge allegiance to any human government; neither can we oppose any such government by a resort to physical force. . . . We shall obey all the requirements of government except such as we deem contrary to the commands of the Gospel."

It is not altogether easy to determine just how much or how little influence Garrison's non-resistance testimony has had on the thought and action of our country. Certainly universal peace today appears almost infinitely remote from realization—yet who knows? In The Nation of May 21 last I pointed out how Garrison's influence, transmitted through Tolstoy, had touched the thought of Gandhi. In that great non-violent revolt which today is shaking British power in India and is beginning to affect life and conduct in the Western World, we may conceivably see the beginning of a movement which in its ultimate result will yet bring to an end the violence of principalities and Powers. Once more the faith of the Liberator may prove to be the faith of the prophet.

North Carolina's New Senators

By WEIMAR JONES

FOR nearly thirty years North Carolina has been represented in the United States Senate by the same men, Furnifold McLendell Simmons and Lee Slater Overman. In last June's primary Senator Simmons was shelved by the Democratic electorate, and on December 12 Senator Overman was removed by death. When he was succeeded, five days later, by Cameron Morrison, it definitely marked the end of an era in North Carolina politics, an era of Simmons-controlled conservatism.

In the stead of its two veterans North Carolina is sending to the Senate men who are almost wholly opposites. Both have liberal leanings, both are forceful, and both have long been consistent Democratic "defenders of the faith"; but there the similarity ends. Morrison is a picturesque fighter, ever ready to champion the cause of "the pee-pul"; the other, Josiah William Bailey, is a scholar whose devotion to abstract principles of right and wrong, and specifically to righteousness in civil and political affairs, borders on fanaticism.

Bailey, a Baptist lawyer who rarely smiles, and whose lips easily form such words as "corruption," "integrity," and "righteousness," might easily be taken for an ascetic. His lean, angular face and cold, piercing eyes suggest Cassius, who thought too much. He is a brilliant but painstaking student whose mind quickly cuts through to the heart of a thing, with a logic that is irrefutable and a command of language probably unequaled by any other living North Carolinian. They say of him in North Carolina that his mind is "as quick as a steel trap."

Morrison, former "good-roads governor" and one-time Simmons lieutenant, is at once the patriot and the demagogue —in addition to being the husband of a woman worth a million or so. Hail-fellow-well-met, one of his favorite greetings to friends is "Bill, you got a chaw of tobacco?" He endeared himself to thousands when, as governor, he announced one night that he would leave for the scene of strike trouble the following morning at "sun-up." He could just as easily have said "seven o'clock," but he preferred the homespun expression.

Senator Morrison, or "Cam," as he is known to thousands (nobody would ever think of calling Senator-elect Bailey "Bill"), is a born fighter. He has been fighting ever since, with neither college education nor money, he started his climb upward. He is still ready to do battle, "at the drop of a hat," with any challenger. While he unquestionably has received much more of the credit for North Carolina's phenomenal program of road construction than is rightfully his, the fact remains that when others sought thousands for roads, Morrison boldly demanded, and obtained, millions. In his political career he has lost but one major engagement, a project calling for State construction of port terminals and inland waterways as a means of giving the State lower transportation rates—a blow which was aimed at the railroads.

How these men came to the United States Senate forms one of the interesting chapters in American political history. For thirty years the dictatorship of Senator Simmons, dating from the "red-shirt" days when the Negro was driven from the State's politics, was unquestioned; rather it was questioned only on those rare occasions when some innocent gave the "organization" opportunity to demonstrate how all-powerful it really was.

Ten years ago Simmons chose Morrison as the Democratic candidate for governor. Oliver Max Gardner, youthful orator and one-time football star, had the hardihood to oppose him for the nomination. The campaign was one of the most bitter in the annals of the State. Brothers split over it, the fight even extended into the churches; the scars of that battle have not yet wholly disappeared. On his side Gardner, the rebel, had but two assets, an oratory that well nigh swept the State off its feet and a knack for binding men to him with a loyalty that never swerves. Thus armed, he came near winning the governorship; so near that the cohorts of the "little giant," as Simmons is known, sued for peace—even though the victory was theirs.

What Gardner failed to win in battle he obtained by strategy. As the price of joining the organization he demanded and was given the promise of the governorship—eight years later; it had to be eight years, for the invariable rule is for the east and the west to take turns in furnishing the State its chief executive, and both Gardner and Morrison are from the west.

Four years later a new rebel had arisen to challenge the organization. He was Josiah William Bailey. He opposed Angus Wilton McLean, banker and organization candidate. Bailey went from one end of the State to the other, lashing the party organization with a tongue that can coin fiercely biting phrases, hurling charge after charge. Bailey went down in what appeared then as a defeat so crushing he would never again be heard from.

True to his promise, Simmons gave Gardner the gubernatorial nomination in 1928. As a mattter of fact, Gardner's heirship had so long been taken for granted, and he had so often been referred to as "the next governor," that the nomination went to him by default—there was no other candidate.

That same year Simmons the infallible, the strict party man who had ruthlessly crushed any and all whose party loyalty for an instant wavered, bolted the party. McLean lined up with him, as did Frank McNinch, of recent Power Commission fame. But Morrison, whom Simmons had made, came out emphatically for Al Smith. Bailey, for his part, not only campaigned the State for the Democratic ticket in 1928, but in 1930, with an insistence that would have done justice to a Cato, reiterated that Senator Simmons should be destroyed.

One possible Senatorial candidate after another Bailey interviewed and pledged his aid to, but one after another they declined the doubtful honor. At last Bailey announced his own candidacy, swept the State in the primary, and in November was elected by the largest majority ever given a North Carolina Senatorial candidate. From defeat to victory, he has remained the crusading rebel, neither asking nor giving quarter.

Morrison is different. An organization creation, he stuck by the organization until 1928. And the other day he accepted an appointment to the Senate from none other than his old antagonist, the man against whom he had waged such a bitter campaign ten years ago, the man who had come so near cheating him of the governorship—Governor Oliver Max Gardner.

To Simmons, his house of cards falling all about him, the defection of Morrison, his trusted lieutenant, in 1928 was a bitter blow; he has never been able to forgive. It was a rather ironic, final touch to his utter defeat, therefore, when custom decreed that he should present Morrison to the Senate.

North Carolina's new Senators will be heard from. Morrison is too much the fighter, too colorful a personality, long to remain quiet. And Bailey is too much the student, too definitely the crusader, not to make his impress. Morrison will speak more loudly than his colleague; it remains to be seen if he will be heard as far. However that may be, their records indicate that North Carolina's new Senators will be found casting their ballots more frequently with the liberal (not radical) than the conservative blocs.

The Oriental on the Pacific Coast

By HUBERT PHILLIPS

AT a time when the Department of State is cutting down sharply the number of immigrants admitted under the quota law, and when Congress is considering the temporary prohibition of immigration, it may not be without interest to consider the experience of the Pacific Coast with the three great groups of Oriental immigrants that at various periods have troubled its calm.

In considering the history of race relations between native-born Americans and the Chinese, which were the first Oriental group to come to the Pacific Coast in any numbers, a cyclical movement becomes evident. It runs in the following fashion: invitation, welcome, discontent, agitation, legislation, exclusion, and, finally, an attitude of friendliness and good-will toward those already here. What is the explanation of these apparently curious changes in attitude? As a general approach to the whole problem of race relations let it be noted that foreign peoples are usually welcome among their neighbors when they are economically useful, that is, when they are willing to do work which, because of its hardship or disagreeableness, no one else wishes to do.

The Chinese began to come to the Pacific Coast about 1850. They were welcomed for their industry and frugality, i. e., their willingness to take low wages. When the construction of the Central Pacific began, Leland Stanford and his associates brought them into the country by the thousands. There is no telling how long the completion of the first transcontinental railroad would have been delayed had it not been for Chinese labor. A year before the completion of the Central Pacific the Burlingame treaty of 1868 granted the Chinese unlimited right of immigration and a guaranty of treatment accorded the citizens of the most favored nation.

By 1870 there were 63,199 Chinese in the United States. Of this number 49,277 were in California and practically all the others in adjoining States. The year 1870 marks the beginning, so far as a definite date can be given, of the second stage of American-Chinese relations, namely, discontent regarding the presence of the Chinese. This stage soon gave place to the next one—agitation. The reason is not far to seek. The completion of the Central Pacific in 1869 threw thousands of Chinese into industries in which they came into competition with native labor. In 1870 Chinese shoemakers, or at least potential shoemakers, were taken all the way from California to North Adams, Massachusetts, to break a strike in a shoe factory. Economic competition was getting in its work, and as a result the relations between whites and Orientals, at that time almost entirely Chinese, on the Pacific Coast were becoming strained. The business depression of 1877, which with drought affected all lines of economic activity in California, hastened the development of a bitter anti-Chinese agitation. During the years 1878 and 1879 San Francisco, and to a certain extent all of California, became familiar with the cry of Dennis Kearney that "the Chinese must go." Those were the days when the very Chinese who ten years earlier had been complimented for their industry and thrift were stoned and otherwise maltreated by mobs which invaded the Chinese quarters of California cities. The demand from the Pacific Coast for the exclusion of the Oriental soon became so insistent that Congress showed a willingness to abrogate the Burlingame treaty. There followed a contest between President Hayes and Congress, the President standing in the way of a unilateral abrogation of the Burlingame treaty but finally signing a bill suspending immigration from China for ten years. When this ten-year period expired it was renewed by the Geary act, and exclusion became the established policy.

The last stage of the cycle had now been reached. Today the Chinese as a group are respected on the Pacific Coast; they participate in civic undertakings; their children are given every educational advantage; and in some communities Chinese business men are invited to membership in the service clubs of their city. Fear has given way to mutual respect and good-will.

Very few Japanese came to the United States before the close of the nineteenth century. The exact number was a little less than 25,000. The chief factor in the rapid rise in the immigration of Chinese in the sixties was what the economist calls positive; but it was a negative factor which sent the Japanese to the United States in such numbers during the opening years of the twentieth century. This negative factor was the economic consequences of the Russo-Japanese war of 1905, which was followed by widespread economic distress in Japan.

By 1907 there were 75,000 Japanese in the United States, most of them in California. Already the hostility toward them was even greater than that felt toward the Chinese a generation earlier. The cycle of changing attitudes moved much more rapidly in the case of the Japanese. Just why is a little difficult to say. To the present writer the explanation plainly seems to lie in the aggressive habits and progressive character of the Japanese. While public opinion was inflamed with the charges of the low, un-American standard of living of the Japanese, it was the Japanese immigrant's determination to raise this standard, to avail himself of the opportunities offered by the public school, to refuse to remain a mere laborer, to become a proprietor that caused most of the trouble.

The Japanese, like the Chinese, became at first cultivators of the soil. To a large extent this still holds, more than half the Japanese on the Pacific Coast being engaged in the production of basic crops. But as in the case of the Chinese, urbanization is well under way. The passage of the anti-alien land law in 1913 marks a definite step in this process and is without doubt its chief cause. But despite laws prohibiting the ownership or leasing of land by Orientals, laws through and around which clever lawyers have found many paths, and despite the more recent refusal of the United States to place Japanese immigration on the quota basis, there is on the Pacific Coast today a kindlier feeling toward the Japanese already here than has existed for many years. One can find many surprising examples of recognition of certain Japanese ranchers and business men by the civic organizations of their respective communities. Even the organizations most active in bringing about the passage of the laws seeking to drive the Oriental from the land and make impossible any further immigration have announced their satisfaction with the present state of affairs as far as the Chinese and Japanese are concerned.

The Filipino is another matter. In his case the cycle has not run its course. Will it? That is the interesting question, to which the future holds the answer.

In order to produce the enormous quantities of vegetables and fruits that flow to the Eastern markets throughout nearly the whole year, California has to have a great amount of "knee" or "stoop" labor in her vineyards, orchards, and truck gardens. The anti-alien land law, seeking, and in part succeeding, to drive the Chinese and Japanese off the land, left a void which has been filled by two other immigrant groups—the Mexicans from the south and another Oriental group, the Filipinos. (This use of the term Oriental as applied to the Filipino is of course not strictly accurate. It is used here to designate his geographical origin as being more nearly Asiatic than Oceanic. It should also be remembered that the Filipino has had a long cultural contact with Latin and Anglo-Saxon institutions.)

The Mexicans have brought to the Southwestern United States great social problems and have put an enormous burden upon the social agencies dealing with crime, disease, and relief. How different is the story of the Chinese and Japanese! Out of 25,000 cases of poor relief in San Francisco in 1923 there was not a single Chinese or Japanese case. Such a statement, in view of the large Oriental population of San Francisco, is puzzling unless one remembers that the social organization of the Oriental community inevitably took the form of providing protection from the outside community, which in times past was hostile to it. Now it takes care in the same way of the social waste incident to sickness, old age, and poverty.

Even if one did not have access to immigration figures, observation alone would be evidence of the gradual increase, in recent years, in the number of Filipinos in the Pacific Coast States and especially in California. Yet the total number, 34,000, according to the California Department of Industrial Relations, seems hardly sufficient to cause serious economic disturbance in a State as large as California. Like the Chinese and the Japanese before him, the Filipino has gone directly to the land where, in some instances at least, he has proved to be the most efficient labor available. The lettuce industry in the Watsonville district has been largely developed with Filipino labor. The lettuce and asparagus growers do not find the Filipino more reliable or efficient than other Oriental laborers, but the latter groups are not available in large enough numbers. And they do find the Filipino decidedly more efficient than the Mexican and more dependable than the itinerant white laborer.

There is therefore some displacement of labor, but for the most part of labor that is not particularly anxious to do the work which the Filipino is willing to do. Nevertheless, as early as 1927 organized labor began to agitate for the exclusion of the Filipino, apparently out of fear that an influx of Filipinos might conceivably vitally affect the future labor market of the State.

There are, however, one or two factors complicating the present situation which were not present in the case of the two preceding immigrant groups from the Orient. In each of the three groups the immigrants have been largely male. W. J. French of the California Department of Industrial Relations is the authority for the statement that out of every hundred Filipinos who came to California during the ten years 1920-30, ninety-three were males. This proportion of males to females is probably no larger than it was among the Chinese and Japanese immigrants. But there is another factor which is quite different. So far as the present writer knows, no social study was ever made of the age and marital status of the Chinese and Japanese when the immigration from those countries was at its height. But the general impression is, and it seems to be well founded, that the immigration from both of those countries was largely composed of mature adults, many of whom left wives at home to whom they expected to return or whom they expected to bring to the United States as soon as they were economically established. But if one associates a little with the Filipinos in the centers where they have congregated on the Pacific Coast one is struck by the youth of the group and especially by the number of very young boys, at least in appearance. Statistics compiled by the State Department show that 80 per cent of those entering the United States from the Philippine Islands are between sixteen and thirty years of age and that 77 per cent of them are unmarried. These young men, finding themselves in a country which is strange and yet their country at least as far as the flag is concerned, seek the natural social outlets and activities of youth, only to run up against the color bar. Their perfectly natural and easily understood attempts to attract the attention of white girls and to seek their company have been, at any rate on the surface, one of the things which have aroused antagonism to the Filipino. This was the pretense for the inception of the week of rioting near Watsonville in January, 1930. A group of Filipinos had rented a dance hall a few miles out of Watsonville and set up a "taxi dance hall" for Filipinos. They brought in from somewhere nine white dance-hall girls. According to the testimony of the two Americans owning the property the dances were more decorously conducted than those of some American groups who had rented the hall in time past. But the "honor" of the nine white women must be saved, and so for three successive nights a mob, composed largely of young men and boys, sought to storm the dance hall and was held off only by armed guards provided in anticipation of trouble. Frustrated in this attempt, the mob satisfied itself by assaulting hapless Filipinos on the streets of Watsonville, pillaging dwellings occupied by Filipinos, and finally, by shooting up a ranchhouse in which Filipinos lived. In this affair one Filipino, Ferman Tober, was killed.

The line-up of organizations that were particularly active, on one side or the other, in the days of anti-Chinese and anti-Japanese agitation is very interesting. Labor organizations, patriotic and military organizations, and retail merchants' associations have been traditionally hostile to the immigrants. The churches, the large landowners, and importing and exporting houses or firms having international trade relations have been traditionally favorable. Nothing could show more effectively the all-pervasive influence of economics. Largely this same line-up exists in the case of the Filipino.

It is not the purpose of this article to attempt to peer into the future and prophesy what action will be taken regarding the Filipino. But one thing stands out clearly. Given California's peculiar adaptation to the production of fruits and vegetables, given the native white's disinclination to work at the production of such crops except as an owner, it follows that California must depend upon some at least temporarily "submerged" social group to produce her crops. So far she has drawn upon three Oriental groups with results which have been described. Two other courses are open to her. She may use, and in fact is using, the Mexican. In case the agitation for the exclusion of all alien groups should include him, there still remains one hope—the American Negro. During the past three years he has come to California in large numbers along with the cultivation of cotton. If a labor vacuum is created in the fruit industry he will fill it. Though he is a native and a citizen he will bring some social problems to the State, quite different from those brought by the Oriental but, nevertheless, difficult and serious. Perhaps some time it will dawn upon the human intelligence that men should own only such land as they can cultivate and harvest themselves or in cooperation with their neighbors, and that any other procedure means a floating population of homeless, womanless, and often jobless men making for an unstable, unjust, and in the long run non-prosperous social order.

"Pacification" of the Ukraine

By NEGLEY FARSON

THE "pacification" of the Ukraine brought out such atrocious stories of Polish brutality that the Polish ambassador in Washington, perhaps rashly, issued an invitation to foreign correspondents to go there "and see for themselves," an invitation which I was naive enough to accept and which brought about my arrest a week later in the remote village of Gaje.

In Berlin, when the Poles heard I was bound for the Ukraine they hastened to the telephone to assure me of every convenience; in Lwow, of course, I must be sure first to see the voivode, who would "arrange everything" for me. The voivode is a sort of local district commissioner. In Warsaw, when I announced my intention to the Foreign Office, it was not received with enthusiasm. At the same time strange comments began to appear in the newspapers, one of which said there were foreign newspaper correspondents in the town—"Some are correspondents and some have just come here to find things to say against our fair land. We should simply get rid of them as such." Of course, said the Foreign Office, I would see the voivode immediately upon arriving at Lwow. He would "arrange everything."

At 9:05 on the snowy morning I arrived in Lwow the voivode was asleep and therefore not able to "arrange everything," so leaving my card, I took a motor car and drove out to the remote village of Gaje, which, it was whispered to me in Warsaw, had been the scene of some of the worst atrocities. Polish roads are quite dreadful in the winter, and the car slithered along on a scum of slippery mud. It was the mud that enabled me to get the information I would not have got otherwise; for when we reached the country crossroad going over the hills to Gaje we were mired, and I had to do the rest of the journey on foot. For some two miles I walked across the bleak, windy hills. A heavy snowstorm had set in, against which some doleful crows were flapping helplessly. And then I passed along a scraggly gray forest (which comes into this story) and in a notch of the hills, huddling from the winter, I found the thatched clay huts of tragic Gaje.

The peasants were out, in conical sheepskin hats, busily engaged wrapping their clay houses in bundles of straw, like overcoats, to keep in the warmth of the stove. Yes, they said, the soldiers had been there. Yes, they had beaten a lot of people—you know what soldiers are. Badly? Well . . . they had killed Tiutku. How did that happen? Well . . . Tiutku was afraid . . . when the boys saw the cavalry riding they ran out and tried to hide in the woods. Then the soldiers flushed them out—just like partridges. They beat them. Tiutku? Well . . . he must have been weak . . . he thought he could save himself from further beating if he could get on the good side of the soldiers . . . help them to find something. There was a machine-gun, he said, hidden in a house he knew in the next village. Aha! said the soldiers. They took him there—and of course there wasn't any machine-gun—they couldn't find anything!

"Why did you lie to us?" asked the officer.

"Because I hate you!" wept Tiutku.

Then the soldiers beat him again and Tiutku died the next day.

That was the story. And I might say that when they knew I had found it out, the political police in Lwow admitted it to me the next day; only they said Tiutku had died of heart failure—as well he might.

Then the police caught me. I had noticed that the peasants were beginning to get frightened as they talked with me. How did they know I might not be an agent of the Poles? Perhaps, they suggested, it would be better if the policeman saw my documents? I agreed, although I knew what it meant, and upon the appearance of that spick-and-span Polish policeman the wretched peasants became as silent as the grave. Finding that I had no official permission to visit the village, he immediately said he would have to take me back to Lwow. "Orders is orders," said he—and why had I not immediately reported to him upon entering the village? I smiled and the peasants grinned in rueful chorus. He was a decent policeman, doing his job, and we conversed amiably in the straw-filled cart that took us back to the main road, where my motor car rushed us back to Lwow.

But there the scene changed. I was taken to the station of the dreaded "political" police, where in a room gory with the photographs of bomb outrages and local terrorists captured in wrecked homes with blood-spattered walls I was put through a six-hour inquisition which reminded me of nothing less than the grilling I received when I was arrested by the czarist okhrana in 1915. Why had I gone to Gaje? Why had I not seen the voivode first? What had I seen in Gaje? Whom had I talked with in Lwow? Hour after hour, until, beginning to get annoyed, I began to ask questions myself. Did I have to have a written permission to visit the village? Yes. Did I have to show it to the local policeman as soon as I got there? Yes. "Who's asking these questions," demanded the sinister "political" Inquisitor, "I or you?" I told him that I was—whereupon another policeman was called, and I was taken out into another room, where I remained under guard. It was cold. But the last hour of my incarceration there became warm enough—the talk now centered sharply on my notebook. What had I written in it out in Gaje? I replied that was my affair. If it was an official order that they take it from me, then, I said, I could not prevent them with so many policemen around—but that would place an entirely different complexion on this whole affair. If they took it from my pocket, I assured them, I would report to my Ambassador. The Inquisitor gave me a sickly grin.

"Be a good fellow," he wheedled. "Let me see it—just for me."

This naive request was too much for me, and I told them they must let me go and get my dinner. Aside from being cold and covered with mud, I had had nothing to eat the whole day. So at ten o'clock that night they let me go—followed by spies who were as adhesive as my shadow from then on.

Lwow is a sophisticated provincial town pollenized with the cultivated tastes and desires of the sons of country landowners, and that night I had the peculiar experience of eating an excellent late supper in the very presence of the smart officers of the crack Fourteenth Cavalry Regiment who, according to the peasants in wretched Gaje, had beaten their comrade to death.

I finished my French wine, with the orchestra playing "Victoria and Her Hussar," and went out into the lobby to find my spy waiting for me—a particularly ugly girl in rubber boots.

The next day, in a tiny makeshift hospital protected by the sacred walls of the Uniate church, I saw eleven peasants in such a state that I could hardly bear to look at them. Their buttocks had been beaten to a pulp. Some of them had been lying there five weeks, attended by the kindly nuns. Bandages were removed, showing raw red septic sores some six inches in diameter that it seemed nothing less than extensive skin grafting could ever make whole again. They were merely a few from the hundreds of villages that had been "visited" by the soldiery. One man of sixty-two told me how the cavalry had ridden into his village, driving the peasants before them like cattle. The peasants had been herded into a shed where twenty of the males were laid across planks and flogged with heavy sticks. Some of them got two hundred strokes. When a man fainted he was revived by dashing cold water upon him—and flogged again. Fifty other peasants were coming to this hospital to have wounds treated. Hundreds of others lay in far villages, unable to receive medical attention as the Ukrainian doctors who tried to get out to them were arrested. This is a matter of fact.

It is also a fact that not one of these people had a single charge against him. They had merely been "pacified" by the Poles.

In the Driftway

As the Drifter lay awake on Christmas night from having had too much turkey and too little exercise he began to reflect on what a Christmas dinner means. And in so far as his machine-age ignorance would permit he reconstructed the Christmas dinner of a farmer and his family whom he knew ten years ago in a remote corner of Wyoming. Perhaps even that distant farm has by now been drawn into the modern world but at that time it had not. This farmer and his wife were of ordinary intelligence, and they had six children, four boys and two girls. It was a long trail that led up to that Christmas dinner. Let it begin with the hatching of the turkey. Mother turkeys strut the fields and bob their necks as if they were entirely competent. But they are not. Loud-mouthed babies get lost in the tall lucerne, and animals other than humans—particularly coyotes—find turkey meat succulent. There are losses as the summer wears on, and they can be kept down only by the watchful eye of the farmer or the farmer's wife or the farmer's child. And the turkey, as everybody knows, is only the beginning. The wheat grows, is cut and threshed and sacked. On a long day the farmer hitches up the team and with a child for company drives to the flour mill with wheat enough piled up behind him to make the year's bread. He talks to the white-dusted miller and the boy watches the wheels go round. Back home, by this time, canning season is on. So many quarts of peaches and pears, mincemeat, pickles, beets, peas, beans. So many glasses of jellies, jams. Dried beans, too, dried peaches, apples, plums. Somebody is working hard, as usual. The potatoes piled in the cellar mean stooping backs. Apples still hanging on the trees mean reaching arms and wary footsteps on a shaky ladder. The pumpkins are yellow, the squash is wrinkled but not yet old enough to store.

DAY after day the Christmas dinner piles up while the turkeys strut and gobble as if that sound were the sweetest sound on earth. The woodpile grows, too. The ax rings and the farmer tells his boys about the three heats that wood gives out—the heat you get from chopping it, the heat you get sawing it into lengths, and the heat that comes from the Franklin stove in the parlor or the big range in the kitchen. The last great work falls of course to the farmer's wife, with boys to carry water and wood and girls to try their hands at a pie crust under laborious direction. They have to learn some time. But finally the day itself comes, and the hour. The farmer and his wife and the six children sit down to a table loaded with food. And though that family may not be very long on brains, every member of it is intimately aware of where his dinner came from and how it grew, from the onion in the stuffing to the pumpkin in the pie. The boys competed with squirrels for the hickory nuts they will crack tonight. The farmer has known the apples in his excellent cider since they were pink blossoms on a crooked tree. The farmer's wife knows that turkey so well that she can hardly bear to eat it. But she does. She is hungry with a hunger that only physical activity can produce. The family has earned its living in the literal sense. It enjoys the fruits of its toil without benefit of middlemen.

* * * * *

SHIFT the scene to New York City, to the home of a $25-a-week clerk in a broker's office. He and his wife have no children—they can't afford it. Preparation for Christmas dinner begins the day before, when the wife goes marketing. She buys the turkey that looks best to her among those hanging with their heads down in the refrigerated butcher shop. Has she ever seen the pride that is a live turkey? Probably not. A turkey to her is a naked bird hanging ignominiously by its big feet. She moves on to a grocery store, where she buys cranberry sauce, very good, three cans for a quarter. She buys, at last, a mince pie and, since she'll be very busy the next day, a loaf of bread that is already sliced. She has in her kitchenette at the end of the afternoon what the farmer accumulates between June and Christmas. What does the dinner mean to the clerk and his wife? It means only so much money spent. They have earned their living, too, but the phrase has lost its original meaning. They live on money, in effect they eat money—which is hatched from other money. At least so it is reported, though nobody, so far as the Drifter knows, ever saw a dollar hatch a little dollar. The work back on the farm goes on, of course, in some form or other. But the broker's clerk, instead of doing it himself, works eight hours in an office building in order to pay for having it done. He pays high, too. There are a lot of well-fed men between him and the farmer who must get theirs.

* * * * *

UNDOUBTEDLY, the broker's clerk would laugh at the farmer in Wyoming, would shudder at the thought of the hard work he has to do. The farmer would envy the clerk with his warm house, his radio, and the conveniences no one would care to be without. The Drifter does not presume to say which is better off. He can only say that he would rather spend Christmas with the farmer than with the broker's clerk.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

What About Russia?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your unemployment program is fifty years or more ahead of anything coming from high official sources, and I believe it would abolish unemployment. But that is not enough to meet the new conditions.

Russia has no unemployment problem now. But what will Russia do in a few years from now, when it is able to produce a surplus? It will improve the standard of living for all its people until consumption keeps pace with production—or until all have everything they want. If it must curtail production it will do so by reducing working hours, not by throwing part of the workers out of a job. Russia will act thus because it is the reasonable way to deal with overproduction, and because it is consistent with Communist ideas and with Soviet Russia's actions in the past.

This will bring into world economics a new kind of competition, competition between two economic systems, to decide which can provide the best standard of living for its people.

Most of the European nations are overloaded with debts and armaments, hemmed in on all sides with tariff barriers, and hog-tied with politics and diplomacy. They are in poor shape to race for the highest standard of living. The United States, without debt, with a comparatively light burden of armaments, all the raw material needed, and an abundant food supply, should be far in the lead in this race for years to come. American workers have at present more of the necessaries and luxuries than the Russians have. We also have unemployment problems and economic insecurity. How far are we ahead? And how long can we keep the lead?

All the purely material advantages are on our side, but our statesmen are living in the past; they are only dimly aware of the struggle between economic systems. The best they know is to borrow charity from the dark ages and call it a cure for unemployment, and try to check Russia's advance by legislating against "Russian convict-made goods."

Soviet Russia is fully aware of the struggle, knows what it is about, and what it must do to win. And Russia has the fresh vitality of youth.

Portland, Ore., December 20 B. E. NILSSON

Unemployment Insurance

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Henry Raymond Mussey's criticism of unemployment-insurance schemes on the ground that they have a tendency to deaden efforts to reduce unemployment may be justified so far as the British scheme is concerned, but it has no application to the bills for unemployment insurance introduced by the Socialist Party during the last two years in the Connecticut and Massachusetts State legislatures.

These bills treat unemployment insurance roughly in the same way that workmen's-compensation laws treat industrial accidents. That is, they put on the employers the duty to pay out-of-work allowances to men whom they lay off or discharge, and then require the employers to insure against that liability. The unemployment-insurance board charged with the administration of the law is directed to make different rates of premiums for different industries in proportion to the amount of unemployment in each industry. In addition, provision is made for a system of charges and credits on the premiums paid by individual employers according as their unemployment experience is markedly worse or markedly better than the average for their industry as a whole.

In this way a direct financial incentive is offered to each employer to reduce unemployment in his industry and in his particular shop or factory to a minimum.

Cambridge, Mass., December 20 ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

Talk Turkey

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an editorial in your issue of December 10 entitled An Unemployment Program we have a fine example of lucus a non lucendo. The piece concludes: "If we do not want communism, let us abolish unemployment." Well, what then? By so doing we would put a quietus on the scheme to confiscate all private wealth. That strikes one as a safe and sane proposal. But does The Nation not realize that it unceasingly advocates the confiscation of a great part of private wealth in its doctrine of taxation according to ability to pay? Would The Nation turn face about and seek to prohibit all confiscation of private wealth? One finds no evidence of such an impulse. And yet The Nation must realize that the only way to stop the scourge of unemployment is to make it possible for the laborer to employ himself, if need be, so as to avoid the "squeeze" stations of industrialism. How?

1. By nation-wide socialization of land rents.
2. By the concurrent disappearance of interest.
3. By the abolition of all taxes.

If The Nation really wishes to stave off the threat of communism, why does it not "talk turkey" while there is yet time?

Fairhope, Ala., December 12 E. WYE

Judge Lindsey Was Right

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial remarks about the controversy between Bishop Manning and Judge Ben B. Lindsey it seems to me that you take the wrong position as to the decorum and judgment evinced by the Judge.

I cannot agree with your expressed opinion that "Mr. Lindsey hurt his cause by his own ill-timed response." Hurt his cause? In the eyes of those who shouted "he ought to be lynched"? I for one—and I am sure that I am voicing the opinion of thousands of others—have the most profound admiration for Judge Lindsey for his courage in daring to challenge the Bishop on the spot, right before his own congregation.

It is your opinion that "he would have done better to await the exoneration which time would speedily have afforded him," but in this I differ with you. It is my opinion that men like Bishop Manning make their attacks secure in the knowledge that no one will dare impugn their statements right before their auditors, and that once they are shown that they cannot attack a person or an idea without being called to account or without giving the attacked an opportunity to exonerate himself, they will be constrained to abandon this dastardly practice, or, at least, limit it to the utmost. The refusal on the part of the Bishop to allow Judge Lindsey to take the pulpit in his own defense amply bears out my contention.

When an arrogant, swashbuckling sky pilot turns literary critic he ought to be put in his place, and the most propitious time and place for it is any time and any place.

New York, December 17 E. J. OSTROW

Afterthoughts of Calvin

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his daily article of July 5 former President Coolidge said: "With the direct primaries in most States and the popular election of Senators, the present perversion of legislation is unavoidable." In his article of July 14 he said: "The Congress will cease from troubling for a period of five months." But in his inaugural address he said of Congress: "In spite of all the criticism which often falls to its lot, I do not hesitate to say that there is no more independent and effective legislative body in the world."

On November 27 Mr. Coolidge said: "If at any time our rewards have seemed meager, we shall find our justification for Thanksgiving by carefully comparing what we have with what we deserve." He referred to the American nation of today as "far less deserving than the Pilgrims." But in his last annual message to Congress, two years ago, he refrained from suggesting that America was not in every way "deserving." He said in the message: "The main source of these unexampled blessings lies in the integrity and character of the American people. They have had great faith, which they have supplemented with mighty works." Just why were we so deserving in 1928 and so much less deserving in 1930?

Worcester, Mass., December 20 MYRON M. JOHNSON

Hooked Rugs for Relief

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are many families in Marion, North Carolina, who since the strike have not been able to find work. These families are badly in need of food and clothes. With the coming of winter and the school season the need is increased.

In order to help buy the things most needed some of the strikers are making hooked rugs. We want a market for these rugs, and would be very glad to send them to any central labor union, any group of people, or any one person who could dispose of one or more of them for us.

Some of the rugs are decorated with scenes from the mountains and the surrounding country and are very beautiful. Prices range from $3 to $15 according to size. You can gladden the hearts of these workers by ordering one or more rugs at this time. Correspondence should be addressed to me, Box 634, Marion.

Marion, N. C., December 20 GRACE ELLIOTT

Material on G. B. S.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having contracted with American and English publishers to write the biography of George Bernard Shaw, I don't want people saying later when it is published, "But you should have put in my story of Shaw," or "Why did you leave out this post card I got from him?" So I am hereby warning all such critics to send me their stories, quips, inscriptions, autographs, photographs, post cards, letters, telegrams, cables, and interviews now, or forever hold their peace. Any such material should be sent to me, care of Simon and Schuster, 386 Fourth Avenue, New York, or at 9 rue de la Buffa, Nice, France. After it has been copied it will be returned to its owners promptly and with thanks.

Nice, December 1 FRANK HARRIS

Books, Drama, Films

Graves in China

By LEONORA SPEYER

The fields hold dear each dusty mound;
The plowman goes
Patient among the rows
Of fresh-turned ground.

The greening ruts run straight until,
Blocking the way
This many a night and day,
Stands the meek hill.

Stands and will stand! Though sprouting seed
Claims April earth
For its imperative birth,
And for man's need.

Here halts the plow (the field is wide
Or narrow), the foot
Turns, and the reverent rut,
To either side.

Spring on the land—and in one bed,
Under one cover,
Contented lover and lover,
The living and the dead.

Dollar Books: An Autopsy

THE dollar book, ushered in but a few months ago with banners and trumpets, is already dead. Only one publisher, apparently, will continue to put out new volumes at the dollar price, and even these will be confined mainly to lighter fiction. The revolution is over.

But it would be highly unfortunate for the book business if the conclusion were generally drawn that any attempt to reduce prices was doomed to failure. On the contrary, it may yet be found that some reduction in the price of books is inevitable. There are reasons for believing that the present world-wide drop in raw-material prices may reflect not merely one year's depression, but the final phase (in so far as any movement of prices may be called final) of the post-war readjustment. If we merely look back at the course of prices after the Napoleonic Wars or our own Civil War we can see that it required not merely one or two years, but a decade or so to bring prices back approximately to pre-war levels. All this may seem a far-fetched digression; but if at least a substantial part of the recent price collapse represents a permanent post-war decline, retail-price adjustments are certain to follow—as of course they already have to some extent—and it would be strange if books proved an exception.

The dollar book, it seems to me, was a failure not because a cut in price was unsound in tendency, but because this particular cut was far too sudden and drastic. At the time the cut was made it appeared that it might enable us to see just how "elastic" the demand for books was—i. e., to what extent sales of books might increase as prices were reduced—but what actually happened was hardly a fair test of this, chiefly, I believe, because it did not allow for the time element. There is a tremendous inertia in buying habits; they cannot be radically altered in a few months.

Here the publishers might profitably take a hint from the automobile makers. The prices of automobiles are now considerably less than half of what they used to be, but no automobile company announced overnight that the price of its cars had been cut from $3,000 to $1,500. Its managers would have seen at once the foolhardiness of expecting sales immediately to expand enough to offset such a price reduction. What the companies did, instead, was to make small tentative reductions of not more than 10 per cent or so at a time, and then, when the market had proved that it could expand, and had had time to do so, further cuts. Over a period of years sales multiplied as prices came down. It is doubtless true that the same economics do not entirely apply to the book business. Each book is a unique thing, or ought to be; at least it is more difficult to persuade a buyer to substitute one book for another because of a small difference in price than it is to persuade him to buy one motor car instead of another for the same reason. And it is difficult to say how much difference a reduction in price of as little as twenty-five cents would make in the sale of any individual book. But it seems to me probable that a general reduction of twenty-five cents would make a real difference in the sale of books in the mass. At least this type of gradual and orderly reduction might be worth trying.

The danger is that the failure of the dollar book may discourage publishing enterprise on its commercial side just at the time when it needs most to be stimulated. The recent proposal, for example, that at least certain types of popular books carry advertisements seems to me worth serious consideration. It is essentially no more undignified for books to carry advertisements than for Harper's or the Atlantic Monthly to do so, and if we followed the French practice of printing fiction originally in paper covers, it would be a very simple matter to lop off the advertisements when the reader found anything worthy of a permanent binding. Such a proposal may be denounced on the ground that it tends to "commercialize" the book business, but perhaps the real trouble is that the book business has not been commercialized enough. There is a great deal of confusion of thought on this point. It is the commercialization of authors that is to be feared, and the commercialization of publishers in the kind of books they choose, not the commercialization of marketing methods. All that is required of the latter is that they be honest, efficient, and sound in the long run.

Even the most efficient marketing methods, of course, will not increase book sales to more than a limited extent. For the rest, the publishers must hope for an advance, necessarily slow, in the level of the national culture, and an increase of the book-reading habit in the teeth of the whole restless modern spirit and the intense competition of the newspapers, the magazines, the theater, the talkies, the radio, motoring, dancing, bridge, ping-pong, golf, and love. It does not seem a rosy prospect; but as book reading, in spite of tremendous odds, has survived, it cannot be altogether utopian to suppose that it may in time increase.

HENRY HAZLITT

Shakespeare as He Was

William Shakespeare. A Study of Facts and Problems. By E. K. Chambers. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $15.

The Wheel of Fire. Essays in Interpretation of Shakespeare's Sombre Tragedies. By G. Wilson Knight. Oxford University Press. $5.

DIFFERENT as these two books certainly are from each other, they nevertheless unite in saying a single thing—namely, that Shakespeare stands very much where he stood three hundred, two hundred, one hundred years ago. Latterly we have been hearing otherwise. We have been disturbed by rumors of revolutions in the scholarship and criticism of our best poet and our best playwright. We have been told that as soon as certain investigations were done we should have on our hands merely the mangled text of a badly mangled man—a man whose originality had been overrated and the body of whose work had been too naively accepted as authentic, integral, and complete. Both of these books return, or advance, to a conservative position. The first, a work of pure and solid learning, defends the traditional text of Shakespeare against the forces of twentieth-century higher criticism, against the forces of disintegration. The second, a work of pure and brilliant intuition, defends the plays against the notion that they should be taken at anything less or more than their supreme face value. The importance and the timeliness of neither book can be exaggerated.

Sir Edmund Chambers, whose six long volumes on "The Medieval Stage" and "The Elizabethan Stage" have established him as one of the great scholars of contemporary England, and who writes with a kind of towering common sense, not to speak of an almost unsurpassable dryness, now takes up the figure for whom his previous work was intended merely to supply a background. He treats the theater, the biography, and the text of Shakespeare; and he is not at all ashamed to confess in his preface that his conclusions "do not differ essentially from those which have long formed part of the critical tradition." He cannot find, and he freely admits it, that "revolutionary results really emerge from the closer examination of contemporary plays, or of theatrical conditions, or of the psychology of misprints." His bibliographies, if nothing else, are convincing evidence that he has studied all of the so-called Shakespeare problems with extreme care; indeed, his book is in a sense one long bibliographical introduction to those problems, a work of reference about them; but he leaves Shakespeare substantially as he was.

I have called him dry; I must hasten to say that his dryness is usually delightful, and his best weapon against the folly which most men commit when they deal with Shakespeare. The biographical portions of his book, for instance, bristle with innuendoes against those "gifted writers" who pretend to know anything important about Shakespeare's life. Sir Edmund knows so much that he realizes how little there is to know; nor will he indulge in "imaginative reconstruction." Not that he is uncritically hostile toward every part of the Shakespeare legend. He does not find it sensible to dismiss the deer-stealing story without some admission that it may have been possible, or rather that we cannot deny its possibility; and he has to disagree with Sir Sidney Lee's harsh judgment upon a seventeenth-century clergyman, Richard Davies, who said that the poet died a Papist—"How," he asks, "did Sir Sidney know that Davies was irresponsible or a gossip?" So in the chapters on Shakespeare's theater, where he is so incontestably an expert. Professor T. W. Baldwin's "ingenious speculations" as to the relation between the plays and the actors in Shakespeare's company for whom they presumably were written are "vitiated by a misconception as to the nature of theatrical apprenticeship, by a chronology which I believe to be erroneous, and still more perhaps by the complete absence of any data adequate to support so elaborate a superstructure." The dryness there is in the word "perhaps."

So also in the chapters on the text. Here Sir Edmund is in the very thick of controversy, since there are able men who say that the reconstructed text which has come down to us does not faithfully represent Shakespeare's work as he left it; that he was not the sole author of many of the plays; that he altered and rewrote, and that it is difficult now to disentangle the successive versions from one another. It would be out of the question to attempt even an outline of Sir Edmund's arguments, which among other things extend through three hundred closely printed pages of analysis of the plays and poems one by one. It may be noted, however, that he categorically condemns the work of J. M. Robertson on the Shakespeare canon, remarking as he passes that Mr. Robertson "has all the arts of the debater except perhaps that of lucidity." And this final conviction must be recorded: "that the great majority of the plays are Shakespeare's from beginning to end, and that, broadly speaking, when he had once written them, he left them alone."

I have emphasized the controversial aspects of Sir Edmund's book at the expense of other aspects which make it equally valuable. It is a mountain of documents, a vast work of reference. As such, and as a contribution to controversy too, it seems to me the one indispensable book on Shakespeare at the present moment.

Mr. Knight, whose book among other merits possesses that of being introduced by T. S. Eliot, might be said to begin with his commentary where Sir Edmund with his scholarship necessarily leaves off. Sir Edmund has nothing to say about Shakespeare's poetry and drama as such; he only lets us have them again where we once had them—in the standard editions. Mr. Knight has nothing to say about anything else. His are essays in "interpretation"—which, since he scrupulously defines the term, means something quite definite at last. It does not mean, for instance, criticism, the important function of which is to objectify the work under discussion, compare it with other works, and divide its good from its bad. "Interpretation, on the contrary, tends to merge into the work it analyzes; it attempts to understand its subject in the light of its own nature; it avoids discussion of merits. . . . Uncritically, and passively, it receives the whole of the poet's vision; it then proceeds to reexpress this experience in its own terms." It approaches success only when, "preserving something of that childlike faith which we possess, or should possess, in the theater," we remember the original imaginative experience we had as we read or saw the play, and when we now make an effort to state the whole of that experience. Shakespeare's plays, so treated, are in Mr. Knight's opinion without faults, having "so resplendent a quality, so massive a solidity of imagination," that criticism can do nothing with them.

It is refreshing to hear an intelligent man talking this way about Shakespeare nowadays. Not that he represents a return to the uncritical attitude of which we all are tired. He simply is non-critical, which for a person of disciplined imagination is by no means a bad thing to be. Indeed, in the essays which compose his book and which illustrate his method Mr. Knight says much that is illuminating and convincing, and adds something at last to the commentary of Coleridge, Hazlitt, and A. C. Bradley. Nor is it easy to do this. If anyone thinks so, let him read this book; or let him try himself.

MARK VAN DOREN

T. S. Eliot's Baudelaire

Intimate Journals. By Charles Baudelaire. Translated by Charles Isherwood. Introduction by T. S. Eliot. Random House. $6.50.

IN an essay in "For Lancelot Andrewes" T. S. Eliot maintains that Arthur Symons's translation of Baudelaire's work changes him into a Swinburnian decadent of the nineties. That the criticism is just, anyone who has examined the Symons version will grant. But, as Eliot admits, there are certain elements in Baudelaire's poetry that warrant Symons's treatment of him as a kind of superior Ernest Dowson. Eliot, however, insists—and quite rightly—that Symons is unsound in reducing Baudelaire to these elements. What Symons and Baudelaire have in common may be the better part of Symons, but it is a very small part of Baudelaire.

Eliot goes on in the essay mentioned to expound his conception of Baudelaire, and in his preface to the "Intimate Journals" he returns to the task. Baudelaire's Satanism, he says, "amounts to a dim intuition of a part, but a very important part, of Christianity." His ennui is "a true form of acedia, arising from the unsuccessful struggle toward the Christian life." "In the middle nineteenth century . . . an age of progressive degradation, Baudelaire perceived that what really matters is Sin and Redemption." That, according to Eliot, is Baudelaire's true importance.

It must at once be admitted that there is much evidence to support Eliot's view of Baudelaire as "naturaliter Christian," and some of the strongest evidence is in the "Intimate Journals." The three parts of the book are Squibs and Crackers, My Heart Laid Bare, and A Selection of Consoling Maxims upon Love. Of course many of the observations they contain might be used to defend other theses. Mr. Symons, for example, could easily discover passages that might have served as mottoes for the naughty nineties; Huneker could have drawn upon the book to show that Baudelaire was, as he maintained, superman and egoist; the psychoanalysts will find it useful in their interpretations. But there are also those passages that Mr. Eliot seizes upon, passages that show Baudelaire's preoccupation with sin, his scorn for the diffuse and maudlin religiosity of the age, his desire to pray despite his unbelief, and his growing humility in his later years.

It is easy to see why Eliot emphasizes those particular passages. He has committed himself to certain theological dogmas, among them the dogma of original sin. But it is doubtful if Eliot has any strong, immediate sense of original sin. Judged by his poetry, he has a strong sense of ennui, frustration, and purposelessness, but he has no more conviction of sin than H. G. Wells. Therefore, he rejoices in Baudelaire, who did have an extraordinary ability to realize, intensely and immediately, his unworthiness. By communicating, as the poet can do, something of his own conviction Baudelaire gives Eliot's theological system a reality and vitality that he himself is powerless to impart to it.

We can see the service Baudelaire renders Eliot, but we do not necessarily conclude therefore that Baudelaire's importance derives from his ability to perform that service. On the contrary, we may maintain that Eliot's conception of Baudelaire underestimates the poet's significance, and is, in its way, quite as narrow as Symons's. Eliot rightly emphasizes Baudelaire's independence and experimentalism—"what he knew he found out for himself." But as he sees it, the only result was that Baudelaire was led back into the fold. Eliot holds that Baudelaire had an immediate, a thoroughly poetic sense of the evil in the world and in himself, but was powerless to confront that evil. To meet it he had to take refuge in the church. The real significance of Baudelaire, on the contrary, is that he was able to confront the evil he so vividly perceived. Reading one of his poems, firm line by firm line, one sees that the poem is the act of confrontation and mastery. Viewed in such a light, his occasional use of ecclesiastical language is but an accident of education. In each of his great poems Baudelaire demonstrates that he is, in Yvor Winters's phrase, "morally superior to the facts of life." To say less is, certainly, to belittle him.

GRANVILLE HICKS

About China

The Inner History of the Chinese Revolution. By Tang Leang-Li. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

The Spirit of the Chinese Revolution. By Arthur N. Holcombe. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

History of Chinese Political Thought During the Early Tsin Period. By Liang Chi-Chao. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

The Bitter Tea of General Yen. By Grace Zaring Stone. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

The Old China Trade. By Foster Rhea Dulles. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Three Wise Men of the East. By Elizabeth Bisland. University of North Carolina Press. $3.

IN the last few years there has been a significant difference in books about China from those written in the past. By its long revolution and civil war conducted with modern armament, by troubling our foreign offices and unbalancing the Pacific trade, China has achieved "importance" in a sense that it had not before achieved it by what used to be called its "spiritual" contributions. From now on China is to be assimilated to our own standards of values; it is to be thought of not as a producer of art but as a producer of political and economic disturbance. In Chiang Kai-shek it may soon offer a great man in the Mussolini-Pilsudski mode.

This change is not only one that has taken place in Western minds, but one that is taking place in Chinese minds. Racial consciousness is giving way to national consciousness, to that dismal sense of boundaries which perhaps may be nothing more exalted than the sense of property extended into social consciousness. Probably it was necessary to develop this feeling as a kind of psychological armament, to protect China against a slave consciousness that would have been worse. But there is no question that the result has been a degradation.

The story of China's revolution is too confused as yet to be arranged into a straightforward narrative, and Tang Leang-Li is too close to the events and chief personalities to do the arranging, although his important and valuable book, "The Inner History of the Chinese Revolution," presents much of the material that will go into the final arrangement. He has been an official of the Kuomintang Party, and is one of the leaders of the elements which have repudiated Chiang Kai-shek's packed congresses and hold themselves to be the legitimate successors of Sun Yat-sen. His point of view is definitely partisan in the recital of the latest acts of the revolution, but it is as definitely honest. In his account of the revolution I was particularly struck by one force in the revolution which has always been a force in Chinese life, and which may help us to understand why the revolution has taken so tortuous and tedious a course. I refer to the compromises which have been made from the beginning, and which have certainly delayed its settlement. The first was Sun Yat-sen's compromise with Yuan Shi-kai; later he entered into alliance with Chang Tso-lin and other anti-revolutionary elements. No one impugns Sun Yat-sen's motives, or his intelligence, nor should the compromises of Feng and other Chinese leaders, particularly the Kuomintang's compromise with Russia and the native Communists, be too readily discredited. The Chinese are not perfectionists; their justice has been always based on compromise rather than on ideal right; and while the operation of this racial characteristic may retard a final settlement, it may produce one not so embittered and humiliating as the decisive outcomes in Western history. What seems weakness or opportunism to us seems in China to be reasonable procedure, and we must remember that our concepts of right and wrong are largely the products of tradition. If compromise seems to the Chinese a virtue, then we may be satisfied that it is a virtue. Mr. Leang-Li nowhere says this explicitly, nor, do I think, does he intend to give it implicit recognition. It is implicit rather in the facts themselves.

Professor Holcombe, whose recently published "History of the Chinese Revolution" was comprehensive and carefully balanced, does not particularly succeed in his attempt to give a short account, for the general public, in "The Spirit of the Chinese Revolution." This little book, about a fourth as long as its predecessor, amounts to a much smaller fraction in comparative value. It is divided into a number of sections called The Spirit of Nationalism, The Spirit of Christianity, The Spirit of Communism, The Spirit of Science, etc. It would have been more correct to use the word "influence" instead of "spirit." His popularization suffers, like others of its kind, by attempting to substitute generalizations for the facts which alone can give reality to the generalizations. While this book may be useful to readers who want to learn a little but are unwilling to take much trouble about it, its highest use will be to lead some readers to the author's previous book.

"The History of Chinese Political Thought During the Early Tsin Period" is valuable as an introduction to fine Chinese thinking in ancient times and, in the commentary of the author, to fine Chinese thinking in our own time. Liang Chi-Chao, whose recent death was a great loss to the Chinese intellectual world, has had an honorable, if apparently ineffective career, in recent Chinese history. His influence on Chinese youth, exerted partly by superb literary gifts, was very great. And it was by his inspiration that the opposition to Yuan Shi-kai's attempt to destroy the revolution and found a new dynasty took successful action. Along with an interesting critical survey of China's greatest political philosophers, Confucius, Mencius, Mo Ti, Lao Tse, Chuang Tse, and the Legalists, or advocates of divine right in government, he makes subtle and interesting comparisons with Western institutions and history. Here, however, in spite of the cultivation and tolerance of his mind, he gives way to occasional patriotic bias; and in his admiration of the great men he studies he falls into the usual and perhaps forgivable error of claiming too much for them. The Confucian ideal of the superior (not the perfect) man and his responsibilities of social and political leadership has rarely been so successfully stated before.

"The Bitter Tea of General Yen" is a distinguished and fascinating novel. I have seen claims made for it that it is worth a dozen serious books on China in its illumination of Chinese life. This is a different sort of praise than the book merits, fine as it is, and sensitive and acute as its author, Miss Grace Zaring Stone, is. It is rather a remarkable picture of white people in China, and wherever Miss Stone deals with them she is extraordinarily effective. The central situation, however, the encounter of an intelligent American girl with General Yen, model Tupan of a province, reveals little more than a sincere and humble desire to understand the nature of the Chinese mind and the civilization it has erected. The cultured, brilliant, cynical General Yen is neither the essence of Chinese manhood nor is his situation the essence of current Chinese politics. So far as it will lead to respect for Chinese personality and methods, which are so fatally easy for even sympathetic Westerners to misunderstand, this somewhat romanticized situation will be of service. Its greatest achievement, however, both as fiction and as revelation, is its studies of the whites. No malice could have done worse to their pretensions; but Miss Stone does not annihilate; we merely understand them as well as we do our own relatives, and can do as little about them.

"The Old China Trade" recalls an extraordinary episode of American expansion. By a patient and methodical use of his material Mr. Dulles, without any brilliance of style or devices of narration, makes of it a continuously absorbing book. The close of the American Revolution left a great mass of privateers idle in the Northern harbors. How were these to be employed? The financier Robert Morris set the example by outfitting a ship, the Empress of China, for the Oriental trade. Thus by maritime pioneering the North Atlantic States tapped a source of wealth that financed the industries of New York and New England and provided the leisure and well-being for the golden day of New England civilization. The Americans at the beginning sailed in ships smaller sometimes than the caravels of Columbus; they sailed without nautical instruments and with the crudest of charts; most of the crews were boys; yet they accomplished historical voyages, and in their efforts to find furs to exchange for Chinese goods they opened up the American northwest coast and made important Arctic discoveries. Mr. Dulles's account of trade and diplomatic relations with China in the early nineteenth century is a superb piece of historical writing.

With Miss Bisland's "Three Wise Men of the East" we return to the old picturesque school of books about the Orient, mixed up with modern feminist sentiment. Her Three Wise Men are three rulers. The first is Shah Jan, whom she calls the "great lover" because, so far as is known, he loved only one woman. With a grand gesture Miss Bisland sets aside the evidence of history and establishes him as the greatest of Mogul emperors and one of the greatest men in all history. Thus, uxoriousness is turned into a measure of greatness. Miss Bisland's treatment of Chien Lung, the "magnificent emperor," and Hideyoshi, the "fascinating parvenu," is equally capricious and as preposterously mistaken in placing them in Chinese and Japanese history. The book is written with a lavish vocabulary full of jewels and fairy palaces and Oriental wonder. But there is only one wonderful thing about it—that a university press should have lent its imprint to a book lacking any justification in scholarship or literary merit.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

"Our Chief of Men"

Cromwell. By Eucardio Momigliano. Translated by L. E. Marshall. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

EUCARDIO MOMIGLIANO'S study of the Lord Protector possesses the characteristics that justify a new book on the subject: it is objective, and it offers both new information and confirmation of important facts. Wherever the author sets forth an unusual or particularly significant event in Cromwell's career he bases his assertions on the unpartisan contemporary records transmitted to their home governments by Italian diplomats then accredited to London. The most valuable material comes from the letters addressed to the Councilors of Genoa by Francesco Bernardi, Genoese chargé d'affaires at London, who enjoyed unusual intimacy with the Protector, but who, nevertheless, viewed current affairs without passion. In these documents other accounts, English in origin and therefore prone to bias, depicting Cromwell's de facto assumption of the place from which he had helped to expel Charles, and his perverse and obstinate ambition, receive definite authentication. In addition much light is shed on Cromwell's desire to become emperor of a pan-European confederation of Protestant peoples.

In order that the book in its totality might attain the excellence of some of its parts, however, it should be either shorter or longer. A shorter book might have consisted only of annotated texts of a larger number of the letters, since the author indicates that many remain unedited though not inaccessible. Such a volume would be a valuable source book for creative writers who might later undertake a full-length biography of Cromwell. On the other hand, in a longer book, the author himself might have undertaken such a study of Cromwell in relation to his times. He is so pressed for space that his sketchy —and occasionally inaccurate—summary of the Puritan revolution fails to reach the roots of the whole complex growth. The beginnings of the struggle obviously go back to the days of Henry VIII and less patently, though none the less surely, to the reign of Edward II. The priest of Lutterworth and the monk of Wittenberg have their share in the ancestry of Cromwell, the elect of God, as well as the legalistic theologian of Geneva. The Protector's overwhelming worldly success as a soldier may have seemed to him the seal of divine approval and hence the honest self-justification of his supreme and single power. A longer book, based on such clear testimony as Mr. Momigliano presents, could have investigated these dark caverns of the spirit with perhaps startling results.

Despite the questionable basis of its construction and the frequently cumbersome style in which it is written—or translated—the book as a whole constitutes an important addition to Cromwell literature. DONALD A. ROBERTS

Lynn Riggs as Poet

The Iron Dish. By Lynn Riggs. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE surfaces of Lynn Riggs's poetry are clean and cool. One derives casual pleasure from the graceful gestures of his particular lyric gift. He has, however, given us little more than his quick, intelligent grasp of external design. It is not often that we find him committing himself beyond the expression of purely decorative effects. On occasions when he does cross the lines of his self-imposed limitations he is clear and vivid. Note this brief commentary:

We will need even these stumps of cedar,
The harsh fruit of the land.
Our thirst will have to be slaked, if at all, by this thin
Water on the sand.
If we have demanded this corrosive season
Of drought, if we have bent
Backward from the plow, asking
Even less than is sent,
Surely we may be no bitterer
Than the shrunk grape
Clinging to the wasted stem
It cannot escape.

The mood of resignation indicated throughout the volume is shown here in its last analysis and with quiet distinction. The counterpoint to this mood is a delight in sharp, hard sunlight such as may be found upon "a pink dress, a blue wagon . . . in the road . . ." all expressed in the simplest of terms and with potentialities for precision. Perhaps it is irrelevant to wish that Mr. Riggs had combined his knowledge of American Southwestern speech displayed in "Roadside" with the formal economy that distinguishes the poems in "The Iron Dish." He has made the poet and the dramatist two distinct and separate personalities. An indication of what may be accomplished in the fusion of the two is shown in a poem called Santo Domingo Corn Dance. The poem is a neat and highly original interpretation of an Indian motif. Here is a selection that illustrates Mr. Riggs's ability in handling the theme:

THE SONG OF THE BODIES

I am
Naked before
You, High One—look! Hear me!
As I stamp this ground worn smooth
By feet.
Not as
A supplicant
I shake the doors of earth—
Let the green corn spring to meet
My tread!

Mr. Riggs's promise seems to lie in a direction away from the florid and strikingly poetic phrase; it finds its best expression in the clean-cut image and in an austere economy of words. HORACE GREGORY

Books in Brief

Willa Cather. By René Rapin. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.50.

Mr. Rapin's study of Willa Cather, in the Modern American Writers' series, is a very small contribution to criticism. Perhaps it was not the intent of the book to give more than the hastiest judgment of the subject's worth. But it should be possible to indicate, at least, why "The Professor's House," "One of Ours," "Death Comes for the Archbishop" are "truly to be called great." Those are big words; they may be applicable to the excellent work of Willa Cather. But of her experimentation with the form of the novel, of the actual quality of her style, there is nothing in this book. Instead, we get beautiful writing and extreme, adjectival gush.

Little America. By Richard E. Byrd. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

That romantic land, the south end of the world, which has called so many men for adventure and exploration and heroism, is once more described, this time by Admiral Byrd. On the whole the Admiral is content to tell a straightforward, unadorned tale of what his expedition did, ate, wore, said, and planned during the two years they spent in the Antarctic. He answers nearly every question that might be asked about equipment and occupation; he tells in detail the scrupulous plans made for the flight over the South Pole, for the supporting parties that had of necessity to reinforce the fliers in case of accident—though happily they were not needed; he describes the flight itself, and perhaps most interesting of all the occupations of the party during the winter months when they were snowbound in camp. Admiral Byrd labored under two disadvantages in writing his book. A masterpiece on the same subject had just been issued for the American public—Apsley

Now--at last--the one great desire of every booklover and collector becomes a satisfying reality--

Autographed BOOKS

Signed by the Author for You

Each copy of the publications of the new Autographed Editions Club is personally autographed, making [redacted] in order not to put too much of a task upon the author, to limit the membership to 3,000.

THERE before you—on the flyleaf of your Autographed Editions book—stands, vividly, the most personal thing the author can give you . . . his own signature, by his [redacted] hand.

There, in the signature of author, designer or illustrator is the character, the life—the man who gave you this book. Charles Dickens' [redacted] signature, Mark Twain's, Bret Harte's—make these illustrious authors, these colorful personalities, live again in your mind and heart.

That is why [redacted] autograph is valued—why the autographed book [redacted] [redacted] priceless treasure. The signature proclaims the [redacted] much [redacted] did his living features when he lived.

Of no intrinsic or material worth is the personally signed volume of an author's work—yet collectors and dealers the world over bid amazing prices for the possession of [redacted] thing of the author that remains, to a certain extent, alive.

How refreshing—and interesting—in this machine-made age for booklover [redacted] collector to know that [redacted] publisher has made available [redacted] personalized series of books. While millions scramble for the machine-made characterless books that descend as [redacted] plague on soda and cigar store counters—the discriminating booklover may avail himself of [redacted] book that gives him genuine pleasure as a reader, and adds rapidly increasing value to his personal library.

That is the idea behind the [redacted] Autographed Editions Club—which you may join if you act without delay. Only [redacted] limited number can belong because, obviously, [redacted] author [redacted] illustrator can not be asked to sign more than a [redacted] thousand copies—even that is [redacted] task.

The Autographed Editions Club will issue once [redacted] month, for exactly three thousand subscribers, [redacted] original work of fiction, travel, poetry, biography, drama—or the choice translation of a fine book, from [redacted] foreign language.

This book of the month will be beautifully printed, bound and boxed, and signed by either the author, [redacted] designer, the illustrator, or the translator. This will make every publication of the Autographed Editions Club [redacted] collector's item—to say nothing of the fact that the signature makes the book thrice [redacted] precious [redacted] infinitely more to be loved.

The Editor-in-Chief of the Autographed Editions Club [redacted] Ralph Cheyney, the director of book design is Adolph Ritter. The first book they have prepared for subscrib[redacted] is "Body," by Daniel Quilter described elsewhere [redacted] this page.

Every booklover and collector will want to [redacted] least examine and test this [redacted] book club idea. The number that may be admitted is limited. Use the coupon below. You risk nothing, as [redacted] complete refund is guaranteed if you are not delighted wtih your subscription.

First Publication

BODY

by Daniel Quilter

"Body," the first publication of the Autographed Editions Club, [redacted] an amazing and moving story-study of contemporary American life.

The book [redacted] in eight parts, each part representing [redacted] [redacted] and more searching approach [redacted] [redacted] understanding of human relationships in these tumultuous times. There are seven full-page halftone reproductions of drawings of distinction and beauty, by Anton Skillin.

An entirely [redacted] and startling situation is revealed in the opening pages. A rich man who has married [redacted] motion picture star, finds, on his honeymoon to Paris, that, in spite of the great [redacted] that has been taken of her, both by her parents and himself, his bride has, in [redacted] secret manner, become physically and mentally demoralized.

Then follows the thrilling narrative of the Viennese physician's diagnosis—the policeman left overnight to watch over the dead body of [redacted] famous beauty—the Snake Charmer—Clivette—The Way Down—each part of the book of rare distinction and interest, bringing [redacted] new name and manner into American Prose.

Every [redacted] you receive [redacted] beautifully made, beautifully illustrated and designed book, personally autographed.

With the Compliments of the Author
Daniel Quilter

De Luxe—Library Size

"Body" is full library size, 6 x 9; beautifully printed in 14 pt. Benedictine type on Ticonderoga watermarked laid paper.

A Saving of $10

The cash in advance subscription price for [redacted] year is $50—twelve $5 books at a $10 saving. See coupon.

The First Time—Possibly the Last That This Coupon Will Appear

Fill in, send this coupon today! Only [redacted] limited number of subscribers will be accepted. This advertisement and [redacted] similar [redacted] appearing in other publications this week may complete the subscription to the Autographed Editions Club.

The Autographed Edition Club
96 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

I enclosed [redacted] for which send me, postpaid, my autographed copy of "Body," by Daniel Quilter; and enter my yearly subscription to receive one book a month for the next eleven months, each book to be sent, $5 C. O. D. (no additional postage to pay). It is clearly understood that I may return "Body" or any other of the eleven books, within 5 days of receipt and receive my money back if I [redacted] not entirely satisfied.

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State ....

☐ Check here if you desire first book, "Body," [redacted] C. O. D.

☐ Check here and enclose $50 if [redacted] wish to save $10 by subscribing for one year in advance. IN7

THE EDITOR of the most powerful liberal daily on the Continent analyses Russia's gigantic experiment—presents the facts on Bolshevist methods in industry and politics—on all phases of existence under the regime—investigates the spirit behind the facts—reaches a startling conclusion. His discussion is authoritative, impartial, scientific, absorbing. "The most illuminating study of that strange experiment in revolution which all the world is watching."—Dean Inge.

THE RUSSIAN EXPERIMENT

by Arthur Feiler

Just published, $2.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., NEW YORK

The Institute of Adult Education
Announces a Series of Lectures
by DR. SAMUEL D. SCHMALHAUSEN
at the
COMMUNITY CHURCH
34th Street and Park Avenue

FRIDAY EVENINGS AT 8:30

Jan. 9. The Choice Before Us: Mussolini—Gandhi—Lenin
23. The Evil Role of Science Under Capitalism
30. Why Our Intellectuals Betray Their Ideals
Feb. 6. Education Is Not Enlightenment
13. What Do We Mean By Human Nature?
20. America At The Crossroads
27. The Role Of Superior Brains In History
Mar. 6. Woman In Our Changing Civilization
13. Can Psychology Save Civilization?
20. The Sanity Of Communism

Single Admission 50c — Course Ticket $3.00
Except January 9th — Admission Free

Office: Institute Of Adult Education
32 Union Square, N. Y. C. Tel. STuyvesant 9-8072

Cherry-Garrod's "The Worst Journey in the World." And the Byrd expedition all came home alive! Had there been one or two martyrs to science, it is not unlikely that the expedition would have been more popular. This, of course, is preposterous and unjust. As Admiral Byrd himself says, their job was not to make heroes of themselves but to avoid that very thing. If they could, they must sheer away from every pitfall which had brought the Scott expedition to its disastrous and painful—if dramatic—end. Nevertheless, the account of how the expedition stayed alive makes fascinating reading. The illustrations add much to the text.

Sexual Life in Ancient India. By Johann Meyer. E. P. Dutton and Company. Two volumes. $10.50.

In their cautious acceptance of birth control Western authorities, political and religious, acknowledge every justification for it except pleasure. Whatever other value Dr. Meyer's volumes have, they are useful in showing that civilizations can exist and flourish without our own abject fear of sex. In India its pleasures are esteemed and are even regarded as the rewards of asceticism. Aside from this sheerly incidental revelation, Dr. Meyer's work has little to offer. It is a dreary edifice of pedantry, where such recherché facts as that children were desired and motherhood respected in Ancient India have to be established by endless citations and references in classic literature and the work of other scholars.

Drama

W. C. Fields and the Cosmos

TO me this seems a year in which the musical comedies distinctly show the way to so-called legitimate attractions. My quarrel with that word "legitimate" is deep and of long standing. I have never been able to understand why entertainment becomes more important simply because no one sings. In recent years I begin to sense a new point of view among critics. When I held a reviewer's post on a morning paper, it was practically treason not to choose a comedy or a farce if it happened to open on the same night as a musical show. Now there are heretics who abandon the old principle. It would be folly to do otherwise.

For instance, there came a night not so long ago in which the choice lay between W. C. Fields in "Ballyhoo" at Hammerstein's Theater and a comedy drama entitled "Life Is Like That." Some few of the pundits insisted on being faithful to the memory of Shakespeare and passed up Mr. Fields to witness "Life Is Like That." The loss was theirs. I found Fields to be at the very top of his glorious best, and I liked the story in which he is set.

A satire on C. C. Pyle, the sporting promoter, has long seemed one of the neglected spaces in the American drama. I will not maintain that the plot runs down all the possibilities of the subject matter. But, at least, the scheme endows Fields with a role in which he is believable as well as amusing.

It is well to remember that a performance in musical comedy is a piece of acting just as a portrayal of Hamlet, the Prince of Denmark, may be. I will grant that there are depths and subtleties in Hamlet not likely to be found in the usual revue. On the other hand, low comedy parts are vastly better played in most instances. I do not see why any sensitive connoisseur of acting should not vastly prefer W. C. Fields to Walter Hampden. A good comic moves in a plane high above the head of an indifferent tragedian. It might be an excellent idea for the American public to pause in its continual program of self-reproach and take a little pride in the fact that we lead the world in the matter of musical comedy.

"Ballyhoo" is not a perfect specimen, but it is amply excellent to provide a hilarious evening. Several of the regular critics found it dull, but I think they are too captious, and to some extent it is the custom to remain slightly aloof and calm while writing about revues.

Much is made of the fact that Mr. Fields does things now which he has shown us previously. This seems to me an ungrateful form of criticism. The fact that he can produce endless fun by capers in an Austin car should not be minimized simply because some seasons ago he did tricks with a Ford. And I feel that one of the high spots in the present theatrical year has been underlined in red because W. C. Fields is juggling again.

I am of the opinion that in this diversion the man falls little short of genius. You may protest that juggling does not belong among the major arts. Such an opinion will be held only by those who have witnessed merely the proficient practitioners. Fields is, as far as I know, the only one who is able to introduce the tragic note in the handling of a dozen cigar boxes. When they are pyramided, only to crash because of a sudden off-stage noise, my heart goes out to the protagonist as it seldom does to Lear or Macbeth.

If one thinks of art in terms of line and movement, then I suggest that there is present in this juggling act as much to please the eye as when Pavlowa dances. Like the best of modern painters, Fields can afford to depart from the orthodox, because he is heretical from choice and not through incapacity. I mean, it is amusing when he muffs a trick because you know that he could easily complete it if he cared to. Certainly, there is something admirable in the ability to emotionalize the task of tossing spheres into the air and catching them in rhythm. Possibly there is even profundity in such a pastime.

Mr. Fields at play among the planets suggests to me an Einsteinian quality. I do not like to rush into symbolism, but if a mortal can personally see to it that these complicated orbits are preserved, each in its entity, then I go home more sure of the safety and sanctity of the universe than before.

And yet, it might be simpler merely to say that "Ballyhoo" is excellent entertainment.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Films

A Notable Achievement

RENÉ CLAIR, the author and director of "Sous les Toits de Paris" (Little Carnegie Playhouse), enjoys the combined benefits of talent and good fortune. He has produced a picture that in many ways is a little masterpiece, and he has been lucky enough to be the first artist in a field that has been dominated by Hollywood robots. Indeed, so great is one's relief and delight at seeing a fresh mind, unencumbered with hollow conventions and equipped with taste, subtle wit, and imaginative insight, apply itself to fashioning a work of art that the shortcomings of the picture inevitably recede into the background. There I shall leave them for the moment, to stress the more important fact—the fascination and charm of René Clair's offspring.

The quality of the picture is revealed almost from its opening scenes. The characters have hardly been introduced when the story halts on a scene in which a group of Parisian tenement dwellers, led by a young peddler of songs, engage in solemn singing in the fashion of the Salvation Army. The

FILMS ☐ PLAYS

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you can throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lyistrata' an event you will long remember."—Richard Lockbridge, The Sun.
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre, W. of B'way. Eves. 8:40. Matinees Wed. and Sat., at 2.40.

—"A SMASH HIT"—Walter Winchell, Mirror—
"Joe Cook perfectly marvelous and the show perfectly beautiful"—Heywood Broun, Nation.
JOE COOK in "FINE and DANDY"
HIS NEWEST, MADDEST MUSICAL
ERLANGER'S THEATRE—W. 44th St.—PEN. 7963
Evening 8:30; Matinees, Wed. and Sat., 2:30

The Theatre Guild Presents
MIDNIGHT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:50.

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN
MARTIN BECK THEA. 45th Street, West of Eight Avenue. Eves., 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

"Robert E. Sherwood's best play."—Brown, Post.
Arthur Hopkins presents
This Is New York
A New Comedy by Robert E. Sherwood with LOIS MORAN
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St., W. of Broadway. Eves. 8:40 Mats. Fri., Jan. 2 and Sat., Jan. 3.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents
MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy Hit
VINEGAR TREE
HOLIDAY MATINEES: Wed., Dec. 31; Fri., Jan. 2; Sat., Jan. 3.
PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. Bryant 2628
Evenings 8:40. Matinees at 2:40.

The Actor Managers, Inc., Present
RUTH DRAPER
in her original character sketches
Program Changed Daily
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st St. E. of Bway. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30; Eves. (incl. Sun.), Dec. 31, Jan. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7 and 9. Price $1-$3

Films and Lectures continued on the following pages

☐ FILMS ☐ LECTURES ☐

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

AMERICAN PREMIER
NOW PLAYING
Rene Clair's French Talking and Singing Film Masterpiece
"SOUS LES TOITS DE PARIS"
(Under the Roofs of Paris)
Acclaimed an artistic triumph in Europe and America
LITTLE CARNEGIE Playhouse
57th ST. EAST of 7th AVE.
Popular Prices
Direction Leo Brecher

"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
CENTRAL
B'way & 47th St.
Cont. Noon to Midnight
POPULAR PRICES

League For Industrial Democracy
Invites You To Its
Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK
127 West 43rd Street
Saturday, January 10, 1931, at 12:45
BEHIND THE BANK FAILURES
One Thousand banks in the United States have closed their doors in 1930—the significance of these failures at this time will be discussed by
Dr. John H. Gray
Formerly President of the American Economics Association
Dr. Max Winkler
Vice-President of Bertron, Griscom and Company, Bankers
John T. Flynn
Author of "Investment "Trusts"
Chairman
Reinhold Niebuhr
Tickets $1.25 Non-Members $1.50
Undergraduate Students 75c
Make Reservations at the office of the L. I. D., 112 E. 19 St.

PSYCHOLOGY
AND ITS USEFUL APPLICATIONS
A Series of Six Lectures by Distinguished Psychologers
Early Mental Growth—Prof. ARNOLD GESELL, Yale University
Character and Personality—Prof. MARK A. MAY, Yale University
Psychology and the Professions—Prof. W. R. MILES, Stanford University
Psychology and Industry—Prof. M. S. VITELES, Univ. of Penna.
Social and Political Problems—Prof. F. H. ALLPORT, Syracuse Univ.
Psychology and Education—Prof. A. I. GATES, Columbia University
Friday Evenings at 8:30—January 9th to February 13th,
New York Academy of Medicine—Fifth Ave. at 103rd St.
Tickets: Single Lectures $2.00. Entire Series $10.00. Half price to students, teachers and social workers. Write or telephone to—
THE PSYCHOLOGICAL CORPORATION
Grand Central Terminal Building — Phone: Vanderbilt 3-9357

Other Lectures appears on Page 18

length of the song, the dulness of the music, and the solemnity of the singing would have been enough to condemn this scene for any Hollywood talkie. But here comes the miracle of art. By introducing a slight action, so slight that it is almost entirely confined to an exchange of glances between the peddler and a prowling pickpocket, the artist sets off the vital force. Instantly the characters become intensely alive, the singing acquires the quality of suspense, and the whole scene begins to sparkle with humor and to throb with the pulse of human life. By vivifying touches such as this, one scene after another is transformed into a palpitating reality. We observe their effect in the episode of the two friends interrupting their altercation to turn on the fashionably dressed passers-by who stop to gaze at them; in the scene of another fight where a gramophone keeps wailing after the tune has played itself out, and where the face of a silent cafe habitue plays a gamut of expressions that follows the action with a tale of its own; and in several other episodes throughout the picture, too numerous to be listed here. All this testifies to the freshness of approach and the sense of vital and significant detail with which René Clair treats the material of human life. His imaginative vision of this life is the source of the authentic Parisian atmosphere that distinguishes his picture, that makes it so stimulating in its sober earnestness.

But greatly as I admire this creative interpretation of the material of life and the flawless acting in which it is embodied, I am not prepared to regard "Sous les Toits de Paris" as an important advance in the solution of the problem of cinematic form in the talkies. René Clair undoubtedly achieves a fair measure of success in blending scenes with dialogue with scenes without dialogue. He succeeds, however, only by the extensive use of music, of which, as it happens, he has an abundant supply in his story and setting. But even he is occasionally obliged to resort to music as mere accompaniment, as in the old silent pictures; and this method, if applied to less musical stories, would be dodging the issue of cinematic dialogue.

Compared with "Sous les Toits de Paris" "The Blue Angel" (Rialto) and "The Royal Family" (Rivoli) are negligible. But they are entertaining enough as Hollywood films go. "The Blue Angel," a German picture made by a Hollywood director, is a conventional melodrama; "The Royal Family," a comedy bordering on farce. The former is a little more sensitive and cinematic, the latter more stagy. Both remain safely within conventional viewpoints and methods of treatment.

Alexander Bakshy

Contributors to This Issue

Weimar Jones is a North Carolina newspaperman.

Hubert Phillips is associate professor of social science at Fresno State College, Fresno, California.

Negley Farson is on the foreign staff of the Chicago Daily News.

Leonora Speyer will publish in the spring a book of verse, "Naked Heel."

Granville Hicks is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

Isidor Schneider is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

Donald A. Roberts is a member of the department of English at the College of the City of New York.

Horace Gregory is the author of "Chelsea Rooming House," shortly to be published in England.

David W. Wainhouse is assistant director of research of the Council on Foreign Relations.

International Relations Section

Iraq: A British Preserve

By DAVID W. WAINHOUSE

AT Bagdad on June 30, 1930, Great Britain signed a treaty of alliance with Iraq, a treaty which Iraq ratified on November 16. The document is an important one and may be said to begin the realization of a policy expressed by Great Britain in November, 1917, namely, to emancipate a people "so long oppressed by the Turks" and to establish a national government and administration "deriving its authority from the initiative and free choice of the indigenous populations." This process of emancipation has been going on with considerable success. The mandatory's administration in Iraq has been efficient and constructive. In a decade it has raised the most backward Arab country to the honorable position of being the first mandate to enter the League of Nations. But the process has not been one pura sine animo furandi.

The difficulty lies in the system of mandates. In reality it is a euphemistic term for colonial administration of the old-fashioned kind. As in all colonial administration, the colonizing Power is influenced by two motives which pull it in opposite directions. There is a temptation on the part of the mandatory to overreach itself in encouraging interests favorable to its nationals to the neglect of the natives; and there is the obligation on the part of the mandatory to deal with its charge in a way that will enable it "to stand on its own feet." The task of guiding a people to nationhood is a costly business; and nations are not interested in doing it merely for the sake of an ideal.

Originally British interest in this region was aroused chiefly because of the pirates who infested the Persian Gulf and preyed upon British shipping. Trading-posts and political residencies were established. By the close of the World War, British and Indian troops had wrested the region from Turkish hands, and the diplomats at Versailles, with the aid of a map, compasses, a ruler, and a charming insouciance, fashioned what is now the kingdom of Iraq. There followed commercial and political penetration, until today Great Britain is in control of the chief resources of Mesopotamia.

Iraq, with an area of some 116,000 square miles and a population of 3,000,000, lies at the head of the Persian Gulf. To the north is Turkey, which by reason of its position as a treaty revisionist is a disturbing neighbor. To the northwest is the French mandated territory of Syria, inhabited by Arab tribes which are unruly and inclined to pillage. To the east is Persia, inhabited by a people whose religion is Shiashi and hostile to that of the people of Iraq, who are Sunni.

In the days of Marco Polo Iraq lay along the routes traversed by caravans engaging in a lucrative Eastern trade with Bagdad, the emporium. With the discovery in the fifteenth century of the new route to India by way of the Cape, merchants took to the sea rather than risk the perils of the overland route, and Iraq fell into a decline. The discovery of oil, the enduring wealth in the extraordinary fertility of the soil bathed by the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, and, more recently, the development of aerial navigation, which gives Iraq, a country lying along the shortest route from Great Britain to India, a unique position—these factors have made it once more commercially and strategically important. Iraq, indeed, promises to become a world thoroughfare to Central and Southern Asia. Thus, imperial policy toward India, aerial communications, and oil dictate Great Britain's policy in the Near East.

British pre-war diplomacy in the Middle East called for a system of buffer states between the Mediterranean and India. The cataclysm brought on by the World War necessitated a realignment of policy. The downfall of friendly Russia and Turkey's position as an ex-enemy made an alliance with either of these Powers impossible. For the past decade British diplomacy has been directed toward forging a chain out of the Arab provinces of the former Ottoman Empire, in the hope that with Persia and Afghanistan independent India would enjoy security from the Soviet menace. In this chain of buffer states Iraq forms a vital and important link.

On the discovery of oil in Iraq the oleaginous diplomacy of the Western Powers began. A consortium of British, American, French, and Dutch companies—to which the British companies contributed a preponderant share of the capital—was granted a seventy-five-year concession in 1925 by the Iraq government.* Iraq was promised a substantial return in the form of a royalty of four shillings a ton. The government expects a handcome income when the pipe-line to the Mediterranean is built. Iraq, as already noted, is destined to become the Suez Canal of air communication. The Imperial Airways, Limited, a company subsidized by the British government, already operates an aerial service from London to Karachi, a distance of some 5,000 miles. In the near future Great Britain expects to build a railroad across Palestine, Transjordania, and Iraq, thus uniting its three mandates and connecting the Mediterranean with the Persian Gulf.

The treaty of June 30, 1930, was born of these forces and must therefore be read and understood in that light. The preamble states that the British government is prepared to support the candidature of Iraq for admission to the League of Nations in 1932. This means the automatic severance of the mandatory-mandate relation between Great Britain and Iraq. The proposal is important because it marks the beginning of the liquidation of the Wilsonian idealism expressed in Article XXII of the League Covenant, and because of far-reaching influence upon the French mandate of Syria, in pressing the French government to follow the good example set by Great Britain. The quid pro quo for this "liberation" is a British "sphere of influence" in Iraq—a term used in the nineteenth century when the great Powers were scrambling for concessions in China and were carving up Africa. The imperial constitution has a remarkable digestion. It can assimilate dominions, commonwealths,

---

* The Anglo-Persian Oil Company, a British concern participating in the consortium, is controlled by the British government.

☐ LECTURES ☐

THE RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 E. 15th St. AL 4-3094
WINTER COURSES
January 5 - March 14

AMERICAN CIVILIZATION TODAY
Mon. 8:30 p.m.
Lewis Mumford, George S. Counts, Carl Van Doren, Wm. P. Montague, John Dewey, Raymond C. Moley, Harry F. Ward, Morris R. Cohen, Morris Hillquit.

THE METROPOLIS IN THE MACHINE AGE
LEWIS MUMFORD Mon., Jan. 5, 8:30 p.m.

HISTORICAL MATERIALISM
BELA LOW Mon. 7 p.m.

BASIS OF HUMAN BEHAVIOR
JOSEPH M. OSMAN Tues. 8:30 p.m.

CURRENT ECONOMIC CHANGES
GEORGE S. MITCHELL Tues. 8:30 p.m.

LABOR AND THE LAW
LOUIS WALDMAN Wed. 7 p.m.

TRADE UNIONS IN ACTION
DAVID J. SAPOSS Wed. 8:30 p.m.

SOCIALISM IN THE MUNICIPALITY
NORMAN THOMAS Wed. 8:30 p.m.

MASTERS OF THE SHORT STORY
E. L. TARTAK Wed. 8:30 p.m.

PHILOSOPHY AND SOCIAL THOUGHT
DORION CAIRNS Wed. 8:30 p.m.

AMERICAN LITERARY PARALELLS
WILLIAM E. BOHN Thurs. 7 p.m.

FROM HAYDEN TO WAGNER
HERMAN EPSTEIN Thurs. 8:30 p.m.

HISTORY OF AMERICAN RADICAL MOVEMENT
JAMES ONEAL Thurs. 8:30 p.m.

Write or phone for Announcement
Register Now — Reasonable fees

WEST SIDE FORUM
West Side Meeting House
550 West 110th Street
(S. E. Corner Broadway)
New York, N. Y.

Tuesday Eve., Jan. 6, at 8:30
MAX EASTMAN
"Russia vs. America"

PROGRESSIVE OPEN FORUM
Schiff Center
2510 Valentine Avenue
(Fordham Road Station)
Bronx, N. Y.

Wednesday Eve., Jan. 7, at 8:30
JOAN LOWELL
author of "The Cradle of the Deep"
"What I Think of Men"

Offices: Affiliated Forum — 32 Union Square, N. Y. C.
Tel. Stuyvesant 8072 Weekly Notices Mailed on Request

Mary Ware Dennett's Pamphlet
THE SEX SIDE OF LIFE
AN EXPLANATION FOR YOUNG PEOPLE
may be ordered by mail from the author's address
81 SINGER STREET, ASTORIA, L. I., NEW YORK CITY
Single copies 35c, three for $1.00
Lower rates [illegible] quantity orders for schools, mother's clubs, parent-teacher associations, social welfare groups, etc.

a union, a free state, protectorates, "A," "B," and "C" mandates, sovereign princes, and spheres of influence.

Article I establishes a close alliance between the High Contracting Parties and provides that there shall be full and frank consultation between them in all matters of foreign policy which may affect their common interests. In effect the consultative clause means that the British government remains the paramount Power so far as outsiders are concerned. In the past, clauses providing for joint consultation in all matters of foreign policy have given the paramount Power virtual control of foreign affairs, and there is no reason to believe that such will not be the practice in this case. By Article IV Great Britain and Iraq agree to come to each other's aid in the event of war. Iraq's help will consist in furnishing to its ally all facilities and assistance in its power, including the use of railways, rivers, ports, aerodromes, and means of communication. Precisely what Great Britain is to do for its ally is not stipulated.

Iraq further undertakes to grant to Great Britain, by Article V, sites for air bases to be selected by it (i.e., Great Britain) in the vicinity of Basra and for an air base west of the Euphrates—discreet distances from Bagdad and Mosul—on the ground that the permanent maintenance and protection in all circumstances of the essential communications of Great Britain is in the common interest of the contracting parties. To protect these lines of communication, Iraq agrees to allow Great Britain to maintain forces at Basra and at some point west of the Euphrates. Forces are likewise to be maintained at Hinaidi and at Mosul, but for only five years. While in one breath the treaty declares that the presence of these forces "shall not constitute in any manner an occupation and will in no way prejudice the sovereign rights of Iraq," in another it declares that the British forces shall continue to enjoy "the immunities and privileges in jurisdictional and fiscal matters, including freedom from taxation." While it might be denied that the presence of troops on Iraq soil constitutes an occupation, their presence and their immunities derogate these sovereign rights.

The collaboration in Iraq's defense still links the two countries closely together. Great Britain undertakes to grant to native officers naval, military, and aeronautical instruction; to furnish arms, ammunition, equipment, ships, and aeroplanes of the latest available pattern; and to provide officers to serve in an advisory capacity with the country's forces. In view of the desirability of identity in training methods between the two armies, Iraq promises, should it deem it necessary to have recourse to foreign military instructors, to choose them from among British subjects. Iraq further promises that if any personnel of its forces are sent abroad for military training they shall be sent to British military schools. Finally, Iraq undertakes that its armament and essential military equipment shall not differ in type from those of the forces of His Britannic Majesty.

The changes contemplated under the treaty do not mean and cannot mean that Great Britain will cease to interest itself in Iraq. Whatever else goes, imperial communication by air must remain a permanent factor in their mutual relations, and Iraq recognizes such a necessity in this treaty. In place of the tutor-and-tutored relation a special alliance is set up, one in which the former tutor remains on the spot in the capacity of a silent partner in the affairs of Iraq rather than as an active participant.

The Nation
FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1931 No. 3419

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29
EDITORIALS:
  Toward a New Party 32
  Another Railway Plan 33
  Honesty Is Not Enough 33
  Papa Joffre 34
CALIFORNIA'S SUN GOD. By Duncan Aikman 35
ON THE GERMAN FRONT. By Oswald Garrison Villard 37
HIGH SCIENCE AT WASHINGTON. By Paul Y. Anderson 39
THE MOSCOW TRIAL. By Louis Fischer 41
WE MET MR. HOOVER. By Amos Pinchot 43
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 44
AN EXPLANATION: LOANS AND REVOLUTIONS 45
CORRESPONDENCE 46
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 47
BOOKS, DRAMA, MUSIC:
  Poets. By Frances M. Frost 48
  So Did King Canute. By Henry Hazlitt 48
  Human Predestination. By H. S. Jennings 49
  Petticoat War. By Cuthbert Wright 50
  A Pepys in Wall Street. By Benjamin Stolberg 50
  A Strange Career. By William MacDonald 51
  Books in Brief 51
  Drama: A Tirade Against Tabloids. By Heywood Broun 53
  Music: Whither Tonality? By Arthur Mendel 54
  Architecture: The Bright Lights. By Douglas Haskell 55

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN FREDA KIRCHWEY
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN ARTHUR WARNER
DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

CONGRESS REASSEMBLES with a busy eight weeks ahead. On the first day the Senate, without a record vote, amended the House resolution appropriating $45,000,000 for drought relief by adding $15,000,000 specifically to make loans for food, its action being hastened by the reports of "dire need" in Arkansas. The Senate also adopted a resolution introduced by Senator Hiram Johnson calling on the State Department to produce all official documents bearing on relations with Nicaragua since 1924, while Senator King introduced a resolution demanding the withdrawal of the marines from that unhappy country. Senator Walsh of Montana filed motions to recall and reconsider the nominations of George Otis Smith, Claude L. Draper, and Marcel Garsaud as federal power commissioners, attacking sharply their action in dismissing Solicitor Russell and Chief Accountant King, whom he characterized as "two loyal and faithful servants of the public." As certificates of confirmation have been sent to the White House and the commissioners have been sworn in, it is reported that the Administration is prepared to challenge the Senate's constitutional right to withdraw confirmation. Altogether, there seems to be promise of a lively eight weeks on Capitol Hill. One cannot envy the sensitive Mr. Hoover, who faces not only all these difficulties, but the dread specter of an extra session to boot.

THE SPECTACLE of 500 farmers, nearly all of them whites and many of them armed, swarming into a little Arkansas town and demanding food for themselves and their starving wives and children ought to arrest Mr. Hoover's attention. These Arkansas farmers, it appears, have been hard hit by the drought, and so general is the distress that the Red Cross, which is already feeding or otherwise aiding some 100,000 people in the State, expects to have 250,000 on its hands before the winter is over. In order to obtain relief, however, it has been necessary for the sufferer to fill out a questionnaire, and in the county in which the demonstration we have referred to occurred the supply of blanks had been allowed to run out! The embattled farmers, of course, or some of them, got what they demanded—the local merchants hastily decided to see to that—and the Red Cross, presumably, will pay the bill, but a loudly touted relief system which allows hundreds of men and women in a recognized and easily accessible area to approach starvation because of red tape is pretty urgently in need of reformation. Mr. Hoover is a stout champion of the committee system in relief work. He might do well, in view of the work which has been undertaken by the Red Cross in the drought area, to examine the Red Cross machinery for more loose screws.

WILLIAM STARR MYERS, of Princeton University, is the latest critic to demand a curb on the Senate. According to press reports, Professor Myers is so dissatisfied with its handling of foreign affairs that he calls for a constitutional amendment reducing its powers to the same limits as those of the House. Would Professor Myers really favor leaving the management of our foreign relations to the uncontrolled discretion of the President and the Department of State? What all the critics of Senatorial delays and general Congressional ineptitude have in the back of their mind is the supposed benefits of a benevolent dictatorship exercised by a wise and good executive. They want Congress to go home and let a noble President rule us—that is, in the actual situation, to let business have its way. With the House reduced to a rubber stamp for the Administration machine, the Senate has become our sole remaining bulwark against executive blundering and unwisdom. Intelligent and fearless criticism in the Senate has been the brightest feature of American government during the past decade. The lessons of history are learned slowly, even by historians.

PEACE WAS THE THEME of the New Year's Day utterances of President von Hindenburg of Germany and Premier Mussolini of Italy. Each stressed the need for peace and for international cooperation, and each asked that the world have confidence in his country's pacific intentions. Yet there was a distinct difference in the flavor of the two appeals. Mussolini's plea was that of a spokesman for a country that has been spending upon armaments sums so large as to threaten it with national bankruptcy. Italy's preparations for war must be fully considered in weighing the sincerity of its spokesman's appeal for peace. President von Hindenburg's address was more of a warning than an appeal. He demanded directly and by inference that Europe show its confidence in Germany by disarming as Germany is disarmed, by restoring the Saar basin, and by permitting the terms of the Young Plan to be carried out in such a way as not to endanger the economic or social structure of Germany. He declared that this was due Germany as a matter of justice, and implied that forces beyond the control of the Berlin government might gravely imperil European peace unless this justice were done. Mussolini has it within his power to keep the peace, but Germany, disarmed and still for the most part desirous of maintaining friendly relations with everyone, must depend upon the rest of Europe not only for a tangible display of confidence and good-will but for an opportunity to develop normally and soundly.

THE FORMIDABLE STRIKE in the Welsh coal mines and the threatened strike in the Lancashire cotton mills come as rude reminders of the precarious state of two important British industries. In its effort to bolster the decrepit coal-mining business, the Coal Mines Act of August 1, 1930, inaugurated the questionable experiment of combining unprofitable mines with profitable ones, with the hope on the part of the government that some 200,000 men in the unprofitable mines would be kept at work. The act also reduced the miners' working day from eight to seven and one-half hours, but with a "spread-over" provision by which the seven-and-one-half-hour day might be changed to an eight-hour day for five days and a five-hour day on Saturday. This latter arrangement, which is favored by the operators, has been rejected by the miners, who have also refused to accept any reduction in wages, and some 150,000 men have joined the ranks of the unemployed. The threatened strike in the Lancashire district is due to the efforts of the cotton-mill operators to reduce production costs by requiring a weaver to tend more looms. Both coal and cotton have suffered severely from foreign competition, and the Coal Mines Act and the "more-looms-per-weaver" policy represent attempts to "rationalize" the industries and put them on a more efficient basis. The cotton-mill situation presents another of the technological problems which industry has repeatedly to face. The outlook for the coal mines is clouded by the fact that many mines can now be worked only at a loss, and ought to be closed.

A SITUATION that might quickly become a serious menace to German stability has developed in the Ruhr district as a result of the outlaw strike of miners. The workers have quit the pits, not at the command of the union leaders, but at the behest of Communist agitators. Early hopes expressed by government officials and employers that the strike would peter out within a few days have not been realized. Instead, the miners are quitting work in increasing numbers. There have been numerous demonstrations, followed by several bloody clashes in which two miners have been killed and many others injured. The most alarming aspect of the situation is the failure of the trade unions to keep their members in line, these members apparently being more eager to listen to the promises of the Communists. This is due perhaps to the compromising position in which the German Socialists, whose chief strength is based upon the trade unions, find themselves. Instead of playing the part of an active political opposition, in which role they could be of definite assistance to the workers of the country, the Socialists have been compelled by circumstances tacitly to support the Brüning Government. But the mine workers appear unwilling to accept anything less than an active defense of their interests. The Socialists cannot or will not supply this defense. Hence the attractiveness of the Communists' promises of direct action. The latter obviously hope to capture the leadership of the laboring classes by this means, thereby acquiring a fresh starting-point for another revolutionary attempt in Germany. Meanwhile the mine owners appear determined to make the situation even worse by carrying through their plans for a lockout of 300,000 men on January 15.

CENTRAL AMERICA IS STIRRING AGAIN, much to the discomfiture of the State Department in Washington. The recent restlessness in the Isthmian countries has led to a revival of Congressional criticism of the Central American policy of the government. It has, moreover, put a new strain on the State Department's already overworked recognition policy. The latest disturbing event is the revolution in Panama. An early morning surprise attack on the presidential palace and the Panama City police station (Panama has no army) brought victory to the revolutionists, who appeared to have been inspired primarily by their political opposition to President Arosemana. What role, if any, the government's financial policy, which was some time ago criticized in a report by the National City Company, played in the revolution has not been determined. Parts of the report have been suppressed by the government. After order was restored, Don Ricardo J. Alfaro, Panamanian minister in Washington, was called to the presidency. Meanwhile Mr. Stimson is once more confronted with the onerous task of having to decide whether or not to recognize a government that has come into power with the aid of a revolution. The Panama situation is complicated by the fact that the revolution was the direct result of the 1928 elections, which the opposition asked the United States to supervise. The United States refused, and the opposition has now seized power by violence. A further complicating factor is the Panama Canal and its relation to the national-defense policy of the United States. No government of Panama against which the slightest suggestion of unfriendliness to Washington may be ascribed can reasonably hope for recognition. Panama is, therefore, a special case; nevertheless, this newest crisis has served to reemphasize the need for a sound and intelligent recognition policy.

GENERAL MANUEL ORELLANA, who seized the presidency of Guatemala on December 17, has hastened to solve the dilemma in which his action placed the State Department in Washington. Secretary Stimson had just a few months previously recognized new governments in the Argentine, Bolivia, Brazil, and Peru that had come into power by similar means. He explained at the time that the United States was free to follow a policy of expediency in recognizing revolutionary governments, being morally obligated to withhold recognition of such governments only in the case of the five Central American states. Hard upon the heels of this declaration came Orellana's coup d'etat. Mr. Stimson could not very well show himself less friendly to this revolutionary regime than he did toward the similarly constituted governments of South America, yet his emphasis on the obligations of the United States under the Central American treaty of 1923 made it quite inconvenient for the State Department to accommodate Orellana. Mr. Stimson decided therefore to withhold recognition, and the acting Guatemalan President, being apprised of Washington's predicament, promptly responded by resigning his office. Thus the State Department has been relieved of what promised to be an embarrassing dilemma. The moral seems to be that South American states may decide for themselves what sort of governments they will have, but the Central American countries must in this respect please Washington first.

EIGHT MORE MARINES have been killed in Nicaragua. The battle on December 31 near Ocotal (scene of the outrageous massacre of more than 400 Nicaraguans on July 16, 1927) also cost the lives of 11 more natives. Thus the Stimson peace of Tipitapa continues to bear tragic fruit. In all some 800 to 1,000 Nicaraguans and upwards of 40 American marines have died in the fighting that has followed Mr. Stimson's threat of May, 1927, forcibly to disarm all Nicaraguans who dared violate the Tipitapa agreement by refusing to surrender their rifles. Just what is the purpose of Washington in keeping the marines in Nicaragua? Just what important section of the country's foreign or national-defense policy is being furthered by this senseless slaughter of American youths and Central American peasants? Certainly the bankers cannot be entirely to blame. They have displayed unusual prudence with regard to Nicaragua these last three years. Nor can it be said that the clash at Ocotal had anything to do with American supervision of elections. No elections were being supervised in Nueva Segovia on December 31, and no elections are scheduled for that province for many months to come. The need for maintaining marines in northern Nicaragua as a guaranty of peace and order may be questioned at many points. The senseless slaughter cannot be excused on the ground that the marines are needed to help create a native national guard or must be kept in Nicaragua to guard the wholly hypothetical route of a canal that the United States may build some fifty or one hundred years hence. How does Secretary Stimson justify their presence?

THE ENGINEERING BOARD of the St. Lawrence Power Commission has proposed a plan for the construction of a great power plant at Massena Point, New York, to cost $171,547,000. It recommends construction in two steps, ultimately developing 2,200,000 horse-power at a cost of about $78 per horse-power. The commission, it will be recalled, is to recommend a plan for the development of St. Lawrence power by the State in accordance with the progressive policies urged by Alfred E. Smith and Governor Roosevelt, and the engineering report represents only the first technical step. The entire country will watch with interest for the announcement of the full plan in order to learn just how far the commission ventures to go not only toward development but toward the transmission of power by the proposed State agency. If the State actually controls transmission, and if the municipalities by additional legislation are authorized to go into local distribution if they so desire, then New York may conceivably get effective control of power rates. It is a safe guess that the bitterness of power-company opposition will be directly in proportion to the probable effectiveness of such control.

A YOUNG ITALIAN named Cero Gangi, unable to speak English, was walking a street in Boston on June 11, 1927, with his employer, Samuel Gallo. A shot was fired and a man in front of them was killed. Gangi ran, was caught, and was accused of committing the murder. Gallo sent a lawyer to defend him, and Gangi, trusting his employer, kept silent. But he was convicted of murder, although there was no motive and nobody had seen him fire the shot. Fortunately Gangi had a brother in New York City. He couldn't speak English, either, but he went to Boston and did more than the police or prosecuting officials had done. He learned that the man shot had been accompanied by a girl who had formerly lived with Gallo. She said Gallo had done the shooting. A reprieve was granted to Gangi just four hours before the time set for his execution. Subsequently Gallo was convicted of the murder, and Gangi was finally freed after three and a half years in prison. The American League to Abolish Capital Punishment has just issued the story of Cero Gangi in a pamphlet which makes an effective object lesson in the ways of justice in this country, and one of the good arguments—there are many others—for the speedy and complete abolition of capital punishment.

THE PUBLIC-RELATIONS COUNSEL of the Catholic church has been working overtime. Thus we see a very long, front-page story of what will be contained in the encyclical that Pope Pius will issue shortly. This is a serious story and declares that the church, in view of the laxity of morals now alleged to be current, is to reiterate its ancient, uncompromising stand on marriage, divorce, birth control, mixed marriages, and the religious education of children. When it refuses to permit its religious principles to be modified by the current mores, the church is admirable. A rock should stand; and the church, in its best moments, is a rock. Less serious are the other news stories emanating from Vatican City. One is that the Pope is presently to be the owner of the smallest railroad in the world, 600 feet long, so the story goes, with a magnificent station in it 180 feet long. This leaves, according to our best Einsteinian calculations, 420 feet of road, or about the distance from Fourteenth to Sixteenth Street, to be divided between the other station and the roadbed proper. The road leads from the Papal palaces and St. Peter's out into the world, and the Pope is to have his own private car in which he will be whirled along, foot after foot. Finally, the Vatican State is to have power of coining money. The silver coins are to be imprinted with the images of the Virgin, St. Michael, St. Peter, St. Paul, and the Pope himself. The gold coins are to be even more impressive. They are to have, in addition to a bust of the Pope, the figure of Christ holding a scepter and a globe. A handsome coin, by all accounts. But somehow it reminds us of the money changers who were driven out of the temple. Evidently that particular quarrel has been patched up.

Toward a New Party

FOR a generation there has been in the United States no political opposition worthy the name, and the thing goes from bad to worse. The Republican Party as a national organization has for decades been the obsequious servant of the great moneyed interests of the country. It represents adequately, if not too intelligently, that immense body of Americans who believe that the country is best served if governed by its great business men, and who therefore favor leaving both economic and political control in their hands. Though we do not share this belief, we hold it desirable to have one great conservative party embodying the idea, and to have all the men who accept it belong to that party. The rest of us belong elsewhere. The Republican Party could do no greater service to clear political thinking than to put out that body of progressive dissenters who in greater or less degree reject that doctrine. Of course it will not put them out, because votes count. Dissenters are on the whole more useful inside the party than outside.

Democratic opposition to Republican big-business conservatism has collapsed completely. Historically it has represented during recent decades the small-scale capitalism of the farmer and the little business man. As big business waxed, Democratic opposition waned, and in recent years party leaders have been at special pains to convince the dominant business leaders that Democrats are no less tender of big-business susceptibilities than Republicans. When Al Smith committed the party to protection, the last abject surrender was made.

In practical politics there remain, as a possible opposition, the progressive or insurgent members of both parties, notably the Republican Senators. They too represent a decadent capitalism—the farmers, the small manufacturers, the retailers beset by chain-store and mail-order competition. They come from the unlamented ex-Senator Grundy's "backward States," the States untouched by large-scale industry. From Dolliver to Norris they have obstructed and annoyed the ruling Republican overlords, fighting courageously a series of more or less isolated battles. An opposition group with a philosophy, a program, and an effective organization they have never become, and the abortive attempts at revolt in 1912 and 1924 only emphasized the basic weakness of their position. They have fought a splendid battle against the oncoming forces of big business, but they have lost because there lay back of their fight no adequate economic and political philosophy.

Today repeats the story of yesterday. The Progressives are doing some splendid fighting in good causes, in which they will continue to command our hearty support. But when all is said and done, their work remains, as Professor Dewey rightly pointed out, guerrilla warfare. It is not constructive political opposition. They remain Republicans, only a little less so. The political leadership which, as we pointed out last week, the country has a right to expect of them involves a basic change of ideas of which they have given no evidence. We clearly recognize the difficulties confronting them, and give them full credit for the highest motives. Nevertheless, in tying themselves to the old organization they cut themselves off from the new movement and indicate that they do not belong in it.

There has been just one consistent and intellectually respectable political opposition group in the United States during the twentieth century. The Socialist Party has had a philosophy, a program, and an organization. It did not hesitate in 1917 to court temporary extinction in defense of its principles, but it is again actively at work. It suffers as a vote-getting organization from its name, its foreign origin, its war record, admirable as that was, and from other handicaps that are likely, in our judgment, to prevent it from growing directly into the powerful party that the time demands; but certainly no small part of its program will have to be taken over by any party that is worth its salt, and any intelligent new movement will necessarily seek its friendly cooperation in the difficult task of political education that lies ahead.

What, then, if any, is the hope of a new alignment, one that will bring back reality into political contests? What are the "grass roots" from which any such movement must grow? What are the constitutional and other obstacles that stand in the way of creating such a party? These are important questions, to which we shall attempt to make some answer in our two next succeeding issues. Here we can only say that the hollow pretense of our present political life need not continue indefinitely. The relentless march of industrial growth is making it clear to increasing millions of men that their economic stake is a stake as workers and not primarily as owners. Here is a basis for real modern politics.

The American Federation of Labor, as it is at present organized, stands in bourbon opposition to labor politics, and it assumes to speak for all labor. The Gompers-Green machine has got to be smashed to bits and the labor movement has got to be freed from its outworn and deadening ideas if there is to be such a party as we have suggested. The opponents of the machine have their work cut out for them if organized labor is to play its necessary part in the new movement. But beyond organized labor there are other classes. There are millions of non-union workers. There are farmers who want to make a living by their work on the land, and who can no longer hope to grow rich by the increase of land values. Among the unorganized classes are many groups of white-collar workers and of professional people already thoroughly disgusted with existing parties. They will never find a congenial home in organizations whose primary concern is the preservation and enhancement of property rights for the benefit of the few. It is to a party representing the needs and ideas of such groups as those above suggested that we look as the only means of accomplishing by peaceful methods the great changes that are necessary in our economic and social order. If there is to be a new party it must be one that means business, that proposes to build, not to tinker. It will not come into existence overnight, and it cannot be built in a day, but the need for it was never more apparent than now.

Another Railway Plan

It is by no means certain that the announcement by Mr. Hoover, on December 30, of a tentative plan of railway consolidation for Eastern trunk-line territory holds the promise of an early settlement of the long controversy over the consolidation of all the railways of the country. The details of the plan are not fully known, and after they are known the Interstate Commerce Commission will have to pass upon them. All that Mr. Hoover was able to say was that representatives of the New York Central, Pennsylvania, Baltimore and Ohio, and Nickel Plate had agreed upon a plan for the consolidation of the railways in what is known as official-classification territory, except New England, and that the four systems proposed embraced the territory east of the Mississippi and included the Virginian Railway on the south and the New York Central on the north. The presidents of the four roads, in informing the commission on January 2 of the general nature of the plan, mentioned a number of short lines, whose control has been debated, upon whose allocation the presidents had agreed, and it has also been announced that the question of traffic rights for the Pennsylvania over the Nickel Plate into Buffalo, a concession to which the New York Central has hitherto strongly objected, would be submitted to arbitration.

The agreement cuts athwart so much of the so-called final plan of consolidation promulgated by the commission in 1929 as provides for a fifth Eastern trunk line to include both the Wabash and the Seaboard Air Line, and the commission, if it approves the plan, will apparently have either to drop its fifth system or modify it materially, and at the same time will be obliged to withdraw certain orders which it has aimed at alleged violations of the anti-trust laws. The Pennsylvania, which owns the Wabash, and the Baltimore and Ohio, which owns the Western Maryland (a road which, with the Pittsburgh and West Virginia, and Wheeling and Lake Erie, forms a line from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic), have been ordered to divest themselves of those properties. These controversies will have to be adjusted, and the proposed allocation of the Virginian, the Norfolk and Western (controlled by the Pennsylvania), the Chicago and Alton (recently purchased by the Baltimore and Ohio), and other lines will have to be reconsidered.

On its face, the agreement has the appearance of a step in advance. Unfortunately for Mr. Hoover, however, in his effort to help answer one question he has contrived to raise others that seem likely to plague him. Senator Couzens of Michigan, chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, who is exerting himself to secure early passage by the House of a resolution, which has already been passed by the Senate, postponing consolidation until the subject can be further inquired into, promptly charged that the issuance of Mr. Hoover's statement was "most unethical," and expressed doubt whether the commission could be expected to exercise an independent judgment with the President enthusiastically supporting the proposed plan. Senator McKellar of Tennessee has also had some sharp things to say against Mr. Hoover for "prejudging" a matter of which the commission was as yet uninformed. The criticisms would have been more to the point, perhaps, as far as public effect goes, if the commission had not allowed eight years to elapse after the publication of its tentative consolidation plan in 1921 before it completed the final plan made public in December, 1929, and if the record of the subject since 1923 had not been a dreary story of fruitless conferences of railway officials, opposition by the commission to consolidations which the railways favored, and, in general, an official attitude which suggested indifference when it did not intimate hostility. Yet Mr. Hoover should have known that the commission, even if dilatory, is not likely to have its temper improved by an executive pronouncement which practically takes one of the most important parts of the consolidation program out of its hands and confronts it with a preliminary agreement which the President, with much earnestness and evident satisfaction, publicly approves.

If at this point Mr. Hoover has, to put it mildly, been maladroit, he is entirely unconvincing when he presents the agreement to the country as "a contribution to the recovery of business by enlarging opportunity for employment." The only benefit to employment, apparently, will come through electrification or other improvements, the development of terminals, or the construction of a small amount of trackage, and at none of these points can the benefit be immediate. Most consolidations, moreover, turn out in the end to have diminished rather than increased employment, and reports of Senator Couzens's interviews with President Daniel Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio make it reasonably certain that the railway personnel, while perhaps protected against immediate reduction by discharge, would eventually be much reduced. On the whole, it is to be feared that Mr. Hoover, instead of aiding business recovery, has only confused still further a situation already difficult and disappointing.

Honesty Is Not Enough

Why has the Senate never seen fit to make better use, in the interest of more efficient government, of its privilege and its duty of controlling Presidential appointments? The Senate itself is best qualified to say why it has not done so. Our concern is with the fact that this action has resulted in the filling of many important and influential government offices with incompetent persons, misfits of various descriptions, all for the sake, not of good government, but of political patronage. Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution states specifically that Presidential appointments shall be made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." There is no implication here that the Senate is required to confirm any and all White House appointees, whether or not fit for the offices to which they have been appointed, unless some scandal or other can be traced to them which would make it politically unwise to confirm the appointments. Yet this is exactly the course the Senate has been and still is following. It seems to care not one whit whether the man nominated by the White House is qualified for the job; if it can find no dirt in his past record with which to besmear him, it feels obligated to confirm his nomination.

There is a striking recent example of this benevolent but detrimental attitude in the Senate's confirmation of the five Power Commission appointees. Referring to Frank

PUBLIC LIB.

McNinch, whose nomination should certainly never have been confirmed, the Baltimore Sun on December 19 asked: "What, one may be disposed to inquire, does Mr. McNinch have by the way of technical qualifications to handle the extremely complicated job he will face as a member of the Federal Power Commission? Alas, the answer is that the committee failed to go into that matter. It was so much consumed by interest in Mr. McNinch's political and religious qualifications that the qualifications peculiar to the job went largely by default." The Senate as a whole gave the same answer in approving the nomination of Mr. McNinch and his four colleagues. Nowhere on the record is to be found any suggestion that the qualifications of these men had been established. It was to be expected that the regular Republicans would vote to confirm the five nominations, but that the Progressives should have joined in this blind expression of love for the patronage privileges of the White House is saddening and discouraging. True enough, they broke forth in aggrieved indignation when three of the new power commissioners summarily dismissed Charles F. Russell and William V. King from the employ of the commission, but the Progressives who voted for the commissioners took to weeping rather belatedly.

Laymen among the liberals of the country had their hopes raised when the Senate sought to inquire into Charles Evans Hughes's qualifications to sit on the Supreme Court. There was in this gesture an indication that the Senate had at long last decided to exercise its constitutional prerogative and insist upon stricter control of Presidential appointments in behalf of the public interest. The hope went still higher when Judge Parker was rejected, even though it was fear of the Negro and labor vote rather than any conscientious examination into Judge Parker's qualifications that brought about rejection. In the present session of Congress, however, the new-found hope has been smashed to bits upon the hard reality of political patronage, Senatorial courtesy, and Progressive inertia.

The Senate still has before it an excellent opportunity to redeem itself. Among other nominations awaiting confirmation are those of six men to the new Tariff Commission and that of Eugene Meyer, Jr., to be governor of the Federal Reserve Board. Here are several government offices of vital importance to the nation. The tariff commissioners can, for example, restore some semblance of sanity and economic sense to the administration of the tariff, or they can, on the other hand, make that administration more ridiculous and unsound than it is today. It lies wholly with the new commissioners as to whether some of the glaring deficiencies of the latest tariff law are to be corrected. Similarly the Federal Reserve Board's influence over the financial machinery of the country is a matter of utmost concern to the public, particularly at this time of financial depression. All of these positions require men not only of unimpeachable integrity, but with an intelligent understanding of the public interest involved in the questions they must decide; the jobs need men who are not only honest, but thoroughly competent. Certainly we do not want the Senate to confirm Presidential appointees as to whose integrity or character there may be any question, but before all else we do insist that even honest men must be proved competent to hold the jobs to which they are nominated before the Senate consents to their appointment.

Papa Joffre

JOFFRE is dead, and oceans of war-time sentiment have been set to moving again. The fact is, and the French today recognize it, that Joffre was not a very great general, but he became the symbol of a great battle. What Joffre did at the Marne seems to have been largely accidental; but he was the commander-in-chief of the French armies, and he became the symbol of French tenacity, the man who stopped the Germans.

In a very real way Joffre was a fitting symbol of French tenacity. He was "Papa" Joffre to his soldiers, a fat, comfortable human being, no martinet, with a sublime and sometimes unreasonable faith in France. He was, to be sure, capable of ferocious jealousy of aspiring subordinates; he also had the capacity to inspire intense loyalty among his immediate inferiors. It may be true that he took amazingly long siestas when his troops were giving up their lives; at least he had none of the stiff-backed qualities which made other commanders loathsome to the privates.

Controversy will probably rage about the details of the battle of the Marne as long as there are antiquarians with zeal to study battles. Certain facts remain: Joffre had for three years before the war been in supreme command of the French forces, and he was responsible for their course at the outbreak of the war. They concentrated, though most of us have forgotten it, upon a silly little invasion of southern Alsace. When the Germans poured into northern France, the poilus who should have been on guard there were proudly capturing Mülheim. Joffre was devoted to "Plan XVII," and Plan XVII was an almost fatal mistake.

Nor does it even appear that Joffre had any immediate responsibility for the events which turned the tide on the Marne. When he first woke from his interest in Alsace he made a vain attempt to turn the German flank. The failure of that effort seems to have made him unduly cautious. He ordered his troops to retire farther than they did retire; it was Gallieni, who had suggested Joffre for the high command but later became his bitterest enemy, who discovered the weakness in Kluck's flank, demanded permission to attack, and finally started his troops against the Germans before he had Joffre's final slow permission.

But, after thirteen days of steady retreat, the French armies, which Joffre did command, did counter-attack and they forced the enemy back of the Marne and held them there. Joffre held the line, and the war-time propaganda built the battle of the Marne into an even greater victory than it was, and Joffre into a greater hero. A time came when a more vigorous leader, more apt for the offensive, was required; and Joffre was gently eased upstairs. His mission to the United States, on which he behaved with fitting kindly dignity while others did the negotiating, was a kind of balm for removal from army headquarters.

In the later years Joffre, comfortably spending his vacations houseboating on the canals and rivers of southern France, was an ideal war hero. The fierce personal animosities of Foch and Clemenceau did not beat about his head; he ate well and slept long, as every French peasant aspires to do, and the rest of France loved him for it.

California's Sun God

By DUNCAN AIKMAN

Los Angeles, January 2

A NEW sun will rise in California on January 6. It will be distinguished from other solar bodies in that gold-drenched land by a rosy portliness flavored with the more expensive barber-shop lotions. Its illuminations will often suggest the glamor, the professional geniality, and the circus monkeyshines of modern royalty. But royalty's offensive quality of pomp will be buried under endearingly democratic mannerisms suggesting an Exalted Ruler of the Elks. The new orb's name will be James Rolph, Jr., but all California will call it Jimmy. Its title will be governor.

There is, one recognizes, a certain metaphorical recklessness about comparing any American State governor to sunlight. But Jimmy Rolph, gubernatorially speaking, promises to be uniquely luminous. It is not only that, judging by his nineteen years' reign as mayor of San Francisco, he radiates rather than governs. He sheds also many of the beneficial effects of solar radiation—cheerfulness, good-will, the sense that the world is full of gay and decent fellows regardless of minor differences of customs and opinion, the energy to live merrily in one's own way and the tolerance to let others do likewise. The fat Ariel of Pacific Coast politics belongs, diagnostically, among the creatures of light.

Solar bodies, to be sure, have their limitations as public officials. With all their admirable qualities, they are essentially unmoral and unintellectual. They are shamelessly content to let the power trust supply light for the philosopher's studies, and they shine platitudinously upon both the just and the unjust. In their light a man may do murder, grow prunes, falsely imprison his fellows, or, worst of all, press wine grapes. Suns merely shine on, satisfied to hearten each for the business in hand.

Thus Jimmy Rolph's harsher critics—thousands of whom voted for him in last summer's primary and last fall's election—have sometimes accused him of possessing all the virtues except brains and moral courage. But there are times in a sovereign State's history when it can use the remaining virtues to its profit. California, whose vote in 1930 abundantly testified that it wanted Jimmy Rolph for a sunbeam, has chosen to experiment in this possibility.

The desirability of the Rolph qualities to California appears most clearly in contrast with the prejudices and rancors in the State's political background. For a variety of reasons, ever since the irruption of Senator Hiram Johnson into prominence more than twenty years ago, the public consciousness has seethed with an unusual number of phobias and punitive hatreds. Johnson himself, though unquestionably one of the ablest and most useful governors in the history of any American State, necessarily fought his fight against corporate privilege and the domination of the Southern Pacific in State affairs with bitter and bruising weapons. Many of the enmities inspired by his battles still smolder.

In the meantime, new contentions have been added. These are not necessarily peculiar to California but sharper in their manifestations than in most States. Owing to the ceaseless exploitation by ultra-conservative leaders and labor-baiting zanies generally of the bombing of the Los Angeles Times building in 1910 and the San Francisco Preparedness Day outrage, the State has enjoyed for more than half a generation an acute phobia with regard to all radical activities. The hundreds of thousands of expatriate Main-Streeters rushing into Los Angeles and its suburbs from the Midwest pietistic belts, hating the urban conditions which their mere swarming has created, have sought to fix the mores of the new metropolis, and to some extent of the State, in the forms of their rustic prejudices. They have brought about, so far as Southern California is concerned, a situation where sadistically drastic prohibition laws have been enforced in a city of 1,300,000 people by volunteer key-hole snooping, where a "reform" administration under an ex-Klansman mayor is conducted by espionage on the private lives of city employees, and where the strongest recognizable political force on the horizon is exercised by the back-fence gossip that is broadcast tri-weekly from the radio station of the Reverend Robert P. (Bob) Shuler. Naturally, these elements have inspired in liberal San Francisco and among their own opponents in Southern California something of the hostility which they themselves feel for all forms of liberalism.

Inevitably, governors and gubernatorial candidates have reflected these widespread antipathies. The Johnson battles were won with bludgeoning attacks and bitter phrases rather than with amiability, and when Johnson departed for the Senate in 1917, his hand-picked successor, Stephens, largely carried on the tradition that Californians who disagreed were natural enemies. In 1922 the anti-Johnson forces won the governorship with Friend W. Richardson, who with the savage mustaches, mannerisms, and something of the appearance of an irate bull walrus did everything in his power to establish a reputation as America's outstanding amateur fascist. Richardson was never happier than when praising the American "idealism" of the Klan-ridden ex-Iowans in Los Angeles, denouncing any defense of the constitutional rights of unpopular minorities as "truckling to the reds," and refusing to consider the pardon applications of Mooney and Billings on the ground that when criminals were found "guilty as hell" by the courts of California, that settled it.

In 1926 Clement Calhoun Young, a somewhat milder specimen of the Johnson progressivism, came into office. But Young attempted to fuse the contentious elements—to which was shortly added the Hoover-Johnson feud in Republican politics—by the one impossible solvent, slyness. With the professionally benign smile of a canary-swallowing cat, Young sought for four years to be for both Hoover and Johnson and, after giving ostensible consideration to the Mooney and Billings applications, finally passed the buck of this passion-stirring issue to the archdukes of tory timidity on the State Supreme Court. Thus, the Young slyness, while it aroused a good deal of personal detestation for a personally mild and otherwise fairly efficient governor, failed in its aim of inducing the contentious California factions to tolerate each other. Its outstanding result was to create among the shrewder voters of all shades of opinion just enough suspicion of Young as the trimmer who knew better, to sweep the renomination away from him in the August primaries. With him went down to defeat the amazing Buron R. Fitts, district attorney of Los Angeles—flag-waving Legionnaire candidate of the snooping fascism of the Shulerites on the one hand and on the other of the Harry Chandler–Los Angeles Times lodge of labor-baiters. While Governor Young, sweating terror over the liabilities of the Mooney case, dashed up and down the stairs of the State building in San Francisco making sure that the Supreme Court was still holding that sack of potential embarrassments, and while Fitts bragged expansively to women's clubs and church bodies of the thousands of years of prison terms his office had obtained for prohibition violators, "Sunny Jim" Rolph milked cows, kissed babies, rode white stallions in civic parades, rigidly deleted all forms of crusading sourness from his genial campaign platitudes, and captured a comfortable plurality in a three-cornered primary.

It is hardly a famous victory, but it has certain advantages. Crusading, a genuine, almost an epic activity of California leaders in the Johnson days, has degenerated into racketeering in the cheaper mob prejudices. If Fitts had won, it would have been a symbol that California regards "crusading" against reds, against Italian wine-makers, and against petty business men entrapped by their stenographers [illegible] its highest manifestation of Christian statesmanship. If Young had won, it would have signified that it regards as the acme of astuteness an executive who, in his abject terror of racketeering crusaders, dared not make his own decision on the Mooney case lest the Fitts-Richardson combination assail any show of reasonableness as "truckling to the reds." Rolph, unless his whole record belies him, will give the State a respite from this form of political agitation. Also, if his urbane silence in the face of campaign charges that he was a wet Beelzebub is a criterion, he will give opposing crusaders no undue advantages. Though this may be regrettable from the standpoint of various California abuses which still need to be crusaded against, it may also prove the surest means of restoring crusading to a respectable status.

All this is consistent, however, with the strong probability that there is not the slightest intellectual consciousness in "Sunny Jim" either of determination not to crusade or of any resentment against crusaders. In fact, in these large matters of method and policy, the Governor-elect functions hardly at all from the intellect but almost wholly from the center which he refers to in his campaign speeches as "the heart." Emotionally and psychically he has a "complex" against crusaders because they intrude disagreements and censorious viewpoints into a society which could be perfectly happy agreeing on fundamentals, sinking its minor differences, and letting its members seek pleasure and profit each in his own way in the perfect California climate.

For the essence of the Rolph political method is to promote the warm atmosphere of harmony and tolerance. Thus during his campaign last summer not a word escaped him of criticism of his opponents or their "issues." Thus his nineteen years as mayor have been a series of conciliatory and once or twice daringly friendly gestures. The hysteria of the Mooney-Billings trials and the period following the Preparedness Day bomb explosion found him evasively genial, but at least he left to the Chamber of Commerce Law and Order Committee the work of arousing the community blood lusts. Prohibition found him indifferent, but he blandly refrained from racketeering in the prejudices of either the wet or the dry side, and, with complete control over his police department through his power of commission appointments, proceeded, as though absent-mindedly, to permit San Francisco to enjoy her traditional drinking liberties. Partly, perhaps, because of his personality, the era of religious hatreds engendered by the Klan largely passed San Francisco by. It was, incidentally, during the height of the Klan excitement that thousands of his Protestant supporters, seeing him march by in a Shrine convention parade, learned for the first time that Jimmy Rolph, intimate of Catholic prelates, was a non-Catholic; though this might have been suspected from the fact that previously the unusual tribute had been paid him of election to honorary membership in a Jewish synagogue.

In strictly executive achievements the record has the same non-controversial flavor. The projects he has backed, notably municipal street-railway ownership and the development of Hetch Hetchy water and power, have usually developed signs of an overwhelming public popularity before his indorsements were forthcoming, and on the rare occasions when he has picked a loser he distinctly has gone down to no fighter's defeat. Mainly, when controversies have been unavoidable, he has left the business of agitation to his board of supervisors—county and city government in San Francisco are one—and retired into his normal role of a genial friend to all mankind who reigns without governing.

The Rolph principle of action, in short, is not so much to agree with his adversaries as to have no adversaries at all. Thus his exploit in receiving Communist unemployment-day demonstrators last March while police from New York to Los Angeles were clubbing them is to be regarded not entirely as a subtly planned means of compelling national attention and hardly at all as a venture in conscious liberalism, but simply as Jimmy Rolph's way of trying to find a basis of friendship with Communists. "Sunny Jim's" impulse to "get along" with all men, including despised minorities, had simply won another victory.

Under the circumstances, California must expect from him radiation rather than leadership. Though he can hardly sympathize with the Hoover prohibition views or the Hoover impulses toward the administrative guidance of social progress, no politician is less likely to lead a revolt against the Great Engineer in the Presidential home State. Conversely, if revolt should be successfully staged by an alliance of the Johnson faction with the wets and the disgruntled grape-growers, no politician would be less likely to die heroically in the Hoover trenches.

There is not at present, either, the slightest ground for expecting that he will encourage a reopening of the Mooney-Billings case. In the face of the Supreme Court's recent nominal settlement of this issue it would, indeed, take a governor of memorable courage and battle lust to do this, and courage is not Jimmy Rolph's long suit. Stalling off controversies is. No doubt on his genial side Rolph would be happier than any other governor since the explosion if he could obtain a popular mandate or a Supreme Court decision which would permit him to assert the innocence of both celebrated prisoners. He would be pleased, perhaps, if, apart from the question of their guilt, the whole State could be persuaded that their release was desirable as a good-will prescription. But with the ultra-conservative element rejoicing in the Supreme Court's stand and the charges of the Los Angeles Times that the whole pardon movement has been a money racket aiming at subornation of perjury, universal popularity for such a formula is not even remotely conceivable.

The best that can be logically expected of him is that he will avoid doing anything, in the Justice Preston–Los Angeles Times manner, to inflame the animosities of the Mooney case. For with all his deficiencies, Jimmy Rolph will not, in the traditional manner of California statesmen, persecute individuals, unpopular minorities, or despised opinions to win the votes of the prejudice blocs. He would rather dodge issues, conciliate antagonists, and gladhand his enemies. Shining from the new eminence in Sacramento with the combined glow of his pink-fat baldness, his silver mustaches, his fresh gardenia, and his immaculately polished boots, giving a royal show by his incessant progress through civic parades, fair openings, and cornerstone layings, he would rather shed a cheerful light than slay dragons.

In Jimmy Rolph, however, this preference is saved from utter inanity by the quality of emotional sincerity. Those who know him best realize that, though his amiability has been employed politically, he would be the same chronic baby-kisser, the same delighted and habitual parader, the [illegible] would-be intimate personal friend of the entire California electorate if he were a Trappist father, a certified public accountant, or a laboratory chemist. This gregarious yearning toward the affections of all mankind, this chronic gladhanding may not, in ordinary circumstances, furnish an adequate technique for statesmanship. But California, where twenty years of cheap crusading has added materially to the population of local hallucinatory monsters, can [illegible] these peculiar qualities to ease down her phobias.

On the German Front

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Berlin, December 17

"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"—but not in Berlin. Nobody had ever heard of Erich Maria Remarque until his book appeared and sold to the extent of one million copies in Germany alone. Now the German government, plus one Dr. Goebbels, National Socialist, has added enormously to his fame by forbidding the movie version of the book—and thereby has antagonized every liberal and every liberal element in Germany. Indeed, so disheartening is the action of Brüning and Herr Curtius that there are those who fear that the date of the beginning of the collapse of the German democracy will be December 11, 1930, and that the fate of this Republic will always be linked with the banning of a single film.

For, say what you please, the forbidding of "All Quiet on the Western Front" has been a surrender to the mob. It is notice that if organizations or parties do not like a certain play or production they need only demonstrate sufficiently to have their will. I am well aware of the government's defense, for I listened for three-quarters of an hour to a very high official trying to convince the foreign-press correspondents of the justice of his position. He was very glib—almost eloquent. He showed at once the complete ease and self-possession of the trained lawyer and he pleaded his case with near-eloquence and obvious sincerity. Yet I do not believe that he convinced a single listener or that any foreigner left the room with his opinion that the government has yielded to the Hitler gang being changed one iota. Indeed, privately I am told by officials that that is really the case; that the Prussian police could have insisted successfully that the performance go on in Berlin, but that in Hamburg, Hanover, Leipzig, and many other cities this would have been impossible.

It certainly cannot be denied that the outpouring of men at the Nollendorf Platz Theater was as menacing as it was impressive. Americans must not forget that Germany today is a series of armed camps. There are nearly a million uniformed and well-organized men in the Stahlhelm, the militaristic veterans' organization; there are about three and one-half millions in the Reichsbanner, the republican organization of war veterans and young men who consider themselves the special guard of the Republic. There are at least 500,000 brown-shirted Hitlerite Hakenkreuzler, 300,000 in the secret Communist "Red Front" organizations, and fully 700,000 in the loyal "Young German Order" and similar associations. Not a day goes by but some of the men in these organizations are killed or wounded, not a day on which some of their meetings are not broken up by force. Force is the order of the day. For example, the Reichsbanner, with whose aims all republican readers of The Nation would surely sympathize, has openly declared within the last week that from now on it is going to take the aggressive. Thus, in Magdeburg, where Hitler is scheduled to speak soon, its leaders have served notice that they will do a little interfering with free speech and free assembly themselves. They have served notice on the "Nazis" that Hitler will be permitted to speak only if 300 seats in his meeting are given to the Reichsbanner and if one of its speakers shall have the right to orate for one hour in reply to Hitler! The head of the police has called the leaders on both sides into consultation and it is now expected that he will forbid both the Hitler meeting and the one planned by the Reichsbanner for the same evening, on the ground that they both menace the public order.* So far has the anxiety of the Berlin police gone that all outdoor public assemblies, all demonstrations, all marching in column formation has been forbidden. Not even the unemployed are permitted to march to the city hall to protest against their plight.

Germany is seething politically—there can be no question of that. Two nights ago there were four simultaneous Reichsbanner meetings to protest against the banning of the Remarque film. The one that I attended was crowded to the doors, with a fine orderly crowd of working people and small shopkeepers; a prince of ancient lineage sat upon the stage in the Reichsbanner uniform. Long before eight o'clock the police barred entrance into both halls because they were dangerously crowded. The Hitler meetings are jammed similarly and would be, I think, even if there were no orders issued to the faithful to attend. On the streets outside of these meetings, even in the center of the city with large numbers of police in readiness, there are frequently dangerous affrays. Tomorrow night the former executive officer of the cruiser Emden, Kapitän-Leutnant von Mücke, one of the most gallant figures of the World War, is going to start to denounce Hitler, his associates, and all his works, of which he, von Mücke, was formerly a distinguished part—concerning which he now proposes to turn state's evidence. No more lurid posters were ever displayed than those announcing this meeting, for they declare that von Mücke will "tear off the mask" and reveal that many of Hitler's immediate supporters are "thieves, liars, falsifiers, and men guilty of crimes against morality." It is generally expected that this will be a battle royal—I profoundly regret that a previous engagement in Munich will prevent my attending this delightful party.

---

* The Hitler meeting was duly forbidden.—EDITOR THE NATION.

PUBLIC LIB.

Meanwhile, all of this is very hard upon the nerves of the government and of the "Schupos" or police. Night after night in every city these men have to do extra and hazardous duty—a police colonel was murdered in Hamburg two weeks ago. They are nice-looking men, spotlessly uniformed and extremely well equipped. I watched them handling the huge and really menacing Hitler demonstrations—undoubtedly staged as a test of the efficiency of the Berlin Hitler shock troops—and admired their self-restraint. When it comes, however, to sailing into a mob with their hard-rubber clubs, they are accused of brutality and lack of discrimination; but one of the highest officials in the land declared to me that the police have orders to be savage when the order to disperse a crowd comes and that no other policy will make possible the maintenance of order or keep the Republic safe.

The Republic does rest today upon the force of the police and it is admitted that the Minister of the Interior, Herr Severing, has them well in hand and that they are zealously loyal. Whenever a higher police officer shows the slightest sign of friendliness to the "Nazis," he is rigidly dealt with. None the less, the Communists complain that the "Schupos" refuse them aid when they are attacked or raided by the Hitlerites, while the latter also violently denounce Herr Severing and his "police-hounds." The "Schupos" are certainly not the least bit weak in dealing with the Communists, who appear today much less aggressive than the other groups. I have also been to some of their meetings only to be shocked by the signs of want, fatigue, and hunger, the poor clothes, the utterly pallid faces, the plain evidences of a desperate struggle for life, with much resultant premature aging.

Yes, Berlin seethes. The Germans, unlike our own people, talk and think in political terms—largely driven to it by the all-prevailing anxiety, the fear as to the future, the terrible unemployment; by the hope that somewhere they will hear a word of cheer and encouragement. "Hugenberg is our only hope," writes to me the wife of a distinguished university professor. There are multitudes who find in Hitler, or Goebbels, his aggressive Berlin lieutenant, or Otto Braun, or Severing their only hope. For Germany is discouraged, downhearted, dispirited this Christmas. There is a good fighting spirit still in many quarters, but the prevailing unemployment alone is enough to discourage a people, for it is not only among the unskilled or the skilled factory laborers. Suicides of destitute men of education and talent who have no hope of a job are frequent; in every class of life the emergency exists. I heard yesterday of a young diplomat dropped merely for reasons of economy. Although much influence has been exercised in his behalf, he is without work. Nobody knows what to do with the multitudes who are graduating from the universities as doctors and lawyers. The Berlin chamber of lawyers (which corresponds roughly to our bar associations) came very near passing a resolution forbidding the admission to practice of any more lawyers!

All the more reason why the government must not yield to any such threats as those which caused the banning of "All Quiet on the Western Front." The official defender to whom I listened gave us, of course, to understand that there was no yielding; that he had seen the film—he himself spent four years at the front—and that it was so one-sided and failed so completely to bring out the heroic side of war and of the German soldier in war that it was quite impossible. It was, however, all his own reaction to the film; what he liked and disliked. Not a word did he say about the deep underlying principles involved; nothing about the freedom of the stage and of opinion. He was sorry, of course, that it had been necessary to overrule the Oberprüfungsstelle, the competent body of censors which originally passed the movie.

He was particularly anxious that the government's point of view should be spread abroad, and that it should be made clear that the government's action had been started before the Hitler disorders began; as to them he snapped his fingers. It is carefully explained also that the federal government has no control over the Oberprüfungsstelle and cannot act until after it does; but the government could easily have prevailed upon the producers not to show the film at all, even if it had to offer some compensation. There are but few signs here, unfortunately, that Germans in authority have a better understanding than heretofore of foreign mentalities. Apparently this official did not realize that this film had already been shown in the United States, England, France, and elsewhere in the world, and that no sane person, except supersensitive German Hitlerites or militarists, or persons with wrecked nerves, could possibly see in this picture anything derogatory to the German soldier or the German nation whether at peace or at war. It was a magnificent opportunity which the government lost, not only not to yield to the demagogues but to increase respect for itself at home and abroad and to let people see for themselves how false were the assertions of Goebbels and the whole Hitler crew. But the thing has been done; the government is completely compromised. The Social Democrats, the backbone of the government's support in the Reichstag, are rising in protest, and Goebbels has made good his boast of two days before the banning, that "Hitler is at the gates of Berlin."

Meanwhile, Brüning has come comfortably through the Reichstag's second session with increased majorities, thanks in considerable degree to the agreement not to debate upon the Polish situation and other aspects of foreign affairs. As to both the latter, there must be a day of reckoning, and it is now confidently believed that Curtius will go and that there will be a new minister of foreign affairs by the middle of February—probably Brüning himself. The feeling of outrage toward Poland steadily increases. Even the Reichsbanner leaders are beginning to demand the release of the Polish corridor, and the government naturally seeks to cut the ground from under the feet of the "Nazis" by becoming more vigorous in defense of oppressed German minorities. It remains a government of compromises, fighting against time in the forlorn hope that in the spring there will be greater industrial employment—as if that could come in any great degree without a general improvement all over the world. The politicians who are pessimists still look for a collapse in the spring; some say frankly they don't care what happens: "Europe is lost anyway."

Somehow, I cannot share their feeling. Europe has, it is true, never been in as bad a way since the war as it is now because of the war-creating, hate-creating Treaty of Versailles, because of the reparations and debts, the high-tariff walls, the world-wide industrial chaos and depression. But to anyone who saw Germany as I did during the civil war of February and March, 1919, during the invasion of the Ruhr and the inflation period, it is not easy to prophesy any general collapse either of Germany or all Europe. They suffer and work and get by somehow. But he would be a fool indeed who denied that wherever one scans the horizon the outlook is of the darkest.

High Science at Washington

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 3

IT is very appropriate, remarks one New York editor, that the announcement of the proposed consolidation of Eastern railroads should have come from the White House, anointed with Mr. Hoover's blessing. It is, indeed. Only a President who is a comparative stranger to the Constitution and laws of the United States could have perpetrated such an incredible howler. In pronouncing the President's action "unethical and indiscreet" Senator Couzens has put the matter mildly. It was a glaring impropriety, as the briefest glance will disclose. The proposed plan must be approved or rejected by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That body possesses no powers not delegated to it by Congress. It is a quasi-judicial agency and is expected to arrive at its judgments independently. Yet here it is confronted with one of the most far-reaching cases it will ever be required to decide, and here is the President publicly stating, in effect, how he would like to see it decided. The situation would not be so very different if the President had issued a public statement suggesting that he would like to see the Supreme Court decide a pending case in a certain way. The main difference would lie in the fact that while Interstate Commerce commissioners and Supreme Court justices are alike in owing their appointments to the President, the justices are secure for life but the commissioners may depend upon the President's good-will for reappointment. It has been suggested that Mr. Hoover's action in this matter was a deliberate attempt to usurp legislative and judicial powers which do not belong to him. Being more charitable, I am inclined to think it was a plain blunder, arising from his peculiar lack of information concerning the structure of the federal government and the powers and duties of his office. As to the merits of the proposed consolidation, this writer is not qualified to express an opinion, but certain circumstances seem significant. President Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio—one of the main systems involved in the plan—has stated that 80 per cent of the savings expected to accrue from it would "come out of labor." In order to approve it, the commission will have to reverse itself, since it previously recommended a fundamentally different plan. Joseph B. Eastman, ablest and best-informed member of the commission, has stated that little or no sentiment for such a consolidation can be found among shippers and railroad-operating officials, which tends to confirm Senator Couzens's charge that the moving impulse back of the plan is a concern for the financial position of some of the roads rather than any consideration of operating efficiency or public interest. It is perfectly obvious that the consolidation should not be effected until it has been thoroughly scrutinized by Congress. The Van Sweringens and their financial adviser, Joseph R. Nutt, have contributed large sums to the Republican Party since 1928. Nutt is treasurer of the Republican National Committee. Senator Couzens is not alone in wishing to know whether those circumstances had any connection with President Hoover's extraordinary course. Such an investigation is hardly possible unless there is an extra session of Congress, and Mr. Hoover, who desires above all things to avoid an extra session, has characteristically contrived to increase the demand for one.

* * * * *

THAT demand is likely to be further increased during the next few days. Among the factors contributing heavily to it is the neat coup just executed by the power trust in a bold eleventh-hour attempt to wreck the Norris plan for government manufacture and distribution of electricity from Muscle Shoals. Although apparently licked by the outcome of the last election, it was to be expected that the power companies would not surrender without staging a final trick or two. The trick in this instance consists in a proposal to strike from the bill the provision for building transmission lines out of revenue derived from the sale of power. This would mean that unless Congress subsequently appropriated money for the construction of these lines, or unless the municipalities seeking to purchase the power built them, the privilege of transmitting and selling the power would be given to a private company. The first alternative would be very difficult and the second would be impossible. The actual result would simply be the perpetuation of the situation which exists now: to wit, one in which the government manufactures power and sells it at a very low rate to the Alabama Power Company, which transmits and retails it at enormous profit. And, of course, the resultant extortionate rates to the public would immediately be cited to show the "inefficiency" or "failure" of government operation! Senator Ellison Smith of South Carolina, heretofore one of the most militant champions of the Norris plan, has mysteriously been won over to this transparent scheme, but thus far it is blocked by the resolute stand of Senators McNary and Norris. The latter declares that rather than submit to such a hold-up he will do his best to block all action until the next Congress meets. This would have the double tendency of delaying a final settlement of the problem and of hastening the meeting of the next Congress. That an extra session is urgently required is quite plain. Chiefly because of its long occupation with the tariff bill Congress is approximately two years behind in its work. A dozen matters of the first magnitude clamor for action. For Congress to throw down its tools on March 4 and retire from the scene merely because a few gentlemen believe the stock market would improve would be a cowardly and ignominious betrayal of its responsibility. But Democrats will be found joining hands with Old Guard Republicans in the effort to consummate just such a betrayal. The hope of the public lies, as usual, in the progressive and independent members of both parties.

* * * * *

SO much has been written already about the exposure of Robert H. Lucas's underhanded effort to defeat Senator Norris in the last election, and about Lucas's subsequent effort to read Norris out of the Republican Party, that the subject tends toward staleness, but it may be possible here to shed additional light on certain aspects. In the first place, it is perhaps not generally realized that the conspiracy to "get Norris" was launched nearly a year ago—long before the savory Mr. Lucas resigned his office as Commissioner of Internal Revenue (in which capacity he handled some $2,500,000,000 a year of public money) to become executive director of the Republican National Committee at the urgent personal insistence of President Hoover. Collaborating in the early stages of that delectable enterprise were certain power magnates and certain public officials whose relations with the White House were especially intimate. Thus we find William Murray, an employee of the National Committee, conferring in Omaha with Walter Head, chairman of the board of the Nebraska Power Company, on ways and means of getting rid of Nebraska's Republican senior Senator, and subsequently we find Murray transmitting his detailed report to Representative Franklin Fort, bosom friend and all-round handyman for Mr. Hoover. There are indications, moreover, that the campaign of extermination was planned to include Senator McMaster of South Dakota, Senator Schall of Minnesota, and Senator Borah of Idaho, three Republicans whose progressiveness was only less obnoxious to the Administration than Norris's. McMaster actually was defeated and Schall barely scraped through. It will be seen therefore that Lucas inherited a dirty piece of business, and merely carried it on. By this I do not mean to suggest that it was repugnant to him. On the contrary, if one were looking around for someone to perform such a job one would naturally turn to a "muscle man" of the Kentucky Republican machine, that malodorous combination of bigotry and big business. Those who accompanied Al Smith to Louisville during the 1928 campaign and found themselves harried and harrassed on the streets by the police because they happened to be wearing badges which identified them as members of the Smith party can testify to the political ethics in vogue there. Lucas merely practiced in Nebraska the lessons learned in the Louisville school of politics. In the literature which he sent out to be used against Norris was a cartoon depicting a scene from "Ten Nights in a Barroom." The testimony shows it was regularly kept in stock at the plant of the Fellowship Forum, generally regarded as the national organ of the Ku Klux Klan, where Lucas secretly went to have his printing done. It was used in the campaign against Smith, and had been used in other campaigns. In short, it was a standard piece of Klan propaganda. In addition to sending 10.000 copies of it to Nebraska, Lucas sent 790,000 copies to Montana, Colorado, Kentucky, Ohio, West Virginia, and Delaware, but in these six States it was used against Democratic nominees for Congress. It is rather encouraging to note, incidentally, that all the Senatorial candidates against whom it was directed were elected. Nevertheless, the origin and history of the anti-Norris vendetta is ample to explain why Mr. Lucas has not been kicked incontinently out of his job. So long as he continues to "take the rap" like a little man he will be fairly safe.

* * * * *

THIS brief report on conditions under "the only party fit to govern" would be incomplete without some mention of the lofty activities of the Honorable Arthur M. Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States in the Cabinet of the Great Administrator. By ruling that the presence of corn sugar (dextrose) in prepared foods need no longer be declared on the label, the glorious Mr. Hyde has weakened if he has not substantially repealed an important section of the Pure Food Act. It is interesting to observe that his principal justification of this high-handed procedure is based on his desire to "aid agriculture"! It is still more interesting to learn that when this same subject was before the Senate Committee on Agriculture a year ago, Secretary Hyde said:

> Corn sugar and artichoke sugar are regarded by the department as wholesome food products. There is not only no objection by the department to their use as foods, but a sympathetic attitude exists toward their increased consumption. It is the belief of the department, however, that the proposed amendment is repugnant to the fundamental principles of food legislation. The Supreme Court has properly said that the purpose of the federal Food and Drug Act is "to enable the purchaser to buy food for what it really is." To permit the sale of corn sugar or artichoke sugar under the circumstances proposed by this bill would authorize the sale of such products as an ingredient of prepared foods where the purchaser would be definitely deceived and perhaps defrauded. Undoubtedly it would authorize the adulteration of cane syrup, maple syrup, and honey with corn sugar or corn syrup, without notice to the consumer.

Congress, partly influenced no doubt by this vigorous protest, failed to adopt the amendment. Just one year later Secretary Hyde himself puts it into effect through an administrative ruling, over the strenuous objection of virtually all the experts qualified to judge the effects, including those in his own department! It is a fair epitome of administration as practiced under the Only Scientific Mind to Occupy the White House Since the Age of Science Came to Flower.

The Moscow Trial

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, December 9

THE chief purpose of the state prosecutor in a higher Soviet court is not to convict the defendants. Nikolai Krylenko, the Russian Attorney General, did not care much whether Professors Ramzin, Larichev, Kalinnikov, Fedotov, Charnovsky, Kuprianov, Ochkin, and Sitnin hung as the result of the striking trial which ended three days ago. He sought to prove that the defendants, acting under the inspiration and guidance of expropriated Russian industrialists now residing in Paris and of French agents operating in Moscow, organized an illegal party, colluded with another clandestine party—that of Kondratiev, Groman, and Yurovsky—engaged in sabotage and "wrecking" at home, served as spies for the French government, and laid plans, together with French and White Russian military, to invade the Soviet Union and overthrow the Bolshevik regime. In reality, Poincaré, Briand, the French General Staff, Sir Henri Deterding, and a group of dispossessed capitalists sat in the dock in the gorgeous Home of the Trade Unions, and not the eight academician-economists. Counter-revolution, both foreign and domestic, was on trial. The fate of Ramzin et al. was quite incidental. The G. P. U. has the authority to deal with such people summarily. It did not do so because the Soviet Government wished to prevent the fruition of its enemies' plans or desires by disclosing them, and to arouse the defensive enthusiasm of its supporters and the resentment of the indifferent by revealing the far-reaching, sinister, anti-revolutionary, anti-nationalist machinations of the conspirators. War and intervention stimulate terrible memories in Russia. The charge of preparing such catastrophes was hurled at Ramzin, who was but the proxy for Poincaré.

All the defendants confessed and, with a Dostoevskian passion for self-accusation, piled up mountains of evidence of their own guilt. The outside world, therefore, suspected a "frame-up." But the confession psychology of the Ramzin group is quite intelligible. When the G. P. U. arrested them, it had what it considered heavily incriminating proof of their espionage and "wrecking." If, like the honorable revolutionaries of pre-1917 days, they had refused to talk, they would have been shot. There was one chance of escape: to tell the whole story, unmask Moscow's enemies, and thus perhaps earn the Kremlin's clemency. Moreover, the facts revealed at the trial are too plausible—in cases, susceptible of demonstration—to be discounted. Inevitably, of course, "tortures" in the secret "dungeons" of the "Cheka" have been charged, but the supposed victims showed no signs of mistreatment.

The evidence deposed at the twelve-day trial is of far greater importance than people as yet realize. It will affect, and will be used to affect, both Soviet internal and foreign affairs. Several things are not open to dispute:

The defendants had established a secret political party which boasted a central committee and nuclei in almost every branch of industry. Its chief strength was in the State Planning Commission (Gosplan), the nervous system of Soviet economy. What was all this for? The membership was recruited almost entirely from middle-aged or old engineers whose sympathies, social tendencies, and politics were deeply, often violently anti-Soviet. Ramzin explained that he had received the Bolshevik Revolution with cold hostility, had refused to work with the Bolsheviks during the period of military communism, had adopted a policy of cooperation when NEP gave him the illusion of gradual evolution toward some acceptable form of capitalism, and had abandoned that policy for one of counter-revolutionary opposition in 1927 because the Communists embarked on a course which threatened to nullify NEP. The other defendants, and most engineers of the same type, had acted similarly.

Such membership, and indeed the very existence of the "Industrial Party," precluded any program other than the overthrow of the Soviet Government. The leaders realized, however, that Russian engineers are incapable of directing a popular movement, and that their purpose would appeal neither to the workers nor the peasant masses nor the vast loyal majority of civil servants. Thus, while the party could hope for some assistance from Kondratiev's Peasant Party, its chief sources of support lay abroad. The defendants and witnesses admitted this in court, and gave circumstantial accounts of their contacts with foreign enemies of bolshevism.

Without foreign money and a foreign army, the two thousand technical men whom Ramzin counted as his followers could not kill the Communist regime. They could, however, prepare for the blow from without by interfering with Soviet economic construction. The state prosecutor, of course, may have attempted to charge to the defendants mistakes arising out of bad Soviet methods and Communist "giddiness from success," yet the evidence of deliberate sabotage was overwhelming. Members of the "Industrial Party" constructed factories where no raw materials and railway facilities were available. These factories are known, and their defects are those described by the accused. They built plants to run on coal where there was no coal in the vicinity, but instead great exploitable deposits of peat. Their policy included the "freezing" of capital. The buildings erected under their supervision were excessively beautiful, the stories much higher than exacting Soviet hygienic regulations require, and therefore very costly. They worked against the Five-Year Plan not by insisting on slower tempos, but by being more papal than the Pope, by out-Heroding Herod, by planning for breakneck speeds in the hope that thereby the Bolsheviks would break their necks. Incidentally, American business men and specialists bear witness to deliberate and rather widespread sabotage in Soviet industry.

As a further preliminary to foreign intervention, the defendants engaged in espionage on behalf of France. They supplied information to the French General Staff through two Frenchmen in Moscow, Mr. K. and Mr. R. Mr. K., an attaché of the French embassy in Moscow, sat through almost the entire trial and apparently enjoyed the notoriety and the prospect of promotion for good services. In the middle of 1929, Ramzin declared on the witness stand, Mr. R. asked him for data on Soviet military aviation. Ramzin delivered the requested report within a few months. Ramzin, Larichev, and Ochkin saw Messrs. K. and R. several times with a view to passing information, accepting instructions, and receiving money, not so much in payment for spy work as for the "Industrial Party's" organizational expenses and to finance "wrecking" activities. Ramzin here reiterated that he kept none of the sums for himself. He handled about 350,000 rubles, Larichev nearly three times as much.

The concrete proofs of espionage were submitted to a session in camera from which correspondents and the general public were barred, but even without it there is no reason to doubt the affirmations of the defendants and corroborating witnesses, particularly since espionage fits well into the pattern.

Ramzin's, Larichev's, and Fedotov's association with émigré Russian capitalists is as undeniable as their sabotage and espionage. This was accepted even by an American long-distance diplomatic observer of Russia whom I met in Riga and who, like all United States officials on the Soviet periphery, enjoys the best "White" connections. But if you accept any one of the prosecution's theses, you cannot reject all the rest, for Ramzin would never have conferred with violent enemies of the Soviet regime like Riabushinsky and Dennisov unless he was actuated by anti-Bolshevik motives, and such contact with men who publicly advocate the invasion of Russia now, within the next few months, inevitably lends support to the Attorney General's contentions and the defendants' confessions regarding clandestine organizations and subversive activities.

Krylenko amused the big audience in court by reading verbatim the account in a Paris Russian monarchist daily of a banquet given this year in the French capital in honor of Suvorov, a Czarist general. The list of "those present" included several duchesses and dukes, prominent Russian millionaire "Whites," well-known Russian monarchists, the Orthodox Metropolitan Evlogi, and well-known generals of the French Staff, one of whom spoke. Toasts were pronounced for the early collapse of the Soviet state, which faith in God—and the aid of the French army, though this was not mentioned—would certainly achieve. Finally they sang "God Save the Czar," and everybody went home happy.

The Russian émigré colony in France has an eager supporter in Sir Henri Deterding, the heavy-liquid Napoleon. Krylenko introduced into the record two clippings from the Paris Russian newspaper Rebirth. One described a celebration of the tenth anniversary of a Russian high school in Paris. It was attended, among others, by General Miller, the chief of the anti-Bolshevik forces at Archangel during the civil war, General Suvorov, Metropolitan Evlogi, Princess Murat, and Countess Shuvalov. Sir Henri said: "The hope of a hasty liberation of Russia, now experiencing a national catastrophe, grows stronger every day. . . . The liberation of Russia may come sooner than we all expect; it may even come within a few months." This was on June 11, 1930. Four days later the same paper contained Deterding's reply to a group of Russian university students who had thanked him for his financial aid. "If you really want to express your gratitude to me," he wrote, "then I ask you to do the following: endeavor, in the new Russia which will arise within a few months, to be the best sons of your native land. . . ."

Now Deterding once made a similar prophecy. In January, 1926, he wrote to the London Morning Post predicting the fall of the Soviet Government before the end of the year. This was regarded as the irresponsible muttering of a frantic enemy. But it subsequently developed from a letter published in the Vossische Zeitung by the wife of General Max von Hoffmann of Brest-Litovsk fame a propos of the Berlin trial of the Georgian chervonetz forgers, and from a memorandum submitted by the counterfeiters themselves, that in 1926 Deterding several times conferred with General von Hoffmann in London, and together with Commander Locker-Lampson, M. P., discussed definite plans for raising an army to invade the Soviet Union. To Sir Henri's mind, apparently, plans laid by himself warrant a prophecy of achievement. His forecast in June, 1930, of a Soviet overthrow "within a few months" therefore tends to reinforce the defendants' statement that the Paris Russian industrialists in conjunction with the "Industrial Party," and, necessarily, with a foreign army or two, had planned intervention for 1930 or the spring of 1931.

To be sure, such indirect proof might be discarded by a court of law. That is immaterial. The Soviet court which tried Ramzin and his colleagues was a political tribunal directed against a conspiring antagonist. If the Soviet public accepted the proof, and if the proceedings indicated to the foreign plotters that Moscow knew their intentions, everything was accomplished thereby which the trial started out to accomplish.

Now as to the complicity of Poincaré, Briand, and the French General Staff. Technically this was the weakest part of the prosecution's case. The evidence on this point was hearsay: Nobel, Dennisov, Riabushinsky, and the other Paris exiles told Ramzin and Larichev that Poincaré and Briand had promised support, and that the French General Staff had organized a special commission for intervention under the chairmanship of General Janin, commander-in-chief of the Allied and Kolchak forces in Siberia in 1919. Of the French Staff, Ramzin and Larichev actually discussed intervention only with Colonel Joinville and Colonel Richard. They were accompanied on these occasions by General Lukonsky, Denikin's chief of staff, who was groomed to be the titular head of the invading armies. It was through these two colonels that their contacts were established with Messrs. K. and R. in Moscow. According to the defendants' testimony intervention was first scheduled for 1928, then postponed to the summer of 1930, and then again to 1931. Under French aegis, Polish and Rumanian armies would march into Russia; Finland would perhaps cooperate; the remnants of Wrangel's forces would be used. A military dictatorship would be used, a White terror inaugurated, and a government set up. The "Industrial Party" could not quite agree on the composition of their cabinet and drafted several alternative lists. Nor were they certain as to their political program. Some wanted a constitutional monarchy, some a bourgeois-democratic regime, some an "engineers' state."

Neither Ramzin nor any of his friends, however, ever spoke with Poincaré or Briand or any member of the French government. The dispossessed Russian émigrés may have lied when they boasted of their meetings with Poincaré and of his sympathy. The French colonels may have been interested in ordinary military intelligence and prepared to pay for it—they did—but their conversation about intervention was perhaps a device to fire the ambition and imagination of Ramzin, who without the political superstructure would have refused to engage in espionage, for he is not the usual type of spy. This, I say, is the counter-version.

Suppose, for a moment, that the German state prosecutor had tried, in 1913, to prove that Poincaré was preparing war against Germany and that the British and French General Staffs had a common plan for action. He would have failed. Could Poincaré be convicted in a law court today? I wonder. Yet most of the official archives have been opened: there are Black, Yellow, White, Green Books, and an increasing body of world public opinion regards Poincaré and France as the chief sinners in provoking the Armageddon of 1914-18. Similarly, it is difficult, if not impossible, definitely to demonstrate Poincaré's and Briand's guilt in the Ramzin affair. Obviously Poincaré is too wise to talk with Ramzin. For Ramzin may tell tales if he is caught.

The political background of the trial—French hostility for the Soviet Government—requires little elaboration. France is the Continental power. Only Russia can challenge her hegemony in Europe. The Bolsheviks are a permanent revolutionary and national threat to Poland and Rumania, the mainstays, weak though they may be, of French supremacy. The bogy of Soviet-German cooperation still obsesses Paris—and rightly. Russia is in a stronger moral position even than Germany to demand the revision of Versailles. Moreover, recent signs of a rapprochement between Moscow and Rome make the Quay d'Orsay panicky, for apart from the economic benefits which such an arrangement could, if fully exploited, yield to Italy—France's immediate enemy—it may mean much in the Balkans and Asia Minor.

France, since November, 1917, has not been interested in Russian territorial integrity or in the payment of debts by a strong Russia. France now has Poland, Rumania, and other vassal-allies as a counterpoise to Germany and no longer needs Russia, least of all an undependable Bolshevik Russia. To a France choking with gold, the little Moscow would pay cannot affect higher political considerations. The defendants in the Ramzin trial affirmed that they were prepared, since they had no other alternative, to grant territorial compensations to the nations whose aid would enable them to overthrow bolshevism. They would accede to Poland's demand for large slices of the Ukraine, Finland's for Karelia, and Rumania's for Bessarabia and Odessa. The partition or weakening of Russia must today occupy a prominent place in French policy.

Having made such a case against Ramzin and his seven collaborators and having condemned them to death, why were the sentences commuted? Does not this prove the whole performance a comedy? No, it just proves how little the world understands of Bolshevik psychology. If the G. P. U. had needed the lives of these eight men to convince the public at home and abroad that the trial was not staged, it would have shot them. They were spared for a simple reason: they are harmless and useful. First of all, they have revealed the operations of their own organization and assisted in its destruction. No one fears them. Only a pedant, said Krylenko, quoting Lenin at the trial, would demand capital punishment for men who have no popular support. But they have not told the whole tale. There are technical details of "wrecking" which they can still disclose. They will help to pull up the roots of their party. "When you have the key to a safe," one Russian said to me, "you do not throw it into the well." They will also enjoy considerable freedom to continue their scientific work. Soviet justice is somewhat strange to the bourgeois mind because it is actuated almost entirely by motives of expediency and pragmatism and not at all by motives of revenge.

We Met Mr. Hoover

By AMOS PINCHOT

ON the morning of June 4, 1930, I had a happy and unforgettable experience. As a member of a delegation representing a committee of misguided nobodies, made up mainly of bishops, bank presidents, manufacturers, and the like, I had the pleasure of sitting at the elbow of the President of the United States and hearing him cure bad times and unemployment in about thirty minutes.

It was an awfully hot day for June. But as we waited hour after hour (our appointment was for ten), while companies of high-school cadets, groups of teachers, and girls' clubs marched past us and disappeared on their way to shake the Great Engineer's hand in the inner office, the anteroom seemed cool and comfortable, even though slightly cluttered by Senators and Representatives waiting to talk with Mr. Hoover.

Our purpose, it must be confessed, was an embarrassing one. It was to urge upon the President, whose shoulders were already bowed with matters of far more concern, the need of providing some relief to that situation of business depression and unemployment into which, it will be remembered, the 1929 panic temporarily threw the country, despite all precautions taken by the Republican Administration. In short, it was our intention to urge Mr. Hoover to ask Congress to authorize a program of immediate expenditure on already authorized federal road construction, road surfacing and repair, and other public works which, we hoped, might be got under way before the cold weather set in.

About one o'clock, to our great delight, Mr. Akerson, the President's secretary, approached—he had told us twice during the morning that there must be some mistake, as he had no memorandum of our appointment, but we held our ground—and, with that affability for which he is justly famed, said that the President would see us, but warned us, first, that we must confine our interview, including the presentation and discussion of our plan, to ten or fifteen minutes; and, second, that on no account should we say anything to the reporters relating to the President's part in the interview, as Mr. Hoover was already doing so many things calculated to improve conditions, and working with so many helpful agencies, that any publicity as to his reactions to our particular plan would, at the moment, be exceedingly inadvisable.

We gladly accepted both conditions. Fifteen minutes would be ample for the discussion of so trivial a subject.

Also, we did not need to be told twice that, on any public question, it was essential to guard the President's opinions from the public ear. In a moment, with a final admonition of brevity, Mr. Akerson bowed us through the corridor, and we found ourselves in the presence of Herbert Hoover. Mindful of the Akersonian injunction, our chairman at once plunged into our plan, laying especial stress on our belief: first, that the revival of business depended partly at least on giving work to, and thereby putting money in the pockets of, the unemployed, to the end that they could not only live but buy things; and, second, that spending money on roads had the double advantage that it could proceed without the delay of elaborate reports and planning and that it would not merely increase employment and help business, but have some permanent value when done.

Mr. Hoover listened with the scant patience and restrained exasperation of a man who knew every angle of the situation far better than we who had presumed to advise him. Whereupon, he launched into a clear, forcible, and convincing speech, in which he proved to us that we were wrong on every point. Unemployment, he said, was being shamefully exaggerated. Its peak had been reached and passed. The tide had turned. The Census and Labor Department reports, and other information to which, as he reminded us, he had better access than we, would presently show that things were quite different from what we feared. Yes, we were now to drift peacefully, if slowly, back to good times. With calm confidence he spoke of the results that were being gained through the conference he had called of great business leaders and of their fine response to his appeal not to curtail the volume of their activities. He showed us, in authoritative style, that every agency of both the federal and State governments was working at top capacity to relieve the situation. "Gentlemen," he said, "you have come six weeks too late." Here the Great Engineer was right again. Our chairman for just about that time had been trying to get an appointment with him.

The Great Engineer then tore to pieces our suggestion of extensive work on the roads, with the remark that such a program would require more cement than all the factories of the country could furnish. This, though it surely must have been so, was, I confess, a little surprising, as our information was to the effect that the cement makers had just been importuning Congress for higher protection in the revenue bill, on the ground that American factories were standing idle.

I do not know how the rest of the committee felt about it. But they looked to me to be in a state only to be described as glad-eyed glee. For my part, I wanted to slap the Great Engineer on the back, and wake the echoes of the White House with a resounding cheer for the Hoover Administration. I had come to Washington under the dismal obsession that we were facing a grave disaster. I had imagined that business depression, unemployment, in short, black times with all the miseries that follow in its train, had settled down on our unfortunate people, only to be routed by firm and prompt action of the federal government. I was to leave, assured that my fears were groundless and that all was well with America.

Before packing my bag for Washington, I had noted that England in peace time, that is to say, in the fiscal year of 1921-22, had been able to raise £398,757,000 by taxation on incomes alone as a war measure in her drive against depression and want. That is well on toward $2,000,000,000, and it seemed to me that this country, with double England's wealth and population, could afford, when faced with similar dangers, to raise half or a quarter that sum for the same purposes. Such reflections, however, were now wholly inappropriate. Under Mr. Hoover, we had weathered the storm without resorting to so cruel an assault on the high brackets and the pockets of the mighty. Unluckily for England, she had had no Great Engineer.

Mr. Akerson appeared. In fact, he had appeared more than once during our interview to warn Mr. Hoover, with deprecatory gestures, that people were waiting with more momentous things to say. Nobody but the President and our chairman had spoken. Our rabbi, our Christian clergyman, our lawyer, the woman who had just made a survey of unemployment—all had something they had hoped to say. There was no need of it. It would have been silly, useless, discourteous even, to have added a word. Mr. Hoover, with characteristic efficiency, had disposed of unemployment. It was a wretched subject, anyhow. And the unemployed, I gathered, were far from good Republicans. We were bundled out of the White House into the sunlight of a world of things which we had just learned did not exist.

It was two o'clock of a warm June afternoon. Since then summer has passed; winter has arrived. The seasons have succeeded each other in their accustomed way. But, alas, something has gone wrong. Has the magic of the Great Engineer lost some of its power and cunning? Or are 5,000,000 men and women looking for work and shivering as they eat the bread of charity but another illusion of the untrained lay mind?

In the Driftway

NEXT to the President of the United States the Drifter has the most thankless job in the world. For no matter what he writes, no matter how he writes it, there is one thing certain: not more than two people can be counted upon, even tentatively, to like it. The Drifter, in this computation, works on the reckless theory that one reader in the world besides himself will find the subject in hand worth talking about. But there are times, of course, and they are numerous, when the Drifter himself must withhold his approval. And at such times, the strain put upon the reckless theory and the lone reader is almost more than they will bear even in the Drifter's conscience.

* * * * *

THE precarious plight of a columnist is summed up very neatly in two letters which arrived simultaneously and which happen to mention in diametrically opposite terms the same innocent bit of drifting—that bit in which the Drifter paid his respects to the Breton village of Locmariaquer. Letter Number 1 begins by praising the Drifter's account of his adventures with Hebrew. It continues as follows:

> It is a great improvement over Life on the Old Farm in Brittany and various other subjects which keep drifting into the magazine through that leak [!]—and you can tell the management so from this subscriber.

The second letter comes from another subscriber. Its first paragraph is given over to pleasant remarks about the magazine as a whole, and the Drifter quotes it in the hope that it will cheer up "the management." The next paragraph belongs to the Drifter and he will cherish it as only a Drifter can.

> In spite of the Engineer in the White House [the letter reads] I have faith that the country will hold together for three years more. Ergo my check, for which please enter my subscription to the last ably edited, critical journal in America.
>
> Will you please tell the Drifter that his recent article on Locmariaquer is the finest gem of The Nation's long year and altogether deserving of a Pulitzer prize. If the editor can balance the sustained criticism and the occasional pessimism of the magazine with happy turns of literature as that on Locmariaquer, The Nation will actually occasion a smile once in a while.

* * * * *

NOW it happens that the Drifter liked both columns. He thought his adventure into Hebrew was extremely funny. He thought his quieter adventure into the silences of Locmariaquer was quite as exciting if not so hilarious. He still thinks that there is room for both in a column which takes for its province the world and everything in it. And that remark leads into the real difficulties of a Drifter. He is limited by his liberties. His column has no fixed standards either as to subject matter or style. Instead, unarmed with any such defense as "I'm an editorial about unemployment; take it or leave it," the column must face the bristling standards of everyone who reads it. And those standards are doubly formidable because of another factor. The column, any column, is the type of writing which almost every literate person feels sure that he himself, given half a chance, could do better than anyone else, better, particularly, than the author of the column he has just finished reading. The Drifter has often felt that way himself—about other columns—but on the few occasions when he has put his feeling to the test he has failed miserably. And this has led him to comfort himself with the thought that although his efforts may be feeble, perhaps only 75 per cent of his readers could do as well.

* * * * *

NEVERTHELESS, he is willing to do better. And he would like very much to know what people think should leak into the Driftway. At least, he wishes that everyone who reads this little homily would write him a letter about it. The Drifter has already had a few opinions. One reader thinks the Drifter should contribute a bit of disinterested literary art to offset the principles and indignation that must needs surge through most of the columns of a liberal and intelligent magazine. Another thinks he should concern himself with the lighter news events of the day. The New Year cries for a symposium on these important questions, and the Drifter urges it strongly, because for him such a symposium would have two ulterior advantages. It would help to fill the column, of course. But it would also accomplish another worthy purpose. By printing three letters in one column the Drifter would increase his theoretical interested audience. Instead of two it would be five, including himself and that other theoretical reader. Which would not be so bad for THE DRIFTER

An Explanation

Loans and Revolutions

CERTAIN statements contained in the article Loans and Revolutions, by Drew Pearson, noted Washington correspondent and an authority on South American affairs, which appeared in the issue of The Nation for December 10, have been questioned by the banking houses directly concerned. In its desire to avoid giving currency to statements or assertions that might in any way be considered unfair or inaccurate, and to rectify any misstatements that it may inadvertently publish, The Nation investigated the complaints addressed to it and as a result of its inquiry placed its columns at the disposal of the bankers and Mr. Pearson in order that the points at issue might thereby be discussed and adjusted. The Nation believes that in the following letter from Mr. Pearson these points are explained and corrected.—EDITOR THE NATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have heard from Speyer and Company and Dillon, Read, and Company in regard to my article on Loans and Revolutions appearing in The Nation of December 10. In fairness to both of these houses I ask you to print this letter.

In regard to the Sao Paulo coffee realization loan I want to assure Speyer and Company that I had no intention of implying that bond buyers who purchased this issue were in any way more "gullible" than all of the rest of us who were caught in the recent and memorable financial brainstorm. But the word "gullible" as I used it created an association in my mind with the mood established by statements from the White House, from the Secretary of the Treasury, the National City Bank, et al., during the bubble days of two years ago. Certainly there was no intention to imply that anyone buying bonds from a house enjoying the high reputation of Speyer and Company must be gullible. On the contrary, those who took their chances with Speyer and Company were undoubtedly less gullible than the rank and file of us. The statement that 15 per cent of the Sao Paulo flotation was left in the hands of the bankers refers to the European issue, as I am informed that the American bankers promptly sold the entire American portion of the loan.

Dillon, Read, and Company have taken exception to my statement that their $23,000,000 loan to Bolivia "was earmarked for refunding of previous loans and for railroad construction; yet within the year $5,000,000 of it had gone for the purchase of munitions from Vickers, Ltd., with which to upset Frank B. Kellogg's peace negotiations between Paraguay and Bolivia." I am glad to make the correction that $5,000,000 of the loan was not for "purchase" but for the "payment" of munitions previously ordered from Vickers, Ltd., and referred to in the prospectus covering the loan. Dillon, Read, and Company also call my attention to the fact that of the $25,000,000 loan to the Central Railroad of Brazil, referred to in my article as the Sao Paulo Railway, only $8,000,000 was for the purpose of electrification; although from my article it might have been inferred that the entire sum was for electrification. It remains a fact, however, that although eight years have now passed, not one penny of even this $8,000,000 has been used for electrification, nor is there any concrete evidence as to what the balance has been spent on.

In reviewing certain aspects of Latin American financing, I was shocked by practices which to me seemed conducive to unsound and unfriendly relations between our country and our southern neighbors. In commenting thereon I used the word "collusion" as a dramatic term for focusing consideration. This was an unfortunate word and I am assured by Dillon, Read, and Company that their dealings with Brazil were in no respect collusive.

Washington, December 29 DREW PEARSON

Correspondence

Let Everybody Work

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Bees and birds and beavers solved the problem of employment before the advent of man. Their solution was simply to allow all to work without hindrance. Can the topsy-turvy madhouse sophistry of man find any fault with this? Apparently so. For man is out of work, starving amidst plenty, and not a soul in power or authority knows what to do about it.

Open your eyes, as if you lived in Mars or some other ultramundane sphere, and behold the plight of homo sapiens. Labor, operating on land, produces wealth or goods. Privilege, the parasite, appears, pretending through some legal legerdemain to own the land and actually confiscating the earnings of labor. However, labor continues to carry on until accelerating facility produces wealth in such superabundance that privilege doesn't know what to do with it and therefore says to labor: "Quit work. There is overproduction. Get off my land until I have disposed of the present stock of goods."

Thus enters unemployment. Labor stands idle and bewildered. If labor attempts to produce goods even for sustenance, privilege calls the police or the constable and, if necessary, the sheriff and the State militia and the United States Army. Men are idle because society forbids them to work. Nothing in human history stands out bolder than the fact that no man was ever out of work except when government made him so. Privilege, backed by government, has made work a misdemeanor.

Now, what do you propose to do about it? You propose, not to remove privilege, but to deal to labor a dole in lieu of the right to work, which has been bartered away to privilege; not to free labor but to continue petty and futile easements such as insurance, public work, or boiling water out of the ocean—the work finally being paid for by labor alone!

Verily, this is a crazy land flowing with milk and honey and silk and money and filled with soothsayers whose accepted lunacies surpass all the marvels of "Alice in Wonderland."

Minneapolis, December 20 WILLIAM SCOTT

The Norwegian Election

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your comment several weeks ago on the Norwegian election, you wrote as follows: "Norway is the latest of the European countries to swing to the right in the recent elections." But this statement is not quite correct. It is very unlikely that the right will replace the left when the new Storting meets.

The Labor Party (Arbeiderpartiet) obtained about seven thousand more votes than it did three years ago. Is that a "swing to the right"? The Labor Party is the largest party in Norway, having approximately 50,000 more voters than were obtained by the combination of the several parties of the right; and the Labor Party will have forty-seven representatives in the new Storting, while the next largest group will have only forty-four. Furthermore, last summer the national organization of clerks (in stores and offices) joined the National Federation of Labor, which virtually means the Labor Party.

It is true, nevertheless, that the Labor Party will have a dozen representatives less in the new Storting than it has in the present. But that is mainly due to the fact that three years ago the Labor Party got many more representatives than were warranted by the size of the Labor vote, which, in turn, was due to the split-up of the voting public between so many political parties—making a large number of the Labor representatives only minority representatives. As such, they succeeded beyond their wildest dreams. What they have lost this year is merely an unjust and unnatural advantage. This year, in a large number of districts, the several bourgeois parties joined hands around the same candidates with the negative issue of defeating Labor, thus capturing Labor's former minority candidates. That can hardly be called a "swing to the right." In fact, it appears that even now the Labor Party has more representatives than the actual size of the Labor vote warrants.

Moreover, this year's election was hotter than ever before. The conservatives in numerous shameful and degrading ways pictured to the voting population the coming of the Bolsheviks, the devil, and burning hell if the Labor Party succeeded in capturing the majority in the new Storting. That drew out a large number of bourgeois-minded citizens, who generally do not exercise their right of voting. Thus, it appears that more than 90 per cent of the citizens of age took part in the election. And the Moscow Communists lost half of their number (from 40,000 to 20,000—in round figures).

We can also say that those voting for Labor this year (in the face of all the lies and calumnies of the bourgeois leaders and papers) did so consciously and deliberately. That could not be said after the election three years ago. This conscious and deliberate flock will be mighty strong three years from now, when the voters will have become wearied by the conservatives' harpings on lies and misrepresentations. This year, also, the Labor leaders were forced more or less on the defensive (an uncomfortable position) because of the more openly stated revolutionary principles in their program.

Thus, all in all, instead of a loss the forces of the Labor Party have become materially strengthened and adjusted.

Columbus, Ohio, December 15 LYDER L. UNSTAD

Maternal Mortality

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You comment in your issue of December 24 on the shameful record of the United States in the matter of maternal mortality. It is shameful, to be sure. But comparing mortality statistics between countries is notoriously misleading. And in particular, the official figures about maternal mortality are quite incomplete and unreliable. France, for instance, in her official causes of death, gives a hundred or so from puerperal fever during a year, while Germany reports some 15,000. Now doctors agree that in truth there is no such difference, that perhaps the actual rate is lower in Germany.

Both for their accuracy and the early date from which they are available, mortality statistics for England and Wales are the best. Next come Denmark and the Scandinavian countries, then the German-speaking and the remaining English-speaking countries, such as the United States. Comparisons within this group can be made, at least since 1919. But to mention their figures in the same breath with those from other countries, as you have done, is to jump at conclusions. In making studies, the epidemiological service of the League of Nations Health Section observes this as a sort of rule.

Some of the rates quoted in your editorial are comparable, n any case those between the States in this country. However, if one could know complete figures for many of the ountries you mention, the relative standings would be altered.

Nevertheless, I do not wish to deny your main point. Our aternal mortality can and should be lowered.

Ann Arbor, December 24 CHARLES A. ORR

The Only Solution

To THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I fully agree with the splendid letter from Agnes H. Downing in your issue of December 10, particularly its ast paragraph. The six-hour day is the only logical remedy or unemployment. Then when machine production on the sixour basis tends to displace workers and the supply of workers ecomes greater than the demand, reduce the hours again.

Unemployment insurance, like the tariff, would be awkward and hard to regulate; it would be, after all, charity and miserable dole at best, and humiliating to boot. Speeding p public works as a relief is only temporary and inadequate.

Taft, Cal., December 14 M. B.

Contributors to This Issue

DUNCAN AIKMAN is the Pacific Coast correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

LOUIS FISCHER will shortly arrive in the United States for a lecture tour.

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

FRANCES M. FROST is a Vermont poet.

H. S. JENNINGS, professor of zoology at the Johns Hopkins University, is the author of "The Biological Basis of Human Nature."

CUTHBERT WRIGHT is the author of "The Story of the Catholic Church."

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a writer on economic and other subjects for current periodicals.

for unforgettable impressions VISIT SOVIET RUSSIA

WORLD'S ENIGMA! THE FIVE YEAR PLAN!

ndividually arranged tours or in small groups at as low as $255.—including eturn Steamship fare. Interesting itineraries. Frequent sailing dates.

Write for Booklet "N"

AMALGAMATED BANK TRAVEL DEPT.

11-15 Union Square, New York City

"A book of challenge to the world's intelligence." —Nicholas Murray Butler

THAT NEXT WAR?

Major K. A. Bratt

"A Swedish Staff officer, who spent his best years in the scientific study of war; who followed up his study by personal observation of warfare; and who therefore, in this volume brings a trained imagination to bear upon THAT NEXT WAR of which fools in all lands glibly prate—such is the author of this book."—Wickham Steed.

"We are rushing towards war with increasing acceleration, and nothing can stop us except ourselves. Meanwhile scattered voices cry into our closed ears, and one of the most poignant and importunate speaks in this book."—The Nation and Athenaeum.

"The interest of this book lies as much in an exceptionally acute analysis of post-war politics as in the consideration of future strategy."—Review of Reviews. $2.50.

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., 383 MADISON AVE., N. Y.

New Crowell Books

ANTHOLOGY of MODERN PHILOSOPHY By D. S. ROBINSON (University of Indiana)

Selections for beginners from the writings of the greatest philosophers from 1500 to 1900, with biographical sketches, diagrams and questions for discussion. $4.50

A MODERN INTRODUCTION to LOGIC By L. S. STEBBING (University of London)

"It appears to me to be easily the best book on Logic that has appeared in recent years."—F. C. Northrop, Yale University. $4.50

THE BASIS of BELIEF

By WILLIAM G. BALLANTINE

The art of research has far outrun popular understanding of the science. This book supplies an urgent need for a clear exposition of the few simple but profound principles that lie at the basis of all scientific reasoning. $2.00

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue New York.

Books, Drama, Music

Poets

By FRANCES M. FROST

Words beat in the brain
As the blood beats in the heart.
Wild as the summer rain,
Bright as the scarlet-tart
Tang of berries hung
On the downward branch, the words
Gather within the young
And flee from their breasts like birds.
But sounds upon the tongue
Are fewer with the old.
The berry-fire that stung
The heart is stamped by cold:
And knowing quiet things,
The old will seldom speak
Of a hawk dragging wings,
Of tears upon a cheek.

So Did King Canute

I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition. By Twelve Southerners. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THE twelve Southerners who contribute to this symposium figuratively take down their old muskets and intrench themselves along the Mason and Dixon line, ready to shoot on sight anything that looks like industry heading South. For they are convinced, in the words of John Crowe Ransom, that this industrialism is "a foreign invasion of Southern soil, which is capable of doing more devastation than was wrought when Sherman marched to the sea." It will be said by most readers that these men are fighting a pitiable rearguard action in what is already a lost cause. This is probably true; yet their pleas for that cause are eloquent and touching, and recall much that was gracious, and even precious, in the Southern ways and values that now seem forever doomed to defeat.

There is, it is true, much confusion in these voices. The clearest in many ways is that of Stark Young, who does not seem greatly interested in the issue of industrialism, but deplores mainly the decline in certain personal qualities among former Southern aristocrats, as reflected in their bland acceptance of Mr. Coolidge's crude manners, or in the willingness of Southern society women to indorse some face cream or mattress in exchange for money and publicity. Far from wishing any literal restoration of the old Southern life, however, Mr. Young wisely remarks: "Dead days are gone, and if by some chance they should return, we should find them intolerable." But Mr. Ransom, whose essay opens the book, is much more bellicose. Indeed, it is hard to tell from some of these essays whether the writers think the real issue is between Industrialism and Agrarianism or between the North and the South; and Mr. Ransom, for one, seems rather happy at the prospect that the industrial invasion "will offer the chance to revive ancient and almost forgotten animosities." He is not only against Industrialism; he is against all technological discoveries, against the ideal of Progress itself. Progress seems to him terrifying, for it "never defines its ultimate objective, but thrusts its victims at once into an infinite series." It also threatens us with "deracination." I am at some loss to understand, however, why Mr. Ransom, except for the accident of birth, should regard the old South as the ideal example of resistance to industrial progress. There are better examples in India and China (at least up to a few years ago) and still better examples among the Australian black-fellows. For if Mr. Ransom's fears of Progress had always prevailed we should still be in the savage state—assuming that we had at least accepted such technological advances as flint and the spearhead. Mr. Ransom may reply that he is merely proposing to dig in and stop progressing now, which, we may be confident, was precisely the position of the conservatives among our paleolithic ancestors.

It is obvious that this book is, in the main, the rationalization of a nostalgia for ancestral ways rather than a rational approach to real problems. On the one hand, the contributors see the old South, and farming and farm labor, through a sentimental haze. Reading them, one would almost think the old South had been the scene of a perfect flowering of art and music and beautiful letters. Reading them, one almost forgets that such culture as the old South had rested on slavery, that it was confined to a small privileged upper class, relieved of the more menial duties. All these writers see in farm work a mystical and ennobling satisfaction; and the reader almost forgets that the "genuine humanism . . . rooted in the agrarian life of the older South" was not that of the man who picked the cotton, but that of the man who owned the plantation. Occasionally, it is true, slavery is mentioned and even defended, as by Mr. Ransom, who, after conceding that "slavery was a feature monstrous enough in theory," calmly repeats the smug fiction that it was, "more often than not, humane in practice." So great are the mystical values of working on the farm, again, that these contributors would apparently have their fellow-regionalists go in for farming even though they cannot make a decent living out of it. This seems to be most clearly stated by Lyle H. Lanier: "The objection may be made that already there is overproduction of agricultural commodities; the answer is that agriculture is more than a process of 'production.'"

Industrialism, on the other hand, is seen by these literary agrarians only in its worst aspects; the term, indeed, is so extended that it usually seems to mean everything objectionable that goes on up North. The fallacy into which most of them fall is that of identifying "industrialism" with the exclusive pursuit of material wealth. One contributor, indeed (again Mr. Lanier), defines the word as meaning precisely this: "By 'industrialism' is meant not the machine and industrial technology as such, but the domination of the economic, political, and social order by the notion that the greater part of a nation's energies should be directed toward an endless process of increasing the production and consumption of goods." Such a definition, to my mind, can only result in hopeless confusion. Sheer acquisitiveness can appear as frequently under a dominantly agrarian economy as under a dominantly industrial one. If by fiat we declare that "industrialism" must mean acquisitiveness, then we must find another word to denote "the machine and industrial technology as such."

In so far as the attitude of these contributors rests on a logical and not on a sentimental basis, it is on such basic confusions as these that most of them founder. Nearly all of them regard Industrialism and Agrarianism as essentially antagonistic, whereas it should be obvious that they are merely complementary. Any farmer who raises more than the needs of his own table does so in the expectation that he will sell the surplus to a non-farming population in exchange largely for manufactured goods—for clothes, furniture, books, and—dare one mention them?—automobiles. The present group of writers, instead of denouncing the North, should be thankful to it, for it was because the North was so largely industrial that the South could long afford to remain so largely agrarian. Even to be an efficient agriculturalist, the farmer must buy industrial implements; for the irony is that only as agriculture is more "mechanized" will it be able to hold its own against industry.

The values of industrialism, it is true, are not precisely the values of agrarianism. But industrialism has its own values, and complete failure to recognize them can only make such protests as "I'll Take My Stand" worse than ineffective. If, like Mr. Ransom, this group can only remark with bitter irony that "factories henceforth are to be counted on as among the charming features of Southern landscape," as if factories were necessarily ugly, then they will not care whether their factories are designed by first-rate modern architects (like Gropius and Mies van der Rohe in Germany) or by botchers, with the result that they will probably be designed by the latter.

In short, the real objection to the ideals of these typewriter agrarians is not that these ideals are quixotic or visionary, but that they are stupid. Our aim must be to humanize industry, not to exterminate it. One might even take the liberty of suggesting to this group some points of a practicable program:

1. They can at least try to prevent the further artificial stimulation of industry, at the necessary expense of agriculture, supplied by our preposterous tariff.

2. To assure agricultural survival, they can aim to disseminate instruction in more intelligent farming methods.

3. They can agitate for progressive labor legislation, involving health, hours, minimum wages, unemployment insurance and prohibition of child labor. Such legislation would probably reduce the rate of growth of industrialism in the South, but the kind of industrialism that finally appeared would be on a much higher level.

4. They can eliminate many "factory-town" evils by working for strict housing legislation, model-housing schemes, city planning that would minimize congestion, provide maximum light and air, establish parks and playgrounds, insure the largest number of trees and the smallest number of advertising signboards. In brief, they could aim to "gardenize" their towns and cities and make them fit for humane living.

A program like this might be difficult to realize, but at least it would bear more fruits than nostalgic sighs for days that are lost forever. And not such very fine days at that.

HENRY HAZLITT

Human Predestination

Crime and Destiny. By Johannes Lange. Translated from the German by Charlotte Haldane. Charles Boni. 50 cents.

IS the criminal predestined to be such by his innate constitution? Or is it misfortune or the faulty organization of society that drives him to crime?

For judging such questions of human fate, the existence of duplicate individuals offers incomparable advantages. Identical twins are such duplicates. They are at first a single individual. This early divides into two, each retaining the original constitution. How far will these two samples of the same personality have the same career and fate? If one is a criminal, will the other be a criminal also? To what extent are they made different by diverse environments, diverse experiences?

Johannes Lange has made a unique study of such questions in thirty pairs of twins. One member of each pair had a criminal record. What shall we find as to the fate of the other? The problem of destiny has never been more sharply defined.

Thirteen of the thirty pairs were identical twins; they had come from one egg; they were originally duplicate personalities. Of these thirteen pairs, one member of which in each case was a criminal, the other member had also a criminal record in ten of the cases. If one such twin is criminal, clearly the chance for the other to escape that fate, under existing conditions, is small. Lange studied the detailed histories of the different twins. The two members were astonishingly alike in characteristics and careers. Both members of one pair were burglars. Both of another pair committed "puerile offenses against the property laws." Another pair were high-powered swindlers. Another were gutter-snipes. One pair contributed two brutes "lacking all human feeling except for their own unpleasant selves." And so on through the list; the correspondence in details is terrifying. "In all these pairs the type of crime is identical, the criminal careers begin at the same age; and the behavior of both members in court and in prison corresponds absolutely" (p. 215). It is such facts that give the book its title, "Crime and Destiny"; or as the German title has it: Crime as Destiny. The two twins have the same innate constitution; they have in the main the same environment; the result is the same fate—both are criminals.

But this title may be misleading. Their innate constitutions did not irrevocably predestine these men to crime; on this the author (and the evidence) is clear. Many things in the histories of these twins show the effect of environment, of the experiences undergone. In three of these pairs one of the twins was not a criminal. In several cases one of the twins was reformed by a wife of strong character, or in other ways, while the other went from bad to worse. Under different conditions, or in a different social system, both twins might have avoided criminality.

Yet in the main these were personalities that lacked foresight and resistance; "inability to resist innate urges" (p. 226) was their undoing. This was the secret of their common fate. On such characters environment has relatively little influence. Identical twins possessing foresight, resistance, and power of adaptation to conditions (distinctive features of superior types) might well have very diverse careers as they came into diverse environments. "Destiny" as applied to human careers signifies merely that differential consequences do not follow save on differential antecedents; that condition fulfilled, anything may happen. "Destiny" covers possible complete deflection of a career by a word, a look, a passage read, an incident observed—anything that stirs an emotion or starts a train of thought.

In addition to the thirteen pairs of identical twins, there were studied seventeen pairs (one member of each being criminal) in which the two members came from separate eggs and hence had diverse innate constitutions. The environment however is as like for such twins as for one-egg twins. Yet of the entire seventeen, there were only two in which the other member was also criminal. This, when contrasted with the ten out of thirteen of the one-egg twins in which both were criminal, demonstrates the great influence of identical constitution plus similar environment, as compared with similarity of environment only. Or to put it in the reverse way, it shows how diversity of innate constitution results in different characteristics and fate, even under similar environment. But there is nothing to indicate that great differences of environment acting on identical constitutions would not likewise produce great diversity of career and fate. Both sets of influences are powerful in determining human destiny.

The author is interested in the treatment of criminals. On this what conclusion is to be drawn? The moral of the study is that "the curse causeless shall not come." One's innate constitution does not predestine one to crime; nor must bad environment lead to crime. But certain combinations of these result in criminality; it does not come uncaused. Hence there is "no point to punishment in the narrower sense," but in dealing with criminality "we should regard the safety of society as our only and definite object, and act accordingly." But what measures does this call for? The answer does not follow from the facts or principles set forth in the book; it will be obtained only by long-continued study and experimentation. To one aspect of such study Lange has made a valuable and intensely interesting contribution.

H. S. Jennings

Petticoat War

The Intriguing Duchess. By Dorothy de Brissac Campbell. Covici-Friede. $3.50.

THIS life of Mme de Chevreuse is a particularly displeasing example of the treatment of a little-known and fascinating period. Perhaps there is no era in French history so bandied about and unrealistically understood as the seventeenth century. Dumas and Rostand must be responsible for the fact that this epoch, at once frivolous and rather stark, should usually be described in terms of low comedy, degraded in this biography to the level of a Hollywood scenario for some houri of the screen. Despite its casual romanticism, it was a transitional period of the highest importance in European history between the two disasters of the Reformation and the French Revolution. It was the period of the victorious nationalism of Richelieu, that nervous and heroic prelate who on his deathbed replied to his curé who asked if he forgave his enemies: "I have no enemies save those of the state." It was the age of cavaliers and women at once handsome, adulterous, and devout; the age of that noble domestic architecture which now rots in the Marais; the age of Molière, the Val de Grace, and St. Vincent de Paul. But it was also, most unfortunately for history, the age of Cyrano, D'Artagnan, and the immortal trio, and as such it has a fatal appeal for all those who like their history spiced with flatulent smut, and their bargain-counter culture at the maximum of cheapness. In this book by Dorothy de Brissac Campbell they are repaid in full.

Why, we wonder, do people essay a period at once so complicated and delicate when they themselves have apparently not the remotest notions of delicacy, even in their style? The style of "The Intriguing Duchess" can be well judged by this opening tidbit:

> Lovely women dominated seventeenth-century France. They enslaved kings by their beauty, hampered statesmen by their intrigue, and destroyed the peace of Europe—for an idle whim or a fleeting emotion. International treaties were casually arranged between kisses, and wars were lightly conceived between the perfumed sheets of beds not endowed with the blessing of the church.

In perusing the unutterable William de Mille pretentiousness of this approach, would you not believe yourselves sitting at the Paramount on the eve of one of those million-dollar productions libeling "old court life in France," called "Woman of Passion" or some such swinery? Well, we can assure all lovers of the Eighth Art that the book fulfils the promise of its overture. It abounds in such teeth-grinding clichés as "into the limelight," "naughty old scamp" (for James I of England), "sly dog," "mutual admiration society." Almost the only first-hand authority apparently consulted has been that of Mme de Motteville, a rather tedious gossip afflicted with the same mania of "servantgal"-ism as our authoress. The latter has the impudence to label Mme de Maintenon a "reformed prostitute," and the career of that fine, underrated nationalist king, Louis XIII, as "inglorious." There is no such thing in French history as the "great Duke of Condé." The third prince of that title was a sordid and villainous personage, and so was the son, the real "great" Condé. Apocryphal scandals are repeated throughout, such as that of Richelieu's making love to both Mme De Chevreuse and the Queen, and that of the birth of Louis XIV. The whole business of the Fronde revolution is made a vast and important pother, whereas it was merely a social fuss concocted by a few self-important people, for whom nothing, even treason and murder, was too low did it augment their self-importance. The right side, as usual, was represented by the government, in this case by the Queen-Regent and by Mazarin. One thing, however: it was a revolution mainly fought by pretty speeches, and we are indebted to Mrs. Campbell for the story of the old Duc de Chevreuse, her heroine's husband, who said that "Paris and he had always been lovers, and that he had never fought against the Queen till she had turned on his first love." There are plenty of such stories in this book, but in general its historic attitude is a little too like that of Lauzun, hiding under Mme de Montespan's bed to "listen in," as Mrs. Campbell puts it.

Cuthbert Wright

A Pepys in Wall Street

They Told Barron. The Notes of the Late Clarence W. Barron. Edited and Arranged by Arthur Pound and Samuel Taylor Moore. Harper and Brothers. $5.

CLARENCE W. BARRON was the publisher of the Boston News Bureau and the Wall Street Journal. But he was a lot more than that. He was a congenital reporter. To him life had no meaning except as a continuum of inside stories, all talk was significant, and gossip, carefully sifted, was the simplest and most direct reflection of the spirit behind it. "What's the news?" he asked with his dying breath, actually and not apocryphally. And then he no doubt went to heaven to get the real stuff behind all its omniscience.

It is impossible, at least from this book, to dislike the simple-shrewd tattler of these jottings, which were never really meant for your eye or mine. In his later years Barron was, as the editors happily put it, a jolly old Kris Kringle. Short and hefty, one of his major problems was the ridiculously human job of reducing his irreducible 330 pounds to some semblance of physical sanity. Yet for all his girth he was of imposing vitality, bustling, elegant, and high living. His silver whiskers were neat and parted, a grand twinkle in his roguish look encouraged you to tell him some more, and above all he was armed with that charming and disarming idiocy toward all social ethics which makes the ideal receiver of stolen confidences. A perfect reporter, he never passed judgment on what he heard.

With excellent skill the editors retain the atmosphere of direct and immediate and intimate notations, Pepys-like in their daily freshness and non-moral perspicacity. Barron would flit in and out of the offices of the mightily moneyed, occasionally stealing a chat with J. P. (the younger) himself. Existence was a steady flow of meals and visits and early morning hours, packed with kibitzing with everybody who was somebody, except in the world of ideas. Since these notes cover only the decade between 1918 and 1928, the founders of our industrial and investment universe, the buccaneers and organizers of the John D., Sr., and J. P., Sr., variety, speak to us mainly in the tattle of others. Most of Barron's victims are not tigers but jackals, house-broken to the circus of institutionalized big business at that. Many of them are genuinely able executives, more of them are glorified clerks, some are expensive politicians here and abroad, lots of them are dollar-a-year ingénus, but now and then we are treated to a Gargantuan grafter of the Jay Gould variety. But the interesting thing is that the basic rapacity of the latter type still dominates, in these days of "service," the life patterns of all the others. That's the motif of all their adventures. And Barron's pages are lifted by innumerable dollar signs, winging six figures from one pocket into another.

And the things they did tell him! How they delighted in cheating each other, the law, the community, and in buying the purchasable, both goods and gentry! The weaker characters smeared their views with a surface varnish of unctuousness, like a peasant crossing himself absent-mindedly. The greatest of the unctuous fraternity was the late Judge Gary, compared to whom Daniel Drew was an outright man. His varnish was never thin or volatile but dripping with oil. Still, with the aid of George Kessler, the Moet and Chandon wine man, we catch the sainted jurist lying complexly about the way the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company was acquired by the United States Steel trust. The really powerful adventurers, however, such as Edward Doheney and Harry Sinclair, are rather engagingly honest to type. And Doheney is even capable of genuine moral indignation whenever he has been double-crossed by some one he has bought and paid for. "Doctor Dillon," he complains with much heat, "went to Mexico under contract with me at $20,000 a year for five years." The doctored journalist was to write for the general press from the Doheney angle. Instead, "He became infatuated with Obregón and wrote those fulsome articles for the New York Evening Post which were really damaging to my interests. At the end of two years I told him what I thought of his actions for a man on my pay roll . . ." I cannot help but feel a great deal more respect for Doheney than for his journalist. And as for the willingness of George Creel to serve Mr. Doheny, a certain nausea keeps me from reviewing it. It's recorded on pages 162 to 165.

Said William M. Wood of the American Woolen Company: "American Woolen Company showed $9,000,000 last year, but really made $14,000,000. Our policy this year will be to show as little profit as possible. If you show big earnings . . . your employees will insist upon an advance in wages."

Mused and opined James B. Duke, the tobacco king of child-labor fame: "I have now four houses, my place in Somerville, New Jersey, my home in the South, one at Newport, and one at Fifth Avenue. . . . If the United States should get a sensible system of taxation and put the taxes where they ought to be—on consumption . . . " The conclusion is irresistible. If the brats in his factories had paid just a little more for bread and salt Mr. Duke might have spent his declining years each week-end in another palace.

Here's a lighter touch. "Inviting one to a second libation it was remarked, 'No bird ever flew on one wing' "; that at the home of Ruth Bryan Owen, daughter of the Great Commoner and extra dry Congresswoman from Florida.

At the Republican convention in 1920 Mr. Barron jotted down hasty bits: "Mrs. Lowden's pearls are showing up big at dinners . . ." "Governor Lowden: 'My one ambition is to free labor from the dominion of Gompers . . .' " "General Wood is described to me as a pathetic figure in Chicago, almost on the street corners begging votes . . ."

And so on and on and on, page after page. Of course, it is well to remember that these are tales out of school, and such tales are never high lights of high-mindedness. I do not know about you, but I should certainly hate to see broadcast all my intimate talks with my friends in my various worlds. Yet the world which "told Barron" seems to me very different from any other society. Outside the technical underworld there can be no social group so brazenly obtuse in its social outlook. Furthermore, there is no social group anywhere, whether it be a group of Harvard professors or Ziegfeld beauties, of writers or longshoremen, where there is so little personal wisdom, so little real knowledge, such a dearth of wit, so little mellowness, fraternity, kindliness, indeed so little acute malice. In all this talk of 361 pages by the "rulers" of our society, aged mostly between forty-five and seventy, there is hardly a line of good conversation, not a trace of real culture or plain good breeding, not the slightest evidence of even a fair formal education. If some of them had it, it never broke through.

Oh yes, I forgot, there was one witty line. On viewing Sargent's portrait of John D., Sr., his brother William Rockefeller remarked that "he didn't like the look of John D.'s hand —it was still reaching."

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

A Strange Career

John Charles Frémont: An Explanation of His Career. By Cardinal Goodwin. Stanford University Press. $4.

PROFESSOR GOODWIN'S contribution to an understanding of Frémont's career relates principally to Frémont's connection with the Bear Flag revolt and the conquest of California, his part in the fraudulent army contracts during the Civil War while he was in Missouri in command of the Department of the West, and his connection with Western railway scandals after the war. The examination tends strongly to discredit Frémont. It is absurd, Professor Goodwin declares, to attribute to Frémont the conquest of California; on the contrary, he drifted into the Bear Flag revolt, failed to display even second-rate leadership, and was in fact, as he himself later admitted, "a pawn put forward by others." In the matter of the army contracts he was not, Professor Goodwin thinks, a scoundrel, but his moral weakness and loyalty to others led him to give his approval to transactions which he must have known were dishonest. If he did not himself prepare the statements that were circulated in France in 1869 to advertise the bonds of the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad he was at least responsible for allowing them to circulate, for he did nothing to reveal their falsity "until the money had been raised from the sale of the bonds."

At each of these points Professor Goodwin's findings seem conclusive. He is less successful in making clear the reasons for the wide personal popularity of Frémont before the Civil War, for his choice as a Senator for California, and for the extraordinary vote which he polled in 1856 as the Republican candidate for President. Distinctions of this kind are hardly to be won merely through achievements as an explorer. Professor Goodwin aptly describes Frémont as a man whose "entire career was built largely on a series of circumstances over which he exercised little or no control," and morally "a loose constructionist" who "adjusted his moral outlook very largely to the environment in which he lived." The characterization is true enough, but we are still left wondering a little why Frémont for a time went forward so fast and so far.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

Eight Victorian Poets. By F. L. Lucas. Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d.

These essays on Tennyson, Browning, Arnold, Clough, Rossetti, Swinburne, Morris, Hardy are pleasantly written lectures emphasizing the spiritual and philosophical direction of each poet in an attempt to reestablish the need of spiritual beauty in an age so reprehensibly materialistic as our own. It is an old theme, and concerning the poets Mr. Lucas says nothing very new. He writes well and has quick perception of the quality of poetry; but beyond the usual criticism he does not go. It is well, probably, to recall these Victorians and their high moral purpose, their convincing vitality—and this is

MOSCOW
LENINGRAD
THE • VOLGA

TRAVELING individually or in groups, the inquiring American is welcome in Soviet Russia. The Open Road, now in its fifth season, renders them a specialist's service based on a specialist's knowledge and facilities.

■ In Moscow and Leningrad resident Open Road representatives facilitate access to key institutions and personages.

■ Travelers who follow the Volga or visit the Crimea, the Caucasus Mountains and the Ukraine are provided with interpreters through whom contacts are made with moujiks, collective farm officials, industrial workers, red soldiers, officials of local Soviets, et cetera.

Booklets available on Russian or European Travel

VISITS TO SOVIET RUSSIA THROUGH
The Open Road
11 West 42nd St., New York City

The Training School for Jewish Social Work

invites social workers without professional preparation and others, holders and prospective holders of a bachelor's degree, to whom a career of intrinsic interest and social usefulness is a primary consideration, to examine carefully its course of study in preparation for

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

The School prepares its students for every variety of social work in American Jewish Communities and Institutions.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified students.

For full information write to

M J. Karpf, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

the author's purpose, nothing more—to recall them as they were and as they meant to be. It is well, probably, to remember that we need poets and poetry lest the imprisoned emotions perish of starvation, and that we should therefore read of them and through them. But such a volume as this offers no solution to the modern dilemma and no new vision of the past. The charm of the lectures is their style and their mood, both very subtly adjusted to each subject in turn. Back of them lie wide reading and comparative study, but there remains in them the tone of a popular presentation within a short lecture hour.

America Moves West. By Robert E. Riegel. Henry Holt and Company.

Westward.. The Romance of the American Frontier. By E. Douglas Branch. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

Wagons West. A Story of the Oregon Trail. By Elizabeth Page. Farrar and Rinehart. $5.

A Yankee Trader in the Gold Rush. The Letters of Franklin A. Buck. Compiled by Katherine A. White. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

One Man's Gold. The Letters and Journals of a Forty-Niner. Compiled and Edited by Florence Morrow Christman. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $3.

On the Old West Coast. Being Further Reminiscences of a Ranger, Major Horace Bell. Edited by Lanier Bartlett. William Morrow Company. $5.

John Marsh, Pioneer. The Life Story of a Trail-Blazer on Six Frontiers. By George D. Lyman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

Of these seven new books on that apparently inexhaustible subject, the American West, the first two are comprehensive histories dealing with the series of migrations which swept the white race over the Alleghenies, across the Ohio and Mississippi regions, to the Far West and finally to California. Of the two Mr. Riegel's is the most systematic and Mr. Branch's the more interesting; both of them, however, are based upon good sources, and either of them would do as an introduction to the subject. The next three books are documents having to do with the gold rush, being collections of letters sent back East from California by men from Illinois, Maine, and Pennsylvania respectively. None of them adds anything especially new to the picture we have, but all of them together make that picture clearer; of such testimony we can never have too much. The sixth book is a miscellany, chiefly fantastical, taken from the papers of an old Californian who knew the territory both in its Spanish days and after. The last seems to make good its author's claim that he presents in it a hitherto neglected hero of the West. John Marsh, doctor, Indian agent, and rancher extraordinary, had adventures that put the very wildest fiction to shame, and appears indeed to have been a person of importance in the history of half a dozen States.

The Best Poems of 1930. Edited by Thomas Moult. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Since 1922 Mr. Moult has edited "The Best Poems" for each year, and his anthologies have shown the trend of each year rather directly. As 1930 has on the whole been sterile, a year given over to emphasizing humanism and to the writing of pleasant and unimportant magazine verse, "The Best Poems of 1930" reflect just this condition. There is much of moralizing, much of conventional form, and much of light, pleasant fancy. The collection is very pallid. The older English bodyguard is here in force, but none of the younger rebels—not even Robert Graves this time. The best poems in the collection come from American poets. Archibald MacLeish's beautiful poem Immortal Autumn is included, and Horace Gregory's fine O Mors Eterna. But as a whole the anthology is rather uninteresting.

Lafitte the Pirate. By Lyle Saxon. The Century Company. $5.

Jean Lafitte was the best-loved pirate of history. He and his brother called themselves privateers, but when there was depression in that industry—also when there wasn't—they practiced smuggling and piracy. Louisiana had just come under the sovereignty of the United States; its laws and authority were not popular among the Creoles. So the brothers Lafitte enjoyed the same respect and immunity in Louisiana in their time as a reliable bootlegger in New Jersey today—and for similar reasons. When Governor Claiborne posted a notice in New Orleans offering $500 for the capture of Jean Lafitte, that estimable pirate swaggered into town, read the notice, and put up another placard offering $1,500 for the arrest of Governor Claiborne. Before the battle of New Orleans Pirate Jean offered the services of his men to Governor Claiborne. The latter spurned the offer, but General Jackson accepted it—to his satisfaction. Subsequently Mr. Lafitte resumed the practice of his profession. His biography, picturesquely told by Mr. Saxon, might be entitled "From Pirate to Patriot—and Back Again." Nor did the round trip involve as much change of heart at any stage as a pious member of the D. A. R. might suppose.

Drama

A Tirade Against Tabloids

"FIVE STAR FINAL," by Louis Weitzenkorn, is presented as a bitter attack upon the tabloid newspapers of New York. In fact, it is rather directly pointed at one particular tabloid. The play has the excellent quality of having been written by a man who was very angry. This anger is translated into a great deal of zest and excitement. Nobody can deny that "Five Star Final" possesses power and theatrical effectiveness. It is crude in certain scenes, and yet the mood of the author could hardly function save in a somewhat tabloid treatment of the tabloids. It is not his object to mock these publications, but to punch them on the nose.

Some little incidental humour creeps in, but the fundamental spirit is one of crusading. A critic can readily point out that if Mr. Weitzenkorn had sat down to the task in a somewhat cooler spirit, he might have written a smoother play. But the answer to that is that in a cooler spirit he would never have written the play at all. And it is a job well worth the doing.

To some extent there was a smug acceptance upon the part of the various newspaper representatives. All of them seemed to say, "But, of course, none of this touches us." And yet it does. Certain wide implications of the story bear upon the entire practice of journalism.

To state the story briefly: A tabloid owner wants to jack up the circulation of his paper. He gets a long serial story which purports to give the inside facts about a murder now twenty years old. In order to give some point to this revival, the managing editor undertakes to learn something of the present status of the woman concerned. She was acquitted at the time of the trial, and has since married. Her daughter knows nothing of her mother's antecedents, and as the play begins the girl is about to marry a young man equally ignorant of the background of her family. The publicity drives the mother into an anguish which she solves by killing herself. And her husband also takes poison rather than face the shame and disgrace of the exposure.

It is perfectly true that the technique of news reporting

RUSSIA • A WORLD MENACE ?
Read . . .
SOVIET FOREIGN TRADE POLICY 25c
RUSSIA'S AGRARIAN PROBLEM 25c
by Vera Micheles Dean
two issues of the Foreign Policy Association Information Service which has won the praise of editors, educators, statesmen and others all over the world; published fortnightly under the direction of Raymond Leslie Buell; each number an impartial, factual study of an important international problem. Complete list of titles free on request.
"I KNOW OF NO OTHER SERIES NOW BEING PUBLISHED ANYWHERE COMPARABLE TO THIS."—Newton D. Baker.
Annual subscription—$5.00. Subscribe NOW and receive these two Russian reports FREE.
Write Dept. N, Foreign Policy Association, Inc.
18 East 41st Street, New York, N. Y.

Mary Ware Dennett's Pamphlet
THE SEX SIDE OF LIFE
AN EXPLANATION FOR YOUNG PEOPLE
may be ordered by mail from the author's address
81 SINGER STREET, ASTORIA, L. I., NEW YORK CITY
Single copies 35c, three for $1.00
Lower rates on quantity orders for schools, mother's clubs, parent-teacher associations, social welfare groups, etc.

PUBLISHER WANTED to publish a 100,000 word novel at my expense. Box 248, c/o The Nation.

□ LECTURES □

Rand School of Social Science
7 East 15th Street ALg 4 - 3094
What Can Be Done About Unemployment?
EDWARD C. RYBICKI, Municipal Unemployment Bureau
CHARLES SOLOMON, Former Socialist Assemblyman
Saturday, January 10, 2 p.m. Admission 25c.
Industrial Society and the School System
GEORGE S. COUNTS, Prof. Education Columbia University
Monday, January 12, 8:30 p.m. Admission 50c.
Write for folder for details

TUES., JAN. 13th at 8:30 P.M.
WEST SIDE FORUM
West Side Meeting House
550 West 110th Street
(S. E. Corner Broadway)
New York, N. Y.
Dr. SAMUEL D. SCHMALHAUSEN
will speak on
"THE BANKRUPTCY OF CIVILIZATION"

WED., JAN. 14th at 8:30 P.M.
PROGRESSIVE OPEN FORUM
Schiff Center
2510 Valentine Avenue
(Fordham Road Station)
Bronx, N. Y.
LEWIS BROWNE
will speak on
"THIS BELIEVING WORLD"

Offices: Affiliated Forums, 32 Union Square, N. Y. C.
Tel.: STuyvesant 9 - 8072 Weekly Notices Mailed on Request

Lectures, Theatres, Films continued on pages 54, 55, 56

☐ LECTURES ☐

To The Group: "At last a civilized club, in an uncivilized country, they tell me, prodigious!"—George Bernard Shaw

THE GROUP

A Clearing House of Opinion for the Intellectually Adult
Meets at Auditorium — 150 West 85th Street

Special Lecture

SATURDAY EVENING, January 17th, at 8:30 P.M.

CLARENCE DARROW

will speak on:

"FREE WILL, THE DOCTRINE OF DESPAIR"

Subscription Members 50c. Non-Members $1.00

Tuesday Evening, January 13th, at 8:30 P.M.

DR. GEORGE SWETLOW

(Lecturer Medico-Legal Jurisprudence at Brooklyn Law School)

will speak on:

"INSANITY AND THE LAW"

Sunday Afternoon Discussion Group, Jan. 18th, at 4:30 P.M.

JOHN FARRAR

(Distinguished Editor and Publisher)

will speak on:

"IS THE MOB DEGRADING OUR LITERATURE?"

Tea Served Founded 1918 Subscription to all 50c.
(Membership $1.00 for the year—Weekly notices mailed on request)

League For Industrial Democracy

Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK
127 West 43rd Street

Saturday, January 10, 1931, at 12:45

BEHIND THE BANK FAILURES

One Thousand banks in the United States have closed their doors in 1930—the significance of these failures at this time will be discussed by

Dr. John H. Gray
Formerly President of the American Economics Association
Dr. Max Winkler
Vice-President of Bertron, Griscom and Company, Bankers
John T. Flynn
Author of "Investment "Trusts"
Chairman
Reinhold Niebuhr

Tickets $1.25 Undergraduate Students 75c Non-Members $1.50
Make Reservations now at office of L. I. D., 112 E. 19th St. Algon. 5865

DEBATE

Friday Evening, January 30, 1931, at 8:30

HEYWOOD BROUN
CLARENCE DARROW
versus
NORMAN THOMAS
ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

Harriot Stanton Blatch, Chairman

SUBJECT:

Resolved that the Best Political Service Can Be Rendered by Joining the Socialist Party

At the MECCA TEMPLE
55th Street, between 6th and 7th Avenues, New York City
Tickets: $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c.
Auspices: New York Chapter, League for Industrial Democracy
112 East 19th Street Algonquin 5865

displayed in "Five Star Final" is peculiarly confined to the tabloids. But I wonder whether there is not a great deal even in the most respectable of journals which pries into private affairs right up to the point of tragic consequences. And here there arises that debatable point as to just what amount of censorship a newspaper can impose upon itself. Recently we have seen papers play down unemployment because they felt that this underemphasis might be good for the community. Within a few weeks several cases of bank crashes have been buried inside in order not to shake public confidence. The analogy is not close, but once a newspaperman begins to say, "This is the truth and this is news, and yet I will not print it," the whole theory of journalism may be shaken. Possibly it ought to be shaken. Perhaps there is a line which can be drawn between things of public concern and purely private matters.

I am trying to say that "Five Star Final," in addition to being a hot and powerful play, is also a piece of provocative inquiry. Heywood Broun

"Meet My Sister" (Shubert Theater), circling about the love of a French countess for a poor professor of psychology, is adapted from a German musical comedy. It succeeds in retaining—except for some boop-boop-a-doopism in the second act—a rather agreeable European flavor. One of its pleasant innovations is to omit entirely the usual chorus. Bettina Hall makes a lovely countess, and Walter Slezak is a highly engaging importation from Central Europe.

"The Truth Game" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) is a thin and surprisingly old-fashioned polite English play redeemed by some competent acting, particularly that of Viola Tree as the awkward Lady Joan.

One of the misfortunes of the season was the closing of "The Inspector General" after a run of nine nights. Gogol's gorgeous comedy of political corruption is well worth seeing even in a mediocre performance, and Mr. Jed Harris's revival, while it fell short in several directions, was considerably better than that. H. H.

Music

Whither Tonality?

THE FUTURE OF TONALITY is the title of a very brilliant article by Mr. Joseph Yasser, contained in a special supplement to the December issue of Modern Music, organ of the League of Composers. Mr. Yasser's thesis is, very briefly, this:

The pentatonic scales, ancestors of our diatonic scales, had five "regular" tones and two "auxiliary" tones, dividing the octave into seven parts. From them we derived scales having seven regular tones and five auxiliary tones. The analogous step to follow, according to Mr. Yasser's historical logic, is the adoption of scales with twelve regular tones and seven auxiliary tones. He has accordingly worked out the structure and keyboard embodiment of such a scale, which, he claims, outlines the tonal thought of contemporary composers, whom our prejudices confine to the diatonic scales for their expression.

Mr. Yasser makes the evolution of chord formation fit neatly into his scheme. His theory is that the natural basic interval for chord structure is the interval formed by two alternate "regular tones" of the scale. In our diatonic scale this interval is a third. In the pentatonic scale, which had fewer divisions of the octave than the diatonic, it was accordingly larger—about the size of our fourth. In Mr. Yasser's new scale ("supra-tonality"), which has twelve regular tones, it is reduced to approximately the size of our second, or whole tone. The new scale thus embodies the harmonic innovations of Scriabine, Debussy, and others.

So far, so good. Musically, Mr. Yasser's idea has more than a little to recommend it. It is not possible to say offhand that its artificiality too far exceeds that of Bach's tempering of the diatonic scale, upon which the music of two centuries has been based. The fate of the system must, in any case, rest on its musical value, and neither on the terminology nor on the "historical logic" that Mr. Yasser has used to support his thesis.

And this is lucky for "supra-tonality"! For if it has musical faults, they will be apparent only after it has been well tried, and even then they may not prevent its adoption: the faults of the tempered diatonic scale have not stood in the way of its immense development. Whereas if it were to stand or fall on the validity of its historical logic, the verdict would not take so long to reach. Consider the scheme of that historical logic.

"Tonality" (our 7 + 5 scale) is, according to Mr. Yasser, the synthesis of "infra-tonality" (the pentatonic system) and "infra-atonality" (medieval dissonant counterpoint). Similarly, "supra-tonality" (the new 12 + 7 scale) is to be the synthesis of "tonality" and "atonality."

Now, the universal priority of the pentatonic scale is not by any means proved. And it will take more than Mr. Yasser's quotations from medieval critics to establish the analogy between contemporary atonality and the dissonant counterpoint of the Middle Ages. More than three hundred years intervened between "infra-atonality" and its alleged synthesis in tonality. But the new scale is supposed to be the formulation of what Debussy and Scriabine created, and they were both dead before atonality was well started. Moreover, it reacted against them as violently as against all other tonal ("tonocentric") music.

The synthesis, then, preceded the antithesis, and the antecedent was partly a reaction against the consequent.

Flaws in historical logic do not invalidate the 12 + 7 scale as a musical idea, but that is only because its validity has nothing to do with historical logic. We can only judge "supra-tonality" after we have listened to music (and a great deal of it) written with the new scale in mind, and performed on instruments that make it possible. If we are not convinced after that, historical logic even sounder than Mr. Yasser's will not convince us. And if our ears do accept it, syntheses and antitheses may interact as much as they please without our even knowing it.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Architecture

The Bright Lights

IT is the habit to speak of a "modern manner" as if there were just one, but already it is divided right down the middle. The Europeans get the Day; we get the Night. You can confirm this in any way you wish. The best way is to look at the pictures. A favorite architectural illustration abroad is of a sunny summer afternoon. There are some bathing girls about, in one-piece suits. They are on a broad terrace, and behind them is a wall of pure glass through which you can see a few tables and chairs inside. Of "building" there is as little as possible, as if it were meant to stay out of the way like the bathing suits.

Compare this with pictures by our own Hugh Ferriss, whom our architects to a man consider the "greatest renderer in the world." In his "Metropolis of Tomorrow" are sixty illustrations, among which a bare ten seem to represent day-

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

PLAYS TO SEE

†Art and Mrs. Bottle—Elliott—39 St. E. of B'way.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
*Midnight—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
†Oh Promise Me—Morosco—W. 45 St.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
*On the Spot—Forrest—49 St., W. of B'way.
†Petticoat Influence—Empire.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St., W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.
†This is New York—Plymouth—45 St., W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St., E. of B'way.

---

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

All Quiet on the Western Front—Central—47 St. and B'way.
Sous les Toits de Paris—(French)—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt (German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony—Carnegie Hall—Thurs. eve., Jan. 8; Sat. aft., Jan. 10.
Dusolina Giannini, soprano—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Jan. 20.
Josef Hofmann, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Sun. aft. Jan. 11.
Vladimir Horowitz, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Wed. eve., Jan. 21.
Nina Koshetz, soprano—New School for Social Research—Tues. eve., Jan. 20.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Jan. 13.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie Hall—Fri. aft., Jan. 9, 16; Sun. aft., Jan. 18; Thurs. eve., Jan. 15, 22; Sat. aft., Jan. 17. Metropolitan Opera House—Sun. aft., Jan. 11.
Roth String Quartet—Town Hall—Wed. eve., Jan. 21.
E. Robert Schmitz, pianist—Barbizon-Plaza—(Program includes pieces by Bartok and Hindemith) Sun. eve., Jan. 11.
Andres Segovia, guitarist—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Jan. 18.

☐ FILMS ☐

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A.M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Sat.

AMERICAN PREMIER
NOW PLAYING
Rene Clair's French Talking and Singing Film Masterpiece
"SOUS LES TOITS DE PARIS"
(Under the Roofs of Paris)
Acclaimed an artistic triumph in Europe and America
LITTLE CARNEGIE Playhouse
57th ST. EAST of 7th AVE.
Popular Prices
Direction Leo Brecher

"ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT"
CENTRAL
B'way & 47th St.
Cont. Noon to Midnight
POPULAR PRICES

☐ PLAYS ☐ LECTURES ☐

"LYSISTRATA"

"If you [illegible] throw back your head and laugh, unabashed, at the grandly comic spectacle of life, you will find this 'Lysistrata' [illegible] event you will long remember."—Richard Lockbridge, The Sun.
FORTY-FOURTH ST. Theatre, W. of B'way. Eves. 8:40. Matinees Wed. and Sat., at 2:40.

—"A SMASH HIT"—Walter Winchell, Mirror—
"Joe Cook perfectly marvelous and the show perfectly beautiful"—Heywood Broun, Nation.
JOE COOK in "FINE and DANDY"
HIS NEWEST, MADDEST MUSICAL
ERLANGER'S THEATRE—W. 44th St.—PEN. 7963
Evening 8:30; Matinees, Wed. and Sat., 2:30

The Actor Managers, Inc., Present
RUTH DRAPER
in her original character sketches
Program Changed Daily
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st St. E. of Broadway.
Matinees Thurs. & Sat. at 2:30.
Eves. at 8:30, Sun., Tues., Wed. & Fri.
Prices $1-$3

The Theatre Guild Presents
MIDNIGHT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:50.

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN
MARTIN BECK THEA. 45th Street, West of Eight Avenue. Eves., 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

"Robert E. Sherwood's best play."—Brown, Post.
Arthur Hopkins presents
This Is New York
A New Comedy by Robert E. Sherwood with LOIS MORAN
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St., W. of Bway. Eves. 8:40. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents
MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy Hit
VINEGAR TREE
PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - 2628
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

☐ LECTURES ☐

Dr. Samuel D.
SCHMALHAUSEN
will speak on
"THE CHOICE BEFORE US—
MUSSOLINI—GANDHI—LENIN"
Friday Eve: Jan. 9th at 8:30
COMMUNITY CHURCH
34th St. & Park Ave.
Admission Free

light. I say they seem to, because even in these the days were often distinctly cloudy. There are a few sunsets and mists, and the rest is solid night.

One of the illustrations in particular must have been the artist's favorite. It might be entitled What Hath Building Wrought? Here again is a terrace. It is at about the fortieth story. The time, of course, is night; there has been a party going on, and a few souls, still perhaps a bit hazy with drink, have wandered out to see what, indeed, hath been wrought by building. And it is wonderful. There are solid mountains and chasms, all man-built. This reaches into illimitable distance and loneliness, as vast and solitary as the surface of the moon, all done by steel and electricity.

If you are a city dweller these pictures can be verified in daily life. Sitting here, for example, looking out across the East River at the old rock pile of New York, you will find it unquestionably most beautiful at night, with the thousands of lights. Whatever chaos there may be in the forms disappears in the uniform grill of this star-spangled banner, and patriotism catches at the throat. Here is modernism indeed. Thousands of years went by with their changes of style, but not until this century was there electric light, which, far, far more than the familiar triad of steel, glass, and concrete, has changed the basis of all architecture. This is us.

By comparison, European modernism looks a bit lazy. Not only does New York City probably build more cubage in a year than all Germany, but in the building that they do the Europeans seem to lean too much on mere Nature. Light from the sun, as we know, varies from day to day, and although there is no question that it can be quite useful, yet in a deep building in the middle of a city it interferes with the control of the electricity. Flowers brought into the house involve unhealthy dirt; they fade and die; and there is not nearly so much fun to be had from them as from "painting with light." Indeed, if we were to speak of the split in modernism from another angle, we should say that the Europeans lean on Nature, while we are out to conquer it. Distances they enjoy, but we have annihilated Distance.

At sixty or two hundred miles an hour you can travel to Chicago, where we are preparing a World's Fair that shall illustrate the differences between America and Europe after "A Century of Progress." In the great exhibition buildings windows have been eliminated almost entirely, so that no sunlight shall interfere with the science of illumination. In the Transportation Building there are solid metal walls, but the composition walls of the others are equally sunproof. Heating, ventilation, and all sorts of insulation are of course artificial, and will be nearly perfect.

No Nature interferes with the show. At least not inside. Outside there will be some lake and a few lagoons, but used as a setting for the composition of the buildings rather than for themselves. It is a soil on which trees will not grow, but some device will be invented to make a satisfactory fluff. The chief "natural" exhibit will be a huge metal fountain that can be lighted up at night.

Not the least advantage, of course, is that there will be plenty of work for everyone to do: the illuminating engineers will be busy, and the power companies will shovel coal by the thousand tons for the lights, drawing on our unsurpassed natural resources. When the great show is all over the wreckers will tear it down, and we can begin elsewhere perfectly fresh.

The only thing the Europeans are planning that can remotely compare with it is an exhibition for Cologne in the same year, the bulk of which will consist of skimpy houses, to remain permanently for day-by-day use. Is that a proper celebration of science? Is that their conception of the romance of business?

Douglas Haskell

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1931 No. 3420

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 57
EDITORIALS:
The New Power Battle 60
The Party of Privilege 61
The Jobless Millions 62
Goldfish and Liberty 62
WICKERSHAM AND HIS COMMISSION. By Gardner Jackson 63
BRIGHTER DAYS IN AUSTRIA. By John Gunther 65
"NO NORTH, NO SOUTH." By Stringfellow Barr 67
DANVILLE: LABOR'S SOUTHERN OUTPOST. By Louis Stanley.... 68
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 70
CORRESPONDENCE 71
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
The Hunted Fox. By Sonia Ruthèle Novák 73
Pictures for Songs. By Carleton Beals 73
American Churches. By Herbert W. Schneider 74
The Death of Gaiety. By Henry Bamford Parkes 74
Pressure Politics. By Lyle W. Cooper 75
Lawrence. By George E. G. Catlin 75
Warriors for Peace. By Merle Curti 76
Books in Brief 77
Drama: Deflating the Drama. By Heywood Broun 78
Films: The Underworld. By Alexander Bakshy .... [illegible]
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Poland Courts a New War. By Mauritz A. Hallgren 82
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 84

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WELL, WELL, WELL! So that statesman of the monumental mind and the unterrified heart and the vice-presidential ambition, that new St. George, that arch-investigator, Representative Hamilton Fish, has again exposed the Communist menace in all its gory reality. We regret that the editor of The Nation has been caught red-handed, along with the two old Harrys—Emerson Fosdick and Elmer Barnes—among the "pink intellectualists and sobbing Socialists" more to be despised than real revolutionists, but it can't be helped. Murder will out. Mr. Fish got appropriate intellectual support from Matthew Woll and Father Walsh and Martin W. Littleton, while Carnegie Hall resounded with the cheers of sixty-five anti-Communist organizations, running all the way down from the Allied Patriotic Societies, the American Vigilant Intelligence Association, and nine other American brands, through seven sets of Daughters—of America, of American Colonists, of Founders and Patriots, of the Defenders of the Republic, of the Holland Dames, of the Revolution, of the Union Veterans of the Civil War—through the National Sojourners of the United States, the Society of Sponsors of the American Navy, three sets of Sons, two varieties of United Daughters, and so finally to the Women Descendants of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company. An enjoyable time was had by all, and we regret the malicious newspaper report, doubtless inspired from Moscow, that several hundred seats were left vacant before the speeches were over.

SENATOR NORRIS has won another battle in his long Muscle Shoals campaign. After a prolonged and bitter struggle the House conferees yielded to the Senate on the fundamental question of allowing the government to build transmission lines either through Congressional appropriations or out of profits from the sale of power. With the power plant itself government owned and operated and with transmission lines also in government hands, there will thus be provided the essentials of a real system of government operation and transmission so that Muscle Shoals may serve as a yardstick for determining a reasonable price for power. It is for this reason, of course, that the provision for transmission lines was so bitterly fought. As we write there is uncertainty as to the fate of the conference report in the House, where the Administration is doing its utmost to defeat it. If the bill is passed, President Hoover will be faced with the alternative of swallowing his opposition to government operation, which he can scarcely do, or else of vetoing the bill, deferring yet further the long-deferred day of operation of Muscle Shoals, and thus throwing the question forward as an issue into the election of 1932.

THE CONSENT DECREE of 1920 is modified by an order of Justice Jennings Bailey in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to permit the packers to engage in wholesale distribution of products other than meat, and to use their refrigerator cars and other facilities in such trade. They are refused permission, however, to go into retail business, on the ground that such activities on their part "would probably result in the almost complete annihilation of the independent retail grocer, already a minority in volume of sales." They are still restrained from owning public stockyards, terminal railroads, market newspapers, and public cold-storage warehouses. Justice Bailey justifies the limited relaxation of the consent decree by changes in methods of food distribution and in the position of the packers, no one of whom, he holds, has anything like control of the business and among whom there exists "no combination or agreement in restraint of trade." While the opinion as reported in the press seems to suggest that the packers could probably distribute at retail more cheaply than it is now done, the danger of monopoly is held to override that consideration. The packers gain a certain increased liberty of action, but they are denied the coveted opportunity of entering into competition, not with the small grocer, of course, but with the chain stores in retail distribution. The independent retailer has protected the chains from a powerful competitor.

THE RED CROSS APPEAL which Mr. Hoover has indorsed will doubtless go over the top in due time, as such appeals are likely to do in this open-handed country, but the raising of a further $10,000,000 will not dispel the uneasy feeling that Red Cross finances need clarification.

Only a few weeks ago Judge Payne, chairman of the Red Cross, was telling the Appropriations Committee of the Senate that the $5,000,000 which the society had set aside for drought relief would probably be sufficient for immediate needs. It now appears that Judge Payne's estimate was pretty wild, and that $10,000,000 more will have to be found if farmers in Arkansas and elsewhere are not presently to die of disease or starvation. Mercer G. Johnston, director of the People's Legislative Service at Washington, counters the appeal by declaring that at the beginning of the current fiscal year, July 1 last, the Red Cross had on hand or "substantially assured" $44,000,000, of which amount $38,000,000 was immediately available. If these figures are correct, why the need of $10,000,000 more? Mr. Hoover's letter of approval suggests that the Red Cross proposes to go beyond the country districts and extend relief to small rural and industrial towns which have suffered not only from the drought but also from the business depression. What the country would like to know is how much money the Red Cross has on hand or in sight, what it is doing with it, and whether its work is to be extended from the drought area to any part of the United States in which food distribution is thought to be necessary.

SOME OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS in the annual report of Joseph A. Broderick, State Superintendent of Banks in New York, including that providing for the segregation of thrift accounts in commercial banks and that empowering the superintendent to remove officers or directors guilty of persistent violations of the banking law, deserve serious consideration. Other recommendations, however, seem to have a slightly hysterical character. This applies particularly to the recommendation that the superintendent be permitted, when an emergency arises, to approve the merger of two or more banks without the necessity of seeking the approval of the stockholders. Such a suggestion seems both bad in itself and dangerous as a precedent. The stockholders are after all the real owners of the bank, and the "double liability" that bank stockholders carry makes it the more important that what rights they have should be protected. Proposals for general legislation based upon what might have happened in one particular case—in this instance the Bank of United States—always demand careful scrutiny. In general it may be doubted whether so much new legislation is required. The general public will continue to suspect that recent bank failures might have been avoided by a more alert and curious State Banking Department acting under laws already on the books.

ONE GOOD EFFECT of the business depression has been the deflation of the reputation of the business forecasting services. Since the idea of the business cycle was popularized by the President's Conference on Unemployment in 1921, a great amount of useful study has been given to the up-and-down movement of business, and there have been numerous attempts to develop a reliable business barometer of some sort. Given such an idea, the natural thing to do, of course, was to sell the service to the business man, and university schools of business have vied with glorified market tipsters in seeking such patronage. One interesting feature of the December meeting of the economists and statisticians at Cleveland was their discussion of the very limited usefulness, to say no more, of even the best of these forecasting services. None probably is deserving of greater respect than that carried on by the Harvard Economic Society, yet in a recent letter in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin William P. Everets quotes numerous mistaken forecasts in the society's bulletins during the past two years and comes to the rather sweeping conclusion that "Harvard University must receive its full share of the blame" for the crash of 1929. It is impossible to overemphasize the practical importance of rigorous research into the causes of business fluctuation, but we believe that the universities would do well to resist the temptation to cash in on such investigations by attempting to sell the results to business men for immediate use.

ONE MILLION DOLLARS A YEAR is little enough to spend on the protection of our mothers and their children, especially in view of the shocking maternal mortality rate of the United States, which is 6.5 per thousand live births, as compared, for instance, with Denmark, whose rate is 2.2. The Jones-Cooper maternity and infancy bill, which passed the Senate by a vote of 56 to 10, makes that sum available to the several States. The bill is similar to the Sheppard-Towner Act which expired in June, 1929. It assures to each State which accepts it and matches federal funds at least $30,000 a year. Unlike the Sheppard-Towner Act the new bill applies also to Porto Rico, Alaska, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii. There was opposition to the bill, mainly from Senator King of Utah. He called it a federal intrusion on State functions and mentioned socialism, communism, and the backers of the bill in the same accusing breath, to which Senator Barkley of Kentucky retorted that "if one is in favor of making an appropriation for the welfare of a cow or a hog, that is the height of statesmanship; but if he is in favor of an appropriation which has for its purpose the making of a human being a little more healthy, or giving a baby a right to live equal to the right of an animal, he is denounced as a Communist." Senator King's attempt, by amendment, to limit the provisions of the bill to five years was voted down without a roll call. The bill now goes to the House where a similar attempt to limit it will probably be made. We hope the friends of the bill will see it through intact in order that the excellent work accomplished by the Children's Bureau under the Sheppard-Towner Act may be resumed without further delay.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR INDIA outlined by Lord Sankey as chairman of the Round Table Conference committee of federal structure, which will shortly be acted on by the conference as a whole, is little likely to meet the demands of the advocates of real Indian self-government, although the report, according to press dispatches, formally admits the theory of responsible self-government for India with a cabinet responsible to the legislature. Executive power is vested in the governor-general (the viceroy), to whom are reserved the powers of defense and foreign affairs as well as emergency powers in internal matters in time of crisis. The meaning of such powers the past year has shown. In the field of finance the governor-general will have such powers as are necessary to safeguard Indian credit abroad, but "with regard to the fiscal policy, taxation, and expenditure the minister of finance should be responsible only to the legislature." All other ministers will be wholly responsible to the legislature, but it will require a two-thirds' vote of both houses sitting jointly to overthrow the government, so the position of the ministry of the day will be much stronger than in Great Britain or France, for instance. A two-chamber legislature is suggested, representatives of the independent Indian states in both houses being named by the Maharajahs and their councils, representatives of British Indian states in the upper house to be chosen by the provincial legislatures; the exact method of choosing members of the lower house is not yet clear. Special classes, such as the "untouchables," are to be represented in both houses. Concessions like these might have gone a long way to satisfy Indian opinion a year ago, but it is doubtful whether any such plan will be accepted today by either the Congress Party or their sympathizers in view of the events of the last twelve months.

SECRETARY STIMSON'S strongly worded denunciation of slavery in Liberia may, we hope, go far toward stamping out this evil, which continues its protected existence, not only in Liberia, but in many other countries. The Stimson note placed all of the responsibility and a good share of the guilt upon the government officials in Monrovia. Without official protection, whether it be protection directly given or merely that of tolerance, slavery and forced labor would quickly die out. This is the lesson of the Stimson denunciation. It is a lesson that should be driven home to the delegates of the slavery-protecting countries at Geneva. The League of Nations has already done admirable work in this direction. It was a League commission, of which the American member was Dr. Charles Johnson of Fisk University, that investigated and uncovered the unsavory conditions in Liberia and named the officials responsible for them. It was this commission's report that prompted Secretary Stimson to take action. Similar conditions exist in Abyssinia and other countries, as pointed out by Raymond Leslie Buell in The Nation of December 24. That Mr. Stimson confined his denunciation to Liberia is due to the special position the United States has in that country. His strong stand will have the effect, however, of giving substantial and much-needed moral support to the League's campaign to abolish slavery and forced labor everywhere.

THE WHOOP-LA DEPARTMENT of the Italian government, having given up attempted assassinations of Premier Mussolini as sources of front-page news, has called in the Italian Air Minister, General Balbo, and a few of his subordinates to put Il Duce back into column one. General Balbo, commanding a squadron of twelve great planes, started from Orbetello on the south coast of Italy, crossed the Mediterranean, hugged the coast of Africa to Bolama—with destroyers stationed every 250 miles or so—and in a triumphant burst of well-advertised glory darted 1,875 miles across the South Atlantic to Brazil. Unfortunately, at Bolama two of the planes went down, five aviators were drowned, and three were injured. Barring this little accident, which was carefully kept out of the newspapers until the squadron had reached South America and been suitably welcomed, all has gone well with the expedition. The scientific value of the flight is said to be the demonstration that planes can travel long distances in company. But with the same charts and instruments it is difficult to see how they could help doing so, assuming that they took off from the same point at the same time and had the same destination. It is our firm conviction that the newspaper-reading public is tired of reading about flights which are mere costly publicity stunts, that these flights are no longer news, and that there is no reason on earth for continuing them.

THE SON OF WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING the poet, the nephew of Margaret Fuller, the grandnephew of Dr. Channing the eminent Unitarian minister, Professor Edward Channing of Harvard, who died on January 7 at seventy-four, was not eclipsed by his distinguished connections. He was appointed an instructor in history at Harvard in 1883; his first book, "Town and County Government in the English Colonies of North America," appeared a year later, and from then on, through a long life, he was assiduously engaged in elucidating the history of the United States, with what eloquent and admirable success every student of the subject knows. His major work was the "History of the United States," the sixth volume of which, "The War of Southern Independence," was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1926. The seventh volume is already on the press; copious notes for the eighth and last are ready for a compiler. Like that other interpreter and chronicler of American life, V. L. Parrington, Professor Channing was not able to see his task quite through to the end. But enough is available so that his great work will not be lost. When universities are being criticized and professors are being laughed at or despised, it is good to recall such a career as Professor Channing's. He was single-minded, devoted, industrious, for more than four decades; he performed a service for his countrymen that they must always remember with gratitude. It is by work like this that the academic tradition is preserved in spite of those who would like to take it lightly or see it vanish altogether.

NATHAN STRAUS, who died in New York on January 11 at the age of eighty-two, was admittedly one of the greatest of Jewish philanthropists. His most notable work, perhaps, was his championship of the use of pasteurized milk, especially for children—a beneficent innovation which he began in 1892, and which in 1927 was estimated by the New York Department of Health to have so far reduced infant mortality as to have saved the lives of 417,582 children during the preceding thirty-five years. In the panic year 1893 he gave money without stint in relief, and in 1894 established and maintained four lodging-houses and subsidized a series of bread lines. The latter were again established in 1913. His contributions of various kinds during the World War were believed to have represented several fortunes, and after the war he poured money into relief work for Jews and others in Europe and for the establishment of hospitals and kitchens in Palestine. It was characteristic of his intense individuality that he had little patience with the scientific methods of organized charity, but the sharp criticism which was often passed upon his own methods did not fail to recognize his great generosity or his vast fund of human sympathy. In the front rank of Zionist leaders, his aggressive challenge of Henry Ford's attack upon Jewish international bankers was largely responsible, it was believed, for the eventual withdrawal of the Ford charges.

The New Power Battle

PRESIDENT HOOVER'S refusal to return to the Senate the notice of the confirmation of George Otis Smith, Marcel Garsaud, and Claude L. Draper as federal power commissioners may be well founded in law, but it will profit the President little in his contest with the Senate, and it will only add fuel to the flame of controversy over the power problem. The technical constitutional question on which the President seeks to concentrate attention must be viewed always in its relation to the real underlying issue. From the former point of view, the President finds himself in an advantageous position, and he tries to take advantage of that fact to divert attention from the real question underlying the whole controversy, namely, the effective control of power companies. It would be a great pity if he were allowed to succeed in the attempt.

We have already criticized the action of the Senate in confirming the Power Commission nominees, but when that body, after examining their qualifications or lack of qualifications, confirmed them and they were sworn in, a common-sense view of the situation would suggest that they were legally in office even though the Senate under its rules has the power to reconsider a nomination within two succeeding executive-session days. We do not debate the interesting legal point involved. The fact that the essential ground for reconsideration was really the action of the three as commissioners in dealing with Messrs. Russell and King lends point to the President's contention that the Senate was actually attempting "removal of a duly appointed executive officer under the guise of reconsideration of his nomination"—waiving the question whether members of independent commissions are, strictly speaking, executive officers; but those who know the facts will not fail to recognize the economic issue underlying the Senate action. In any case, however, the practical impossibility of getting the matter before the courts gives to the President's action a finality that is little likely to be disturbed unless the Senate later, as threatened by Senator Wheeler, should refuse to make appropriations for the salaries of the commissioners.

If this is the technical situation, then, is the Senate wrong and the President right? Certainly not! Newspaper and other commentators the country over have hastened to congratulate the President for his courage in "rebuking" attempted Senatorial encroachment on his prerogatives and to commend him for defying that obstreperous body. We have little patience with such comment, for it completely misses the whole point of the extraordinary action the Senate has taken in this matter. What is the real purpose and what will be the result of what has been done? The answer must be sought, not in the field of constitutional law, but in that of politics and public policy. In this field, even if it be assumed that the President was legally right in refusing to return the nominations, the Senate has none the less performed a great service in calling public attention again to the economic issues involved and in making it clear once more just where the President stands.

In his public statement on the question Mr. Hoover either is extraordinarily blind and stupid or else is disingenuous. He declares that there is "no issue for or against power companies," and that the question is a purely constitutional one. If the President does not know any better than this, the rest of us do. His statement is a good deal like saying that in the Civil War there was no issue for or against slavery, and his declaration is just about as true as that assertion would be. Now, as then, there is a fundamental conflict, now hidden for a time, again coming to the surface. That conflict is between the special interests of power companies on the one hand and public interests on the other. The President has always been and is today by conviction and association for the power companies. He publicly avows it, and his Administration has fought for the power companies at Muscle Shoals, at Flathead, at the Hoover Dam in the Black Canyon, on the Clarion River—wherever the issue has been raised. We are not charging Mr. Hoover with bad faith, for he has been perfectly open about it; we are simply charging him with being for the power companies. In his public statement he declines to be symbolized "as the defender of power interests if I refuse to sacrifice three outstanding public servants" and attempts to reprove the Senate for absorbing government attention "upon such questions as the action of the Power Commission in employment or non-employment of two subordinate officials." None of this, we believe, will serve successfully to distract the public mind from the fact to which the action of the Senate again dramatically calls attention, namely, the perfectly consistent record of the President's action in support of power-company interests.

What the Senate has done is to make clear the character of the new Federal Power Commission even before that body has begun to function. Lamentable as the necessity is, the work itself had to be done, and it is only a pity that it could not have been done when the nominations were originally considered. When Mr. Hoover makes appointments they are of Hoover-minded men; that is to say, in the case of power appointees, of company-minded men, as was clearly enough brought out in the examination of Mr. Smith. We do not impeach the integrity of the new commissioners, but we do assert that the task of power regulation, almost insuperably difficult in itself, cannot be successfully accomplished unless by well-informed, highly sophisticated men, almost fanatically public-minded. That kind of man the President does not trust and therefore does not appoint if he can avoid it. For the people, then, to rely on his appointees for effective guardianship of the public interest, in face of the endless activities of the power companies, is to court, at the least, disillusionment. The present incident has made that fact clear concerning these three appointees. The Senate has dramatized the incident for the whole country to see and in so doing has again served the country well. This happening has given fresh meaning to the Muscle Shoals fight. It has weakened the voice of those who assert the possibility of really effective and satisfactory regulation. It has strengthened the hand of those who fight for the development and transmission of power by a public agency, not by private profit-making companies.

The Party of Privilege

A DECADE ago Lord Bryce declared that the political party organizations in the United States, although "democratic in theory and in their outward form, have become selfish oligarchies worked by professional politicians." These organizations, he declared, had long since fallen "into the hands of persons who made personal gain out of them." Then he laid his finger on the crux of the matter by showing that in the control and management of these major parties "the power of wealth has been immense." Yet mere dissent to the narrow plutocratic control of the present parties will not suffice as a base for a new progressive or popular party that will represent the vast groups of people who today have no dependable representation in the government.

In order more readily to comprehend what economic groups stand in logical opposition to the now dominant conservative party, and to understand the reasons for this inevitable but long inarticulate opposition, it is necessary to examine the economic interests of the ruling group. When the Republicans, in 1860, nominated Lincoln they waged the campaign on the two main issues of anti-slavery and protection, shrewdly emphasizing protection where opposition to slavery was lukewarm and putting slavery restriction to the fore where tariff interest was not keen. By so doing they drew to their support a predominant part of such business interests of the North and West [illegible] saw in tariff protection a promise of substantial benefits. So much of the federal legislation of the Civil War period as was not obviously political or military—increased tariff rates, war loans, the national banking system, agricultural development, and the like—all tended further to insure the support of business and identify prosperity with Republican control.

All this was in keeping with the theory of government which the Republicans had inherited from the Whigs, and which the Whigs, at long remove, had inherited from the Federalists. To the Federalists, government was safe only in the hands of "the best men," meaning thereby, in practice, the men of property or important business interests. It was the men who held this view who determined the character of the federal Constitution, supported the financial plans of Alexander Hamilton, and applauded the judicial rulings of Chief Justice Marshall. The same regard for wealth and class, but crossed with sharp divisions of opinion about slavery, reappeared years later in the Whig Party. Through all three parties runs the theory that the persons first to be considered by government are such as are important, and that the general benefit will be best served by first regarding the "interests."

It was not until after the Civil War, however, and more particularly not until after President Cleveland had joined issue with big business on the tariff issue that the manufacturing and banking interests rode surely and securely into power. Since Cleveland they have hardly been dislodged from that power, considering that the somewhat liberal tinge of the first Wilson Administration was soon swamped by the reactionary war policies of the second. Today they control the government. Take only the policies and tactics of the last three Republican administrations. The tariff acts of 1922 and 1930, although one of these was designed amid much publicity to aid the farmers, upon careful examination show consideration for only one group, the manufacturers. The farmers have not been helped, and the consuming public was completely ignored. The tender treatment which the federal tax laws seem to extend to incomes in the higher brackets shows the same consideration for the very small but powerful moneyed class. Other legislation and the public expressions of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover have revealed nothing but the kindliest and most generous feeling for big business. Mr. Hoover has espoused the cause of "rugged individualism." In his opinion, publicly stated, the race should go to the strongest, but in our complex society only the wealthy have strength. He has packed the government in Washington, especially the various influential bodies like the tariff and power commissions, with men who think as he does.

Upon what bases rests the control by big business of the two major party organizations? First, upon the fallacious theory, which the whole country seems to have swallowed, that anything injurious to these sacred interests will also hurt the people. Second, and more important, upon the ownership of the two parties. Senator Norris believes the Republican voters own the Republican Party. Certainly they ought to own it, but as a matter of fact big business has bought and paid for it. It feels, rightfully enough, entitled to exercise all the privileges of ownership. The $8,100,738 (a minimum estimate based only upon published reports) spent by the Republicans in 1920 and the $6,627,784 they spent in 1924 did not come, except in very small measure, from the voters; it came from the commercial and financial interests of the country. The Democrats expended somewhat smaller sums, but still in the millions. Quoting Professor Edward M. Sait: "The Democratic treasurer collects what he can. But he commands smaller resources because the commercial and industrial wealth of the country —big business—has allied itself with the Republican Party." Most of the owners of the parties conduct themselves very discreetly in their relations with their political servants. Occasionally some of them overreach themselves, and we then have scandals like the Teapot Dome affair (which annoys the more unscrupulous of Republican and Democratic office-holders, not because the overreaching is crooked, but because these greedy owners are stupid enough to get caught at the game the other owners and their servants are playing). More often, however, the proprietors of the two parties are prudent and succeed in avoiding scandals. No one has yet succeeded in making court cases out of the recent tariff exactions, not to say robberies, the post-office leasing system, and other examples of privilege and pillage. Thus big business is more than adequately represented in our government. We shall discuss in succeeding issues the vast and inarticulate groups whose economic interests stand in opposition to those of big business, and point out ways and means by which these groups may overcome the obstacles that bar them from direct and equitable participation in the management and benefits of government.

The Jobless Millions

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the announcement, at the beginning of the second week of January, that some 60,000 workers had lately returned or were on the point of returning to their old jobs in automobile factories, steel works, railways, or other large industries came the statement of Colonel Arthur Woods, chairman of the President's Emergency Committee for Unemployment, made to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, that the number of totally unemployed persons in the United States was probably between four and five million, that conditions "are not apt to improve before spring," and that both business and employment would probably be at their lowest point this month and next. The first of these items of news seemed clearly to suggest that the unemployment wave had at last been checked and might now be expected to recede, while the second seemed with equal clearness to justify the conclusion that the reemployment of 60,000 workers—a figure which was shortly raised to about 100,000—represented only a drop in the bucket.

What has become, meantime, of the vast program of public or corporate work which Mr. Hoover and various committees elaborated, and which was to relegate unemployment before long to the limbo of the unwept, unhonored, and unsung? Before the end of November, 1929, it was announced at Washington that plans for the expenditure of more than $3,000,000,000 were being made or were actually in operation; by January, 1930, the figure had risen to $7,000,000,000. The largest items in this imposing total were represented by the contributions of railways and public-utility companies, most of it, as later appeared, being work already planned. How much of this work was actually done in 1930 is not known, but evidently not enough to bring down the unemployment total materially. A good deal of it, apparently, has been carried over into 1931 and remains, where it began, on paper. According to Colonel Woods, of the $2,500,000,000 to be expended during the present year for "public or private construction," 40 per cent is now "in the plan or contract stage"—a stage, as everybody knows, many degrees removed from that of pick and shovel.

The country must settle down, then, to another long winter and spring in which some millions of men and women workers, with other millions dependent upon them, must somehow be helped to live. The sensible recommendations made in a recent report of the Russell Sage Foundation may well be adopted by every community, relief agency, and employer where they apply. Avoidance of alarmist publicity, credits for landlords and retailers of necessities who have strained their own credit resources, the support of existing agencies instead of the creation of new ones, registration of able-bodied applicants for relief, preference to residents in employment, discouragement of artificial work, part-time work instead of wage cuts where such substitution is possible, and a reasonable assurance of security in jobs if such assurance can be given are among the procedures which experience shows should be followed if funds are to be conserved, waste avoided, and the maximum of help extended. An ounce of wisdom here is worth more than pounds of projected government aid not yet available.

Goldfish and Liberty

OF all household pets, none leads a more secure or simple life than the goldfish, cared for according to the rules. He lives in his native element, in a container open to the air; his food—just the right kind—is fed to him regularly at just the right intervals; the temperature of his habitat remains nearly constant, comfortably warm, and he is not affected by the dry air that results from too much steam heat. Safe in his little glass-inclosed world he swims, up and down and round about, not disturbed by his lack of privacy, admired by all beholders, glistening, beautiful, happy. To be sure, he wears a constantly disgruntled expression, but one is justified in ascribing that to morphology rather than morbidity.

It is worth considering whether this enviable state is not made so chiefly by its lack of liberty, its freedom from responsibility. Not for the goldfish are those distressingly complicated decisions that even a household dog or cat has to make of where will be the best place to go next, of whom he will love, of when and where he will sleep or lie down or divert himself. And surely man, that creature of infinite decisions, whose activities may extend in such a variety of directions, is miserable compared with this circumscribed, imprisoned bright fish. The theory has been advanced that the chief curse of modern life is its liberty. We no longer have any authority to bow to, we refuse to acknowledge conventions, we scorn manners, we deride rules. God is gone, except in the minds of our more esoteric mathematicians, and with him roast beef for Sunday dinner, men who asked the permission of a lady before they lighted a cigar, and women who warmed their husband's slippers against their return from a day of toil.

There are plenty of persons, of course, who will declare that these days of slipper-warming are well gone. Women are no longer bound by the limits of the home, men live no longer under the deadening weight of stupid and meaningless conventions. But to question this enthusiasm for freedom one has only to remember how comfortable, on the whole, our American young men were when, in the late war, the routine of the army bound them. Responsibility and the necessity of making choices are dreadfully difficult matters. Only the most adult of us are capable of enduring freedom to act and think and speak as we like. It is infinitely more comforting to know the rules that must govern our decisions, to have a superior authority whom we can consult and blame, to be protected from a harsh world by the warm assurance of routine. Why, says the modern child, the modern man or woman, in marriage or out, should I not do as I like? The wise answer, with the weight of experience behind it, would be because it is too painful.

It is impossible, of course, even if it were desirable, to return to the past, to readopt old modes of conduct, just as we cannot put on the clothes we wore in the nineties and have them fit or look seemly. But it is surely not too far-fetched to envisage the possibility that men and women, now, in this age of freedom, are busy with forging new chains, and will be happier wearing them. Happier, too, perhaps, when they can promise themselves to cast them off again. The pendulum must swing; but it will return.

Wickersham and His Commission

By GARDNER JACKSON

Washington, January 10

"VERY belligerent" is the phrase applied to several sessions of Wickersham Commission members by one intimately in touch with the work of that body in arriving at its report on prohibition. Whatever the nature of the prohibition report, the question, "How did they arrive at it?" needs to be answered, and that phrase, "very belligerent," seems to be one key to the answer. For one cannot escape the impression after diligent inquiry into the commission's technique that the clash of personalities within the group has been a surprisingly large factor in the process of knitting the compromise report together.

Some of the sessions have run past midnight with voices at a strident pitch and gestures something less than gentle. Chairs designed for reflective sitting have been suddenly shoved from their positions, files of letters and data have been abruptly swept into disorder by impatient gesturing. In brief, some of the sessions have been dominated by emotions riding high on irritated and unruly nerves.

"How shall I describe the methods by which you've agreed on this report?" one close to the work was asked. "You can't describe them," this person replied. "It's an impossible assignment. There has been no system and no formulated methods. It has been in large measure each one for himself. Think of putting eleven people around a table and expecting them to come to an agreement on a question like prohibition. You know as well as I do that most of those people have exactly the same opinions now that they had when they started."

As a matter of fact the harassed members of the commission have had a thankless and extremely trying task, both because of the inherent nature of the problem engaging them and because of the circumstances attending their engagement. Summoned to the periodic sessions in Washington from their daily preoccupations as judges, lawyers, teacher, and college president, the commissioners have heard a multitude of witnesses describe every known system of liquor control and express every conceivable opinion. Supplied with quantities of data, they have left their sessions to return to their customary preoccupations, snatching time between whiles to reflect upon and digest what they took away with them from Washington and to pursue such individual inquiries as they cared to. Most of the data have been available right along, coming from Congressional and Senate hearings and from studies conducted by private individuals and organizations. The only major new and basic piece of research on the prohibition problem to occupy them was the survey into the working of the prohibition forces carried on by Henry S. Dennison with a staff of investigators including Federal Prohibition Director Amos W. Woodcock.

This intermittent quality of the commissioners' undertaking was handicap enough, but there soon developed another more serious one, namely, political pressure. The commission got away to a bad start in respect to psychological harmony among its members when it decided upon secret hearings. A minority of the group wanted public hearings and wanted them badly, feeling among other things that political pressure would not be so effective if the inquiry were conducted in the open. Overruling the minority left a persistent dissatisfaction, and it is surely at least debatable whether public hearings would not have been better from the commission's own point of view.

After President Hoover on May 28, 1929, inducted the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement into office, the newspapers generally respected the commission's request for privacy. The commission's explanation that privacy was a requisite of research into lawlessness was accepted as sincere and reasonable. The newspaper correspondents took what was handed them from commission headquarters in the Tower Building and refrained from further prying that might interfere with research.

Then, hardly more than six months after the commission held its first session, it forfeited all claim to respect as a body devoted purely to research at least as regards prohibition. Yielding to direct pressure from the White House—pressure induced by political clamor in Congress—it issued preliminary reports and proposed bills. Disregarding the fact that in those hastily composed reports and bills there were several glaring inaccuracies and illogicalities (in one bill an astonishing technical inaccuracy), which were pointed out by Professor Howard Lee McBain of Columbia University and others, the action itself was fatal. It blasted the newspapers' respect for the commission's claim to privacy and made suspicion the dominant attitude toward the body.

Considering how that unfortunate decision came to be negotiated, one cannot help recalling that Chairman George W. Wickersham is a charming gentleman of responsive heart—responsive in a pinch to White House troubles. One remembers that in 1910 President Taft persuaded him as Attorney General to predate over his signature a document exonerating Secretary Ballinger. "I therefore directed him to embody in a written statement such analysis and conclusions as he had given me, file it with the record, and date it prior to the date of my opinion, so as to show that my decision was fortified by his summary of the evidence and his conclusions therefrom," wrote President Taft to Senator Nelson in explanation.

It is inevitable that those who have tried to discover the modus operandi of the commission should thus look back and should feel sorry that the genial Mr. Wickersham has been unfortunate enough to be once more in a position of responsibility to another White House occupant sorely perplexed—this time by prohibition. But whatever the sources and avenues of interruptions to the ideals of objectivity in research and recommendations within the commission, there are clear external signs beyond the issuance of the preliminary reports and bills that such interruptions have occurred. For example, take the turnover of men retained to help the commission in its research.

The resignation last summer of Max Lowenthal as secretary of the commission is an outstanding example. Mr.

Lowenthal, with a background of brilliant legal and scholarly accomplishments, was retained to serve both as administrative secretary and as director of research. His sudden resignation, after he had given up virtually all of his professional commitments in order to work with the commission, led to extensive newspaper queries. On August 8, 1930, the New York World carried a detailed report explaining that Mr. Lowenthal's resignation was based on disillusionment respecting the quality and scope of the commission's investigations. The report stated that Mr. Lowenthal found the conduct of the commission to be directed by political expediency (particularly as regards prohibition) and that a genuinely objective study had become impossible in the face of political bickerings between various members of the group. Mr. Lowenthal has steadfastly refused to say anything, either in denial or confirmation of the World's explanation, but it is generally considered to be true.

Other men, young law-school graduates retained for specific tasks in furthering the research, have tried out the work and lasted but a while. One such man, retained to study and clarify the preliminary reports of a few of the many experts working for the commission, told a committee of the commission members after going over the reports that he could see no point in his continuing with the job. With the exception of one of the reports, he said, there was in the material so little factual information as to render it scientifically valueless. Whereupon one of the commissioners ejaculated with irritation, "Factual, factual! I'm tired of hearing that word factual all the time!"

Just what has been the relationship between the eleven committees of the commission and the experts retained to conduct studies in the eleven specific fields is not clear. Those fields are: the causes of crime; statistics of crime and criminal justice; police; prosecution; courts; penal institutions, probation, and parole; prohibition; juvenile delinquency; criminal justice and the foreign born; lawlessness by governmental law-enforcing officers; cost of crime. The relationship has apparently varied greatly with the personnel of the committees. In some instances the committee members keep in close touch with their experts. In others the experts are left entirely to their own devices. The underlying theory has been, of course, that the experts should have a free hand to conduct their studies as they saw fit.

As the program now stands it seems probable that the experts' reports (whether in the field of prohibition or not one cannot say, so closely guarded has been procedure there) will be published as submitted to the committees, accompanied by the commissioners' observations and recommendations. Thus, it is conceivable that the reports of the experts studying "the causes of crime," for example, may be published with conclusions and findings that run counter to the conclusions or desires of the commissioners themselves. One wonders to what extent the experts will insist on full publication of their reports.

The eleven committees of the commission have naturally overlapped in their fields of study but they were arranged with a view to specialization. A marked exception to this intention has been Dean Roscoe Pound, who has had his say in all the fields. With the single exception of Chairman Wickersham, Dean Pound has spent more time on the ground here in Washington than any other commissioner. He has been on leave from the Harvard Law School for many months devoting himself entirely to commission work. It is agreed by all observers here that his hand is writ large in the prohibition report even though he is not a member of the committee originally assigned to deal with that subject. That committee is made up of Mr. Wickersham as chairman, Newton D. Baker, Ada L. Comstock, and Judge William S. Kenyon, an outspoken dry, who tendered his resignation early this winter but was persuaded by President Hoover to remain.

One of the reasons assigned by the New York World report for Mr. Lowenthal's resignation was violation of the pledge to make no public utterance on commission work taken by the commissioners when they first came together. One such violation, illuminating one commissioner's attitude of mind, was the speech on prohibition lawlessness delivered by Frank J. Loesch, Chicago member of the commission, at the Commonwealth Conference at the University of Iowa. As reported in the New York Times of July 1, 1930, Mr. Loesch said in the course of that speech: "But the real Americans are not gangsters. Recent immigrants and the first generation of Jews and Italians are the chief offenders, with the Jews furnishing the brains and the Italians the brawn." Since that time there have been no statements or speeches by members of the commission as such except by Chairman Wickersham, whose last speech suggested the advisability of flogging for gangster criminals.

Since it let the press loose on its back by the issuance of the preliminary reports and bills, the commission has been subjected to an overwhelming amount of newspaper speculation and gossip. The commissioners have been haunted individually by newspapermen seeking some shred of evidence for prophecy as to the nature of the prohibition report.

There is an unmistakable air of relief around commission headquarters now that the prohibition report, product as it is of all sorts of tugging and pulling, is finished. The attitude is expressed that now the commission can go on with its more important work in other fields. But also in the other fields there is one basic objection which even some of the experts themselves admit privately. That is the rush with which the whole undertaking has been put through. The work will be completed in all fields by the last of June, according to present plans. This is scarcely more than two years after the inquiry began. As one expert remarked to me, "Why, to begin to do this thing right we ought to have at least five years."

And what of President Hoover's expressed standards in regard to the commission mode of inquiry? In his well-remembered "hair-shirt" letter of December 30, 1929, to President-emeritus W. O. Thompson of Ohio State University he said:

> The truth . . . is hard to discover; it must be distilled through the common judgment of skilled men and women from accurately and patiently collected facts and knowledge of forces before the extraction of the essence of wisdom. The materials themselves are hard to come by; it takes time and patience. . . .

Perhaps the one great contribution which will come out of this key commission of President Hoover will be recognition by the earnest members of that body that they have barely scratched the surface and that what is needed is a permanent, full-time, fact-finding body removed from political influence.

Brighter Days in Austria

By JOHN GUNTHER

"THE situation in Austria," a Viennese wit once told H. W. Nevinson, "is hopeless but not serious." Doubtless he had in mind not only the fundamental impossibility of the economic situation, together with the country's almost inexplicable survival, but such minor matters as the excessive confusions, vanities, and bitternesses of local politics. Statesmanship in Vienna makes almost a cult of irresponsibility. And doubtless Mr. Nevinson's friend had reference also to the national trait, Gemütlichkeit. Austria has a genius for turning the other cheek. Crises induced by desperate partisan rivalry almost always end in egregiously opportunist compromises.

The present situation, however, following the November elections, is brighter. There is little doubt that a period of dangerous tension has ended and that a new chapter of development both less violent and less sentimental has begun. The new parliament differs radically from the old, in spirit if not texture. The country has good prospects of two or three uninterrupted years of brisk, moderate government—assuming no sudden change. The extremists were soundly beaten. Austria's No! to reaction is one of the most reassuring recent developments in Europe.

The new government, headed by Chancellor Ender and Vice-Chancellor Schober, was formed on December 3, when the Vaugoin Cabinet, beaten in the elections, was finally forced to resign. The Christian Social (clerical) Party took six portfolios; the newly formed center bloc under Dr. Schober took three. Except for Dr. Vaugoin, who retains his traditional post as Minister of War, all members of the government are ostensibly moderate. The Heimwehr (fascist) deputies were excluded, because Dr. Schober, who holds the balance of power, refused to have them. He had to accept Dr. Vaugoin (with Vaugoin's knife still sticking in his back) but he drew the line at young Prince Starhemberg, the Heimwehr leader. Professedly the Ender-Schober Government is a coalition of moderate right and center parties against the Social Democrats (Socialists). The Socialists, however, are willing to work with it.

The chief result of the elections is negative—the Heimwehr got an awful spanking. Out of a total of 3,464,256 votes, young Prince Starhemberg and his absentee chief-of-staff, the agent provocateur Major Pabst, polled only 226,000. True, the Heimwehr have eight seats in parliament, but only by grace of the extraordinary Austrian election system. At the last moment, one Heimwehr man squeezed in with the "basic mandate" necessary; the other seven seats followed automatically. Of course, the Heimwehr had no real policy. The force of Heimwehr reaction was greatly exaggerated by all observers. So was the sincerity of Heimwehr pledges. The Heimwehr may split up shortly, the right wing going with the Hitlerites.

Another negative result of the elections is the withdrawal, at least for the moment, of Dr. Seipel from parliamentary life. A bland little man, shiny-bald like an apple, he is not only the living force of clericalism in Austria, he is the great incalculable of Austrian politics. Whatever happens in Austria, Dr. Seipel's hand is seen; nothing is conjectured without estimation of his influence. But in this instance he sought to employ the Heimwehr as an oblique instrument of his policy; too late, he tried to wriggle from an embarrassing intrigue; as a result he reaped defeat. Dr. Seipel, a sick man, has retired for a brief holiday. But let no one think he is out of the picture for good. He has been eclipsed temporarily before. And every time when he was ready to come back, the sun has shone.

I have heard many explanations of Dr. Seipel's great power—his natural cunning, his astute and vigorous mind, the power of the church behind him. I think there is another factor. Like the Succession States, Austria pays heavily for its lack of trained statesmen. The war wiped out the old generation; there was no time to train or educate a new. Dr. Vaugoin was an insurance agent; Dr. Kuntschak was a tram conductor; Dr. Schober is a professional policeman; President Miklas was a schoolmaster. But Monsignor Seipel from his earliest days has been a politician. Alone among surviving Austrians he was a minister under the last Emperor. And the assiduity of his training in the art of political maneuver is as indisputable as the perfection of his technique.

As to the Christian Social Party, as an organism it paid dearly for its Heimwehr philandering. In parliament it dropped from 73 seats to 66; its total vote was reduced by 400,000; the old anti-Marxist coalition was broken up; the days of purely clerical cabinets are probably gone forever—all this because Dr. Vaugoin provoked a needless crisis. (He had sought to manipulate high posts in the state railways.) On the other hand, the Christian Socialists are still powerful, well-organized, and somewhat bellicose. The lost seats, moreover, went to the Heimwehr, and intrigue might regain them. "As in Germany, the orthodox conservatives lost to stunt revolutionaries," but if Dr. Schober flirts too overtly with the Socialists, a Heimwehr-Christian Social coalition is still a possibility. Finally, the clerical party feels some relief at being no longer the most conservative group in the Chamber. For the first time in Austria there is an opposition to the right.

As to positive results, the Socialists have good reason for their restrained jubilance. Although their total poll was 20,000 votes less than in 1927, they are now both the largest party in the country and the largest single group in parliament. This is new to Austrian history. The danger of a Heimwehr putsch, moreover, is scotched, and the urban predominance of socialism remains impregnable. Out of a total vote in Vienna of 1,192,674, the Socialists got more than 700,000, which means that for years to come their work will go on in Vienna without serious hindrance.

The Socialists nevertheless have no clear parliamentary majority, nor are they likely to attain one for many years. The major issue in Austria is rivalry between Socialist Vienna and a clerical-conservative hinterland. The major problem is the very close balance between these two forces. As long as this balance persists the Socialists are forced to accept the best coalition government available. And they much prefer an Ender-Schober regime to Vaugoin or Seipel.

A word about Dr. Schober. He seems destined to be a sort of sub-Hindenburg, as Mr. G. E. R. Gedye has pointed out. He is prudent, he is neutral, and he is as clean as soap. Until November of this year he had never belonged to a political party, and the essential items in his program are simply economic reconstruction and political peace. His years as police president of Vienna made him surprisingly few enemies. Theodore Roosevelt, I have heard, once called him the best policeman in the world. It is, of course, something of a paradox that Socialism and Schober should be on reasonably good terms. Three years ago, following the Vienna riots, he was vilified by Socialists as a murderer. But if he bears a grudge today, he seems to bear it lightly. As to the Socialists, for them better Schober a friend than an enemy.

The greatest feat of Dr. Schober has been financial. He performed a miracle. That is, he went to The Hague, he saw Philip Snowden plain, and he came away—with Austria freed of every cent of reparations payment. Austria is the first country in Europe finally to liquidate her obligations left by the war. Following this feat Schober negotiated for Austria a $100,000,000 loan, no mean achievement for the black 1930's. He deserves credit also for the policy which inadvertently ended his former chancellorship—the expulsion of Major Pabst, the criminal indictment of Prince Starhemberg (for alleged arms smuggling), and his projected disarmament bill. Resentment by fascists at these measures provoked the crisis which overthrew him.

Finally there is Dr. Ender himself, the Chancellor, a little man with a big question-mark of a nose and bright, smiling teeth. It is typically Austrian that the Chancellor finally to be seized upon by all parties as the imperative savior of the hour should have been almost completely unknown. Yet no one should think Dr. Ender is a figurehead. He was born in 1875 and has had long years of experience as a provincial lawyer; he is a moderate clerical, pledged to a constitutional regime; and for twelve years he made an admirable record as governor of the province of Vorarlberg, the smallest but the most prosperous county in Austria.

Dr. Ender has more interesting claims to eminence. It is enormously suggestive that the cardinal principle of very nearly every Austrian politician is the abolition of Austria, i.e., Anschluss, or union with Germany. But Dr. Ender goes them one better. He is on record as having advocated Anschluss with Switzerland! That is, in 1919 he led a separatist movement, which, of course, was both peaceful and abortive, to join his homeland of Vorarlberg to the Swiss republic.

Such a program showed robust political intelligence. Even today, if Anschluss with Germany remains forbidden, surely the best future for Austria is cultivation of a permanent, cumulative, fiber-hard neutrality like that of Switzerland, a sort of non-political state. Austria has a good start in that direction.

The program of the Ender-Schober Government is the economic restoration of the country. The number of unemployed today is 192,670, as against 125,540 a year ago, a shocking figure for an agricultural country of 6,000,000. Exports have decreased by 42,000,000 schillings as compared to September, 1929, and imports by 70,000,000 schillings. At the Dorotheum, a second-hand market, not less than 45,000,000 schillings' worth of goods is stocked on pawn. In the large the economic situation is all but hopeless. Taxes paid within the country, for instance, furnish almost two-thirds of the state revenue. The country lives by the taxes it takes out of its own mouth.

Another problem is disarmament. It is not the least of local paradoxes that the treaty of peace limited Austria's regular army, so that now she has two irregular ones. During the electoral campaign Dr. Vaugoin carried out a preliminary arms search, which, however, was disgracefully one-sided. He let the Heimwehr arms severely alone; and then confiscated arms which the Schutzbund, the Socialist military organization, had actually confided, in his capacity as Minister of War, to his care! But let no one think that any but the top of the Socialist powder barrel was removed. The amount of arms held by both Heimwehr and Schutzbund is, I think, commonly exaggerated, but each could probably equip at least 50,000 men, and the continued presence of such illegal armament is, of course, not only unbecoming to the nation, but a constant temptation to excitement and trouble. You can do anything with bayonets, Talleyrand said, except sit on them.

As to foreign affairs, Dr. Schober, who is Foreign Minister as well as Vice-Chancellor, will attempt a conciliatory course. Above all Austrian politicians he stands for Anschluss, but meantime he wants as good relations with France and Czecho-Slovakia as he can get. When Dr. Seipel was Foreign Minister, Austria was inevitably a presumptive source of trouble. He was open to flirtation both with Italy and Hungary, and it is not unreasonable to adduce in this connection the close relations between Prince Starhemberg, Major Pabst (who is a German), Hitler (who is an Austrian), and General Bömboes, the Hungarian Minister of War. Most foreign offices are nervous at talk of an Italian-German-Hungarian-Austrian fascist combination—and they greet Dr. Schober with corresponding relief. Monsignor Seipel, moreover, is an avowed legitimist; he wanted Otto back in Hungary. Dr. Schober is also monarchist, and regards a Hapsburg restoration as eventually inevitable (in Budapest); but he does not want Otto at any risk of war, civil or otherwise.

Finally there is the immediate business of the impending presidential elections. Every possible artifice has been supplied to make these elections somewhat intricate. The preliminary lists must be submitted within ten weeks of the new session of parliament. There are, however, two elections, each by full popular plebiscite. The first is to eliminate all but the two leaders. These then fight it out—except that they may be two different leaders. Voting is for parties, not for persons, and any party is privileged to withdraw its first candidate, successful or not, and, for the second election, to replace him with another. If no candidate gets a clear majority in the first election, the second may take place with entirely different nominees. In the first elections, Dr. Renner is expected to stand for the Socialists, Dr. Kuntschak for the clericals, and Dr. Schober as representative of the middle bloc. But there is a catch. Austrians like confusion, and they like compromise. It seems clear at the moment of writing that both elections, formidable and expensive as they are, will occur—but with no result at all! The three candidates are expected to retire in favor of Dr. Miklas—who holds the job right now.

"No North, No South!"

By STRINGFELLOW BARR

SOME time back, about the beginning of this century, I used to hear the phrase "No North, no South!" I don't know its history but I always carelessly assumed it was what Grant said to Lee at Appomattox by way of apology for fighting it out on this line if it took all summer and by way of tipping him off as to what to expect from Thad Stevens's gang in the near future. Now I think of it, somebody or other repeated the phrase when we, the American people, saved democracy. But let it go into the limbo of great national slogans like "Forward America, Nothing Can Stop U. S." Maybe the man who invented it meant nothing at all by it except that he had misplaced a pocket compass and wished he could get his bearings.

Anyhow, today, any Northerner or any Southerner who is sensitive to his surroundings, who has in short not lost his compass, would be insulted by the phrase. Indeed, far from ignoring sectional differences, I incline to think such persons readily exaggerate them. Since the nation has found out what engineers can do in a white house and since even the little children in the streets have taken to kidding Santa Claus, we have as a nation few great creative myths comparable to the picture the North has of the South and the picture the South has of the North. Nevertheless, I should like to repeat the phrase "No North, no South!" and try my hand at giving it a new content.

It happens that during the past calendar year the South has practiced more self-analysis, or certainly a noisier brand of self-analysis, than has been practiced in the past three decades put together. Southern writers have been partially goaded to this by the ineptitudes of a host of commentators on the Southern scene, North and South. These cultural carpet-baggers and scalawags have at least served the useful purpose of stimulating abler thinkers into a reassessment of the contemporary South's peculiar institutions. But the newer school of interpreters were driven even more, I suspect, by the growing pains of industrialization, of which North Carolina's severe attack of Gastonitis may be taken as typical and which the Danville strike now serves to keep fresh in the memory. What these new interpreters make of the shifting currents of Southern life may be worth summarizing.

In the first place, they assume rightly or wrongly that the fundamental differences which the title of this article implies are non-existent. How violently this assertion of differences is made can be gathered from the title of the agrarian symposium recently published by Twelve Southerners, mostly from Nashville, "I'll Take My Stand." Though the tone of these twelve Neo-Confederates varies somewhat with each paper in the symposium, the general note is a rebel yell of defiance at the encroachments of industrialism and its Yankee ways and a call to arms that urges Southerners to stick to the land. This call to arms is of course the easiest thing in the world to laugh at, and many Southerners have done their share of laughing; but I hardly think laughter was the appropriate response. For the book at least helped other Southern writers to focus the attention of the South on its principal problem since the South lived as military districts under Northern rule. And it served also to reiterate and make precise the real differences between the people of the South and the rest of the Union.

Glance at those differences. No European in his senses would ignore them. The American jingo finds them inconvenient to examine—or would find them so if he knew anything about them. They are profound historic differences; and parts of the Old South have more than three centuries of history. That is plenty to give them significance.

As John Crowe Ransom points out in "I'll Take My Stand," whatever historians may have made of the "Puritan and Cavalier" myth—and I think they have chiefly misunderstood it, as historians are inclined to do when faced with a good myth—the prevailing note of New England and the States it populated was dissent from the European tradition and the desire to create a better and therefore different world. The prevailing note of those who led the Southern settlements was a desire to expand the European mode. This distinction, which will be hotly denied, can be illustrated by recalling the arrival of three groups in America. In 1607 the London Company founded the first permanent English settlement on these shores, in Virginia, for commercial profit. In 1619 a Dutch slaver brought the first shipload of Negroes who, with later increments and their descendants, were to furnish the manual labor for the development of the Virginia system throughout the South. A year later, the Pilgrim Fathers hove into Plymouth and started the commercial, industrial, and in short "American" system that was destined with Grant's aid to triumph over the other.

Two centuries and a half later that triumph was complete and Dr. Beard's "American Leviathan" was under way, a somewhat reconditioned Mayflower. With this significant result: Southerners are the only members of the optimistic, self-confident, and always victorious American nation who have tasted crushing military defeat, government by bayonet in an "occupied area," and a completer expropriation of their goods than ever befell any Anglo-Saxon community since Norman William seized England. Whether or not Walther Rathenau was right when he said that only those nations which had known defeat had souls, the experience of complete subjection does things. For one thing, no people whose recent past was finer in its own judgment than its present can avoid a certain skepticism when it meets boundless confidence. Even so slight an incident as Hoover prosperity can demonstrate that.

Finally, with the federal government in the hands of an industrial plutocracy, the almost purely agrarian South was left for decades in a state of unsplendid isolation, its leaders dead, emigrated, or emigrating; its capital resources destroyed; at the mercy of "foreign" capital. It was during that period that she learned distrust of outsiders and that she learned to sentimentalize and exaggerate her own peculiarities or even those traits she mistakenly considered peculiar. This has led to a vast deal of easy but impotent sentimentalizing on the part of those who would normally have been effective leaders or drastic critics. Out of this situation developed the elaborate defense mechanisms of the contemporary South.

And now, with terrific suddenness, the South is being industrialized. The Twelve Apostles at Nashville are shouting that the South should show herself as impermeable and refractory as possible, that she should combat these new carpet-baggers with their higher standard of living and instalment buying and their new American economic system that had till so recently solved the problem of cyclic depression and overproduction. Other Southerners have regretted the passing of the picturesque but have insisted on the inevitability of the economic process and rejoiced that the South would through industry secure the underwriting she had once gained through cotton and cane. And some have added that she should profit by the experience of other communities and apply immediately to the disease of industrialization the antitoxins tardily developed in England, New England, and other industrialized societies.

But it is the cry of "Keep the North out," so explicitly raised at Nashville, that seems to me most characteristic of the young South when it tries to think through its problems. The Nashville agrarians are mostly young men, some very young, in hearty insurrection against the Southerners of two decades ago who, tired of pouting in the corner, looked to the North, to popular education, general prosperity, and progress for salvation. The Nashvilleans have punctured those slogans. But if there is one conspicuous fault in their book it is that they do not seem aware that these slogans had already been punctured in the North. That they should have punctured them in the South and for Southerners is a good thing nevertheless; that they should have cited the older Southern tradition was politically a wise thing. But they ought, as a matter of mere tactics, to have recognized their allies wherever they found them. Their allies are not, as they evidently suppose, the farm bloc of the Middle West. Middle Western agrarianism has very little in common with the agrarian tradition of the South. Their allies are disillusioned Northerners, who have seen through the messianic prophecies of the high-pressure industrialist; who willingly use his gadgets if they feel a need for them; but who object to gadget-worship, who decline to canonize progress or deify prosperity.

If the North, which has for sixty years enjoyed vastly greater wealth, broader contacts with the outside world, and a wider and more rapid dissemination of cross-fertilizing ideas, still holds to its ridiculous picture of the South, it is perhaps not surprising that the side that lost, and that lived in isolation, should confuse machine production with the tradition of laissez-faire capitalism under which the North adopted and improved it. But Nashville should stop talking about "the North"; discriminate between those in the North who still believe in Santa Claus and those who are less interested in "Protection and Prosperity" than in leading interesting lives in a civilized manner; and restate the South's own tradition in terms of whatever useful things the North can offer. Throughout the Southern press a controversy has raged about "I'll Take My Stand!" The quickest way to find out what stand is worth taking toward industry in the South is to drop the Southern folk-concept of "the North" as a homogeneous unit of go-getters with a good line of sales talk and plenty of "personality." The most interesting element in the North—most interesting anyhow to me as a Southerner—has already recognized the distinctive attributes of the South. If these Northerners would take the next step and recognize in those attributes an elder American tradition submerged by violence but now resurgent, a tradition sufficiently their own to rob it of its right to be called merely "the South," then—well, then there would indeed be no North, no South. But not in the sense in which Grant used the phrase to Lee. Or was it Grant?

Danville: Labor's Southern Outpost

By LOUIS STANLEY

Danville, Va., January 10

YOU travel westward across the State of Virginia, past snow-spotted mountain ridges, past scraggy fields that have recently grown tobacco, past windowless stone and clay buildings where the leaves were cured not long ago, until you arrive at the city of Danville with its population of 22,000. There you are suddenly hurled into a unique industrial conflict of major proportions. Four thousand men and women are in revolt against the Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills, Inc., the largest cotton-goods company below the Mason and Dixon line, and the central issue of their strike is the right to form a union of their own.

The trouble started when the management decided a year or two ago to extricate itself at the expense of the workers from the difficulties caused by the depression in the cotton-goods industry. The company had been paying 10 per cent on its common stock for years. In 1922 it had paid 20 per cent. There had been various extra dividends. In 1929 for the first time the company took dividends out of surplus. President Fitzgerald in his annual report to the stockholders stated that in many respects the year had been the most unsatisfactory since the World War.

In order to meet the new competitive conditions the company set out upon a policy of squeezing all the work it could out of its employees. A Boston engineering firm was engaged to introduce a speed-up system. Soon engineers overran the plant. The result was the "stretch-out," a scheme whereby the amount of work per worker was "stretched out," often doubled, while his wages were decreased. Part-time work aggravated the situation. On top of all this the company announced early in January, 1930, a 10 per cent wage cut to take effect February 1, regardless of the opposition of the employees' representatives in the company union that was euphemistically called "Industrial Democracy." In February the workers, having lost what little faith might have remained in the paternalism of the company, became a local of the United Textile Workers of America affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The company did its best to break the back of the union. It had to reduce its working force because of curtailed production, the "stretch-out," and reorganization of its plants to accommodate new lines. It hit upon the idea of accomplishing both its ends by discharging the most active union members. The workers never knew who would be without work next, and for a textile worker to be unemployed in a one-company town is to starve. Even their miserable homes, spreading through the neighboring mill village at Schoolfield, "like a poultry farm with telephone booths," as one of the strikers described them, are owned by the company. Finally, an ultimatum had to be given to the management to cease its attacks upon union members and reinstate those who had lost their positions. When the strike finally broke out on September 29, the union was already paying $1,600 a week for the relief of the victimized members. The walk-out may have come at a poor strategic moment, but the workers had no choice. They had to strike for the life of their union. Wages, hours, and working conditions have become unimportant.

There are many significant things about this strike. Long before it began the Danville situation had been attracting the attention of the entire South. The plant involved is the outstanding mill producing cotton goods in that region. Not only is it important because of its size but as a pioneer in the industrial revolution of the South—it will soon round out a half-century of existence—it has built up a remarkable reputation for integrity and efficiency. Its president, Harry R. Fitzgerald, is a prominent personality in the cotton industry. Its welfare work and its "Industrial Democracy" scheme of employee representation in management have won it many friends. The wages it has paid to its workers have been among the highest in the South. Whatever happens to the Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills will influence industrial relations in the South, particularly in textiles.

It is true that when President Green came to Danville to offer mediation to the company in an address to eight thousand strikers and their friends standing in a cold tobacco warehouse, he told the reporters that the success of the unionization of the South did not depend solely upon the outcome in Danville. To that extent he was right. Nevertheless, we must not underestimate the effect that victory or defeat will have. In other textile centers in the Piedmont workers have their eyes riveted upon Danville, as the writer found upon visiting Leaksville, Reidsville, Spray, and Greensboro, North Carolina. North Carolina, it will be remembered, is now the leading cotton-goods manufacturing State, while the South accounts for more than half of the production of the country.

Employers throughout the South are watching Danville, too. The Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills, Inc., was the first to undertake wage-cutting below the Mason and Dixon line, following the onslaught of the "stretch-out." Everywhere manufacturers are withholding attacks upon their workers until they see what happens in Danville and it is generally understood that they stand ready to help President Fitzgerald and his company whenever it seems necessary.

This strike is vital also because of the human element in it. In most textile centers in the South the workers are fresh from the hills and farms. They are individualistic. They are unacquainted with one another. They do not understand industrial discipline. In Danville the situation is different. The Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills have given employment to generations of the same family. The workers are a homogeneous group. They are used to factory existence. They know how to work together. That is why they have been able to develop such a remarkable communal life during the strike and why Francis Gorman, vice-president of the United Textile Workers, and Matilda Lindsay, of the Women's Trade Union League, who were sent in by the A. F. of L. to run the strike, have been able to leave so much responsibility in the hands of the strikers and the magnificent local leaders.

Then, too, unlike most textile workers in the South those in Danville have some tradition of the labor movement. Thirty years ago a strike took place there in which one thousand men and women demanded the ten-hour day. Technically the strikers were defeated; nevertheless, the ten-hour day was established, partly by State legislation and partly by consent of the company. The workers have always felt they won a moral victory and today young people on strike will upon their own initiative tell what they know of the grand affair of three decades ago about which their fathers, grandfathers, or other relatives have told them. Among workers who a year ago had no union you will actually find union families much as one meets them in the coal fields.

There have been other attempts at unionism and, indeed, the inauguration of the "Industrial Democracy" in 1919 was to stop the spread of the movement. The skilled loom-fixers, however, have managed to maintain an organization. They had been affiliated as a local with the National Loom-Fixers' Association of America for about six years, when in 1925 they broke away and formed the Loom-Fixers' Southern Association of America. The Danville local remained the only one in the new organization. The Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills recognized the loom-fixers' union without signing a written agreement. Wages and disputes were adjusted by negotiations and no strike was ever called. Even the introduction of the "stretch-out" found the loom-fixers fairly well off. It was the 10 per cent cut that struck them their first telling blow. In the meantime they had come to realize that their isolation left them in a weak position and that affiliation with the A. F. of L. organization, the United Textile Workers, was highly desirable.

This leads us to another feature of the Danville conflict. Often a strike occurs and then organizers are asked to come in to save the day or "outside agitators" enter the field and stir up trouble. Here the A. F. of L. had the opportunity to lay the ground-work in its own way. When the oppression of the company had become unbearable, workers approached the loom-fixers already affiliated with the A. F. of L. to take the leadership in organizing all the employees in the mills for united resistance. Through the efforts of the loom-fixers, A. F. of L. organizers came into Danville. The first mass meeting was held in the city on February 9 and Local 1685 of the United Textile Workers was chartered. Within a few weeks practically all the workers in the mills were members of the union. The organization work continued through the spring and summer, which was marked by a huge parade of more than four thousand marchers, a Labor Chautauqua, and tremendous open-air meetings in the parks. The whole city throbbed with the organization campaign.

Another unusual aspect of the strike is the absence of sensational occurrences that would bring the struggle frequently and dramatically before newspaper readers. Outside of the South even friends of the labor movement are little informed of what has been taking place. This comparative tranquillity has been due to the peculiar relationship of the strikers to the rest of the local population. They have had a great deal of sympathy from the community in spite of the powerful interests on the side of the company. The workers in the mills come from families that have been living in Danville and vicinity for many generations. They permeate the life of the city. They constitute large blocs in the fraternal societies. Even the Ku Klux Klan is under their control. A policeman lost his membership in it for lack of union sympathy. In the schools the main task of the teachers is to keep the children from discussing the strike during class hours. Merchants have contributed to the cause of the strikers and in any case have not cared to displease them for fear of the loss of patronage. Some of the owners of the tobacco warehouses have donated the use of their buildings to the union for special occasions.

The Riverside and Dan River Cotton Mills, Inc., however, dominates the city and of course controls the mill village of Schoolfield completely. The company's shares of stock are widely distributed in Danville but the majority are in the hands of a few wealthy citizens, who speak through President Fitzgerald. Among the largest stockholders are James R. Prichett, president of the biggest bank in town, the First National, and Rorer James, publisher of the city's two dailies, the Register (morning) and the Bee (afternoon.) The first gentleman has great influence with the business men and the second is responsible for the publication of strike news in a light so unfavorable to the workers that the latter have coined the epigram, "The Register does not register and the Bee stings." The ministers have dodged the issue or declared themselves in opposition to the strikers. Only one or two have dared to help the union. Naturally, the strikers' respect for the church has considerably diminished.

The union's first flush of mass picketing by the light and warmth of bonfires and stoves has been eliminated by means of injunctions, special city and county police, and State troops. This interference by the government has impeded the progress of the strike and made workers talk of taking a more active part in politics. The militia has not been as hostile as might be expected and is now being gradually withdrawn. The strike has been on the whole peaceful—the few cases of dynamiting have been attributed by the union to the efforts of strike-breakers to insure to themselves police protection. The city police generally come from the same social strata as the strikers and are not so vicious as police have been under similar circumstances. Of course, there have been unjustified arrests and even the throwing of a tear-gas bomb to disperse pickets.

As the strike has progressed the business men have become uneasy. Trade has been seriously affected. The bank clearings of the three commercial banks of Danville have declined from $117,964,109 in 1929 to $98,519,909 in 1930. Time deposits have diminished. There have been many failures of retail stores. The added expense to the city and county of maintaining police and to the State of keeping militiamen in the field has called forth the resentment of taxpayers. Secretly many merchants would now like to see the end of the strike, no matter who wins.

The outcome of the Danville strike will determine the speed with which the unionization of the South will proceed. There is now an upturn in the cotton-goods market and the company will be wanting to fill orders. Relief, therefore, becomes an urgent necessity. Those who wish to further the organization of the workers in the South must contribute generously and without delay.

In the Driftway

THE family album is not what it used to be but the Drifter has reason to know that it still has its place in the hinterland of America. And on such occasions as Christmas it is brought out, in fun or in respectful silence. The Drifter will never forget one cordial father-in-law whom he overheard conducting his son's wife through the stiff-backed, double-faced gallery of the treasured book. "These are my parents," he said as he paused at a place. "This," he continued, as he pointed at the early Victorian gentleman with whiskers on the left, "is my father." "And this," he went on relentlessly, indicating the sweet-faced lady on the right, "is my mother."

* * * * *

BUT even if the album, along with the huge picture of father, young and smooth of face, that used to have a gilded easel of its own, has disappeared from the parlor, it still exists in its irreducible elements, the pictures themselves. And it is not always a cheering thought that in some long-shut bureau drawer, in some deserted attic, or, it may be, in a second-hand store, lie the depositions of our former selves—at six months looking natural for the last time, or at six years holding a new and silly toy without which the photographer would have been faced with a tearful countenance and a sulky mouth. As the years went by, and each child became less of a novelty and delight to his family, the photographs dwindled in size and number, but undoubtedly there was a graduation picture for the eighth grade, for high school, and for college. The whole story is there for anyone to see. One young man of the Drifter's acquaintance tells how in a burst of unhumble generosity at the age of ten he gathered up all the records of a blond and much-photographed childhood and distributed them among the neighbors. By that method, to be sure, he destroyed the damning continuity of his pictorial record. But assuming that the pictures were not labeled clearly, such tactics have their disadvantages. How long did those neighbors remember the name of the blond cherub which bore no resemblance to the other cherubs in the box of pictures? Not for long. And while an old photograph recognized and in its proper setting may be at least amusing, there is something sad and baffling about an old portrait whose identity has been lost. The human mind demands a name for every thing, whether the name means anything or not. And so the Drifter hopes that if any of his baby pictures have gone astray in a cruel world each one is duly labeled The Drifter.

THE impulse which gives rise to photographs is born of an understandable and pathetic human frailty, the desire to preserve the moment. But there are times when it ceases to be either understandable or touching. The Drifter is thinking now of some of the family groups that he has gazed upon, and particularly of one in which he himself was—and is—irrevocably posed. When he was extremely young he lived in a house which suffered the distinction one wild autumn night of having its entire roof blown off by a wind that has not yet been forgotten in those parts. The Drifter remembers vividly the moment when the house was finally abandoned for a neighbor's hospitality. He was blown into a ditch on the perilous journey. And he recalls how the roof looked the next morning as it rested almost intact on top of the orchard lot beside the house. He remembers also, though he has never been able to explain the parental motive, that he was summoned home from school one bright morning a few days after the storm to find every other member of the family—and a photographer—waiting for him. The family was forthwith stationed about the ruins at scattered points and a picture was taken of the roofless house and the roofed orchard, the prostrate picket fence and the fallen poplar tree. Presently there was added to the family collection one dozen large-sized photographs of that memorable scene. And while the Drifter is on the subject he cannot help recalling the episode of the family portrait in "The Vicar of Wakefield." The portrait, it will be recalled, depicted each member of the household holding an orange in his hand and the work was pronounced satisfactory in every way—until the fatal fact was discovered that the picture was so large that it could not pass through the door of the house.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Yellow-Dog Injunction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 31 is an article under the caption The Yellow-Dog Injunction which in every line breathes class hatred, prejudice, and animosity against employers of labor. It seems to me that the author goes too far in assuming that unionized labor represents the true interest of the wage-earners in this country, since unionized labor comprises only about 3,000,000 or 10 per cent of our 35,000,000 wage-earners.

Organized labor has chosen its seat in Washington, close to the law-makers. It is carrying on an intensive propaganda for laws which would enlarge its powers for mischief. These are not in the true interest of the workers and have no support from 90 per cent of their number who decline to be coerced into unions. The small minority desires, however, to rule not only the employed but also the employers. Free laborers refusing to be unionized are called scabs. Equitable contracts between employers and employees, with both sides represented by counsel, are misrepresented as forced and called yellow-dog contracts because they impose obligations on the employed as well as on the employer.

The militant methods of irresponsible unionized labor in calling strikes and bedeviling employers with arbitrary working rules and systematically creating class hatred are a distinct menace to society. All these tactics are practiced by the union heads merely from lust for power and from greed, taxing the union members for their comfortable but parasitical existence.

The courts in most cases see through the screen of hypocrisy and misrepresentation and therefore seek to protect life and property by injunction against unlawful and riotous acts of the misled and excited men. If here and there a court should transgress just limits, there are always the higher courts to curb them.

The Nation seems to have made itself the mouthpiece of unionized labor and its coercive means and methods. In fairness to its readers, of whom the great majority, I am sure, are drawn neither from the labor unions nor from the capitalists, but from the cultured middle class of moderate means, The Nation should get an impartial author to analyze and illuminate the other side of the controversy concerning the yellow-dog injunction. This would be in consonance with the principles of fairness in a journal which pretends to serve justice and the public weal.

Jersey City, N. J., January 1 SUBSCRIBER

Better Ideals than Regular Meals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. George Selenine's mental reaction to Mr. Corey's article on Insuring Wages is hardly as unique as your publication of his protest would lead one to expect. Several of my acquaintances who read the article in question raised precisely the same objections. Insuring wages implies placing them on a par with dividends. The recipients of dividends are people who have saved their money which they possibly earned in the form of wages; wage-earners are often persons who have squandered their money; to insure the steady flow of wages would encourage them in their profligacy and, incidentally, defraud them of the chance of ever attaining to the dignity of receiving dividends.

The man of wealth in the Middle West, very unlike his compeer in other lands, is a benefactor of mankind, for he does not hoard his money but invests it, chiefly to provide employment for his less fortunate and often less virtuous brothers. This is the credo of the Middle West, shared by poor and rich alike and most vociferously and strenuously defended by the poor. In fact, the leaner the pocket-book of a man, the less he feels inclined to part with the hope of ever having a full one. Any proposal that aims at interference with the legitimate pursuit of gathering wealth is instantly stigmatized as socialism, and socialism, as we all know or should know, is chiefly objectionable not because it aims at despoiling the rich but because it aims at taking the hope of becoming rich from the poor, and hence "leaves them nothing to work for."

Clinton, Iowa, December 28 J. C. MENZEL

Have the Farmers Had Enough?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: F. J. Steidl in his communication to The Nation of December 31 submits figures and statements to show that the farmers are in a sorry situation. He remarks that "agriculture has long been bled by organized and highly protected industry."

No honest, intelligent person will deny the truth of Mr. Steidl's assertions. But now one wonders if the farmers have finally had enough. Will they, in the future, refuse to support the party and system which has squeezed them dry? It is generally believed that the farmers, as a class, have quite consistently supported the party now in power. Who is to blame for their plight except the so-called leaders of that party?

Mr. Steidl also mentions the fact that he has been reading The Nation for many years, so it may be taken for granted that he is not one of those who have been misled by the campaign and platform pledges of the Republican Party in the past. But most farmers have.

St. Paul, Minn., January 1 B. C. BORRESON

We Are Ukrainians

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When The Nation printed the article The Polish Terror in Galicia, I pointed out to a friend: "But look—we are called Ruthenians." And he answered: "To be exact, the writer says: 'the Ukrainians or Ruthenians.' Everybody understands that he means Ukrainians." I let the matter go. After all, a rose by any other name —

But then in another issue of The Nation I read in an editorial: "However, even before he set out to suppress the Ruthenian and German minorities . . ." I decided to write and set my mind at ease.

We Ukrainians have been given many names in the course of the centuries. We have been called Little Russians, Red Russians, plain Russians, Rusins, Rusnaks, Ruthenians. The habit among other nations of giving us many names has no doubt helped to make of us a Cinderella among the peoples—unloved, uncared for, and unwanted. However, a day came when we gazed into a brighter future. And we Ukrainians sometime ago decided to give up all old names once and for all time and cling to the name Ukrainians.

The term Ruthenians is quite passé. We were called Ruthenians in the heyday of the Austrian Empire, but in truth it has no more meaning than the term Little Russians, which was imposed upon us by the Russian government of other days.

We who speak the language of Shevtchenko and Franko call ourselves Ukrainians and we wish to be called Ukrainians by others no matter whether we come from the Ukraine of Kiev or from East Galicia. The word Ruthenians is misleading and may I say somewhat insulting, for, after all, people very naturally prefer to be called by the name that rightfully belongs to them.

New York, January 1 MARIE GAMBEL

Cow-Catchers for Pedestrians

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In view of the tens of thousands of persons killed annually by automobiles in the United States (two-thirds of them women and children) I think it will be admitted that no means of saving human lives should be neglected. I, therefore, propose that every motor vehicle should be equipped with a fender expressly designed to save the lives of pedestrians. Most of the street tramways and railway engines in the United States are, if I remember rightly, equipped with such life-saving fenders, designed to pick up, with as little injury as possible, any person who may be struck, and carry him until the car can be stopped.

The fender at present used by automobiles is, on the contrary, intended only to preserve the car itself from injury. Practically, it must be very efficient in breaking a pedestrian's leg at the knee or fracturing a little child's skull.

Basle, Switzerland, December 20 BERTRAND SHADWELL

A Word of Cheer

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is, of course, quite possible for a subscriber to renew and to sit quietly by saying nothing. But I feel that I should, once every so often, express the fact that I like The Nation immensely. It is perhaps unfortunate that I agree with its dicta so frequently that it seldom moves me to fervid correspondence. Its clarity remains a delight as well as an inspiration and I trust I may be forgiven, as rather an old subscriber now, for agreeing more often than I disagree with the material you present.

Mt. Rainier, Md., January 3 T. SWANN HARDING

100,000 Fords

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my article on Russian "Dumping" in your issue of December 17, through a mistake in typing, it was stated that the Soviet Union five years, perhaps four years, from now will be manufacturing 1,000,000 Fords. It should have been 100,000.

Berlin, January 1 LOUIS FISCHER

Literary Requests

Josh Billings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am writing a life of Henry Wheeler Shaw (Josh Billings). I should like to communicate with anyone who has letters from him or information about him. Letters should be addressed to me at the Mark Twain Society, Webster Groves, Missouri.

Webster Groves, Mo., December 8 CYRIL CLEMENS

Richard Hengist Horne

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am writing a biography of Richard Hengist Horne (1803-1884), adventurer, journalist, critic, dramatist, poet ("Orion," 1843, republished 1929, Scholartis Press).

I shall be grateful to scholars and collectors who will communicate with me at 120 Derby Hall, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, regarding any letters, original manuscripts (published or unpublished), or special information concerning Mr. Horne.

Columbus, Ohio, December 15 ERI J. SHUMAKER

Dr. Mary E. Walker

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am in quest of biographical material concerning that most active, interesting, and eccentric woman, Dr. Mary E. Walker, and would like to get in touch with anyone who knew her, or with anyone who could and would lend me for a short time letters, clippings, or documents of any kind relating to her. My address is 1306 South 35th Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska.

Omaha, December 28 MRS. CHARLES W. M. POYNTER

Books, Drama, Films

The Hunted Fox

By SONIA RUTHELE NOVAK

If I can find the cave, where once I fell
When I was but an awkward, ambling cub,
In high, deceptive vine and leafy shrub,
I'll hide an hour or two. (I did not tell
My mother then, for any fox knows well
How secrets always pay.) And I shall scrub
My nose in hollow-nesting sand; and rub
My haunches on the walls where spiders dwell.

My tongue will catch the trickling, tonic drip
Of seepings, cool and dank. But there's the horn!
The wind will shift my scent! And now hounds slip
Across the hill! My brush whips under thorn
As guileless hooves bring redcoats down the dip
To jingle bits, and circle me with scorn.

Pictures for Songs

Monografía de 406 grabados de José Guadalupe Posada. Introduction in English and Spanish by Frances Toor and Diego Rivera. Mexico City: Mexican Folkways: Talleres Gráficos de la Nación.

THE name of José Guadalupe Posada is probably known to only a few dozen Americans and probably to a very limited circle of Mexican painters and writers. But though his name is shrouded in obscurity, his work was known and loved by more Mexicans than any artist before or after him. No unprostituted artist of real merit has ever held sway over so large a percentage of the population of his country as did Posada. For more than thirty years he definitely and continuously shaped public opinion. He molded the aesthetic values of the masses; he directed their thoughts and their ideals. No man was too lowly to read and appreciate Posada's message. More than Madero, Zapata, or Santañon, he prepared the Mexican revolution which overthrew Díaz in 1910. He wrote his ideas in clear, large letters upon the minds and hearts of his people, made concrete for them their sorrows, their weaknesses, their strength, their enslavement, and their hopes. So akin to the mass of Mexican people was he, that he passed by unheralded. Yet he helped to forge a nation's soul—a great spirit who worked in poverty and humbleness, an almost anonymous genius.

The Mexican revolution has been described as a mass rebellion against the tyrannies of Díaz, a movement which sprang armed from the dust of despair, but which had no preliminary philosophers to shape its ideals. It had Posada, the artist, who spoke in narrative pictographs in a language intelligible to the common people long before the Spanish conquest. The revolution has since produced the agrarian race leaders Zapata and Carrillo, the novelist Azuela, the painters Rivera and Orozco—to mention the only important persons who have not defiled their trust; but Posada made the revolution.

Is this an exaggeration? In the time of Díaz over 90 per cent of the population was illiterate. But the Mexican masses have never lost their plastic perceptions. Decoration, design, painting have played an intimate role in the life of the remotest pueblo—in the adornment of stores and pulque shops, of walls and stoves, the painting of retablos for the churches, the making of chests, lacquer ware, fabrics, and a hundred other common objects. The Mexican masses could not read, but for thirty years, from one end of Mexico to the other, they looked at the zinc etchings of Posada. He produced fifteen thousand cuts to illustrate the stories, the legends, the songs and prayers of the common people. Not only did he influence the literate of the capital and larger provincial centers in a series of pungent satirical magazines such as Argos, La Patria, El Ahuizote, and El Hijo del Ahuizote, in which with unflagging zeal and mordant satire he ridiculed the Díaz regime, but his sketches circulated into the remotest sierras. He worked for a pittance for the leading publishing house of popular literature, Vanegas Arroyo, in a carriage entrance beside the church of Santa Inez and the San Carlos Academy of Fine Arts, turning out unsigned masterpieces, which were printed on cheap, spongy, colored paper as illustrations for popular ballads to be sent out to all parts of the country. No one knew the author, but everyone read his message.

Posada died in 1913, but one may still vividly understand how these ballads were disseminated. Go to the smallest town in Mexico, and in the market, spread out on canvas, are heaps of these ballads. They are a cross between a newspaper and a song. They herald the latest events in verse. Many of those sold today still carry the illustrations of Posada. Often they are peddled by blind itinerant musicians, who sing them so that the buyers can repeat the tunes on the far ranches during the siestas and under the stars. While the songs are being played, the leaflets are passed from hand to hand, and though the hearers cannot read they enjoy the illustrations.

All of Posada's cuts not worn out, lost, or stolen during the revolution have been dug out of dustheaps, remounted, and reproduced in this volume through the efforts of Frances Toor, the editor of Mexican Folkways, and the artist Paul O'Higgins—406 out of 15,000. Much could have been added to the volume by more intelligent arrangement and by proper notes: an admirable opportunity for an epic portrayal of thirty odd years of Mexican life; but the editors cannot be severely taken to task in view of the service they have rendered in salvaging what was left of Posada; as Rivera says, "so integrated with the popular soul of Mexico that perhaps his identity will become completely lost." But even from this scant crop, Posada will increasingly be recognized as the father of the modern Mexican art movement, and perhaps as greater, in his way, than any living Mexican artist.

For, quite apart from his social significance, or perhaps in great measure because of it, he is a powerful artist. He made his etchings upon the metal with graver and acid, without preliminary sketches, as though he desired the most direct expression possible of his intense concepts. He did this for his daily bread, but in every line there is recorded an uncorrupted soul, with a genial universality, a comprehensive pity and tolerance, wedded to a bitter hatred of injustice; and withal a spirit inimitably, unmistakably Mexican. His work is racy, of the soil, constantly at grips with all of life as he knows it and evaluates it, so passionately provincial that it transcends all provincialism.

All of Mexico is here, its despotisms and cruelties, its revolution, its triumphs and its defeats. He spares neither rich nor poor, powerful nor humble, arraigning them all, now violently, now with comprehensive geniality. He makes the macabre suavely respectable, and that which is respectable is stripped to its inner corruption. He tells of executions by rope and bullet, of martyrdom, of the separation of loved ones, of prisoners, of riots, and jealousy and vengeance. He loves demons and skulls and dwarfs and queer people; and his demons are more demoniacal than the worst dream; and his skulls jovially ape all the foibles of man. He is melodramatic, at times gruesome, but a quirk of humor or naivete holds his delineations to a simplicity greater than any sophistication and hence satisfying to the most sophisticated. He loves paradox. His pompous generals and politicians are bloated with death; he makes the white bones of death dance and carouse and love and hate with inimitable drollery. His quietest pictures are tense with a quality of motion; and he flings galloping horsemen into a rhythmic frieze, clutching into a few inches of space the whole abstract concept of movement by a paradoxical fixity.

To know the work of Posada is a thrilling aesthetic and intellectual experience. Writes Diego Rivera:

> The production of Posada, free of even a shadow of imitation, has a pure Mexican quality. By analyzing the work of Posada, a complete understanding of the social life of the Mexican people can be obtained. . . . His work because of its form comprehends all plastic, and because of its content comprehends all life.

In Posada's work, toward later years, there is the groundswell of disillusion. His records of the violences of the revolution lose all trace of geniality, grow more bitter, but never quite so bitter as his skull of the bloodthirsty reactionary Huerta attached to the body of a loathsome spider.

Fortunately he did not live long enough to see the cause he espoused betrayed by those sworn to protect it.

CARLETON BEALS

American Churches

The Story of Religions in America. By William Warren Sweet. Harper and Brothers. $4.

EVEN those authors of treatises on the gods to whom all religions tell the same old story must find something amazing in this volume. For religion appears here luxuriantly variegated by all its earthly and unearthly forms; so that no candid reader with half an eye for truth can close the book with the feeling of understanding the essence of all religions. He must rather confess that the ways of the Lord are altogether marvelous.

What makes Professor Sweet's "Story" so powerful is that the facts are allowed to speak for themselves. There is a minimum of moralizing. With considerable skill he has interwoven the tortuous histories of the many churches in America in order that each may be understood in relation to the others. There is no single story, no inner plot. The intricate mass of ecclesiastical events is set before us quite clearly by a competent historian and preacher, who is therefore to be doubly congratulated on writing a history without an obvious moral.

I cannot repeat the outlines of the story, however, without venturing upon the moral. One after another the various denominations of European malcontents are served up and scrambled into that raw potpourri known as the American people. We see the religious outcasts of Europe transplanted to the New World, each group seeking to live here by the truths for which it had fought at home—and finding this more positive task more difficult! But instead of devoting themselves to a free cultivation of their cults, the colonists soon lose themselves in the American wilderness. Their European background fades and they scatter like wildfire wherever free and fertile lands lure them. They become pioneers, wildmen, restless, homeless, illiterate. Their religions accordingly become enthusiastic, orgiastic, fantastic. From this emotional wilderness American religions have not yet been able to recover their intellectual balance, for each time they have seemed to be on the point of producing something significant, some new wave of dispersion has destroyed their infant culture. The Puritan Congregationalists, for example, were just getting nicely settled in worldly wisdom and worldly goods when a wave of relatively bigoted Scotch-Irish Presbyterians hit them and insisted on staging what they called a Great Awakening. Then came several waves of still more enthusiastic and illiterate Quakers, Baptists, and Methodists, who had a "deep-seated prejudice against educated and salaried ministers" (p. 314), and who itinerated madly on horseback over huge circuits exhorting, "felling" sinners, and organizing the "great popular churches." These churches in turn might have settled down to being civilized had they not been "burnt over" successively by the enthusiasms of abolitionism, civil war, and big business. As it is, the recurrent periods of "spiritual deadness" with all their aridity are refreshing when compared with the fierce blasts of religious epidemics.

Professor Sweet wisely refrains from saying all this. Others may find something else written between the lines. The lines themselves are freighted with facts, and these are far from cold. They pique the imagination and invite speculation.

The narrative proper ends with the Reconstruction period; the last chapter, being devoted to everything since that period, is necessarily little more than an outline for a second volume. Perhaps it is just as well that Professor Sweet closed his story where he did, for probably neither he nor anyone else could now tell the recent story with the detachment and honesty which characterize his narrative of the earlier events. Nevertheless, we are impatient to hear the rest of the story from him. The growth of Catholicism since the Irish immigration, the new inventions in Judaism, theosophy, and other non-Christian religions, as well as the intellectual and social liberalism within recent Protestantism, would add interesting chapters.

The author is at his best in describing the westward migrations and the way in which the Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists built their imposing national organizations out of the crude resources of the frontier. The social and political power of these organizations, now seeking to combine their forces, gives added point to the amusing statement quoted from the Calvinistic Congregationalist Nathaniel Emmons, who would have nothing to do with these expansive tendencies on the ground that "Association leads to Consociation; Consociation leads to Presbyterianism; Presbyterianism leads to Episcopacy; Episcopacy leads to Roman Catholicism; and Roman Catholicism is an ultimate fact" (p. 296).

HERBERT W. SCHNEIDER

The Death of Gaiety

The Decline of Merry England. By Storm Jameson. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

IN the age of Cobden the fall of the Stuart monarchy was one of God's favors to the Anglo-Saxon race. The twentieth century is not so certain. Laud and Wentworth were trying to regulate business in the interests of the common good. With the victory of Puritanism certain things which we would gladly recover disappeared from English soil—pagan festivals and a sense of tradition, national music and dancing, a physical pride and sense of well-being. Such writers as Mr. Tawney have revised certain of the dogmas of the whig historians; but we have not yet had a full-length history reinterpreting the Reformation and the Revolution in all their aspects.

Tory-socialist historians are sometimes Catholic, like Mr. Hollis; but more often their bias is Anglican, and, for the chaos of modern industrialism, they blame not the breach with Rome but the victory of the Puritans. Miss Jameson is Anglican:

she appreciates the significance in English history of the whig families whose power was built on the robbery of the church, and she does not forget the cruelty and self-indulgence of Elizabethan society; but in her opinion "Merry England" reached its climax in the reign of Elizabeth. In spite of her Anglicanism she is artist enough to appreciate the paganism of the poets and buccaneers, and the older indigenous paganism of the common people. In this book she describes this "Merry England"; and then shows how the national cause was betrayed by Stuart incompetence, how Puritan bigotry destroyed the natural cheerfulness and the aesthetic instincts of the English race, and how the old belief in the supremacy of the commonwealth gave place to the individualism of the Puritan merchants and industrialists. She has not made any detailed or scientific analysis of the progress of events, and her debt to Mr. Tawney's "Religion and the Rise of Capitalism" is evident on every page; her aim has been to illustrate a preconceived thesis by quotations and anecdotes from contemporary sources.

The evidence presented in this book will be hard to refute. Professor Morison has argued that the Puritans loved good craftsmanship; but a traditional good taste is not destroyed in a single generation, and it is undeniable that they ruined English music, hated the popular festivals, and proposed to tear down the cathedrals. The Puritan ministers were sufficiently medieval to denounce avarice; but in the long run the exaltation of the private conscience against authority, and of the bourgeois virtues of thrift and hard labor against the aristocratic virtue of generosity, produced modern industrialism. The Elizabethans quoted by Miss Jameson lived in a society of traditional beauty and gaiety, rooted in the soil and conscious of its duties to posterity; after the Puritan revolution that society disappeared.

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES

Pressure Politics

Labor and Capital in National Politics. By Harwood Lawrence Childs. Ohio State University Press. $3.

PROFESSOR CHILDS adheres to the no longer novel view that the key to an understanding of modern politics is found in the pressure of groups. In illustrating this view he limits his attention to the American Federation of Labor and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. A large part of his book is concerned with the procedural similarities and differences of the two organizations, but the more vital questions of policy and objective are slighted. It is, however, made evident that organized labor and organized capital feel impelled to exert pressure upon government agencies in order to "defend" what they regard as their interests. In this process each group tends to rationalize its conduct, taking for granted that the welfare of the group is identical with that of the public at large.

That deeper issues are involved than might be gathered from much of the discussion is implicit in this statement near the close: "There is every reason to suppose that even today access to the centers of public officialdom is much smoother and easier for the chamber than for the federation." This relative ease of "access" has its chief significance in the fact that the groups examined construe their interests as largely opposed—a fact not to be obscured by the author's view that "at no time in its history has the federation been accorded the favorable recognition that it has been receiving, even by many sections of the employer's world." The greater political pressure the chamber of commerce and allied organizations customarily exert is likely to impress informed persons as being in the nature of things. Business, through property ownership and control, possesses great strategic advantage.

Perhaps this would not be so if organization obtained among wage-earners to the same degree that it does among business men. American unionism is doubtless no stronger than it is because many wage-earners, faced by self-confident and well-fortified business interests, fear that little is to be gained and that much may be lost through union affiliation. This fear might be overcome in a measure if it were not accompanied by an optimistic individualism which causes many wage-earners to visualize themselves or their children as future members of a class "above" that in which they are temporarily detained. In time, optimism of this kind will doubtless give way before an increasing realization of the meaning of economic tendencies. In that event, unionism will of course rest on a broader base than it does at present under the domination of an aristocracy of skilled workers. And with a greater infusion of machine-tenders and other types of labor relatively lacking in skill, one may anticipate a broadening of the objectives to which labor aspires. To the extent that politics is involved, the technique for attaining these objectives will probably change from the present "non-partisan" policy of the federation to a type of pressure politics that finds expression through a labor party. In consequence, labor's power in Congress and in State legislatures may become appreciably greater.

But one should not be too confident of this. For as long as the preponderant factor of wealth ownership remains substantially unaltered, it is difficult to discern how the essence of government will be much changed. That a large labor-party vote and occasional labor "control of the government" do not of necessity result in marked changes in basic institutions is demonstrated by an examination of the functioning of labor and Socialist parties in Europe. Such concessions as business grants in these European countries are designed to keep the working population sufficiently satisfied for it to permit the substance of ownership and control to remain unimpaired. This outcome appears to be inevitable—as long as the principal forms of property remain in private hands. For until others will assume responsibility for some alternative, the flow of profits must be sufficient to induce entrepreneurs to continue in control.

Much of the concern shown by Professor Childs in his last chapter, consequently, seems beside the point. He draws back from the idea that any one group should, through control of the government, control the state, and he goes to some pains to explain that "group" and "state" are different concepts. Traditional definitions in political science may require these distinctions. But by his own evidence Professor Childs makes it clear which group controls the "state."

LYLE W. COOPER

Lawrence

D. H. Lawrence. By Rebecca West. London: Martin Secker. 3s. 6d.

THIS short book bears the authentic marks of Rebecca West's style, such as show themselves in "The Strange Necessity" and even in her recent novel. She thinks by paragraphs. There is a chastening incapacity for the commonplace. There is a prepossession for the discovery of first or final causes—a habit of interjecting "why?"—which is a joy to the philosophic, if not to the lay and lazy, reader. The ground for her interest in Lawrence is novel to most people and typical for her. He "had the earnestness of the Patristic writers" and "like them could know no peace till he had discovered what made men lust after death."

Yet it is just here that Rebecca West's enthusiasm for genius on the defensive makes her pass over, in this brief notice of a personal acquaintance, the man and his work, a doubt which most of us entertain about Lawrence. He stands forth as the champion of life against a God-fearing, life-hating Puritanic shame. But was he indeed such—a faun, an evangelic nature-god, a Rampion?

If anyone will study the writings of Lawrence he will find a strange desire, under the guise of friendship, love, eros-worship, to dominate. First, men friends; then a refuge from male resistance in women; then, when these are cloying, tend to mother, do not give the full sense of power, back to the stronger, fighting relation with men—a movement reaching its full expression in "Kangaroo." Again Lawrence fails to dominate—the agony of the war is the agony of the physical reject who wants to be the proud objector—and, in the "Plumed Serpent," he seeks a new refuge, where it is always to be found, in worship of powerful gods who do dominate, as the man Lawrence cannot: who dominate others. Already, in the "Lost Girl," at the end, there is the hint of life, as it alone brings rest, as the dark tide—the insistence upon masochism at least for the other half of humanity. In "Lady Chatterley's Lover" there is the hatred of power (in the crippled aristocrat) which does not bite: the center of the plot is not love unashamed but the rape of power from the powerless—from the other half of Lawrence. In the earlier but more matured "Plumed Serpent," as in "The Woman Who Rode Away," the life-god is avowed as a cruel Aztec god who asks bloody worship and human sacrifice. Reason (not just dead academic intellect such as preoccupies Aldous Huxley) forbids this red anarchy of the passions, so against reason Lawrence raises beckoning standards of revolt.

Freud, in his last book, has come to a recognition, long preached by Adler, of the intertwining of the sadic instinct of destruction with the love instinct. Lawrence, maybe, is the more catholic, to use Rebecca West's symbolism, for including in his one person both Ormuzd and Ahriman. But very certainly he is not just Ormuzd, a god of dawn and noon-sun, a Balder persecuted by wicked men. We fear Lawrence—perhaps it is our frailty: but I do not think so—because, back of all the good denunciation of cant and dead men making life fetid, back of the endearing personality "as little sinister as a humming-bird" and the artist with the gift of making experience tremble with life, his writings, in their deeper soul (so it seems; so, without malice, I suggest), were smudged with the cruel Satanic mines, were smudged with cruel fear.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Warriors for Peace

The Fight for Peace. By Devere Allen. The Macmillan Company. $5.

NO mariner ever thought of trying to sail a ship without a compass and a logbook, and no merchant ever succeeded in doing business without occasionally consulting his ledger. Peace workers, on the contrary, have conducted their campaign against war with almost no reference to the pioneer experience which lay back of their movement. The chief aim of Mr. Allen in writing this admirable book has been to supply the engineers of peace with the lessons of experience, to give them perspective, and to enable them to work on something other than a trial-and-error basis. One should hasten to add that this has not been his sole aim. He believes, and rightly, that there ought to be an adequate record of the organized war against war which enlisted men and women of unusually gifted personalities in battles characterized by hard defeats, illusory successes, agonizing struggles, and some noble victories. By incorporating large masses of first-hand material Mr. Allen makes many of these forgotten, though vivid and vital, people live again. This achievement is the more remarkable because he has followed the topical and analytical rather than the chronological method of presenting his material. Though not a professional historian, Mr. Allen has produced a book which is both scholarly and popular. Characterized by admirable factual accuracy, it is a very valuable contribution to the story of the unofficial peace movement in America.

Few historical works, when they appear, promise to exert very much influence on thought and action. It is perhaps too much to hope that this book, which runs upward of seven hundred pages, will be read widely enough to produce the effect intended by the author. Briefly, the upshot of Mr. Allen's diagnosis of the fight for peace is that its warriors, for the most part, have not been real warriors. The almost perpetual confusion and general ineffectiveness of the opponents of war have been largely due to the fact that their ethical and intellectual points of view have been self-contradictory: they have set about to overthrow the war-method while still retaining a deep-lying faith in that method. Mr. Allen believes that peace advocates, in their great desire to conciliate the civil power, have weakened their cause by constant compromising and by presenting an appeal emotionally inferior to the dramatic, colorful, and consistent appeal of the militarists and patriots.

The only anti-militarists who have not truckled to the point of view and methods of the state have been the anarchists—whom Mr. Allen does not mention at all. While one may have, however, great respect for the courage and consistency of Emma Goldman and her followers, one cannot but ask whether their rigid refusal to compromise with militarism and governmental methods has not been at least as ineffective as the more timid and cautious tactics of the bourgeois pacifists. Although Mr. Allen has sustained with ample evidence his well-deserved indictment of the bulk of conservative peace workers, he has underrated their real contributions. Nor has he entirely explained their half-hearted and fair-weather pacifism. It was, I think, half-hearted and conciliatory, and therefore ineffective, because to a considerable extent it was merely a compensation for increasing militarism and materialism; because it was working in a hostile environment which attached great rewards, pecuniary as well as moral, to war-making; and, as Mr. Allen points out, because it did not ally itself with the labor movement.

Mr. Allen recognizes the validity and importance of multiple complementary approaches to the problem of ending war and securing peace; he evaluates outlawry, international organization, and the protests of religious and economic groups. Nowhere has a more persuasive case been made for the efficacy of war resistance, or the consistent refusal to compromise under any circumstances whatever with the war system. Certainly if war resistance could win the adherence even of Mr. Einstein's 2 per cent of the population, it might be more effective in preventing a possible war between communism and capitalism, or between East and West, than many of the legal, juridical, and international agencies on which so many friends of peace lean so heavily.

Very few men have a deeper or more intelligent appreciation than Mr. Allen of the need of pacifism to provide a pacific agency for social and economic change and adjustment. Possibly he is right in maintaining that the fight for peace can be won, not merely by removing the present economic causes of war, but only by strengthening, broadening, and deepening radical pacifism which refuses under any circumstances to sanction the war method. It is this conviction, which is so brilliantly elaborated in these pages, that makes this book a splendid antidote to the talk of tired peace advocates and of those generally who find slipping away from them their faith in the possibility of reforming the social order by intelligent, concerted action.

MERLE CURTI

Books in Brief

Mosaic. By G. B. Stern. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

In "Mosaic" Miss Stern, at her brilliant best, lavishes the richness and warmth of her powers on certain groups of that far-flung Rakonitz-Czelovar-Bettleheim family whose ramifications were followed in part in "The Matriarch" and "A Deputy Was King." Her saga may yet win the right to a place beside the family novels of Mann, Galsworthy, Hamsun—novels growing out of a deep emotional sense of those vast river systems of blood, draining a great network of capillaries, coursing down the generations, binding great bodies of human lives together. "Mosaic" is principally about the Paris branch of the family, about Berthe Czelovar and her sister Letti and the comings and goings and doings at their appartement Seize-Rue-Caumont. Always at Seize-Rue-Caumont there are visiting relatives, other members of this cosmopolitan, Jewish family. Maybe it is little Freda or Tony from London; or Rudi, the great operetta composer, from Vienna; or Etienne and his wife, Camille—née De Jong—from San Remo; or the Matriarch herself. And always letters, or maybe telegrams, containing news of births and deaths and good and bad fortune. So deeply is the story of Berthe immersed in the flux of family affairs that only gradually does the great, warm, selfishly generous, obtuse, frustrated egotist that she is emerge from the mosaic pattern. Only in retrospect, so absorbing are the people and so delightful is the manner, is one able to appreciate the deftness, discipline, and economy that govern the flood of emotional power which surrounds the characters in this book. Miss Stern has not yet received from the critics her full due.

Isabella of Spain. By William Thomas Walsh. Robert M. McBride and Company. $5.

The latest writer to succumb to the fascination of a reign that inspired such great writers as Irving, Lea, and Prescott has produced a biography of a queen whose outstanding characteristics were piety, dignity, courage, and inflexible determination. These traits ideally fitted her for her life work and enabled her to accomplish the impossible. Her chief task was to raise Castile out of the depths of baronial anarchy, unify Spain, and place it in the forefront of European Powers. In this she was eminently successful, but the price paid was high. During the process of achieving unity and prestige, Spain, the most tolerant and democratic nation in Europe, became one of the most intolerant and undemocratic. This unhappy result the author has failed to see, doubtless because of an ardent Catholicism that has prevented him from developing the objectivity so necessary to the true historian. His enthusiasm for Isabella's religious aims has also blinded him to defects in character and has inspired a vigorous defense against writers who have been critical of her policies. The historian Lea particularly offends him and consequently is subjected to a scathing denunciation. Such an attitude has given us a picture of a queen too perfect to be human; a defense too belligerent to be convincing. The respect due the author's conclusions can be somewhat estimated by the fact that his brief bibliography lists the works of Hilaire Belloc and Sabatini but not the standard histories of Merriman and Altamira.

Lyric America. By Alfred Kreymborg. Coward-McCann. $5.

"Lyric America" is an anthology of poetry from 1630 to 1930, and a companion work to Mr. Kreymborg's outline of American poetry, "Our Singing Strength." Both books have the virtues and the vices of books covering, and of necessity rather hastily, a very large field. Both serve merely as outlines, and even in this capacity not very well. Mr. Kreymborg's chief contribution is his research among the very earliest American poets. No other books include these early Colonials. His chief failure lies in the fact that including almost every known poet as he does, he cannot evaluate properly the greater figures. He protests against critics of his first book, against critics in general, in his long introduction, wherein the value of poetry is greatly exalted above that of criticism. We do not disagree with this point. When he states that he has deliberately chosen the inclusive method rather than the critical, we must grant him his choice. But that books of the type of "Lyric America" are of less value than more critically selected anthologies we do affirm, though there is place for both and for many other varieties of anthologies.

Orpheus. Myths of the World. By Padraic Colum. Twenty Engravings by Boris Artzybasheff. The Macmillan Company. $5.

This handsome volume is an attempt to suggest the riches of the earth with respect to the stories of gods and heroes which have flourished on it in all times and places. Mr. Colum, of course, can only hint at these riches; but he does so with great effectiveness, and his renderings of significant tales from seventeen cultures, beginning with the Egyptian and ending with the Zuni, are of such a nature that they may very well lead the reader into further explorations of his own.

The Sculpture and Sculptors of Greece. By Gisela M. Richter. Yale University Press. $12.

First published in a limited edition, this notable work now appears in a less expensive format. While $12 is still a very high price, the book has 750 half-tone illustrations and could hardly have been produced more cheaply. The text is divided into two sections, one dealing with the historical background and the evolution in technique from primitive forms to the classic, the other telling what is known of the sculptors and their works. Well written and displaying keen judgment and ripe scholarship, the book falls short in one respect—it does not satisfactorily account for the one great failure of Greek sculpture, the lack of facial expression. Miss Richter explains that Greek sculptors deliberately chose to generalize the features, for fear that facial individualization might mar the unity of the whole figure. This explanation is unsatisfactory. An inexpressive head on an expressive body destroys unity. The headless Winged Victory, and, indeed, most of the magnificent torsos and decapitated figures that remain to us, are perhaps actually better statues without their heads than they would be had the accidents of time spared them.

Uniting Europe. By William E. Rappard. With a Preface by Edward M. House. Yale University Press. $3.

Professor Rappard, who for years has worked diligently and devotedly to further the cause of world peace through the building up of war-prevention machinery at Geneva and elsewhere, is not over-happy or enthusiastic about the prospects for the future. In this collection of lectures delivered before the Institute of Politics at Williamstown he examines the progress made to date by the League of Nations and by other agencies. He sees "promising symptoms of a wholesale evolution," but confesses that it would take more optimism than he can command to say that the prospects for real disarmament and international cooperation "are bright today." National isolation he believes to be a formidable obstacle to the cause, and he is anxious to have the United States show more willingness than it has to date in helping Europe solve the problem of peace, but he weakens his argument against national isolation by agreeing that "every state has the right to consult primarily its national interest in the formulation of its national policies." This is the bed-rock principle of nationalism, to which many coun-

Present day subjects of vital interest

THE Extension School of Adult Education, New York University, offers a program of organized yet unrestricted study for those who would be abreast of the day. There are no academic requirements beyond an alert and open mind. Among the courses to be offered are: The Theater of Today, Contemporary Literature, Psychology Today, and other equally interesting courses. Second term registration begins February 3d. Write now for bulletin to

Rufus D. Smith, Director,
University Extension Division

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY
103 Washington Square East
New York, N. Y.

Two Lectures on DISARMAMENT
By
SENOR SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA

Friday, Jan. 23rd and Thursday, Jan. 29th
5:20 to 6:50 P. M.

For the Two Lectures - $3.00
Single Lecture - - - 1.50

Write for Catalogue 11 describing in full all the courses offered at

The NEW SCHOOL For SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street, New York
Algonquin 4-2567

tries besides the United States adhere, and so long as it defies successful challenge there can be but small hope of lasting peace.

The Epochs of German History. By J. Haller. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

It is a pity that this brilliant historical work is spoiled by Professor Haller's overvaluation of political processes, which he sees only as the manipulation of power, and by his astonishing obtuseness to the significance of his own findings. He frankly arraigns the disunity of the nation before Bismarck, the selfishness and mediocrity of the old German princes. Acknowledging the havoc done by their petty ambitions and by the imperialism of the Hapsburgs, he is apparently incapable of seeing that the nationalism which he advocates must lead and has led to similar and greater disasters in international politics. To make his points Professor Haller at times ignores and at other times understates the remarkable culture and vigor of the German people during their periods of comparative political powerlessness.

Chingis-Khan. By B. Ya. Vladimirtsov. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

After one able chapter on Mongol life and institutions Professor Vladimirtsov's biography of the bloody conqueror declines into commonplace hero-worship. Much of it is taken up with a defense of Chingis against the charge of brutality, a defense that, in addition to being singularly pointless and unsuccessful, weakens the book by nullifying the chief features of the hero's portrait.

Black Bread and Red Coffins. By Negley Farson. The Century Company. $4.

Mr. Farson, roaming reporter for the Chicago Daily News, on an extended trip last year poked into countless out-of-the-way places in Russia. So quickly is change taking place that many of Mr. Farson's observations are already out of date. Nevertheless he has presented in excellent narrative form a worthwhile series of sketches of the new, yet old, Russian nation.

Drama

Deflating the Drama

IN spite of much moaning among the managers, 1931 finds the New York theater in a healthy condition, and this health may be partly explained on the ground of compulsory reduction. Like oil and copper, steel and automobiles, the entertainment field during boom times underwent a process of gross inflation. Theaters were built more rapidly than plays of consequence could be written. Now, in passing through the town, one may see the sign "For sale or rent" upon the doors of dozens of deserted playhouses.

I do not mean that the concentration of effort has meant a masterpiece for every going concern. But, at least, the present season has seen much less of the impossible and obviously inept than usual. As the cynical player said in "The Show Shop" of Jimmy Forbes: "It's always a bad year for bad plays." The reverse of this is approximately true.

In a season during which the buying public is supposed to be on strike, and all luxury industries moribund, "Grand Hotel" is crowded at each performance. And Mr. Kaufman's lively "Once in a Lifetime" also prospers exceedingly well. "The Green Pastures" is not yet within sight of any ending. Possibly, in the next few years, we may have a theatrical season restricted chiefly to palpable hits. There will be no room for the merely moderately successful attraction. Managers are beginning to decide quickly, and to accept defeat after a week or so, and not maintain a losing battle. In the old days there were producers who would suffer staggering losses with poor plays rather than confess defeat. The so-called commercial manager is, among other things, vain and sentimental. He has not been, in any hard-boiled sense of the word, sheer business man.

It is, perhaps, less than sporting to crow over anybody's failure. But I must confess a certain satisfaction at the Waterloo of "Smiles." Florenz Ziegfeld has done a really important work for the American theater. He was one of the first to give opportunity to the newer men in scene designing. This influence went far beyond the musical-comedy field, and there might never have been an opportunity for a Robert Edmond Jones or a Lee Simonson if it had not been for Ziegfeld's earlier alliance with Urban.

I realize that by now Urban probably seems an ultra-conservative to the younger men. But his advent in the theater marked an actual revolution from the old days of literalism. But of recent years it has seemed to me that Ziegfeld grew Victorian. He set his face resolutely against the coming of the new-style revue. It was obvious that New York audiences wanted something intimate, simple, and humorous. The triumph of the first "Little Show" should have been enough to establish the trend. Ziegfeld was not converted. He seemed to feel that he could continue to triumph by weight of names, of metal, and of chorus girls. If only a show were big enough, he seemed to feel that it could not fail to impress the theatergoers. And now "Smiles," one of the most elaborate of his productions, is being withdrawn at the end of a few weeks.

I am hoping that this may lead to merrier times in the musical-comedy field. It is trite, of course, to assail the managers with that old familiar question, "Why don't you buy a joke?" But there never has been a satisfactory answer to that question. We have a right to ask it again, and to keep on asking it. Possibly there may be a chance, now, for some of the younger men to show their worth in the field of musical comedy. There is no reason why the revue form should be nothing more than glitter and some measure of good dancing. George Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind in "Strike Up the Band" made it manifest that there is opportunity for the satirists. Let them get going. Let us have now a real chance for the wits of our day to show us in gay fashion just what they think of this world in which we live.

HEYWOOD BROUN

One suspects that some time during the rehearsals of "Midnight" by Paul and Claire Sifton (Guild Theater), which the Theater Guild launched last week, certain changes were made in the text. The play was announced as a "passionate protest against capital punishment." It came out as less than that, ardent enough in spots, in others confused by wisecracks that seemed not to belong to it. The first act, in its delineation of how a citizen can be pursued by the hideous importunities of the tabloids, was even in tone, excellently acted, and a promise of something fine to come. The rest of the play was considerably less sure and the denouement is altogether uncertain in emphasis and therefore wanting in power. Glenn Anders and Frederick Perry are perhaps the best in a generally first-rate cast.

D. V. D.

Because of the pressure of his other work Heywood Broun has been obliged reluctantly to discontinue his regular dramatic reviewing for The Nation. Beginning with the next issue our contributing editor, Mark Van Doren, will review the drama until the return of Joseph Wood Krutch.—EDITOR THE NATION.

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

PLAYS TO SEE

Ruth Draper—Comedy—41 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of [illegible] Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
*Midnight—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
†This is New York—Plymouth—45 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

---

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

Sous les Toits de Paris—(French)—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Lightnin' beginning Sat., Jan. 17; Sin Takes a Holiday beginning Wed., Jan. 21—The Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.
All Russian Program—5th Ave. Playhouse—66 Fifth Ave.

MUSIC

Dusolina Giannini, soprano—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Jan. 20.
Vladimir Horowitz, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Wed. eve., Jan. 21.
Nina Koshetz, soprano—New School for Social Research—Tues. eve., Jan. 20.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie Hall—Fri. aft., Jan. 16; Sun. aft., Jan. 18; Thurs. eve., Jan. 15, 22; Sat. aft., Jan. 17.
Roth String Quartet—Town Hall—Wed. eve., Jan. 21.
Andres Segovia, guitarist—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Jan. 18.

LECTURES AND DISCUSSIONS

Hon. James W. Gerard on "The German Political Situation Today"—Auditorium—150 W. 85 St.—Tues., Jan. 20 at 8:30 P.M.
"Will The World Return to Religion?"—Debate between Gilert K. Chesterton and Clarence Darrow—Mecca Temple—133 W. 55 St.—Sun., Jan. 18 at 3 P.M.
"Disarmament" by Senor Salvador De Madariaga—New School For Social Research—66 W. 12 St.—Fri., Jan. 23 and Thurs., Jan. 29—5:20 to 6:50 P.M.
"Resolved that the Best Political Service Can Be Rendered by Joining the Socialist Party"—Debate—Heywood Broun and Clarence Darrow vs. Norman Thomas and Arthur Garfield Hays—Mecca Temple—133 W 55 St.—Fri., Jan. 30, 8:30 P.M.

LOUIS FISCHER
Authority on Soviet Affairs
Available for a limited number of lectures during February and March upon his return from Russia.
Address Manager, Room 1006, 32 Union Square, N. Y. C.

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
Saturday, January 24, 1931, at 12:45
Is There a Way Out For Society?
By Charity? By Social Legislation?
By Reorganizing The World?
GEORGE A. HASTINGS,
Asst. Secy., State Charities Aid Assn.;
Instructor in Public Opinion, Columbia University.
ABRAHAM EPSTEIN
Executive Director Am. Assn. for Old Age Security.
HARRY F. WARD,
Prof. at Union Theological Seminary.
Chairman, DR. HARRY W. LAIDLER,
Director of the League for Industrial Democracy.
Tickets $1.25 Non-Members $1.50
Undergraduate Students 75c
Make Reservations at the office of the L. I. D., 112 E. 19 St.

DEBATE

Friday Evening,
JANUARY 30, 8:30 p.m.

HEYWOOD BROUN NORMAN THOMAS

versus

CLARENCE DARROW ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

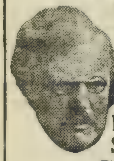
HARRIOT STANTON BLATCH, Chairman

"RESOLVED: THE BEST POLITICAL SERVICE CAN BE RENDERED BY JOINING THE SOCIALIST PARTY"

at MECCA TEMPLE
55th St., between 6th and 7th Aves.

Tickets, $2.50 to 75c. at League for Industrial Democracy, 112 E. 19th St.; Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15th St., or Mecca Temple Box Office.

Auspices: N. Y. Chapter, League for Industrial Democracy



International Debate of Supreme Importance!

LEE KEEDICK presents

GILBERT K. CHESTERTON Says "YES" VS. CLARENCE DARROW Says "NO"

On a Question of Unfailing Interest

"WILL THE WORLD RETURN TO RELIGION?"

MECCA TEMPLE 133 W. 55th St. Bet. 6 & 7 Avs.
SUNDAY, JAN. 18, at 3 P.M.

Tickets $1 to $3 Now on Sale at Box Office
Telephone CIr. 7-7986, or Office of LEE KEEDICK, 475 Fifth Avenue

TUES. EVE., JAN. 20th at 8:30

LEWIS BROWNE

will speak on

"A MORALITY FOR THE INTELLIGENT"

at the

WEST SIDE FORUM

West Side Meeting House
550 West 110th Street
(S. E. Corner Broadway)
New York

WED. EVE., JAN. 21st at 8:30

Dr. SAMUEL D. SCHMALHAUSEN

will speak on

"THE PSYCHOLOGY OF LIBERALISM; SOCIALISM; COMMUNISM"

at the

PROGRESSIVE OPEN FORUM

Schiff Center
2510 Valentine Avenue
(Fordham Road Station)
Bronx, N. Y.

Subscription 50c — Members 25c

Discussion Group, meets at West Side Meeting House Every Sunday at 3 P.M.
Jan. 25th Topic—The Soviet Five Year Plan—Oakley Johnson, Leader—Admission Free

Office: Affiliated Forums, 32 Union Square, N. Y. C.
Tel. STuyvesant 9-8072 Weekly notices mailed on request

Films

The Underworld

GANGSTERS and racketeers play so prominent a part in the American life of today that it would be little short of a miracle if their exploits were ignored by the movies. Nor are they. In fact, the number of films dealing with the underworld and its criminal activities is altogether too great. The actual proportion of these films in the total Hollywood output cannot be stated for lack of data. But it can hardly be very small, and if casual observation is to be trusted, there is reason to believe that it is growing steadily. It is sufficient to mention that the week under review saw four new pictures in New York belonging to this class, while several more were being shown in neighboring places.

Of course, there can be no objection to underworld films on the ground that they make crime too attractive. It is the business of the movies, as it is of the theater, to reflect life, and American life is American life. The trouble with these films is that they reflect the life of the underworld in a light that is altogether false. They crown the hold-up man and the safe-breaker with the romantic halo of bravery and adventure that helps to disguise their fundamental moronism. Nor do they ever make the slightest attempt to relate the criminal class to its social source, the economics and spirit of rapacious capitalism. But the glorification of the gangster, pursued mostly for the sake of cheap sensationalism, does not stop at this. To judge by some recent pictures of prison life, of which two, "The Criminal Code" (Mayfair) and "Paid" (Capitol), have just arrived on Broadway, the criminal is not only admired as a hero, but also pitied as a victim, a victim not of this acquisitive society of ours, but of its soulless law which demands an eye for an eye. It is true, the two films mentioned, which are both adaptations of well-known stage plays ("Paid" being the screen name of that famous play "Within the Law"), choose for their victims of the law two innocent characters; but this innocence is purely accidental, and the chief interest of the pictures, as well as their main emotional appeal, lies in their denunciation of the punitive law and its instrument, the prison. Granting the brutal vindictiveness of the penal system, one cannot help feeling that this sentimentalizing over the poor gunmen side by side with the meek acceptance of the conditions that breed the gunmen and create the prisons fosters a hypocritical attitude toward the existing evils.

Barring this false view of crime and punishment, it must be admitted that both "The Criminal Code" and "Paid" achieve considerable success in the presentation of their respective stories. The picture of prison life in the former is not so rich in detail as it was in "The Big House," but it is sufficiently harrowing to keep one spellbound. It is also capably acted, particularly by Walter Huston, though even he is not completely free of a certain stage effect in speech and bearing.

"Paid" does not deal so much with prison life as with its effect on a proud and resourceful young woman who went there without guilt and left it with the determination to avenge herself for her suffering. There is a great naturalness in the acting of this picture, the chief honors both for acting and striking beauty going to Miss Joan Crawford.

Mr. Ronald Colman is also a person with a "crime record" on the screen, but in "The Devil to Pay" (Gaiety) he is only a delightful, happy-go-lucky adventurer in life with a chivalrous regard for the ladies' feelings and quite unusual disregard of money. The picture is a sparkling and wholly entertaining trifle.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

☐ FILMS ☐ ☐ PLAYS ☐ LECTURES ☐

R K O CAMEO 42nd St. and B'way STARTS FRIDAY

— Special Added Attraction —

Amkino Presents

First COMPLETE PICTURES of the recent sensational TRIAL of the RUSSIAN SCIENTISTS in MOSCOW

In Addition to

AL-YEMEN

First Pictures Ever Made of this Strange Arabian Country

LIVES AND HABITS OF ARABS AND JEWS VIVIDLY, TRUTHFULLY PRESENTED. . . .

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT Continuous 10 A. M. to Midnight

Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Saturday

AMERICAN PREMIER

NOW PLAYING

Rene Clair's French Talking and Singing Film Masterpiece

"SOUS LES TOITS DE PARIS"

(Under the Roofs of Paris)

Acclaimed an artistic triumph in Europe and America

LITTLE CARNEGIE Playhouse Popular Prices

57th ST. EAST of 7th AVE. Direction Leo Brecher

CARNEGIE HALL—Wednesday Evening, Feb. 9th

YEHUDI

Menuhin

Mgt. Evans & Salter (Mason [illegible] Hamlin)

THE GROUP

A Clearing House of Opinion

Meets at Auditorium—150 WEST 85th STREET

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 20th, [illegible] 8:30 P.M.

HON. JAMES W. GERARD

(Ex-Ambassador to the German Empire) will speak on:

"The German Political Situation To-day"

(Weekly notices mailed on request)

Rand School of Social Science

7 East 15th Street Algonquin 4-3094

Europe Tomorrow: Socialist or Fascist?

Leo Krzycki, Socialist and Labor Organizer. Just returned from an extensive tour of France, Germany, Austria and Poland.

Saturday, January 17, 2 p.m. Admission 25c.

Social Reality and Imaginative Literature

Carl Van Doren, Editor-in-Chief for the Literary Guild

Monday, January 19, 8:30 p.m. Admission 50c.

—"A SMASH HIT"—Walter Winchell, Mirror—

"Joe Cook perfectly marvelous and the show perfectly beautiful"—Heywood Broun, Nation.

JOE COOK in "FINE and DANDY"

HIS NEWEST, MADDEST MUSICAL

ERLANGER'S THEATRE—W. 44th St.—PEN. 7963

Evening 8:30; Matinees, Wed. and Sat., 2:30

The Actor Managers, Inc., Present

RUTH DRAPER

in her original character [illegible]

Program Changed Daily

COMEDY THEATRE, 41st St. E. of Broadway. Matinees Thurs. & Sat. [illegible] 2:30. Eves. at 8:30, Sun., Tues., Wed. & Fri. Prices $1-$3

The Theatre Guild Presents

MIDNIGHT

GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN

Martin Beck Thea. 45th Street, West of Eighth Avenue. Eves., 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

"Robert E. Sherwood's best play."—Brown, Post.

Arthur Hopkins presents

This Is New York

A New Comedy by Robert E. Sherwood with LOIS MORAN

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St., W. of Bway. Eves. 8:40. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents

MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy Hit

VINEGAR TREE

PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - [illegible]

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

THE "FISH COMMITTEE" DINNER

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23rd at 6:30 p.m.

For Recognition of the Soviet Union

At Rossoff's Restaurant — 147 West 43rd Street

THEODORE DREISER, Chairman ROGER BALDWIN, Toastmaster

WILLIAM GROPPER, A. B. MAGIL, HARRY A POTENKIN, just returned from Moscow will tell of the ENGINEERS TRIAL

SERGEI RADAMSKY, Soviet Singer will speak on SOVIET ART

Tickets, $1.50. Telephone Stuyvesant 9-2698 not later than January 22nd

Come to the DANCE of the Association of Laboratory Technicians

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 24th, 1931

Hotel George Washington—Lexington Ave. at 23rd St., N. Y.

Subscription One Dollar and Fifty Cents

Tickets can be obtained [illegible] 247 Lexington Ave., Assn. of Laboratory Technicians

Poland Courts a New War

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

SOME weeks ago the Warsaw correspondent of the New Leader of London wrote that he felt it his duty "to ring the bells of alarm and make them heard in the remotest corners of Europe. A new bomb is being placed under the powder magazines of Europe—a bomb which threatens to blow up the whole edifice of post-war equilibrium. This time the danger comes from Poland and her military-fascist aggressiveness." The New Leader's correspondent was thinking primarily of the effect upon the rest of Europe of the course the Pilsudski dictatorship has been pursuing. He could foresee nothing but disaster, perhaps a revolution, perhaps another war, arising from the unrestricted dictatorship, the smothering of political freedom, the "engineered" elections of last November, the tragic "pacification" of the Ukraine, and the suppression by terrorism of national minorities elsewhere in Poland.

It may be that the correspondent painted the picture a little too dark. Yet a glance at the map suffices to show what perils the runaway dictatorship in Poland might have in store for the rest of Europe. To the immediate east is Russia, of which almost the entire continent lives in constant dread. To the west is Germany, with which Poland has been engaged in the bitterest sort of controversy these last eleven years. A clash with Russia, or an internal upheaval in Poland that would play into Russia's hands, contains many alarming possibilities. It is, however, the quarrel with Germany that presents the more immediate and more serious threat to the peace of Europe.

In Upper Silesia, Posen, and Pomerania is to be found what is unquestionably the sorest of the several sore spots in Europe. Whether justly or unjustly, Germany was deeply wounded when these territories were taken from her. Tact and discretion on the part of Poland might have served with the help of time to heal the wound. Far from being tactful or discreet, Poland has allowed its ultra-patriotic citizens to rub the wound with the salt of unrestrained chauvinism until it has become severely aggravated. In Germany this deliberate irritating of the Eastern frontier wound has let loose headstrong forces (by no means confined to the extreme right) which the Brüning Government may find itself unable to control.

Germany has appealed to the League of Nations Council for justice for the Germans in Poland. Notes sent to the Council on November 27, December 9, and December 17 recited in detail numerous individual instances of extremist activities in connection with the elections to the Polish parliament and Upper Silesian Sejm in November. They told of the unwarranted arrest of German candidates, of the summary disqualification upon the thinnest pretense of other German candidates, of the slugging of German voters by Polish patriots (six persons being killed in the ensuing riots), of other acts of terrorism designed to keep the German voters from the polls, of the circulation of the most inflammatory sort of posters and handbills calling upon the Poles to use every means at their command to prevent German votes from being cast. The posters and handbills, the notes said, were distributed by an organization calling itself the Silesian Rebels' League. Although the Polish government was not directly accused of responsibility for these extremist activities, many government officials were listed as officers or members of the Rebels' League, and it was charged that the acts of terrorism were at the very least openly tolerated by the Polish authorities.

The German protests merely skim the surface of the real problem. They do not go into the fundamental issues involved. These issues concern the rights of the German minority in Poland only incidentally. Nevertheless, when the German charges are taken up at the Council session scheduled to begin on January 19 the Berlin government will be compelled by international political circumstances to confine its argument to a discussion of minority rights. Were the German representative to go farther than this he would in effect be asking that the Versailles treaty be reexamined with a view to revision, and Germany is not yet prepared to go into this very delicate question. An airing of German-Polish relations at Geneva might, on the other hand, awaken Europe to the gravity of the situation, and this in turn might conceivably bring about the necessary readjustment and thereby relieve the present strain. But such an awakening appears too much to hope for. France and her allies, the arch-defenders of the European status quo, may be counted upon to stand in the way. Hence the Geneva debate must of necessity center about the rights of minorities, and a limited discussion of this sort cannot solve the basic problem.

One must go back to 1917 and to the peace conference to find the roots of the real difficulties separating Germany and Poland. In the early years of the war Polish leaders were divided on the question of whether they would have more to gain in their independence campaign by courting Russia and the Allies or by cultivating German friendship. Almost all the young Poles who took part in the war fought on the side of the Central Powers. These men looked to Joseph Pilsudski, ironically enough at that time an ardent pro-German, as their leader. Opposed to Pilsudski and his followers was a group, much smaller in number, that centered around the National Democratic Party and was led by Romain Dmowski and Ignace Paderewski. This group was decidedly, almost fanatically, pro-Ally. It demanded the restitution of all the territories which at any time in history had belonged to Poland, a course that certainly would have involved the annexation of considerable sections of German land beyond that which the Versailles treaty and the subsequent plebiscites and insurrections actually gave to Poland. Naturally the Dmowski faction was recognized by the Allies as the bona fide spokesman for the Polish people when it came time to negotiate the peace treaties.

The peace was actually negotiated by three men, Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Wilson. In the light of French policy Clemenceau could not have done otherwise than support the extremist demands of Dmowski, which were designed as much to weaken Germany as to create a strong Polish state. Lloyd George took an almost directly contrary stand. The balance of power therefore lay with Wilson. It cannot be doubted that Woodrow Wilson wanted justice done both sides. His position long had been that lands "indisputably Polish" should be ceded to Poland. Nevertheless he agreed to the cession of territories that were not "indisputably Polish."

Dmowski was ably seconded in his extravagant demands by Professor Robert Howard Lord of Harvard University, American technical delegate at the peace conference, who was strongly anti-German and who is credited with having invented the idea of the Corridor as a means of weakening Germany.

With his confused knowledge of European history, and with Dmowski and his technical adviser, Lord, bearing down on him from either side, it is small wonder that President Wilson surrendered to Clemenceau and the Poles on almost every point. Danzig was torn from Germany and made a Free City under Polish protection by the votes of the Clemenceau-Wilson majority. This was done on the theory that Poland had to have a free port and that Danzig was largely Polish, anyhow, though even the Poles today admit that Danzig is 97 per cent German. It may be noted, however, that Czecho-Slovakia, another creature of the peace conference and similarly cut off from the sea, has been satisfied with free-port privileges in Hamburg and that it was not necessary to detach Hamburg from Germany for this purpose. Moreover, the conference refused to allow a plebiscite in Danzig; it was created a Free City and made a part of the Polish customs system without the consent of its people.

In the same way the majority handed most of Posen and Pomerania (making up the Corridor) to Poland without seeking to establish by means of a plebiscite whether these areas were "indisputably Polish." As a matter of fact, the only districts in the Corridor that were granted plebiscites, Allenstein and Marienwerder, voted to remain German by majorities of 97.5 per cent and 92.8 per cent respectively. Upper Silesia was permitted to choose between Germany and Poland, but only after Lloyd George had succeeded by clever strategy and argument in wearing down the opposition of Wilson and Clemenceau. A plebiscite was held on March 12, 1921. It was preceded, however, by two military insurrections (engineered by Dmowski and led by Adalbert Korfanty in the hope of annexing Upper Silesia by force and thus confronting the Allies with a fait accompli) and by a veritable reign of terror designed to keep German sympathizers from the voting places. But despite the terrorism and notwithstanding the general assumption at the peace conference that Upper Silesia was unquestionably Polish, the plebiscite showed 707,393 votes for Germany and only 479,365 for Poland. According to Article 88 of the Treaty of Versailles a majority of the population was to decide to which country the province should belong. In clear violation of this article, the Allies discovered a minor technicality in another section of the treaty which they interpreted as giving them permission to divide the province and they allotted the pro-Polish voting districts to Poland. Before this could be arranged, however, a third Korfanty insurrection brought a solution which the Allies accepted. The regular and volunteer Polish troops took and held the eastern half of the province, including most of the mining and industrial properties, and this area was thereupon ceded to Poland without any ado whatever as to the legitimacy of the act. Adalbert Korfanty was primarily responsible for this Polish victory. He was recently rewarded for his patriotism by imprisonment in the fortress at Brest-Litovsk, whither he was sent by the once pro-German Pilsudski for having questioned the wisdom of Pilsudski's present anti-German policy in Upper Silesia.

Disregarding the conflicting Polish and German historic and ethnological claims to these territories, it must be conceded that an unqualified restoration of these lands to Germany would not solve the present difficulties between the two countries. The problem can only be met by an honest and thorough reexamination, coupled with a genuine desire, not only on the part of Germany, but also on the part of France, Poland, and their allies, to abide by the findings of that reexamination.

Until this is done there can be no hope for concrete improvement in the situation. It is not enough to say that the Germans should stop whining and complaining and should accept the penalties imposed upon them by the peace treaties. It is not enough, even granting that it were humanly possible, to tell the Germans to forget the grave economic problem created by the separation of East Prussia from Germany, the expropriation of the holdings of hundreds of thousands of Germans in Poland, the numerous irritating border incidents, the shameless neglect of the commercially important Vistula River, the suppression by terrorism of the German minorities. This might prove a workable solution if Poland herself were satisfied with the present arrangement. Clearly she is not. She wants more territory; her public leaders make no bones about their desire to annex Danzig, the whole of East Prussia, and the remainder of Upper Silesia. Propaganda and agitation with these ends in mind have lately been increasing in Poland. The propaganda is being spread along the frontiers and in East Prussia. It is openly tolerated, if not actually subsidized, by the Warsaw government. Some of the agitation is being carried forward by ostensibly disinterested writers and publicists, but more of it comes from the Polish Nationalist Association of the Western Marches and related organizations. These groups have undertaken what they describe as "the civil defense of the frontiers." More than 20,000 men have been organized, armed, and trained for warfare by the "civil defense." War games held by these groups have revealed their true purpose. In one set of maneuvers the capture of Marienwerder (which voted overwhelmingly for Germany) was the objective; at another time Western Upper Silesia was the goal. In addition the state police and the regular frontier guards maintain 25,000 men along the borders in readiness "for any emergency." Literature issued by these various groups keeps constantly before its members the thought that East Prussia and other German lands may some day be saved by Poland, and it repeatedly warns them to be prepared "for the next war against Germany."

In the several years that the Berlin government has been fighting for the rights of the German minorities, citing hundreds of cases of discrimination and oppression, the Polish authorities have been able to prove only a few cases of discrimination against Polish residents in Germany with which to offset the German case, and in all these cases it has been clearly established that erring or misguided individuals have been to blame. But today there are multiplying indications that this situation is changing, chiefly because of the growing German resentment of the Polish excesses, and herein lies the greatest menace to the peace of Europe. Following the November terrorism in Upper Silesia and the Corridor numerous German newspapers of nationalist inclinations called loudly for reprisals. The National Socialists in the Reichstag asked permission to form a volunteer corps of frontier guards "to prevent border incidents" and to "quell Polish excesses." Soon thereafter 200 armed fascists were seized near Breslau, not far from the Polish border, where they had gathered apparently with the intention of forming a frontier guard without the government's permission. In the Pomeranian district of Bütow 400 members of the Stahlhelm broke up a Polish children's festival, assaulted several persons, and damaged the Polish school. Similar attacks have been reported from other villages. Unfortunately, the rising tide of nationalism in Germany holds forth no promise of keeping this very recent development in check. If the provocations from across the border were to cease, the hotheaded nationalists in Germany could perhaps be restrained, but with Polish excesses continuing, these nationalist forces may provoke a border incident that will shake Europe.

At the moment the future looks dark. With the Pilsudski dictatorship riding roughshod over the Ukrainians, the Germans, and even over large groups of patriotic Poles who dare to disagree with Pilsudski, any small spark may set off a devastating explosion. Yet there is still time for Europe to take stock of the situation and turn to a consideration of remedial measures. Should Germany take the initiative in proposing a review of the peace treaties she would immediately arouse the most of Europe against her. Witness only the reaction of Europe to the Treviranus speeches of last September. The responsibility lies with France and the other defenders of the peace treaties.

Contributors to This Issue

GARDNER JACKSON is a Washington journalist until recently resident in Boston.

JOHN GUNTHER is correspondent in Central Europe and the Balkans for the Chicago Daily News.

STRINGFELLOW BARR is editor of the Virginia Quarterly.

LOUIS STANLEY, associate editor of the New Leader, has previously published in The Nation articles on Matthew Woll and on the Illinois miners.

SONIA RUTHELE NOVAK is the author of a book of poetry, "Winds from the Moon."

CARLETON BEALS was for many years a resident of Mexico.

HERBERT W. SCHNEIDER is professor of religion at Columbia University.

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES is the author of "Jonathan Edwards."

LYLE W. COOPER is professor of economics at Marquette University.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN has recently published "A Study of the Principles of Politics."

MERLE CURTI is associate professor of history at Smith College.

Mary Ware Dennett's Pamphlet
THE SEX SIDE OF LIFE
AN EXPLANATION FOR YOUNG PEOPLE
may be ordered by mail from the author's address
81 SINGER STREET, ASTORIA, L. I., NEW YORK CITY
Single copies 35c, three for $1.00
Lower rates on quantity orders for schools, mother's clubs, parent-teacher associations, social welfare groups, etc.

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Samples free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. JAMES ST. TWEED DEPOT, 150 Stornoway, Scotland.

An ideal place for winter vacations. ¶WESTERN VIEW FARM, New Milford, Conn., 83 miles from Columbus Circle, elevation 1000 feet. ¶Hospitality that is unique. It brings back friends year after year. Eleventh season. ¶Riding, mountain climbing, winter sports, or rest and quiet if you want it. ¶Interesting people. ¶Rates $8 a day, $49 a week. Telephone New Milford 440.

The story of the most unique and most astounding economic system that the world has ever known

RUSSIA'S PRODUCTIVE SYSTEM

By Emile Burns

An accurate, unbiased, up-to-the-minute account of the actual workings of the famous Five Year Plan. $4.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., INC., 300 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

GRAPHOLOGY

THIS is stock-taking time. Do not forget personal inventories of yourself and associates. Graphology practical. Send handwriting. Character study, $2.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

HANDWRITING expertly analyzed, $1.00. Send liberal sample, with remittance. Verax Graphology Service, Box 424, River Edge, N. J.

☐ SHOPPERS' CORNER ☐

GRIFFONS-BRUSSELS
Buy a friend for a friend. Adorable puppies, 3 months old. Privately bred.
Mrs. C. W. Crampton, VOlunteer 5-6858

43,000 Nation Readers look through these columns each week for information on the unusual.

If you have the unusual to offer—write us for our rates.

THE NATION 20 Vesey Street

MISCELLANEOUS

GERMAN NOTARY PUBLIC, Steamship tickets. Re-entry permits, traveler's checks, translations, Baggage Insurance, Affidavits, Passport Visas. All Nations Exchange. 251 W. 86th St., Corner Broadway. Tel. Susquehanna 7-6735.

REGINALD REYNOLDS of London, England, has original letters of which he proposes to sell in aid of the Friends of India Society
MAHATMA GANDHI
which is in urgent need of funds for its work in England.
Prospective purchasers can obtain copies of these letters from Susan Hoegland, Glenora, Yates Co., New York.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1931 No. 3421

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 85
EDITORIALS:
  A Party for the People 88
  Pity the Poor Reds 89
  The Indian Conference 89
  About the World 90
CAN GERMANY PAY? By Oswald Garrison Villard 91
A WASHINGTON HONOR ROLL. By Paul Y. Anderson 93
I'M TIRED OF BEANS. By Workless 95
A JOLT FOR HIGH LIGHT BILLS. By Virgil MacMickle 96
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 98
CORRESPONDENCE 99
BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA:
  Descent from the Tower. By Leslie Nelson Jennings 100
  Laski on Liberty. By Henry Hazlitt 100
  Pagan-Catholic Mexico. By Ernest Gruening 101
  Robert Frost. By Isidor Schneider 101
  More of the Sangers. By Dorothy Van Doren 102
  Report on Dr. Pattee. By Granville Hicks 103
  Books in Brief 104
  Music: From Behind a Screen. By Arthur Mendel 106
  Drama: The Comic Spirit Takes a Rest. By Mark Van Doren 107
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 108
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Mexico Turns to Facist Tactics. By Carleton Beals 110

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WHEN IS A DOLE NOT A DOLE? Apparently when it pleases Mr. Hoover to make political capital out of the suffering of many hundreds of thousands of his countrymen. A Congressional fund to relieve the victims of drought and depression would be a dole; but a privately raised fund belatedly sponsored by the President is described as charity. Perhaps a constitutional lawyer or a philologist might be able to explain the difference between the two, but frankly we see none. We believe that a Senate dollar will buy just as much as a Red Cross dollar. We believe that a hungry Arkansas farmer will get precisely as much nourishment out of a meal provided for him by Congress as he will from food paid for by Mr. Hoover's "sound American tradition and spirit of voluntary aid." This very necessary relief work must be undertaken and the people themselves must bear the cost, whether they pay the bill through taxes or in the form of voluntary contributions. The essential thing is to get relief to the stricken districts, whether this be done by the Red Cross alone, by Congress acting upon its own initiative, or by both of these agencies working together. What we do object to is the dilatory attitude Mr. Hoover has shown toward the whole question of relief. Congress, or at least the Senate, wanted to provide this very necessary relief many weeks ago, but Mr. Hoover has just now been awakened to the existence of an emergency.

THE TEMPERAMENT OF MR. HOOVER is such, however, that he cannot act promptly when the time for action arrives, and so overwhelming is his desire for reelection in 1932 that when he finally does move he places political considerations before all else. The unemployment situation offers an excellent example. He sought to minimize the extent of the unemployment until the clamor of undeniable truth grew so loud that he was forced to appoint an employment committee to study the problem and to show that the President really was on his toes. The move proved an empty political gesture. What, one may ask, has this committee done? Where are the results of its studies? Where are its recommendations? Even its chairman admits that while the committee has been studying, unemployment has been growing. With regard to the relief question the story is repeated. Mr. Hoover's shamefaced apologists in Congress cried down the suggestion of a dole, laughed at the idea that suffering was widespread. Alone and almost unaided, Senator La Follette revealed the sham of their legal arguments and showed up the hollow pretense of their insistence that relief was not necessary. Armed with unassailable facts the Wisconsin Senator compelled Mr. Hoover to swallow the words of his apologists and admit that relief was needed. There followed his appeal for Red Cross funds, which was so worded as to make it appear that the emergency had only lately arisen and that the President had responded promptly and generously to the needs of that emergency, whereas in truth he had refused to act, had indeed blocked all action, until the facts hurled at him from the Senate by Mr. La Follette and others proved more than he could stand. As a result of it all, the Senate, by a vote of 56 to 27, added a rider to the Interior Department appropriation bill giving the Red Cross $25,000,000 for food and other supplies. Administration leaders in the House express doubt whether they can hold their adherents in line against the rider.

LESS MONEY AND NOT MORE, if the money takes the form of federal appropriations for public works, is the exhortation of a committee of the American Engineering Council which has been considering methods of relieving business depression. The committee particularly condemns the proposal of adding another billion dollars to what is already available. Any such addition to the vast sum appropriated by the United States, the States, municipalities, railways, utilities, and other private agencies, even if it could be made immediately available, would, in the opinion of the committee, "be of secondary and relatively minor importance as a cure for the present depression." Moreover, no matter how large the appropriation, "the rate of expenditure and consequently the time within which its beneficial effects can be realized" depends upon the organization facilities which the government has and upon "conformity to legal requirements, the preparation of plans and specifications, the selection and acquisition of sites, the letting of contracts, and the actual work of construction." The hard-boiled engineers conclude that it will "tax to the utmost" the ability of governmental agencies to use the amounts already appropriated "with sufficient promptness to materially relieve the present economic situation" in less than two or three years. The report will be a bitter pill for Mr. Hoover and the other proponents of salvation through public works.

EUROPEAN CRITICISM of the United States since the World War has never, or at least until just recently, been wholly sincere. There has always been a sneaking respect for that idol beloved of most Americans called prosperity. Our wealth and our seemingly limitless capacity for increasing that wealth placed us on a high pedestal, and most Europeans, whether they liked it or not, envied us our lofty position. Not so today, however. The economic crash has reduced us to the level of more common clay. Fortunately for us, the unreal fawning which marked much of European criticism before our prosperity has not been replaced entirely by gratuitous sneers of the Mussolini variety. A good deal of the new criticism has been honestly and helpfully analytical. It has sought to understand our difficulties and it has discovered, what has been known to most intelligent Americans, that public and big-business leadership in this country is bankrupt. Fritz Neisser, economic correspondent in New York for the Berliner Tageblatt, has thoroughly explored this problem and has come to the same conclusion. In a recent dispatch to his newspaper he reviewed the attempts of the Hoover Administration to minimize the significance and extent of the depression, he revealed in brief but effective fashion the hopelessly feeble efforts of the government and big business to deal with the situation, and he closed with a devastating reference to Mr. Hoover's own confession that the whole problem must be left to work out itself. Herr Neisser has done a great service by revealing to Europe, which is said to be looking to the United States to lead it out of the depression, that neither the rulers of America nor Mr. Hoover can be depended upon to supply the necessary leadership.

FROM 1928-29 TO 1929-30 world cotton consumption declined by 653,000 bales, but world consumption of American cotton fell off by no less than 2,053,000 bales, consumption of other growths increasing by 1,400,000 bales, according to figures supplied by the International Cotton Federation. Students of the cotton situation declare that United States government stabilization operations have driven the cotton merchants largely out of the market, while mill men, in the face of unaccustomed marketing conditions, hesitate to buy except for immediate use. The government holds a huge stock of cotton as well as of wheat which hangs threateningly over the market. The pegged price of wheat at the same time is making it increasingly difficult to export flour, and the whole marketing situation is thrown into the utmost confusion. It is hard to see any but a political reason for continuation of a policy whose economic and financial results have already proved so disastrous.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT is not altogether happy over the report of the St. Lawrence Power Commission. The commission recommends the creation of a Power Authority with the legal and financial powers necessary to negotiate with the federal government and Canada and to construct the power plant. It recommends that the Power Authority trustees arrange for the transmission and distribution of the power by existing utility companies under a carefully drawn contract. In a minority report former Lieutenant Governor Conway advocates equipping the Power Authority specifically "with authority for construction, maintenance, and operation of its own transmission lines and also of distributing systems so far as may be necessary." He also wants the exclusive right of the trustees to fix rates expressly embodied in the contract. The contract plan of utility control has its advantages, and in this case it would save the cost of building transmission lines, but it is hard to see that it will give the Power Authority effective rate control, and it will certainly not give the State such liberty in rate-making as would be possible under independent State transmission. The Niagara Hudson Company, with its widespread system of transmission lines, is in a position of great advantage for distributing the power cheaply, which fact seems to have led the majority of the commission to favor private transmission. If any contract is to be made, its conditions should be such as to assure the benefits of that cheapness to the consumer.

ON MARCH 13, 1930, the New York Appellate Division removed Magistrate Vitale from office on charges growing out of the famous dinner given to the Magistrate when a detective lost his pistol to a naughty hold-up man. Since that day in March three magistrates have resigned under fire, another has been relieved of his duties pending his trial for buying his job (which trial has just ended in a disagreement), the grand jury is still in session to complete its investigation of the conduct in office of another magistrate, a Supreme Court justice has disappeared without a trace, and various nasty facts have come to light about the procedure in the magistrates' courts during the trials of women accused of soliciting. At this point in the current annals of a Tammany-run New York, Mayor Walker is described as on the verge of a complete nervous breakdown and in imperative need of a long, long rest. If the Rockefeller Institute, which has been making a thorough examination of Mr. Walker's condition, finds his blood pressure so low that it would endanger his health to continue his work, we cannot question a disinterested scientific opinion. But it is all the more unfortunate for Mr. Walker, for surely no nervous breakdown was ever more ill-timed. The Mayor is reported to be determined not to seem to run away while certain sections of the city administration are under such a cloud. He may well hesitate. Nobody begrudges the Mayor of New York a vacation; nobody wants Mr. Walker to work if his health demands that he rest. But the matter would have worn a better face if he had appeared to take the New York scandals a little more seriously instead of consistently minimizing them almost to the point of denying their existence.

EUROPEAN STATESMEN have again strikingly demonstrated their adherence to the strange belief that effective peace machinery can be built upon fear and suspicion. At the moment these statesmen are at work on M. Briand's plan for creating a United States of Europe. We understood that the plan was designed to bring the several nations of Europe into some sort of union in the interest of economic and political peace. As we rather naively saw it, the goal could be attained only by tactful and sincere cooperation. This view now appears to have been incorrect. A European union, according to the evidence on display in Geneva, is obviously more readily to be had by suspecting one's neighbor's motives or by playing on his fears. Thus were Russia and Turkey barred from the deliberations, although the technical ground given was their lack of membership in the League of Nations. At the recent Geneva session Germany and Italy joined in asking that Russia and Turkey, important European countries, be invited to take part in the negotiations. One might have supposed that Briand, father of the plan for a United States of Europe, would have given this request his most earnest consideration. Instead, he hastened to voice his suspicion that Italy and Germany, acting together as they did, were engaged in some deep-dyed plot aimed at France. He directly charged Foreign Minister Curtius of Germany with having forsaken France for Italy. He demanded that Curtius explain the meaning of this move. And the wonder of it all is that Briand is still confident of getting somewhere with his United States of Europe idea.

EXPOSURE by a League of Nations commission of an officially sponsored slave system in Liberia, coupled with Secretary Stimson's criticism of the officials responsible, has had immediate results. It has focused attention on the whole slavery problem, which in its turn promises to lead to definite action at Geneva. More encouraging, so far as Liberia itself is concerned, is the proposal for the correction of the Liberian situation set forth in an article by Raymond Leslie Buell in the Christian Science Monitor. Mr. Buell is an authority on certain African problems. His book, "The Native Problem in Africa," has been credited with being directly responsible for the League's report on Liberia. Reviewing the situation, he comes to the conclusion that the United States and the League should cooperate in remedying Liberian conditions. He recalls the success of the League in supervising Austrian and Hungarian financial affairs, but urges in the case of Liberia that the proposed supervision be extended to include education, health, public works, and native agricultural development. The reconstruction, Mr. Buell suggests, cannot be carried out unless the United States is willing to make some sacrifices. The program will call for an examination into the relations between the Firestone interests and the Liberian government, in which the Firestone loan, placing an "onerous interest burden" on Liberia, plays an important part. State Department officials, surprisingly enough, look with some favor upon the Buell proposal.

THE VESTAL COPYRIGHT BILL, which was passed by the House of Representatives on January 13, is not an entirely satisfactory measure, since it still continues some absurd restrictions on the importation of foreign books, but it nevertheless registers a notable advance in the legal protection which it accords to American authors, playwrights, artists, and composers. Under the present law, copyright protection runs for twenty-eight years with the privilege of extension for a similar period. The Vestal bill makes copyright automatically effective upon the creation of a work, and extends the protection for the author's lifetime and fifty years thereafter. It further permits the creator of a work to divide his copyright, as the present law does not, and to convey full legal title to the purchaser of serial, motion-picture, translation, or other rights. At the present time such rights may be reserved by the author or relinquished to him by the publisher or producer, but the full copyright protection still inheres in the first publisher or producer of the work. The bill has the further advantage of facilitating the entrance of the United States into the International Copyright Union, thereby giving the holder of an American copyright full legal protection, without further formalities, in the thirty or more countries that are members of the union. As American membership in the union must be accepted not later than August 1 next, every effort should be made to secure favorable action on the bill by the Senate before that time.

AFTER A BARE SIX MONTHS of organized war against the theater-ticket speculators in New York City, the League of New York Theaters has decided, at least for the present, to give up the ship. Harlow D. Savage, executive secretary, resigned on January 13. Dr. Henry Moskowitz, adviser to the league, announced that its affairs would be cleaned up and that its next program would include the study of stage censorship. Presumably the good old days are already back again, hardly any tickets for good shows will be on sale at the box offices, and would-be theatergoers are to have the privilege of paying a speculator anywhere from $5 up for $3.50 seats. When the New York public gets tired of paying exorbitant prices to see a play, it will stop paying those prices. When tickets can no longer be sold at a price far in advance of what is marked up over the box-office window, the price will go down. Meanwhile, in a bad season, the producers can only pray that with the old system of a "buy"—whereby a speculator pays cash in advance of opening for a large block of seats for six weeks or so—business will improve. When it is recalled that the League of New York Theaters was organized because business was so bad, the chances for improvement are not too bright.

BY THE DEATH OF ALLEN JOHNSON, editor of the "Dictionary of American Biography," who was struck by an automobile and fatally injured on January 18 in Washington, American letters suffers a severe loss. Mr. Johnson had been professor of history at Yale when he resigned to take over the editorship of the dictionary, but it was for his admirable work as editor of the "Chronicles of America" that the Council of Learned Societies made him their choice in 1926 to record American biography. He had been in communication with scholars all over the country; this acquaintanceship served him well in his new post, and he insisted besides, not only that the articles be written by the best available person, but that they be well written as well as accurate and complete. The volumes of the dictionary which have appeared so far have been not only admirable in content and tone but have made really interesting reading. All the more pity, therefore, that Mr. Johnson cannot continue the work that was being carried on so well. It will go on, of course, with a new editor and with the help of an able and hard-working staff. And one of their saddest duties will be to include Mr. Johnson's own biography.

A Party for the People

THE Republican Party is the party of privilege. Its weaker twin, the hybrid Democratic organization, differs from the G.O.P. only in that its desire to become the party of privilege has never been satisfied. It is willing to sell its soul at any time for the financial favors big business has to bestow on its political servants, as was pointedly shown in the Alton B. Parker campaign of 1904 and as has recently been revealed once more in the tilt between John J. Raskob, principal owner of the Democratic Party, and Frank Kent, defender of the Hoover faith. Essentially there is no difference between these two major parties except that the bankers and business men have found the Republicans more dependable.

The owners of the two major parties get what they want because they have the immense power that wealth confers upon them; because they are articulate, controlling as they do most of the press, the radio, the movies, and other machinery that molds public opinion, and because they understand the value of organization. They get what they want, but how about the ten million farmers, the three or four millions of organized workers (most of whom are decidedly not satisfied with the scraps the American Federation of Labor can wheedle out of big business by its compromising and groveling attitude), the many more millions of unorganized wage-earners, and the still other extensive groups of small business men, shopkeepers, clerical workers, professional people, and domestics? There is nothing whatever to indicate that they derive any immediate benefits from the governmental activities of the two major parties. The indirect benefits that come down to them are at best only incidental. These cannot be disregarded as having no value, but the vast classes of inarticulate persons must accept them exactly as they are received. They have no control over the nature or extent of these indirect benefits, because their political representatives work, not for them, but for the big-business owners of the political parties.

There is, for example, the plight of the farmers. In the 1928 campaign the Republicans vaguely promised them assistance through tariff manipulation and by other means. What happened? A tariff bill was passed that went through the meaningless gesture of protecting American farm products but at the same time raised the rates on many things the farmers must buy. A Federal Farm Board was established, and this organization is now in the process of gambling away $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money in the vain hope of bolstering up grain prices. But instead of grain prices being held up they have fallen far below the 1928 levels, and hundreds of thousands of farmers are in want or near the point of starvation as a result of their faith in Republican promises.

What have the other unrepresented classes to expect? One may look to the power interests for one answer. The power trust is in control in Washington. Its control is not complete, but it has the White House, which is essential. It can hardly be said that the power trust is interested in lowering the cost of electricity to the small householders and shopkeepers. Indeed, its activities look the other way, toward higher rates and increased protection for its profits and dividends. Another answer comes in connection with what President Hoover has or rather has not done to relieve or assist the workers in the present crisis. He asked a few business men not to cut wages, but they, the owners of the Republican Party, have been doing it under one guise or another ever since. What more could have been expected from a President who believes that any reasonable move toward helping the victims of the depression constitutes "playing politics at the expense of human misery"? But the most discouraging answer is the success the party leaders have had in selling the prosperity myth to the public.

It has become accepted theory that unless business is prosperous the rest of the country cannot prosper. Hence all the other economic groups, who do not directly share in the dividends of big business, must do nothing whatever, and most particularly must they refrain from attempting to advance their own interests, lest business be disturbed. It is not that the other groups do not want prosperity, but that they ought to have it on terms that will provide for more equitable distribution of its costs and benefits. This they cannot have unless they are given some voice in the shaping of conditions that make for prosperity. At present business interests are considered first in this connection, and the other groups are thought of, if at all, only in passing. What do we find the two major parties advocating in this unprecedented era of Hooverized depression? Simple and in the larger sense meaningless remedies that will tide us over (or at least the more fortunate of us) until prosperity returns. "Rugged individualism" must be preserved in the interest of the rugged individuals. Nothing must be done to disturb business. "Economic wounds must be healed," according to Mr. Hoover, by "the producers and consumers themselves." Not a single suggestion has come from either of the two parties looking toward any sort of social planning that might help us overcome the most glaring and unnecessary defect in our economic structure, that of recurrent periods of depression, or any of its many other deficiencies. The rugged individual can build up huge reserves against hard times, but how about the factory worker, the stenographer, the bookkeeper, the tenant farmer, the small householder? They must live off their savings, such as they are, or go prowling for food in the streets.

These great classes of producers cannot escape their fate by clinging to the two old parties. They must realize that their primary interests are not only distinct from, but directly in conflict with, the interests of the owners and managers of the major parties. They must organize in defense of their interests. They must, in short, become class conscious. This is the task to which the progressive and radical leaders of the country should address themselves. They must awaken these great classes to the realization that the Republicans and Democrats, and their financial masters, are opposed to them on every public question of the day. Until this is done there is small hope of launching an independent political movement that will give these classes a voice in the government at least equal to that of big business.

Pity the Poor Reds

PITY the poor Communists in America. Representative Fish, chairman of the red-hunting committee (called red-herring committee in Washington), has just had at them to the extent of 30,000 words. His revelations are startling, world-shaking, his conclusions and recommendations no less so. His report proves conclusively and apparently for the first time (or is it really the first time?) that there are a number of persons in this world who call themselves Communists and that some of these persons are at work in the United States. The report goes further and establishes beyond fear of successful contradiction that the reds do not like capitalism, that they abhor the present form of the United States government, and that they want to see the current political and economic show wiped out by a world revolution. This is, indeed, astounding and unexpected news.

Nevertheless, the report does have some value, perhaps not for the average American citizen, but certainly for the "Masters of Moscow" and their humbly obedient slaves in this land of rugged individuals. The next time Mr. Stalin calls one of his American agents to Moscow to reprove him for stalling on the job, the agent can simply hand him a copy of the Fish report. It offers the most eloquent rebuttal to the Comintern's ceaseless criticism of the ineffectiveness of American communism that has come within our ken in many a day.

Moscow may think there are only ten or twelve thousand Communists in this country, but Mr. Fish's committee has found that "there are possibly 500,000 or 600,000 Communists and active sympathizers in the United States." Moscow may be impatient because its representatives here are producing no tangible results, but Mr. Fish has learned that the Communists constitute a "real threat" among the "textile workers, clothing, garment, and needle workers, fur workers, food workers, shoe and leather workers, coal miners, metal workers, lumberjacks, building trades, and marine workers, and to a lesser degree among employees in rubber factories, and in automobile and automobile-body plants." Nor does Mr. Fish ignore the Communist press. He lists by name and gives the circulation of each of the red dailies, weeklies, and monthlies in the United States. He also reveals the names of the various red labor and fraternal organizations. It is all a very realistic and impressive review of Communist activities in this country. Pravda and Izvestia of Moscow can certainly use this material to convince the doubting Thomases at home that the world revolution is making deep inroads in the most capitalistic country on earth.

Mr. Fish has made a number of other notable discoveries too numerous to mention here. We refer those sufficiently curious to the report itself. It makes interesting, if not particularly enlightening, reading. While Mr. Fish may really have been seeking to convert Congress by the imposing array of facts and figures, partly stale and partly imaginary, that he has jammed into his rèport, we feel that he has also used the data contained therein as a vehicle for transferring the fight against communism from the plane of politics and economics to that of religious fear and racial prejudice. Mr. Fish gratuitously refers to the fathers of communism, Marx and Engels, as "two apostate Jews," thus slyly suggesting not only a non-American origin, but that communism was founded by two men who were traitors to their religion. The report states that the movement is largely in the hands of persons "of Jewish origin"; that its followers are aliens who "speak English with an accent, if at all," and that it advocates mixed marriages. Mr. Fish declares "hatred of God and all forms of religion" to be the first goal of communism and by quoting Matthew Woll, the renegade labor leader, he implies that Communists have no sense of ethics and therefore presumably are not to be trusted.

It was inevitable that Mr. Fish should ask that these ungodly and untrustworthy persons be driven from the country. If Mr. Fish would now devote as much energy and devotion to the task of driving out the causes that produce communism, we should not only forgive him his stupid and perhaps dangerous effort to stir up religious, racial, and class hatred against the Communists, and his waste of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money in "discovering" facts that have long been known to all newspaper readers, but we should also hasten to acclaim him for having courage to undertake a task so shamefully abandoned by the Herbert Hoovers, Charlie Schwabs, Owen Youngs, Joe Robinsons, and Jim Watsons of this country.

The Indian Conference

THE practical results of the Indian Round Table Conference are probably best summed up in the report of the committee on federal structure given out by Lord Sankey on January 12. The complete text is not yet available but according to cabled reports it is a delicately balanced composition of which the main theme and countertheme may be stated as follows: Responsibility for the federal government of India will in future rest upon the Indians themselves, subject to certain special reservations. The report goes on to outline the form and functions of the new constitution, and though lack of space prevents any detailed examination here, certain important points may be cited as indicating its general burden. Executive power is to be vested in the viceroy. He will appoint a prime minister who will choose his own cabinet. Ministers may retain office, however, only with the confidence of the legislature. Administration, financial and otherwise, of the army and foreign affairs is left entirely in the hands of the viceroy; the Indians are to have control over internal finance; but the viceroy may intervene when the credit of India seems to him likely to be prejudiced in the world money market. Finally, wide powers are available to the viceroy through his veto over legislation and by reason of such reservations as the following: ". . . in certain specified situations which may arise outside the sphere of these subjects [the army and foreign relations] the Governor General must be at liberty to act on his own responsibility and must be given the powers necessary to implement his decisions"; "in the event of a breakdown of the constitution adequate powers will have to be vested in the Governor General for the purpose of enabling the King's Government to be carried on."

So much for London. What about India itself? The Congress Party led by Mahatma Gandhi is, according to the Simon report, the strongest political power in India. It was not represented at the conference. At present it is an outlaw organization with at least 30,000 adherents in jail. Yet its activities—the boycott, the no-tax campaign, the civil-disobedience movement in general—are certainly not decreasing either in volume or intensity. It is obvious to anyone who has kept in touch with the Indian press that the Congress Party can cripple the working out of any British scheme of government if it so chooses. That it will choose to do just that to the Round Table report as it now stands is a foregone conclusion.

Here is an impossible situation. Practically, the British must either break the power of Gandhi or obtain the co-operation of the Congress Party in framing the new constitution for India. The first alternative seems entirely beyond achievement. The second seems almost as hopeless as the first—but not quite. In London, on January 15, Lord Sankey in presenting his report said this, among other things:

> There is a story in our Bible that wise men came from the East. I see many sitting at this table. But there are many still left in India whose opinion and whose assistance is necessary to complete the work of this conference and to start the future government of India on proper and safe lines.

It is obvious that his words refer to Gandhi and the Congress Party. Moreover, persistent rumors have indicated that many of the Round Table delegates, British as well as Indian, realize that Gandhi's support must be obtained if any new constitution is to succeed. To that end various delegates urged both publicly and in private that all political prisoners in British India, including Gandhi, be released from prison. It is further suggested that the Round Table Conference be resumed in India and that Gandhi, having been released, be invited to attend. Prime Minister MacDonald, in closing the conference, took note of the first suggestion and promised amnesty, but only on condition that the civil-disobedience campaign cease—a condition which Gandhi would certainly refuse.

It has been said over and over again in London since the conference opened that the British at last realize that India must eventually govern herself. If it is true that Great Britain has undergone, if not the idealistic "change of heart" that Gandhi has so long and so often demanded, at least a change of mind based on consideration of British-Indian trade figures since the boycott began, it could find no better way of indicating that change than by an act of amnesty. But it must be unconditional. Only then would it furnish tangible proof which Gandhi and his followers might honorably accept that the British raj has a heart as well as a bankbook, that it can and will keep its promises, and that "safeguards" are not merely a device for keeping power. On such a basis negotiations might proceed with more faith on both sides.

Governments are notoriously shortsighted, and there is perhaps little likelihood that anything either so generous or so practical will take place, but it is to be hoped that by some such move Great Britain may make it possible for India to have her freedom and yet be spared a revolution even more disastrous to life and trade than the one now going on.

About the World

NEGLECTED by book-review departments for forty-six years, "The World Almanac," of which the 1931 edition is lately off the press, is one of the most fascinating volumes this side of Ripley's "Believe It or Not," which in fact it resembles. In a smallish book easily held in the hand are assembled 948 pages printed in six-point type which put to shame the compendiums of week-end reading so popular with our publishers.

It would be impossible even to hint at the riches which this amazing book contains. Take the letter "A," for example; look up a few of the 300-odd items, and you will have information on the following subjects: Absolute Zero; Academic Doctors' Hoods, Colors of; Acids, Corrosive, Treatment for; Actors and Actresses, Favorite; Adam, What Language Did He Speak; Admirals, Rear, U. S. Navy; Afghanistan; Agua Caliente Races; Alaska, Altitudes in; Alcohol, Production and Consumption of; Alfred B. Nobel Prize Winners; American Academy of Arts and Letters; Anniversaries, Wedding; Apple Tree and Its Leaves; Ascension; Ash Wednesday; Automobiles on Farms, Number of; Azerbaijan, U. S. S. R.

Nor is this a mere dry-as-dust notation of names, places, heights, and lengths. A little research brings out the interesting fact that although the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World have been added to by fourteen others that are placed all the way from Rome to Angkor, not one as yet is credited to the United States, or even, indeed, to the Western Hemisphere. However, in a long list of memorable dates, beginning with the Deluge in 4,000 B.C., we have the following item, nearly at the end:

> Late in October (1929) the prices of stocks began to go downward. . . . Thousands of speculators were ruined, scores killed themselves, and the whole course of life was changed for the losers in one of the greatest stock-gambling movements in modern times. . . . President Hoover appointed committees . . . vast sums were pledged . . . toward increasing employment and thereby quickening all forms of legitimate business.

The United States thus bears its share of memorable catastrophes if not of marvels. Let us note briefly the following items: Of eighty-six political assassinations listed since 1865 fifty-two occurred after the murder of the Archduke Ferdinand at Sarajevo, or about 60 per cent in sixteen of the sixty-five years. The largest lighthouse in the United States is the White Shoal Lighthouse in Michigan, with 3,000,000 candle power; the largest in the world is the Cabo Sao Vicente light in Portugal, with 55,000,000 candle power. Of $150,000 in expense money paid to President Wilson in six years he spent only $91,662; of $125,000 paid President Coolidge in five years he spent $114,529. The fastest speed ever recorded by a pigeon in a race was 3,317 yards a minute, or only 203 yards less than two miles. Ambergris is a fatty substance found in the intestinal tract of diseased whales.

There may be citizens of the United States to whom all this information is well known; there may be others who do not want to know it. But for the vast body of us it is interesting, not to say instructive. Long life to "The World Almanac" for giving it to us.

Can Germany Pay?

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

St. Moritz, January 2

CAN Germany pay the reparations demanded of her and her debt to the United States? Of course, Germany can. A pound of flesh can always be had if there is no convenient law or trick to prevent, or the debtor does not perish. If the Allies and the United States insist, Germany can be made to pay in the course of generations, even if its government takes advantage of the moratorium provided under the Young Plan—as it probably will. But the question which the nations involved should put to themselves today is not Can Germany pay? but Should Germany pay? Can they afford to let Germany pay them at the cost of further introducing into the currents of world trade an unnatural factor which beyond doubt has had its share in causing and prolonging the present world-wide industrial crisis? Can they permit Germany to pay them at a cost of still lower standards of living, of enlarging the risk of German economic collapse, of inviting revolution and chaos, of arousing a bitterer spirit of resentment and a hatred of those who are helping to force Germany into its present straits?

Yes, Germany can pay, and you will find foreign observers in Berlin, official and unofficial, who will undertake to prove it to you in marks and pfennigs. They scoff at the idea that it cannot, and declare that "if Germany gets away with this it will get away with anything." First of all they point to the totally unnecessary naval expenditures, including the latest appropriation for beginning a second "pocket battleship." The ships now built or building could not protect Germany at all and are therefore merely a concession to national pride and to the nationalistic desire to keep in existence a nucleus of ships and men for a future large navy. Then there are the military expenditures. They can well be cut—they have been steadily increased—especially if the Reichswehr be regarded, as it should be, merely as a national police force and not as an army for foreign wars—which it cannot be without tanks, heavy cannon, a huge fleet of airplanes, and poison gases. So far I am entirely with the critics. Here much money could be saved; but only the German pacifists and a few enlightened economists and editors are for it. Suggest such a thing—as I repeatedly have done—to the ordinary German and he recoils in horror. To him it means throwing Germany open to Polish invasion; even the fleet is eloquently defended upon that ground of the Polish menace.

But other cuts in German federal expenditure? They are neither as easily suggested nor as practical—in many cases they are open to grave question. The critics dwell upon the fact that the city of Berlin has just opened a marvelous new museum costing millions, which was ten years in building; that Berlin and many other municipalities have established since the war new parks, new municipal bathing places, great stadia for athletics, like the one at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and all sorts of recreation grounds, besides putting up model municipal apartment houses to accommodate at least four million people. Cynical foreigners cite the fact that the federal, state, and municipal theaters in Germany are run today at an annual deficit so huge that journalists are asked not to print it and it has not appeared in the German press. It runs into many, many millions of marks, quite a percentage of the annual cash tribute to the Allies. Belgian and French observers note these things and say: "That money is rightfully ours."

They are on much safer ground when they declare that if Germany increased its inheritance taxes to, say, the English level, it would largely increase its revenues and help to wipe out the remaining inequalities in wealth—there are still two thousand admitted millionaires in Germany. These advocates of exacting the pound of flesh also call attention to the fact that despite the bad times the dividends of 142 German companies recently studied by a Berlin banking house have decreased only from 6.57 per cent in 1929 to 6.26 per cent in 1930. This is to them proof that German industry is neither overtaxed nor overburdened. So is the fact that the Rheinmetall-Gesellschaft, with its gross income reduced from 56,000,000 to 45,000,000 marks, has none the less increased its charges for depreciation from 2,430,000 to 4,080,000 marks, and is still able to report a net of 1,920,000 marks as against 1,810,000 marks in the previous year. The directors of the Gutehoffnungshütte have just increased its dividend rate from 7 to 10 per cent. One single family, the Hamels, owners of two-thirds of the stock, received no less than 6,000,000 marks as against a beggarly 4,200,000 marks the year before—but one does not hear of any bonuses or exceptionally high wages for the workers of the concern.

Next the critics have seized upon a remarkable article by the Minister of Finance, Hermann Dietrich, which recently appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt, entitled The Transfer Mechanism—an article hastily disavowed two days after publication. It seems that Herr Dietrich had promised an article to the Tageblatt, which received this one with his name attached and promptly printed it. Immediately it was explained that Herr Dietrich had not written it, that it was a memorandum prepared for him by some subordinate which the Finance Minister had not even seen. It was further declared that this memorandum presented only a one-sided view of the reparations payments. But the mischief had been done. The article was eagerly seized upon as showing that the necessary transfers under the Young Plan can all be made without disturbing trade; that there are automatic compensations and international financial readjustments which will easily take care of any situation that may arise. "There, you see," the cry went up, "the Reich's Finance Minister admits that the Young payments can readily be made without disturbance at home or abroad." To which the answer is that in the article itself it is stated that the mechanism described in it "must not be overloaded," and that if there should be a complete withdrawal of foreign credits the economic life of Germany would at once be "entirely paralyzed"; there would be a complete collapse of the whole internal banking and credit system and of the public finances. Elsewhere in this article there is reference to the immediately depressing effect upon the financial and economic situation of any home political development which might create anxiety or distrust abroad.

That there is room for further reforms than those embodied in the Brüning sanitation measures, just agreed to by the Reichstag after their proclamation by the President, is perfectly true. For example, the German government is by no means always efficient in the conduct of some of its multitudinous businesses. Thus, the Deutsche Werke in Kiel, a government concern, has just incurred a loss of 10,000,000 marks through faulty construction of two large ships built on order for a Norwegian shipping company. Arbitrators have decided that the ships must be taken back and that the German government must pay 6,000,000 marks to the Norwegians. The total loss will go to 10,000,000. One hears the same complaint among big business men here as in the United States—that when the government begins competing with private industry the losses and waste are great and the injury done to private enterprises serious. A writer in the Tageblatt declares that in certain of these government concerns the losses will run to many millions; that the government has tried making motor cars, windows, sashes, doors, and machinery of all sorts, always with losses and always hastily changing from one thing to another. Here again, critics say, a lot could be saved toward reparations.

The German League for Human Rights has still another and a most admirable suggestion for improving the condition of German finances—not, of course, because it wishes the reparations payments to continue, but because it wishes to aid in the solution of the terrible economic crisis. It urges the immediate lowering of all the German protective tariffs. One of the many grave derelictions to be laid at the doors of the Social Democrats is that they have connived at and aided in the development of the existing tariffs, which raise the cost of living to every German and, precisely as in the United States, take the form of special privilege for certain classes. In a notable address before the league on November 21, Dr. R. R. Kuczynski, well known in the United States as a statistical expert and a lecturer at the Robert Brookings Graduate School in Washington, D. C., pointed out some facts in regard to the working of the agricultural tariffs. He showed that the great agrarian interests, notably in East Prussia (which has really governed Germany for as long as our protected manufacturers have run our government), have received large government subventions and tax exemptions in addition to the high tariffs they demanded. These favors have annually cost the city consumers "several billions of marks." But the farming industry declares today that despite all this it is worse off than ever, that all these measures have helped not at all. Yet a ton of rye which could be bought last summer outside of Germany for 60 marks cost 180 marks in Germany—a gift by the government, through its tariff, of no less than 120 marks per ton to each and every grower of rye. Similarly the coal syndicate charges 16.89 marks per ton at home and is now seeking to market coal abroad at 10 to 12.50 marks per ton. These are but two of many examples.

But granted the overwhelming benefits which abolition of tariffs would confer upon Germany, our question remains: Should Germany, even if aided by changes in fiscal policy and by more economical administration, still be compelled to pay the reparations?

My answer is, No. This is not because of a desire to see Germany wriggle out of obligations solemnly entered into; from the beginning I have felt that Germany ought to pay a reasonable and just amount for the actual destruction in France and Belgium. After studying the German situation at first hand for the last four months, my reasons for now believing more than ever in the desirability of canceling the reparations and debts are these:

1. While, as stated above, reparations are not a major cause of the present economic depression they are contributory, and they place Germany in the predicament of having to meet the world-wide crisis with this extra burden of approximately $500,000,000 a year in payments to the conquerors.

2. There is a limit beyond which no people can, in humanity, be depressed in their standard of living, and the bulk of the German people have reached that limit, with 3,750,000 registered unemployed and an additional multitude in the classes which do not resort to the public registry offices to seek the dole. Today no fewer than 16,600,000 Germans have an annual income of less than 600 marks, or $150.

3. If the German people are still further depressed economically there will inevitably come fiercer internal political conflicts, more and more rioting for food, and the strengthening of all the reactionary elements, especially the National Socialists, with probably a dictatorship to follow. It is all very well to tell a people to give up their museums, their parks, their theaters. But these are safety valves; they give the people something to live by, some intellectual stimulus, something to keep them from despairing. The cities must offer more to their inhabitants if only to offset the horrible depression caused by the unemployment, the bareness, and the hardships, the almost hopeless situation which every young German faces when he enters upon his business or professional career.

4. A disorganized Germany means a disorganized Europe, and a disorganized Europe means an economically maladjusted and depressed world, including the United States. So serious is the existing crisis that only shortsightedness amounting to criminal folly will counsel any policy which even remotely threatens the collapse of Germany.

5. The psychological effect of the canceling of reparations and debts upon the mentality of all Europe would be incalculable. In Germany it would go far to insure political stability, even if the direct economic results proved—as they would—not to be so great as the average German expects. It would stimulate trade, reassure capital, and stop its flight to Switzerland, Sweden, and Holland. It would give a breath of life to an all but perishing people which has just come through the sorriest Christmas since the war.

6. In good-will alone, wiping out the reparations would pay all the creditor nations in dollars and cents, and most particularly the United States. How many billions is the world losing annually by the present economic depression? Any sacrifices toward stopping the present fearful loss and the waste of the unemployed millions of workers will be money well expended.

As long as the reparations burdens continue, so long will Germany regard the rest of the world with the bitterness of one who feels himself gravely discriminated against. The German people are not unaware that since their representatives signed the Young Plan the changed financial situation, because of the depreciation of gold, is compelling them to pay actually some 12 per cent more than they agreed to. It must not be forgotten that there has arisen a new generation in Germany which has no memory of the war, or only the vaguest; that these young men and women feel it to be a crime that they should be compelled to pay for the sins of a government dead twelve years, for a war in the making and waging of which they had no part whatever. The American public must not overlook the fact that it is precisely from this section of the German population that the National Socialists are drawing large numbers of recruits.

The enthusiasm of German youth for Hitler and his motley following is in considerable measure due to the fact that vague as their program is—it is as full of platitudes and glittering generalities as most of the speeches of Theodore Roosevelt and William J. Bryan—it is at least a program. And it conjures up a picture of a freed Germany, again mistress of its own house. German boys and girls are today craving leadership as perhaps never before. If they are to be driven permanently into the camp of the Hitlerites, it will be an ominous thing for Europe and the world for several generations to come—if Europe survives. It will inevitably mean the awakening of that fierce aggressive nationalistic spirit which French politicians say they gravely fear, and are doing all they can to produce—a spirit not existent in Germany immediately after the war and one far from controlling there today.

Germany wants peace. I called a couple of weeks ago upon a high financial authority in Berlin—one who still holds high office and wields great power. I wanted to talk finance with him, but he only wanted to talk peace with me. "Why can we not have peace in Europe? Why will not America now insist upon disarmament, a final settlement of the war issues, and of all the financial questions? As long as these things continue there will be and can be no peace in Europe, no security, no happiness. We are drifting steadily toward a new war and a catastrophe. Yet we Germans are absolutely desirous of peace—as we have just shown again in Geneva with no success and little support."

I repeat: Against this drift to chaos and misery every possible brake should be applied, and none could be so potent psychologically as the settlement of the reparations problem. It is the capitalist system which is on trial, which is at stake. If the capitalist governments continue to rule Europe as incredibly badly as they have done and are now doing, and Russia succeeds in her communist experiment, Moscow will not only be knocking at the gates of Berlin in a dozen years, as Professor Calvin Hoover wrote in the October issue of Harper's Magazine, it will be leveling every gate in Europe. Talk of the menace of Russian dumping! Why, that is but a speck upon the horizon compared with the state of bitterness, of fear, of anxiety, of armament rivalry, and of trade warfare through protective tariffs, yes, the state of international anarchy which constitutes today what men call Europe.

The German statesman was right. Why does not America act? Why does not Mr. Hoover vision that before him lies today a most glorious opportunity to reestablish America in the position of moral leader of the world which it for a time held? Mr. Hoover! Mr. Hoover! Fate surely dealt the world a tragic blow when it placed him in the White House in this hour of extremest danger.

A Washington Honor Roll

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 17

ONLY a mining engineer could dig a hole as deep as the one into which our beloved President has finally got himself over the issue of drought relief. Observe his predicament and explain it if you can. Here is a man whose rise in politics is due almost solely to his success in persuading the government to appropriate millions for charity to be dispensed by him in foreign countries. And here, as President of the United States, we find him locking horns with Congress on the question of appropriating for the relief of suffering in his own country a sum which amounts to about one-and-one-half times the cost of modernizing one battleship! A larger sum was refunded this week to a single rich taxpayer. From Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, and a dozen other States come harrowing descriptions of women and children herded into schoolhouses to keep warm, of families existing on four dollars a month, of bread lines, soup kitchens, and God knows what other pitiful makeshifts against starvation; while the Great Humanitarian stubbornly insists that a government loan of $15,000,000 to feed starving Americans is repugnant to his principles. It is fantastic that a man of Hoover's record should have raised such an issue. It is incredible that anyone with the political experience of a precinct committeeman could contrive to get on the wrong side of such an issue. Of course, Mr. Hoover never had the political experience of a precinct committeeman, but what of his celebrated humane instincts? Alas, it seems they are reserved for that small but worthy class made up of the 511 individuals who in 1928 paid taxes on an aggregate net income of $1,108,000,000. Any adequate relief program would necessitate an increase in the taxes of the impecunious 511, which, to a humane Administration, is out of the question. In other words—why add to the existing destitution?

* * * * *

EACH passing day magnifies the need of an extra session of Congress. About six weeks of the present session remain. No candid person contends that this is adequate for the consideration of matters that require it. It is not adequate even for the proper scrutiny of routine appropriation bills. The very business interests that are supposed to dread an extra session are clamoring for legislation that would consume months of hard work. The railroads are demanding regulation of buses and pipe-lines. The timber, manganese, oil, and communications industries are yelling their heads off for Congressional attention. And, of course, over and above all this there remain Muscle Shoals, the Wagner unemployment bills, the "lame-duck" amendment, and the anti-injunction measure. Seldom has there been such legislative congestion or such an imperative demand for prolonged and intensive legislative action. The "business man's" widely advertised fear of a special session is, in my opinion, largely a myth. Business men habitually curse Congress in an abstract, impersonal way, but at bottom they have much confidence in its collective wisdom and experience, and they have almost none in Mr. Hoover's. A similar state of mind exists among Democratic leaders and is responsible for their determination to adjourn March 4. Confidently believing that the President if left alone for nine months would succeed only in making bad conditions worse, they are resolved not to let him avail himself of the old familiar Presidential excuses, "Congressional interference" and "Senate obstruction." A similar motive can be detected among the Old Guard. Realizing that the renomination of Hoover in 1932 probably will mean Republican defeat, they desire to give him enough rope to hang himself so thoroughly that he will recognize the inevitable and step aside for—well, Dwight Morrow, perhaps. If Mr. Hoover knew his stuff he would be demanding a special session.

* * * * *

IT is no accident that the propaganda mill of the power trust is grinding at high speed these days. It is no inadvertence when selected radio speakers fill the air with the old discredited lies about the Ontario's famous Hydro and other publicly operated systems. Despite the fact that Hoover's in the White House and Wilbur's in the Interior Department, all is not well in the world of the "power boys." And their alarm is warranted. Now that such great constitutional authorities as the Washington Star and the Providence Journal have decided that the Senate had no legal right to recall the confirmation of George Otis Smith, Marcel Garsaud, and Claude L. Draper of the Power Commission, some may regard that particular issue as closed. Perhaps the superannuated reporters and copyreaders who serve as legal experts on so many of our metropolitan editorial pages may be presumed to have more knowledge on the subject than Tom Walsh, Norris, Borah, Bratton, Wagner, George, and the rest of the forty-four Senators whose number includes the chairman and a majority of the Judiciary Committee and three or four former justices of State supreme courts. But the issue is not closed. Thanks to the indecent haste of the commissioners in dismissing two faithful officials and to the blundering of President Hoover and Secretary Wilbur (who is the man immediately behind this business), the public is at last awake to the nature and importance of the power question. The flood of letters pouring in on Senators who voted for the recall shows how quick and complete the awakening has been. Talk about the Senate invading the President's prerogative is a smoke screen. As to that point, the Constitution expressly gives the Senate power to make its own rules, and it is not denied that it acted within its rules. The contention that the unauthorized action of the executive clerk in notifying the President before the legal period elapsed was sufficient to foreclose the Senate from exercising its right to reconsider, sounds pretty flimsy to me, but since I am neither the United States Supreme Court, the Lord God Almighty, nor a New York Times editorial writer, I shall not attempt to decide the legal question. It is not the issue. It is notorious that the executive department under this Administration has gone to shocking lengths to break down the Federal Water Power Act. It is notorious that Solicitor Russell and Accountant King were fired because they had striven to enforce the act by exposing the efforts of power companies to water their valuations with such items as neckties, banquets, propaganda expenses, special cars, and similar examples of "investment costs." Consequently, the issue is whether the policy laid down by Congress in the Water Power Act is to be carried out, or whether the act itself is to be nullified by the rulings of administrative officers. In short, it is whether the Power Trust is to be given immunity under the law to continue robbing the consumers of electricity. I think the public understands it. The "power boys" think so too. If anyone doubts that, let him ask a power magnate what he thinks of Mr. Hoover's handling of the matter. But wear ear muffs.

* * * * *

THE refusal of the Hearst, Scripps-Howard, and other independent dailies to join in the sycophantic orgy of President-petting and Senate-baiting which attended the power controversy, and their realistic perception of the issues involved, are enough to hearten any newspaperman who cares for the honor and influence of his profession. Incidentally, the moment seems opportune to repeat my ancient annual custom by presenting my own Honor Roll of Washington correspondents for 1930. The flowers are distributed as follows:

William C. Murphy, Jr., of the New York World, for discovering and exposing the act of the newly appointed Senator Grundy in moving his private tariff lobby into the Senate office building.

Ruth Finney, of the Scripps-Howard papers, and Marion L. Ramsay, of Universal Services, for their intelligent and persistent reporting of the numerous phases of the power battle.

M. Farmer Murphy, of the Baltimore Sun, for his brilliant and devastating stories on the trading and chicanery which attended the progress of the tariff bill in the Senate.

Raymond P. Brandt, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, for exposing the character and history of Secretary Hyde's adventure in mutilating the Pure Food Act by his corn-sugar ruling.

D. Harold Oliver and Marguerite Young, of the Associated Press, for exceptional examples of competent and thorough straightaway reporting on delicate subjects under trying circumstances—Mr. Oliver on the tariff; Miss Young on communications, power, and railroad consolidation.

William Hard, of the Consolidated Press Association, for his courage and independence in renouncing a profitable intimacy with the White House when it became apparent that he could no longer maintain it without losing his professional self-respect.

Alfred D. Stedman, of the St. Paul Pioneer Press, for his expert reporting of the intricate operations of the Farm Board.

Robert B. ("Red") Smith, of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, for the indomitable courage, humor, enthusiasm, and faith that he has maintained through a sea of physical troubles and professional trials.

I'm Tired of Beans

By WORKLESS

WERE I ever to acquire wealth, or else were I ever fortunate enough to get a job, I should swear off beans for the rest of my natural days. I simply detest those tiny, white, innocent-looking vegetables—and I'll tell you why. I am one of the white-collar unemployed. I have been out of a regular job for two years. In addition, I am nearly forty, scandalously bald-headed, and conspicuously Jewish—all of which attributes are not the least bit helpful when "youth," "pleasant appearance," and "engaging personality" are rigorously demanded by potential employers in the newspaper want ads.

During the early part of my enforced loafing experience I felt morose and almost beaten after the weary days and weeks of tramping the streets looking for jobs. I faced the morrow with an increasing sense of helplessness. Not so, now. For since unemployment has become a recognized national problem, and so many agencies are exerting themselves in their efforts to relieve the unfortunate jobless, it has become almost a distinction to be classed as one of the brood about whom there is so much ado. This is particularly true of the unemployed who are heads of families. It is they, especially, who incur the sympathy of the soft-hearted society matrons, benevolent church committees, community councils, and neighborhood politicians.

I am blessed with an intelligent and loyal wife who contributed considerably toward the family support in her capacity of saleswoman at a time when the public's buying mood was not so "depressed" as it is at present. I am still further blessed with three bright and understanding children of school age—innocent victims of a trying epoch. I have used the term "blessed" advisedly, because it leads up to my peculiarly favored position as a recipient of unemployment relief. It leads up as well to my eventual aversion for beans.

During the latter part of the summer of 1930 conditions became so grave that my little family actually faced starvation. As the food diminished, the children's appetites grew in proportion. They craved fruit, vegetables, and sweets, which we could not supply. Also, as the children's appetites magnified, the unpaid rent bill assumed greater dimensions. While I succeeded in stalling the children's desires with painted illusions of a better future, that technique did not work quite so well with the landlord.

In utter despair, and motivated by the instinct of mother-love, my wife confided our plight to a fashionable lady of the neighborhood whom she had previously met. The neighbor was filled with sympathy and anxious to help. But how? My wife suggested that to secure a job for her husband was the only way to solve our difficulties. Just anything to do, it did not matter what—bookkeeping, clerking, window-washing, yard-cleaning—anything that would help buy food and pay the rent.

To help secure work, however, was the one thing the kind lady could not do. Conditions were bad, and growing worse. There were no prospects of jobs of any kind. But the next day a basket of food was brought to our home. We suspected where it came from. Tears came into our eyes at the thought of having to depend for our food upon friendly and solicitous neighbors, but depressing as the thought was, the contents of the basket were comforting. There were fruit, vegetables, meat, canned goods, and a considerable quantity of beans packed in neat white packages. We fed on the more attractive food and stored away the beans for a rainy day.

Meanwhile the schools had reopened, and my good wife was making an effort to secure free lunches for our children. To accomplish her end, she had to address, as a matter of course, the chairman of the Parent-Teachers Association, a woman coreligionist of extraordinary kindness and influence. Learning of our sorrows, the good lady determined that we should not perish. And accordingly, a second basket of food entered our home. We were very thankful despite our reluctance to accept charity. It helped to keep the children fed and contented. It also helped to raise our spirits. After all, we thought, it was mighty good to experience genuine friendship.

The second offering, like the first, contained several parcels of assorted beans in addition to the other edibles. As the stock of beans accumulated in our otherwise empty pantry, we felt safe in our knowledge that the rainy days were well taken care of.

It was a teacher of the public school attended by my children who next discovered our state of affairs. She was good enough to investigate for herself by a visit to our home, and she assured us that she was actuated in her desire to aid as a devout Christian and active member of her church. We told her that a chance to work and earn a livelihood was the only thing we could ask of our friends. She departed and promised to do her utmost to alleviate our sufferings.

As our friends increased, we began to have some hope for an otherwise uncertain future. I registered at the governor's unemployment council, placed my name with the State free employment agency, and hunted down the want ads as religiously as ever. The newly acquired lady friends were also on the job, and had promulgated our "case" to the community Business Men's Association, the Jewish Synagogue of the neighborhood, and the Republican Ward Committee, all of which had organized committees for the relief of the unemployed. With so much effort being expended in my behalf, I felt sure of getting employment soon.

Several weeks passed. Now and then we received assurances from our friends that everything possible was being done to help us. We waited patiently. As Thanksgiving day approached, we were graciously informed that we were to have no cause to worry in the future, and that we should have something to be thankful for along with the other 120,000,000 Americans. The promise was kept. On Thanksgiving eve we were pleasantly surprised by the arrival of five or six baskets filled to the brim with a variety of food and delicacies. The abundance of food overwhelmed us. The Jewish Synagogue, the Protestant church, the Business Men's Association, the Parent-Teachers group, and the Republican Ward Committee all had done their share in bringing festive joy into our home. We managed, moreover, to consume all the perishable edibles before they could spoil. To brighten things further, the neighborhood clothing committee of the governor's unemployment council turned over for my use two renovated suits of clothing. It did not matter that they were ten sizes too large—I still have a feeling that they were owned by the late William Howard Taft. It was the spirit that counted.

As I reflect upon these events, I find it hard to comprehend the adaptability of the human mind to the trying circumstances of life. Six months ago my wife and I would have proudly turned down every offer of unearned material aid. It would have seemed insulting, painful, inconceivable. Yet here we were accepting food and clothing with a mute sense of satisfaction and without the least resentment. Was it evidence of moral degradation? Was it a confession of helplessness? As I reasoned it out with myself I thought that the world was full of luxuries and pleasures, abounding in food, music, laughter, sunshine. Were not we who were temporarily defeated in life's struggle for existence entitled to just a few of the crumbs of the world's splendor, no matter whence they came, no matter how?

And so, for two weeks or more, we gloated upon food. We had chicken and plum pudding, canned peaches, corn and peas, vegetables, fruit, and what-nots. The usual generous amount of beans in bags, tins, packages, and boxes we stored away in the pantry for future reference. Our children gained weight, and their erstwhile pale cheeks showed an encouraging pink. And didn't we still have our friends, the loyal, sacrificing strangers who spent tireless days and nights conferring, meeting, devising all kind of methods for the alleviation of the lot of the jobless. It was not their fault that jobs were impossible to get, that prosperity was not returning as rapidly as predicted. They meant well. The starving would be fed. The children would be cared for.

When, with all things material, our supply of food diminished we were not dismayed. We still had our plentiful supply of beans, ours to do with as we chose. My wife, excellent cook that she is, devised all sorts of culinary tricks with the little white vegetables. She managed to vary our dietary program daily. Beans with noodles, beans with rice, beans with barley, browned beans, stewed beans, bean pudding, bean croquettes, with sauce, without sauce, beans, beans, beans.

Perhaps because of the Christmas holidays and the New Year festivities our good loyal friends seem to have forgotten us. We cannot blame them. They are not responsible for our plight. Nobody is responsible. There are no jobs.

We still have a few beans. And as we eat them and look into the future we wonder what it holds for us. And I am certain of only one thing: if ever I get rich, or even if ever I get a job, beans will have no place on my menu for a long, long time.

A Jolt for High Light Bills

By VIRGIL MacMICKLE

OREGON'S smashing decision, at the November election, in favor of publicly owned and operated hydroelectric power may well have been one of the most significant events, politically and economically, to occur in America during the year 1930. Taken in conjunction with the somewhat similar result in the neighboring State of Washington, it was one of the most disastrous jolts ever dealt the private power groups, considering that these two States possess between them nearly one-third of the entire country's natural resources in potential hydroelectric power.

Politically, in Oregon, it marks the end of one era and the beginning of another. During the last quarter-century there has not been an election—city, county, State, or Congressional—into which the power octopus, to use a shopworn but precisely descriptive figure, has not thrust its tentacles to its own gain and the detriment of the people. It has never hesitated to use any or all of the time-honored means of political corruption, from bribery, booze, and sex intrigue to reputation shattering, against those whose souls it did not own in advance of election. During all that time only a bare handful of men in office, most of them too insignificant to count, have been able to maintain their political integrity, or, having maintained it through a single term, to be reelected.

There was, however, one very notable exception, the late State Senator George W. Joseph, a man whose splendid character, ability, and energy are not only made clear by his record and attested by the reluctant admissions, direct and tacit, of his enemies, but confirmed by the fact that he was returned to office as often as he cared to run, and could have won any position within the power of the people to bestow. Not all the efforts of the power concerns and other utilities could defeat or cow this man. And since the recent victory of the people in their long struggle to break the grip of the power interests was in such large measure the culmination and, in a way, the vindication of Joseph's unceasing personal efforts, nothing of truth will be lost and something of drama will be retained by presenting the facts of the struggle somewhat in terms of his efforts.

In 1928 the Pepco, or Portland Electric Power Company, the older of the two power concerns in Portland, was negotiating with the Northwestern Electric Company what these two companies euphemistically called a merger for more economic administration. There was no question that the merger would have effected economies. That these economies would have been passed on to the people was doubted by everyone familiar with the conduct of the two concerns. The Pepco had a practically perpetual franchise entailing no payment of taxes. The Northwestern, on the other hand, held a limited franchise, which was soon to expire, and was also liable for taxes. Senator Joseph demonstrated to the complete satisfaction of the voters that a merger of the companies would cost the city hundreds of thousands of dollars and enrich the stockholders of the companies by that much. The proposal was snowed under.

The power companies gave Joseph the credit for their trouncing. One of their smoothest political manipulators admitted to the writer that Joseph had beaten them almost single-handed. More than that, the gentleman indicated the companies' respect for Joseph's integrity when he replied, in answer to the suggestion that they might have found it more economical to have slipped Joseph twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars to keep his mouth shut, that there was "not enough money in the United States to buy that little ——!"

That fight was only the first skirmish in Joseph's well-planned war on the power companies. He was determined to break their blighting control in all departments of the State government, executive, judicial, and legislative. According to his program, the existing public service commission must be abolished and the law under which it acts as an instrument for the imposition of extortionate rates on consumers must be replaced by rate-making machinery that should inevitably function in the interests of the people. More, the very constitution itself must be so amended that not one or all of these departments could ever again betray the common weal. Finally, one or more determined advocates of publicly owned hydroelectric power must, if possible, be sent to Congress.

In one of the most brilliant and bitter campaigns ever witnessed in Oregon he carried his program to the whole State. He was already supported and seconded by some of the ablest men in the State, and his announcement that he would seek the gubernatorial nomination in the primaries rallied to his cause literally thousands of volunteer workers. Democrats changed their registration to be able to vote for him in the primaries. The Democratic Journal, biggest evening paper, favored him as far as possible throughout the entire campaign. The Portland Telegram, another evening paper and a determined protagonist of public ownership and administration of hydroelectric power, devoted itself almost exclusively to Joseph and his program.

Meanwhile, the Pepco itself swelled Joseph's metropolitan popularity enormously, first, by raising its street-car fares from eight to ten cents on the pretext of needing the increased revenues to pay the higher wages demanded by its employees, and, secondly, by promptly and cold-bloodedly repudiating the wage raise. The Supreme Court also added fuel to the flame in the State at large by disbarring Joseph after what seems to have been originally a purely private row with one of its members. Later it made amends by hastening to expunge from the record all the charges against him when, within a month after the voters had nominated him by a decisive majority, he dropped dead.

The Republican State Central Committee then convened, and, while the majority of the populace still mourned the passing of this great leader of a great cause, proceeded to scrap the Joseph platform, and nominate by the condemned secret ballot its own chairman for the governorship. By that move it nearly wrecked the regular machine, for almost at once an indignant electorate held an independent convention, attended by nearly 5,000 voters, and unanimously nominated Julius L. Meier, lifelong friend and business associate of Joseph and an ardent supporter of his program, as its independent candidate. Thus, Mr. Meier, the president of the largest department store west of the Mississippi, was practically drafted to lead the power revolt.

In the November election Meier received more than twice as many votes as the "regular" Republican nominee, and thousands more than the latter and all other candidates combined, notwithstanding the desperate fight waged against him by the power concerns and allied utilities. To clinch the argument, the voters also passed by a margin of about 33,000 votes the "grange power district" amendment to the constitution, which makes it practically mandatory on the coming legislature to enact measures preserving in perpetuity to the people of Oregon their remaining unclaimed hydroelectric power resources and providing for their development and exploitation for the benefit of the people. The program also contemplates legislation to compel the private companies, under penalty of practically confiscatory taxes, to develop all claims on which they have already filed.

Majorities in both houses of the legislature either were elected on the same program or have subsequently pledged themselves to support it, while the same wave of protest against the private power interests carried Major General Charles H. Martin, retired, wet Democrat, into Congress from the overwhelmingly Republican district which includes Portland. The main plank of his platform was publicly owned hydroelectric power. Portland chose as commissioner, by the unprecedented majority of 50,000, Ralph C. Clyde, well-known advocate of public ownership.

Commissioner Clyde, the first to take office, has already translated the mandate of the people into effective action by filing upon two choice power sites for the city of Portland, to be followed by other filings as fast as possible. The Governor-elect has been working on measures designed to crystallize his program into law during the approaching legislative assembly—ably assisted by grange leaders, including Albert Slaughter, veteran drafter of fool-proof legislation, and Carey and Harlan, the engineers and rate experts who recently represented the people in presenting evidence and testimony against the Pepco before the Public Service Commission and who have furnished the statistical ammunition for the campaign from the very beginning. And Major General Martin, a man of wide and influential acquaintance in official Washington and of more than ordinary experience in dealing with the Congressional mind, is planning a determined campaign in Congress to secure federal aid in the development of the Columbia River, the greatest single resource of hydroelectric power in America, on which no electric current has yet been developed.

Of course, there is a possibility that the power trust may still be able to influence enough members of the Oregon legislature to obstruct the program. But in view of the recent emphatic tone of the electorate, a legislative bolt is extremely inadvisable, if not unlikely. Besides, Mr. Meier has just issued a public announcement to the effect that if the legislature attempts to mar the program in any single detail, he will go over their heads by calling a special election and placing the proposed legislation in its entirety directly before the people. That he will do just exactly that is not doubted by anyone who really knows him. Nor is it doubted that he will expose any such legislative skullduggery by every possible means of publicity, including the radio, which he used so effectively during the campaign.

The economic motivation of the Oregon revolt is not far to seek. The whole State was tired of having to pay extortionate power rates, and seriously alarmed over the fact that not only did the rates keep new power-using industries from locating here, but were actually forcing many of those already here to move to other States where power is cheaper. The howls set up by Mr. Average Citizen might not have been effective. But when business which is dependent upon industrial pay rolls sees those pay rolls menaced, it becomes very active in seeking the cause, and vehemently articulate in demanding a remedy. This was precisely what happened in Oregon in general and Portland in particular.

Industries desirous of locating on the Pacific Coast, though finding all Oregon's other natural advantages entirely to their liking, were often compelled to locate finally in California or Washington because of Oregon's prohibitive power rates. California cities had low power rates, Washington cities still lower, those of Tacoma being the lowest of all. Thus, Portland lost a number of prospective industries to Los Angeles, Seattle, or Tacoma. The Hooker Chemical Company, for example, found that it could save $50,000 annually on power alone by going to Tacoma.

Why were the Portland rates so high? Certainly not because of a lack of available potential power. Including the Columbia River, which Oregon must share with Washington and which thus makes exact figures difficult to arrive at, Oregon has easily accessible to Portland from 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 constant horse-power of natural hydroelectric power resources, only 300,000 of which have been developed. The real reason was that Portland's power supply was privately owned and viciously exploited—was overcapitalized and underdeveloped. Take, for example, the Pepco plant at Oregon City, fourteen miles up the Willamette from Portland. The water rights cost the company practically nothing. Yet it has been allowed to capitalize those rights, exclusive of all plant costs, at about $8,000,000, according to Carey and Harlan. Under the law the company is allowed an 8 per cent return on that capitalization, and the public service commission has been practically compelled to fix rates at a level that would insure that return.

The huge capitalization would have been bad enough had all the potential power been converted into actual power and the burden of paying the return spread out over the whole output. But according to the same experts, only 18 per cent of the potential power has actually been developed, the other 82 per cent having been sold as plain water during the past fourteen years to the adjacent paper mills for the sum of $2,500,000, none of which ever went to lighten the rate burden of the consumer. In other words, the consumer had to pay such a rate on his electricity as would permit this 18 per cent of actual power to pay 8 per cent in dividends and interest on the whole volume of potential power. On the basis of actual output the rates should have been assessed on a valuation of $1,440,000 instead of the present $8,000,000, assuming even the former to be a legitimate and not a fictitious valuation; and the users should have been paying the company a total annual revenue from these particular water rights of $115,200 instead of $640,000.

The Pepco is not the only one. Another company has one 15,000 horse-power hydroelectric development the building of which cost $1,230,000. Yet its water site is capitalized at over $10,000,000. That is to say, $10,000,000 of fictitious value was placed upon the company's books for this small water-power site, and stocks and bonds were issued against it. Under such circumstances Oregon's high rates are easy to understand. What is more, under the present method of State regulation the companies have not only succeeded in obtaining a fair return upon this overcapitalization; they have also been able to force the rate-payers, through operating cost, to pay for such items as advertising, public-relations counsel, and even the propaganda designed to discredit public ownership.

Los Angeles, meanwhile, owned and operated one of the largest municipal plants in the United States. Seattle, starting with a relatively insignificant plant in 1902, would soon complete her Skagit project, giving her control of a million horse-power. Tacoma, which has owned its municipal plant for almost forty years, controlled more than 500,000 horse-power. And none of these projects had cost a single cent of additional taxes. All of them not only had paid and were paying their own way, but had succeeded so well that they could reduce their power rates to a point where they were now pulling the pay-roll industries away from Portland.

It was time to act. And Oregon has acted.

In the Driftway

GEORGE W. "Better-Known-as-Æ" RUSSELL, having attacked the great American pastime of moving to the city, has now turned his amiable guns upon that vice of ours which he calls "busyness." He hangs the responsibility for its inception on one whose beard was as venerable as his own, namely, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and he lays to that vice all our economic woes. But let him say it:

> I've a complaint against the United States. It arises out of Longfellow's "Psalm of Life." That poem is drilled in the schools into every child in the country. And they never forget it, especially the line "Let us then be up and doing," and America has been "up and doing" ever since it was published.
>
> That is the cause of all your economic problems. You are working people so hard that you have, naturally, overproduction. You should cultivate the adorable virtue of idleness. Your President and Congress ought to gather on the steps of the White House and formally extract that poem from Longfellow's works and burn it, and then erect a statue to idleness.

* * * * *

IT is doubtful whether "busyness" can be laid at the door of the mild and benevolent Longfellow—it is the Drifter's impression that his poem was written long after that aweful moral dictum "An idle brain is the devil's workshop" had been engraved upon the American mind. But whoever invented it, busyness is a disease as infectious as it is fatal. If only everyone could be persuaded to spend less time "up and doing" and more time sitting down and, occasionally, thinking, the decrease in the number of bad books alone would be considerable. As for subway crowds, overpopulated cities, national advertising, and super-movies, they might disappear altogether in time. But "busyness" has become so securely fastened upon the American consciousness that it can be exorcised only by a long and patient struggle. The Drifter himself has almost overcome it. After extended practice he can let a railroad train leave him behind without lifting a foot to chase it. He has learned that things are as likely to come to those who wait as to those who run after them—including another railroad train. As for that "adorable virtue," idleness, which the American calls laziness, the Drifter is a past master in its rites. He can sit before a log fire for hours all alone doing nothing and yet experience no pangs of conscience nor feel that he has wasted time. Rather he is filled with a sense of well-being and a satisfying feeling that once more he has triumphed over the great American superstition that one must keep busy every minute or be miserable, not to say morally reprehensible.

* * * * *

WHICH leads up to the most ironical aspect of the cult of "busyness." The avowed object of the whole process is its very opposite, namely, leisure, or idleness. Many a young and energetic business man has assured the Drifter, when pressed, that he works hard not because he likes to work but because on the contrary he hopes to make so much money that he will have complete freedom from work later on. Leisure later on has become almost as much of a cult as busyness. But unfortunately one cannot learn how to be idle in a day. One must begin young and practice the art all one's life. Otherwise leisure will turn out to be merely boredom or a convenient opportunity for a nervous breakdown. We have hundreds of Schools of Business in this country. It is time we established a few Higher Institutions of Idleness, if only to relieve the strain upon our already overworked insane asylums.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Pershing Memoirs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As one who served with General Pershing in France I am sorry that he is publishing what are given out as his memoirs of the Great War. I have just read the first instalment, and it left a bad taste. In the first place, at the very opening, he gives the impression that, instead of his being selected by the immortal Woodrow because of his particular fitness, his father-in-law, the late United States Senator Warren, chairman of the powerful Military Affairs Committee, was holding conferences with Secretary of War Baker, and at these conferences his name first came up.

Now, as a matter of fact it was no secret among Pershing's colleagues that perhaps Wilson and Baker were anxious to put him forward to head off the senior major general, the bumptious Leonard Wood, but the historian of the future will have Pershing's own record, even in mild form, to help clinch the fact that his being the son-in-law of Senator Warren, who was in a position to throw a monkey wrench at any time into the Wilson military program, or lack of it, probably was the influencing factor in his being named commander-in-chief.

In the next few lines Pershing tells how he became a fluent French scholar by spending a vacation in France in 1908. Now, everyone who was anywhere near the top knows that he never spoke French with any ease. Only three days ago one of Pershing's panegyrists, in telling of the meeting of Joffre and Pershing in Washington soon after Pershing's selection, said, "Joffre did not understand a word of English and Pershing did not understand a word of French," and so Joffre asked his aide, Fabry, to say to Pershing that he "liked him from the start."

But I think the prize observation of General Pershing's is contained in his positive conviction that the complete blame for the World War has long since been fixed by mankind "where it properly belongs, on the shoulders of the then German government." I thought the world was still giving serious study to this problem, and it seems to me not only a serious blunder, but exceedingly bad taste for a man who is himself of German extraction to put such language into what is being touted as the great and only real story of the war. Was it Napoleon who said that war is entirely too serious business for the army? For twelve years General Pershing has been writing and rewriting and revising proofs of this story, and yet he has apparently not been reading the disclosures that reputable historians have been making. If the future instalments are on a par with the initial chapter, the Pershing contribution to war history will take its place with most of the other memoirs and diaries of our de luxe generals.

DISGUSTED EX-COLONEL A. E. F.

Miami Beach, Fla., January 12

The Dear Ancestral Relics

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It may interest some of your readers to learn that one of the "backward States" inhabited by the "sons of wild jackasses" is coming to the front. In proof of this I quote a resolution recently adopted by the D. A. R. of the State of Wyoming and signed by Mrs. B. B. Brooks, wife of a one-time governor:

> Resolved, The Daughters of the American Revolution in conference assembled greatly deplore the growing communistic spirit in our public schools and higher institutions of learning; therefore be it resolved, that we recommend that the Oath of Allegiance to the National and State Governments be incorporated in the teachers' contract; and resolved, that a copy of this resolution be presented to the State Board of Education, and to the Board of Trustees of the University, and to the Commander of the American Legion.

It remains to be seen whether the Legion will or will not assist in the cause. But Legion or no Legion, we of the great State of Wyoming have a feeling of ineffable security. We need fear no Red Menace.

The national D. A. R. may blacklist a few educators. In Wyoming the Dear Ancestral Relics suspect them all. Have they not heard that the teachers are well read? Is not that enough?

Wheatland, Wyo., January 6 W. W. WOLFE

For California Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation Club of San Francisco will hold its third annual dinner in the Women's City Club, 465 Post Street, on February 12 at 6:30 p. m. Tickets are $1.50 per plate. The public is invited.

Paul Blanshard will be the chief speaker of the evening. His subject will be "International Economics and the Next War." All who are interested in making reservations may communicate with the secretary at 775 Guerrero Street, San Francisco.

SOPHIE GREENBERG, Secretary

San Francisco, January 10

Books, Music, Drama

Descent from the Tower

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

I

Solemnities of sifting from the chaff
Some golden grain of learning; the pursuit
Through dusty shelves of eighteenth-century calf
Of an elusive passage to dispute,
Became for him at last a more than cloak
Flung over fustian—the brown livery
Of an old vagabondage. When he spoke,
It was the accent of Authority.

But somewhere an invisible, tempered spring
Ran down or snapped, as though to prove the fact
That too much knowledge is a dangerous thing,
And books are books, however neatly stacked—
He found it more congenial to discuss
A penny whistle with Theocritus.

II

Yardsticks for Immortality fall short
Sometimes, and magic circles can be traced
By anyone who lightly will consort
With elder gods of laughter and unhaste.
Their signs are in the dust; where willows lean
Over the river reaches; near a hut
Where no one is remembered; in some green
Corner of Elfland or of Lilliput.

What is the stature of a man, unless
He stand no taller than a wooded hill,
Or give allegiance to a singleness
Greater than any labored act of will?
So measured, he can listen unchagrined
To the last words of earth and sun and wind.

Laski on Liberty

Liberty in the Modern State. By Harold J. Laski. Harper and Brothers. $3.

MR. LASKI'S opening sentence, wisely, is a definition: "I mean by liberty the absence of restraint upon the existence of those social conditions which, in modern civilization, are the necessary guaranties of individual happiness." Further: "By making liberty the absence of restraint, I make it, of course, a purely negative condition. I do not thereby mean to assume that a man will be the happier the more completely restraints are absent from the society to which he belongs."

To Mr. Laski the idea of liberty is intimately associated with the idea of equality, but he is careful to give the word equality a special meaning. Nothing is easier, he remarks, than to make equality seem a notion devoid of all common sense, as Mr. Mencken and Mr. Aldous Huxley have done. But Mr. Laski speaks of equality not as identity of talent, temperament, or treatment, but as "an insistence that there is no difference inherent in nature between the claims of men to happiness." In this sense equality is, so to speak, complementary to liberty, for the absence of equality means special privilege for some and not for others, a special privilege which is not, so to speak, in nature but in a deliberate contrivance of the social environment. The more equality there is in a state, the more use, in general, we can make of our freedom. In a chapter on Liberty and Social Power this idea is developed in its economic aspects. In a society where there is any serious inequality of economic condition the workers may almost be said to form a separate and subject nation. The rights of labor cannot receive real and full consideration, for a wealthy or relatively wealthy governing class always suffers from self-sufficiency. "It is inaccessible to ideals which originate from without itself. It tends to think them unimportant if they are urged tactfully, and dangerous if they are urged with vigor."

One cannot expect a writer on liberty to be entirely original. Mr. Laski's own justification for the present volume is that, because of the almost irresistible temptation to throw overboard the habits of tolerance in a time of crisis, it becomes necessary in each age "to restate the case for freedom." But a restatement implies a repetition. Whatever originality is open to a writer here lies mainly in the aspects of the problem that he chooses to emphasize, and in his position on certain specific issues. What is perhaps most arresting in Mr. Laski's discussion is his outspokenness regarding the extent to which he would permit freedom of utterance. If men believe even that violent and bloody revolution is desirable, he would permit them to say so, certainly through the printed word. He would even, under ordinary conditions, permit a speaker addressing a crowd to say so. He would admit the right of the government to take action against a speaker only if it were in fact demonstrable that the speech had "a direct tendency to incite immediate disorder."

I have no wish to argue with Mr. Laski's conclusions. I find myself, indeed, almost completely in agreement with them. But some of the arguments by which he reaches those conclusions seem to me questionable. Mr. Laski is in favor of permitting extreme utterances, for example, because

> It is the history of these matters that if governments once begin to prohibit men from seeking to prove in writing that violent revolution is desirable, they will, sooner or later, prohibit them from saying that the social order they represent is not divine.

This argument is clearly double-edged. Advocates of suppression may retort that it is the history of these matters that if you do not prohibit fundamental criticisms of the social order, the critics will, sooner or later, advocate and organize violent revolution. Mr. Laski later contends that the government "must not prohibit a meeting before it is held on the ground that the speaker is likely to preach sedition there." This position is thoroughly sound; but if governments were permitted to argue from "the history of these matters" rather than from the merits of the particular question at issue, they would find plenty of excuses for prohibiting suspected meetings.

Again, Mr. Laski is capable of contending that persecution of opinion is futile. "No technique of suppression," he writes, "has so far been discovered which does not have the effect of giving wider currency to the thing suppressed than can be attained in any other fashion." Mr. Laski is misled by isolated instances of particular books or plays. Certainly his generalization is not true of the technique of motion-picture censorship. And would he contend that knowledge of birth-control methods is more widespread than it would be if there were no laws against the dissemination of such knowledge? "Most people," he continues, "can see that Nero and Diocletian accomplished nothing by their persecution of Christianity." But was not this, as John Stuart Mill suggested, because the persecutions were only occasional, separated by long intervals of almost undisturbed propagandism? Mill, at least, was under no delusions on this score.

> The dictum [he wrote] that truth always triumphs over persecution is one of those pleasant falsehoods which men repeat after one another till they pass into commonplaces, but which all experience refutes. History teems with instances of truth put down by persecution. If not suppressed forever, it may be thrown back for centuries. . . . In Spain, Italy, Flanders, the Austrian empire, Protestantism was rooted out . . . Persecution has always succeeded, save where the heretics were too strong a party to be effectually persecuted.

It is precisely because persecution is so effective that the struggle for liberty must be so continuous and so unrelenting.

But these few criticisms give a false emphasis. Mr. Laski has written an essay admirable in temper, often acute and penetrating, and at times movingly eloquent. It is fine restatement of a noble case.

Henry Hazlitt

Pagan-Catholic Mexico

Religious Aspects of the Conquest of Mexico. By Charles S. Braden. Duke University Press. $3.50.

ECONOMIC and religious motives underlay the conquest of Hispanic America. Professor Braden of Northwestern feels that the religious aspects have been insufficiently emphasized. His purpose was to approach the history of Latin America from that angle. But he soon found this task too extensive both in space and in time. Accordingly he limited himself to Mexico and to the sixteenth century.

The book is written with scholarly detachment and judicious evaluation of the early chroniclers' testimony. The writings of the conquistadores and of the early missionaries—Motolinia, Mendieta, Sahagún, and the rest—pass in review. The author also relies considerably on the contemporary work of the Jesuit historian, Father Cuevas. No hitherto unknown documents have been utilized, but the reexamination of published material from a new viewpoint is a legitimate function of the historian.

The concluding chapter, which leaps four centuries, on The Permanent Influences of the Native Religions of Mexico upon Roman Catholic Christianity, is wholly inadequate. Professor Braden arrives somewhat hesitantly at the conclusion that "due to the interpenetration of the two types of religion [Roman Catholic and Pagan Aztec] which met in the Conquest, the resultant religion is to a degree different from either of the original cults" (p. 308). That thesis has been more fully demonstrated by other recent writers. Professor Braden's conclusion rests on a few extracts from travel books, none of them factual and written from half a century to a century ago. He complains that "the writers who trouble to give any reasoned basis for their opinions [of vestiges of the pagan cult in contemporary Mexican Catholicism] are very few" (p. 279), and that while he has sought for evidence in a "large number of books of travel and description of Mexico written at intervals throughout the history of Mexico . . . a great deal of reading has netted but meager results" (p. 328).

An examination of his bibliography amply reveals why the results were meager. The latest publication date of any book read was 1925—prior to the recent profusion of publications on Mexico—and the forty-five volumes listed in this category are not the ones which contain the information that he desired. The books which do Professor Braden apparently overlooked. First-hand observation in rural Mexico today would likewise have supplied overwhelming evidence of the vigorous persistence of Aztec religious patterns and practices.

Ernest Gruening

Robert Frost

The Collected Poems of Robert Frost. Henry Holt and Company. $5. Limited Edition published by Random House. One thousand copies numbered and signed. $15.

A READING of the "Collected Poems" can leave no doubt of Mr. Frost's importance. They have an appearance of obscurity, but what renders them difficult to first reading renders them also powerful and compact. The simplicity of their subject matter is never betrayed into coarseness or sentimentality. They constitute a body of poetry certain to enter into classic American literature.

However, since current reviews of this volume are all praise and no serious criticism is being attempted, I think it may be of interest to point out the limiting elements in Mr. Frost's work. There is a danger in too complete an acceptance of any man's achievement, a possibility of his influence becoming a catch-all for literary prejudice.

Mr. Frost, for instance, is singularly out of touch with his own time. Indeed, many poets who antedate him are more contemporary in spirit. It has, indeed, been Mr. Frost's wish to keep out of his own age and his own civilization. We may go therefore to his poetry for diversion and relief from our time, but not for illumination. Mr. Frost does not understand our time and will make no effort to understand it. When he essays to speak of it, as in the long poem New Hampshire (one of the poorest in the book and a sort of pudding of irrelevancies), he shows a surprising lack of comprehension. There, to the challenge of contemporary ideas, he replies with know-nothing arrogance, "Me for the hills where I don't have to choose."

In fact, Mr. Frost's work is weakest in ideas. His style is gnomic; it sounds impressively thoughtful and many sentences have the rounded conclusiveness of proverbs. But his thought, disengaged from the style, is often discovered to be no thought at all, or a banality. (I am far from agreeing with Mr. George Moore and other advocates of "pure poetry" that ideas are foreign to the nature of poetry. Shakespeare, Dante, Goethe, Milton, Donne, Lucretius would have to be among the many poets sacrificed, and the purification of poetry would turn out to be its annihilation.) Mr. Frost has casual ambitions to be a philosopher in his poetry; and in these strivings he is not successful.

We may take for example the beautiful poem A Star in a Stone Boat. The star is a meteorite built into a stone wall. Mr. Frost follows it from its fall to the time a farmer finds it, handles it, puts it into a stone boat, and drags it to the wall he is building. We are given a marvelous sense of its weight and feel in the hands and the puzzled awe with which one looks at it. The concluding lines are perfect:

Such as it is it promises the prize
Of the one world complete in any size
That I am like to compass, fool or wise.

These lines, summarizing as much of philosophy as the poem comes to, do not contain thought so much as a renunciation of thought. I doubt whether a poet of philosophic imagination could have given us a more satisfying poem. Nevertheless, this piece, so suggestive and so full of possibilities, shows how little the philosophic imagination is developed in Mr. Frost.

It is curious, therefore, that Mr. Frost should be so regularly praised for the thought content of his poetry. But there is a reason for it. The touch of philosophy in his writing is the commonest, most easily understood, most easily applied, most comforting form of thinking—renunciation. Mr. Frost adds to it no subtlety and no depths; when it occurs in his poems it is, despite the graces and novelties of his style, banality.

I dwell upon this because it is the one respect in which Mr. Frost clearly shows himself to be influenced. The influence is New England, the New England of other days. The individuality of his style is one of the valuable effects of this influence, for New England life and tradition have always encouraged intense individualism. But this individualism derives in part from renunciation. What a man renounces he is free from and in freedom he can be himself. Perhaps here lies an explanation of the individuality of Mr. Frost's style. He has made a renunciation of usual poetic subject matter and usual poetic effects, not primarily for originality's sake, but in disdain of literary comforts. He has chosen instead to write of homely and country things, regarding them with his matchlessly keen observation and celebrating them with his almost painfully restrained eloquence. No doubt some deliberate and unnecessarily harsh lines are a further process of this renunciation.

Related to this lack of a developed and original philosophy is another lack. Mr. Frost's narrative poems are frequently poised upon a psychological situation. The satisfaction the poetry and the narrative give the reader often leaves him with the impression that Mr. Frost is an excellent psychologist. Now many poets have been good psychologists, as Freud has shown; but Mr. Frost as a psychologist does not get very far. He can describe sensations perfectly; in fact, such descriptions are among his finest achievements. But he does not reach beyond the sensation; and in a psychological narrative he does not reach beyond the fact. The interesting poem of the man who burned down his house to buy a telescope with the insurance money succeeds only in reporting a curiosity; the poem Maple, which attempts to describe the psychological effects of having an unusual name, stretches out to absurd length in the attempt and succeeds in doing no more than to supply the reader data for his own psychologizing.

No, the distinctions Mr. Frost achieves are not those of a thinker or a prober; nor does he need those. He has rounded out a poetic individuality of exceptional dignity; he has developed his descriptive powers to an accuracy so sensitive that his lines often have an effect of clairvoyance; and the patient, logical fulfilment of his metaphors gives his rhetoric an effectiveness achieved by very few poets besides him.

Mr. Frost's style is one of the most individual in all poetry and certainly the most individual of our time. The consciously aristocratic T. S. Eliot, with his almost selfish obscurities, the dazzlingly inventive E. E. Cummings, with all his inimitable experiments, sound like the generality beside him. It is impossible to describe this individuality because its most conspicuous elements, terseness and the use of plain words and the avoidance of metronomic rhythms, are characteristics of many other poets. One can only say that Mr. Frost writes in a manner wholly his own; and if he has been influenced in it at all, it is only in the individualism urged by the New England tradition.

The descriptive power of Mr. Frost is to me the most wonderful thing in his poetry. A snowfall, a spring thaw, a bending tree, a valley mist, a brook, these are brought not to, but into the experience of the reader. The method is simple and can be analyzed. What he describes is never a spectacle only, but an entire adventure. In Our Singing Strength we follow him disputing with birds a bit of roadway; in A Hillside Thaw we almost see him on his knees trying to feel with his hands the process of snow turning into water. With the sight and the act the emotional response comes naturally. The three fuse together and the experience comes whole to us. It is an effect rare even in the best poetry. This simultaneous description gives the reader almost a sensory instrument with which to share the perception; and since it is natural, anyway, for the reader to identify himself with the author, the result is to bring the reader into closer touch with this aloof poet than with many poets who directly seek such a companionship.

Metaphors as Mr. Frost uses them are more functional than they commonly are in poetry. Many poets have more abundance and more brilliance, but few have used metaphor so justly, so carefully, and so fully. It is worked in naturally and at length, becoming a part of the whole idea, not a mere illuminating flash. The most conspicuous example of this is A Hillside Thaw. The first three lines announce the metaphor,

> To think to know the country and not know
> The hillside on the day the sun lets go
> Ten million silver lizards out of snow!

For most poets this would be sufficient. They would turn to other metaphors. But Mr. Frost continues it for thirty-two lines more, and we have a wonderfully complete sense of the coolness, swiftness, and liquidness of these snow lizards that the night will catch and hold, and the sun will again release in the next daylight.

There remains to make some estimate among the poems themselves. The later sections are much superior to the earlier, where the poems are frequently incomplete, beginning with promises of drama, of discoveries of thought that fail into unresolved and weak endings. This disappears in the later poems which, with the exception of the poem New Hampshire, are sound throughout. On the whole it seems to me that the longer lyrics are the most thoroughly satisfying of his poems. The narratives, although among the best in English poetry, suffer from the incompatibility found in all narrative poetry which attempts to be realistic—the rivalry of the poetic and the colloquial. The attempt to fuse the two seems to me doomed to failure; a noble failure, preferable to easier successes, but a failure nevertheless. It were better for a narrative poem to be written wholly in poetic language, which, being complete and self-sufficient in its own terms, will sound natural, certainly more natural than when colloquialisms are inset and draw attention to their competing naturalness. A few of the very short lyrics in the book are inconsequential and, as in Fireflies in the Garden, tend to become cute. Mr. Frost seems to require space to express himself, for in a few lines his terseness and involution have the look of a mannerism.

In conclusion I wish to say again outright in words what I have already said by implication—Robert Frost is one of the great poets, one whose perceptions are among the most acute and the most personal in the whole range of literature. To this nearly every one of the poems written in his maturity bears witness.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

More of the Sangers

The Fool of the Family. By Margaret Kennedy. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

LET me say at once that I am one of the few persons who have not read "The Constant Nymph." I am unable to say, therefore, whether or not this new illumination of the Sanger chronicle is an improvement or otherwise on the earlier one. Taken by itself it is the story of Caryl Sanger, who lacked the fire and individuality that characterized his brothers and sisters, of Sebastian Sanger, who possessed that fire and individuality to a marked degree, of Miss Fenella McLean, whom both brothers loved and one of them married, and of their Muse. As a background, Papa Sanger, though posthumously, is very much in evidence. His sons, strangely enough, call him "Sanger," showing what a figure of legend he had become, even to them.

Miss Kennedy treats the Muse with great respect, and paints the Sangers as unvaryingly faithful to her in the face of love, betrayal, poverty, disloyalty, and death. This novel, then, is another story about the artistic temperament. It contains, besides much spirited writing and many scenes that are genuinely sincere and touching, all the old hokum about artists. Artists, and especially artists who approach genius, are irresponsible, they cannot live a regular life, they are not bound by the ordinary conventions, they should not be expected to conform to the usual standards of loyalty and honor. The Muse transcends these matters and in her presence all is forgiven. It is true that many geniuses have lived irresponsible and irregular lives. But that their irresponsibility and irregularity were due to their genius, or vice versa, I should consider a highly dubious generalization. There is, moreover, in this point of view always the implication that if, on the contrary, a man pays his debts, keeps his appointments, is faithful to his wife, and does not beat his children he cannot possibly possess that flame which sets the world afire. One has only to remember that irreproachable family man and indefatigable father, Johann Sebastian Bach, to see that this is nonsense. Some day some novelist will write a novel about an artist who never did anything spectacular in all his life except in the actual performance of his art. Nobody will believe it and perhaps nobody will read it; but it will be nearer the truth than the tales about wild-haired, wild-eyed, and unmanageable young men and women who do anything for the sake of Art.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Report on Dr. Pattee

The New American Literature. By Fred L. Pattee. The Century Company. $3.50.

PARRINGTON'S failure to complete his third volume has created a need for a book that gives some comprehensive interpretation of the literature of the past forty years. Professor Pattee is not, however, the man to take advantage of that kind of opportunity. The nearest he comes to proposing some sort of unifying thesis is in the three generalizations he suggests in his preface. These are all commonplace, and not one of them is consistently developed in the book.

Not only does Pattee fail to unify his material; he fails to exhibit anything like a sense of proportion. In the first place, he omits, rather strangely in view of his calling the book "The New American Literature," all detailed consideration of writers who have come into prominence in the last decade. But even if one accepts the book as a history of the period from 1890 to 1920, one finds the space peculiarly apportioned. There may be some justice in his devoting sixteen pages to Mencken and only two to Babbitt and More; but there is no justice at all in his giving three lines to John Jay Chapman and three pages to Elbert Hubbard. He omits, of course, discussion of the younger poets, but he also omits all reference to such older poets as Cabot, Stickney, Sterling, and Ficke—and gives a page apiece to Alan Seeger and Joyce Kilmer. He says very little about the drama and nothing at all about O'Neill. Dr. Pattee will, no doubt, say that he was pressed for space; but in that case why did he drag in Herman Melville, on the ground that he was revived in this period, and devote twenty-three pages to an elaborate critique of his work?

We next examine the book as a volume of criticism and find that as such it has almost no value at all. In one or two passages, notably in the chapter on Jack London, Pattee does do pioneer work, but such passages are exceptional. Frequently he dodges the critical task by announcing that the time is not yet ripe for adequate estimates; and after reading such critical judgments as he does indulge in, one regrets only that he does not dodge oftener. We read, for example, that much of Emily Dickinson's poetry "must be dismissed as jingling

National and State Banks
By L. C. Helderman

A study of their origins and history since 1837 with especial attention to the effect on the Federal Reserve Act. Hart, Schaffner & Marx Prize Essay in Economics. $2.50

★ ★ ★

The Early New England Cotton Manufacture
By Caroline F. Ware

Reveals the beginnings of many of the features that have become characteristic of American industry such as mass production, cut-throat competition, tariff manipulation, etc. Hart, Schaffner & Marx Prize Essay in Economics. $3.50

HOUGHTON MIFFIN CO.

HAVE YOU READ
The New Novel by
Ludwig Lewisohn
THE LAST DAYS OF SHYLOCK

THE author of "The Island Within' and "Mid-Channel" has achieved his greatest triumph in this novel of Shylock's life—taking it up where Shakespeare left it. "A powerful novel . . . Mr. Lewisohn has never written a more heart-rending story . . . Told majestically and with grandeur in a style that ranks him with the masters. His prose swings beautifully in perfect rhythm, his development is certain, swift, and economical in line."—Philadelphia Public Ledger. 12 illustrations by Szyck. $2.50.

HARPERS

THE NATION and ATHENAEUM

If you wish to know what London thinks you should read

"THE NATION and ATHENAEUM"

Notable contributors to recent issues include:

ECONOMICS AND POLITICS	—Sir William Beveridge, J. A. Hobson, J. M. Keynes, Sir Herbert Samuel, André Siegfried, Sir Josiah Stamp, Leonard Woolf.
INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS	—C. F. Andrews, Norman Angell, P. J. Noel Baker, Lord Cecil, Walter Lippmann, C. K. Webster.
ART AND DRAMA	—Gordon Craig, Roger Fry, Lydia Lopokova, George Rylands.
MUSIC	—Constant Lambert.
POETRY	—Wilfrid Gibson, R. H. Mottram, Siegfried Sassoon, W. J. Turner, Dorothy Wellesley.
LITERATURE AND CRITICISM	—Stella Benson, Augustine Birrell, Edmund Blunden, G. Lowes Dickinson, E. M. Forster, J. L. Hammond, G. M. Trevelyan, Virginia Woolf.

Subscription $7.50. Postage paid.

Send for a specimen copy to the Business Manager

THE NATION & ATHENAEUM
38 Great James Street London, England

nonsense." We learn that Winston Churchill has written "the epic of the American Republic," whereas Ernest Hemingway has deliberately placed "strangeness and sex uncleanness and grotesque newness among his leading artistic canons." We find that T. S. Eliot is the "leading eccentric of the period," whereas Edgar Guest "despite his daily handicaps is a poet."

It must be evident at this point that the only conceivable use to be made of "The New American Literature" is as a reference book. But even as a reference book it must be used with caution. I have noted some twenty errors, varying in seriousness from the bestowal of a Ph.D. upon Van Wyck Brooks to a rather considerable confusion in the chronology of the muckraking movement. American Literature, one of whose editors Professor Pattee is, has frequently rebuked non-academic writers for their inaccuracies. If "The New American Literature" is a fair sample of what academic writers can do, most of us will stick to the journalists.

GRANVILLE HICKS

Books in Brief

The Approach to Shakespeare. By J. W. Mackail. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

Shakespeare's Problem Comedies. By William Witherle Lawrence. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Professor Mackail's approach to Shakespeare is literary as distinguished from historical or technical. Believing that the playwright is in danger of having his qualities obscured by various efforts these days to solve the "problems" of his work, he sets out to describe those qualities in their own terms. He is a famous critic, and he says some excellent things. Yet a reading of Professor Lawrence's book will convince the serious student that there is still something to be done in the field of historical criticism. Professor Lawrence has taken "All's Well That Ends Well," "Measure for Measure," "Troilus and Cressida," and "Cymbeline" to be a group of comedies in which Shakespeare, under the influence of literary fashion, chose to treat the deeper issues of human conduct in the light of a certain realism and without any intention of being gentle or charming. These have been the least understood of all the plays for the reason, Professor Lawrence says, that they have not been read with their medieval background in mind. He supplies this background by listing analogues of the plots in medieval fiction, by throwing light upon certain moral attitudes that had survived into Shakespeare's time, and by making clear the extent to which the same background affected Shakespeare's contemporaries in the theater. The result is that the comedies in question become clearer, more consistent, and more interesting than they have usually been made by previous commentators. Strangely enough, Professor Lawrence's approach is the more strictly literary of the two, since it insists upon a knowledge of Shakespeare's literary equipment and procedure. It is a definite and important contribution to the discussion of Shakespeare.

Four Contemporary Novelists. By Wilbur L. Cross. The Macmillan Company. $2.

The four contemporary novelists selected by Dean Cross as a supplement to his standard textbook "The Development of the English Novel" belong to the elder generation of English writers. The work and background of Joseph Conrad, Arnold Bennett, John Galsworthy, and H. G. Wells are discussed at some length. Originally published in the Yale Review, these critical studies are a competent blend of biography and criticism written in an authoritative and scholarly manner. The best essay of the four is undoubtedly the estimate of John Galsworthy, whose "Forsyte Saga" was once called by Hugh Walpole "the one universally read novel." The Bennett of "The Old Wives' Tale" and the Wells who remained essentially a gifted and inquisitive cockney are given less extensive treatment. This is an excellent conservative contribution to criticism.

The Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins. Edited by Robert Bridges. Oxford University Press. $3.

A detailed consideration of the poetry of Hopkins appeared in the issue of The Nation of April 16, 1930. The present volume, a reprint of the edition of 1918, now a literary rarity, contains seventeen new poems. In the interval since 1918 Hopkins has won recognition as a major English poet. His few detractors accuse him of overcultivating verbal dexterity. However, a study of even his obscurest poems reveals that his experiments in internal rhyme, in counterpointed rhythm, and in word transposition have always a justified intention, and his failures are remarkably few. No other poet in the entire range of English literature has brought sense and sound into so perfect or beautiful a unity.

A Winter Miscellany. Edited and Compiled by Humbert Wolfe. Decorated by Frank Adams. The Viking Press. $2.50.

The author of "The Uncelestial City," with the aid of two friends, has compiled an eccentric anthology of prose and poetry having to do with winter. The selections range from Hakluyt's description of Russia, where the sailors of Queen Elizabeth after only a moment in the open "had their breath oftentimes so suddenly taken away, that they eftsoones fell down as men very neere dead, so great is the sharpness of that colde climate," to a poem by Chesterton; from a Calverley translation of Horace to an excerpt from Conrad; from the Pickwick Club on the ice to a mystical vision of Richard Crashaw's. There are sections devoted to the countryman's winter, the traveler's winter, the soldier's and sailor's winter, the reveler's and the fireside winter, the sportsman's winter, the poet's winter, and the religious winter. Each of the sections is prefaced by a hitherto unpublished poem by Mr. Wolfe, and the whole by a prose defense in a whimsical vein. The chief merit of the selections is their oddity, for the nature of his anthology has permitted Mr. Wolfe to depart from the beaten path and to include some odds and ends that most of us would not otherwise encounter. It is evident that the selections were made from wide reading and with a fair amount of imagination.

Minoans, Philistines and Greeks. By A. R. Burn. History of Civilization Series. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

The years between 1500 and 1000 B.C. comprised one of the most important epochs in the history of civilization. That epoch saw the florescence of the remarkable civilization of Crete, which reached the Greek islands and the mainland of Greece and became a substratum of Hellenic civilization. It saw the migrations of the peoples that destroyed Crete and later its Mycenean inheritors, that humbled the Hittite empire and implanted the Philistines in Palestine. It saw the extinction, for a century, of safe commerce in the Aegean and the Phoenicians learning their seamanship. The author has a fine style and a narrative gift to take full advantage of this material, and in consequence his book is perhaps the most readable, and surely one of the most distinguished, in the series of which it is the fiftieth volume.

The Dutch and Swedes on the Delaware. By Christopher Ward. University of Pennsylvania Press. $5.

Mr. Ward has written a very readable history of the little-known world which stretched along the Delaware in the seventeenth century under the rule now of the Dutch,

IF YOU WOULD ENJOY WEEKLY THE ESSAYS OF ALBERT JAY NOCK, WHOM WILLIAM SOSKIN CHARACTERIZES AS "ONE OF THE MOST PROVOCATIVE OF MODERN ESSAYISTS" AND WHOSE COLUMN LEWIS GANNETT CALLS "AS POLISHED AND WITTY WRITING AS APPEARS ANYWHERE IN THIS COUNTRY";

IF YOU BELIEVE THAT THERE IS SOME HIGHER ACHIEVEMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND THAN MATERIAL SUCCESS;

IF YOU ARE DISSATISFIED WITH THE NOSTRUMS AND CURE-ALLS OF THE LIBERAL PRESS;

IF YOU ARE LESS CONCERNED WITH THE LENGTH OF BREAD LINES THAN WITH THEIR ECONOMIC CAUSES;

YOU WILL WISH TO FOLLOW THE NEW FREEMAN'S DISPASSIONATE AND INFORMATIVE COMMENT ON POLITICAL, ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS AND ITS SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE FROM WASHINGTON, FRANCE, SPAIN AND RUSSIA.

SPECIAL OFFER TO NATION READERS
One year—52 issues—of the new
FREEMAN WITH THE BOOK OF JOURNEYMAN

a collection of Mr. Nock's essays from the new FREEMAN'S department of Miscellany $5.00
Regular price of The Book of Journeyman is $1.50
The book and magazine may be sent to separate addresses.

The new FREEMAN 112 East 19th Street, New York
Enclosed find $...... As per special offer send the new FREEMAN for 1 year to.................

THE BOOK OF JOURNEYMAN to.................

The Book of Journeyman ordered separately is $1.50

Why a Training School for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK?

BECAUSE experience has shown that the social worker can only be successful if he knows and reckons with the social, religious and cultural background of the people among whom he works.

BECAUSE the Jewish group in America represents a racial, religious and cultural entity possessing a highly distinctive character.

BECAUSE the social worker who identifies his work with the Jewish group in America should, by special training and knowledge, be able to contribute to the problems of its adjustment to American life with a view to its own greater happiness and to the greater enrichment of the culture of America.

College graduates are invited to examine carefully the advantages of Jewish social work as a profession.

Scholarships and Fellowships of $150 to $1,000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified students.

For full information write to
M J. Karpf, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)
71 W. 47th St., New York City

THE NATION'S Index to Vol. CXXXI
(July-December, 1930)

is being printed. When ready, one copy will be sent to each library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send their request to the Subscription Department.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City for unforgettable impressions

VISIT SOVIET RUSSIA

WORLD'S ENIGMA! THE FIVE YEAR PLAN!

Individually arranged tours or in small groups at as low as $255.—including return Steamship fare. Interesting itineraries. Frequent sailing dates.
Write for Booklet "N"

AMALGAMATED BANK TRAVEL DEPT.
11-15 Union Square, New York City
and 111 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

now of the Swedes, and now of the two together. In 1664 Great Britain took over this territory along with New Amsterdam to the north and east, and there are few survivals today of the picturesque society which preceded the seizure. Mr. Ward, writing with warmth and imagination, revives as much of it as can now be known.

Music

From Behind a Screen

THERE is a favorite theory among professional musicians that if all the critics could be gathered together in a room and played and sung to from behind a screen, without announcement of artists, compositions, or composers, they would all be completely at sea. The value of music criticism would thus be shown to be nil, and critics would be exposed as the parasites they are.

It is true that it would be a rather bewildering experience. But would it necessarily prove the uselessness of the critics? As well say that the title of an unfamiliar work and the name of its composer should be of no importance to the performing musician—that he should play at first sight a nameless and anonymous work just as well as if he knew its origin. This theory rests upon the notion that music is "just music" and that one should be able to assay a piece of it as one would a piece of iron ore.

Now, if the recent chamber-music concert of the League of Composers had been given under the circumstances outlined above, I am not at all sure what the outcome would have been. I think many of us would have spotted the Hindemith String Quartet, for the combination of great harmonic freedom, lively and fairly conventional rhythm, and immense fluency and technical sureness is unusual enough to eliminate all but a few. It is not impossible that we would have happened on Kodaly as the composer of the other quartet. But I am quite sure that few of us would have thought of Aaron Copland in connection with the piano Variations he played. Had his authorship been suggested, we would have said they lacked the cogency, the finish, the spontaneity of the Copland works we already knew—the "Music for the Theater," say; the two pieces for violin and piano; the piano Concerto.

I do not say that the Variations seemed more cogent or more spontaneous because we knew Copland wrote them. I say only that those who know some of his earlier works are bound to consider the Variations in the light of those works. For music is not "just music," and a piece of it cannot always be analyzed separately. The adequacy of a composer's powers of expression may be much less constant than the value of what he has to express. Thus, the content of certain music is really understood only by reference to other works in which the composer has expressed himself more successfully. And some works of mediocre intrinsic worth are of interest chiefly for their artistic and historical relations with the composer's more important music. Only closer acquaintance will indicate whether these Variations are important in themselves, or in relation to the rest of Copland's work, or not at all.

If performers, on the other hand, could remain anonymous, it would be very helpful. For they, unlike composers, are important, not for what distinguishes them one from another, but for what, in greater or less degree, they have in common—the ability to realize faithfully the intentions and implications of the composer. In a recent week we had recitals by three violinists of first rank: Szigeti, Yehudi Menuhin, and Heifetz. In forming an opinion of their performance, how is it possible to exclude what should be excluded: Mr. Heifetz's apparent ease; Mr. Szigeti's bodily angularity; above all, Yehudi Menuhin's fourteen years?

Prejudices based on these things being inevitable, a certain discount must be made for them. On the score of technical purity and accuracy of intonation, Yehudi can afford to give the discount, for a comfortable margin separated him from his elders. There was no music on his program so deeply moving as the slow movement of Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," as Mr. Szigeti played it, but that lack of depth was doubtless more in the Mozart and Viotti concertos themselves than in his playing. Mr. Heifetz still dazzles, and the few technical defects of his performance were noticed only, perhaps, because from him one expects nothing short of perfection in technique. On the musical side, he seems to have added to what used to be called his heartless playing the mannerisms of more sentimental players. So that for a real tempo rubato (i. e., bending of the rhythm to meet the requirements of phrase structure) he seems to substitute a superimposed "expression" (i. e., rhythmic distortion added to an essentially unfelt performance). But this is really a case where no substitutes will do, and his earlier chaste and regular playing was by far preferable to this.

It might have been possible to hide Mr. Heifetz's identity behind a screen, but I do not think his substitution of "expression" for truly sensitive phrasing would be so easy to conceal.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Drama

The Comic Spirit Takes a Rest

THE coming on last week of two new plays by George Kelly and Philip Barry was grounds for supposing that the week in question might make an important contribution to the history of American comedy. But not so. Mr. Kelly, whose danger has always been not that he should become savage, which he usually and effectively is, but that he should become serious, became deadly serious well before the middle of "Philip Goes Forth" (Biltmore Theater); and Mr. Barry, who wrote "Hotel Universe" as well as "Holiday," simply refrained from being comic at all in "Tomorrow and Tomorrow" (Henry Miller's Theater). Yet it was a good week. For Mr. Barry's play was excellent for another reason, and Mr. Kelly's was a very capable—and therefore only a comparative—failure.

Mr. Kelly's failure was a failure to maintain that attitude of skepticism toward his characters and their convictions which I take to be the distinguishing sign of comedy. In his first act, which was much the best of the three, he did maintain such an attitude, for there was then no way of knowing which of the two antagonists was right—the young Middle Westerner who wanted to come to New York and write plays, or his blustering father who would bully him into staying at home in the family business. Either might be right, either might be wrong; and I hoped that we should never find out which was what. But we did, for by the time the second act was well under way Mr. Kelly had begun to decide for himself and to try to convince us. He discovered the truth, which is a deadly thing for a comic writer to do. He even created an oracle through which the truth should be delivered to us—Mrs. Ferris, the young man's landlady in New York. From the moment Mrs. Ferris began to speak the play began to sink, and nothing could lift it up again to its very bright first level. Mrs. Ferris's message was this: that we can tell a true artist by the fact that he likes to do the work which his

BONIBOOKS
50c each
JUST PUBLISHED
JAMES BRANCH CABELL....The High Place
ANATOLE FRANCE..............................Thaïs
HERMAN MELVILLE Moby Dick (Illustrated)
CELLINI, Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini
FLAUBERT..........................Madame Bovary
FLAUBERT.................................. Salammbo
BUTLER.................. The Way of All Flesh
OSCAR WILDE...............................Intentions
LAFCADIO HEARN Letters from the Raven
RENE MARAN................................ Batouala
These and 36 Other Titles At All Bookstores

LUNCHEON ☐ DINNER DISCUSSION

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
Saturday, January 24, 1931, at 12:45
Is There a Way Out For Society?
By Charity? By Social Legislation?
By Reorganizing The World?
GEORGE A. HASTINGS,
Asst. Secy., State Charities Aid Assn.;
Instructor in Public Opinion, Columbia University.
ABRAHAM EPSTEIN
Executive Director Am. Assn. for Old Age Security.
HARRY F. WARD,
Prof. at Union Theological Seminary.
Chairman, DR. HARRY W. LAIDLER,
Director of the League for Industrial Democracy.
Tickets $1.25 Non-Members $1.50
Undergraduate Students 75c
Make Reservations at the office of the L. I. D., 112 E. 19 St.

LEAGUE FOR INDEPENDENT POLITICAL ACTION
Dinner and Discussion
HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, AT 6:30 P. M.
THE LEAGUE AND AMERICAN POLITICAL LIFE
John Dewey
THE NEED FOR A NEW PARTY
a symposium
Bruce Bliven
Editor, The New Republic
Mauritz Hallgren
Associate Editor, The Nation
Reinhold Niebuhr
Editor, The World Tomorrow
Chairman, Henry Neumann
Leader Brooklyn Ethical Culture Society
$1.25 per plate. Make reservations now at L. I. P. A. office
Room 401, 52 VANDERBILT AVENUE

Films, Theatres, Debates and Lectures continued on pages 108 and 109

DEBATE

Friday Evening,
JANUARY 30, 8:30 p.m.

HEYWOOD BROUN NORMAN THOMAS

versus

CLARENCE DARROW ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

HARRIOT STANTON BLATCH, Chairman

"Resolved: The Best Political Service Can Be Rendered by Joining the Socialist Party"

at MECCA TEMPLE
55th St., between 6th and 7th Aves.

Tickets, $2.50 to 75c. at League for Industrial Democracy, 112 E. 19th St.; Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15th St., or Mecca Temple Box Office.

Auspices: N. Y. Chapter, League for Industrial Democracy

THE GROUP
A Clearing House Of Opinion For The Intellectually Adult
Meets at Auditorium — 150 West 85th St.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 27TH, AT 8:30 P. M.
DR. CHARLES FRANCIS POTTER
(Founder of the First Humanist Society)
will speak on:
"Will Birth Control Improve Our Race"
(Is The Pope's Stand on Birth Control Morally Defensive)

SUNDAY AFTERNOON DISCUSSION GROUP—FEBRUARY 1ST, AT 4:30 P. M.
IRMA KRAFT
(Distinguished Critic: Brilliant Lecturer)
will speak on:
"What Is Happening in the New York Theatre"
Tea Served (Founded 1918) Subscription 50c
(Weekly notices mailed on request)

DEBATE
ARE THERE GENERALLY ACCEPTED
STANDARDS OF DECENCY WHICH CAN BE APPLIED TO THE THEATRE
YES says JOHN HAYNES HOLMES, Minister of The Community Church
NO says ELMER RICE, Author of "Street Scene"
Chairman: Arthur Garfield Hays
HEAR this clash of opinion on this controversial issue
COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28th, 8:15 P.M.
Tickets: $1.00 on sale Church office, 12 Park Avenue and Author's League of America, 2 E. 23rd St.
Benefit, Community Church and Author's League of America

art requires, and that we can tell a fake one by the fact that he thinks chiefly of fame or money. Even if this were true it would be out of place in a comedy such as "Philip Goes Forth" started out to be; and it probably is not true. Mr. Kelly grows quite romantic about sincerity—and puts, for instance, some very bad poetry in the mouth of Mrs. Ferris's most "genuine" artist, Miss Krail, on the occasion—surely invented to convert us—of the musician's suicide. Not that the play lacked pungent dialogue; and not that it was anything but very intelligently acted, in particular by Harry Ellerbe as the young playwright and by Dorothy Stickney as the pathetic poetess. And I dare say there were many in the audience who were glad to be convinced that the "real" artist dotes on the drudgery of his calling.

Mr. Barry's play is a deeply touching version for modern minds of the story of Elisha and the Shunammite woman. The prophet in this case is a famous Canadian physician with great though vaguely defined powers as a healer. The woman to whom he gives a son—quite in the natural way, be it said—is a young Middle Western wife who has so much more imagination than her good-natured husband that she cannot be wholly occupied in his house and cannot, for instance, conceive a child by him. The coming of the specialist, however, changes all that; a boy, his son, is born; and several years later the specialist is called back from his travels to prevent the child's death from a mysterious affliction which is probably psychological. Leaving then for the last time he asks the wife to go with him, and she does not go.

The old story is translated with the utmost ingenuity, yet the chief virtue of the play lies in its dialogue, which has all the lightness of Mr. Barry's best comic writing at the same time that it is sensitive to an extreme and beautiful degree. Mr. Barry is always tactful and tasteful, even to the point of turning his head from the more painful moments and entertaining us with charming remarks about watch crystals that won't stay in. He proceeds—and succeeds—always by understatement, by the cultivated gestures of polite comedy. This in a play whose theme calls for comparison with that of "Strange Interlude"! The difference between the two pieces defines very well the quality of Mr. Barry, who certainly will never try to achieve the full and powerful tragic note of Mr. O'Neill. He prefers pathos, of which he is a master. But it is worth noting that pathos merely touches us, making us softly cry perhaps. Tragedy moves us, though at a greater distance, and does so by overstatement in the grand style. Tragedy moves us more, and perhaps more significantly; it cannot touch us, however, for it is not tender. The acting of Herbert Marshall as the specialist and Zita Johann as the wife is in the neighborhood of the season's best.

MARK VAN DOREN

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

WORKLESS is an unemployed journalist.

VIRGIL MACMICKLE is a free-lance writer resident in Portland.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

GRANVILLE HICKS is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

MARK VAN DOREN has written theater reviews for the Theater Guild Magazine and is giving a series of lectures on current plays at the New School for Social Research.

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

Plays to See

*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Petticoat Influence—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
‡The New Yorkers—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

---

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

Films

Sous les Toits de Paris—(French)—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.

Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.

News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.

Morocco—beginning Sat., Jan. 24; Outbound Bound, beginning Wed., Jan. 28—The Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.

Gretel Und Liesel (Kohlhiesel's Tochter)—8 St. Playhouse—52 W. 8 St.

Music

Philharmonic Symphony, (Bernardino Molinari conducting)—Carnegie Hall—Thurs. eve., 22, Fri. aft., Jan. 23, Sat. eve.. Jan. 24.

Albert Spalding, violinist—Carnegie Hall, Sun. Jan. 25 at 2:30 P. M.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto—Town Hall—Sun., Jan. 25 at 3 P. M.

Jose Iturbi, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Mon., Jan. 26 at 8:30 P. M.

Philadelphia Orchestra, (Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting)—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Jan. 27.

London String Quartet—Town Hall—Thurs. eve., Jan. 29.

Mary Wigman, dancer—Carnegie Hall—Sat. eve., Jan. 31.

League of Composers—Second concert of Modern Chamber Music—The Art Center—Sun. aft., Feb. 1

Rachmaninoff, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Sat. aft., Feb. 14.

Myra Hess, pianist—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Feb. 15.

Debates and Lectures

"Resolved that the Best Political Service Can Be Rendered by Joining the Socialist Party"—Debate—Heywood Broun and Norman Thomas vs. Clarence Darrow and Arthur Garfield Hays—Mecca Temple—133 W. 55 St.—Fri., Jan. 30 at 8:30 P. M.

Are There Generally Accepted Standards of Decency Which Can be Applied to The Theatre—Debate—John Haynes Holmes and Elmer Rice—Community Church Auditorium—Wed., Jan. 28 at 8:15 P. M.

Will Birth Control Improve Our Race—Dr. Charles Francis Potter—Auditorium—150 W. 85 St.—Tues. Jan. 27 at 8:30 P. M.

What is Happening in the New York Theatre—Irma Kraft—Auditorium—150 W. 85 St.—Sun., Feb. 1 at 4:30 P. M.

☐ PLAYS ☐

—"A SMASH HIT"—Walter Winchell, Mirror—
"Joe Cook perfectly marvelous and the show perfectly beautiful"—Heywood Broun, Nation.
JOE COOK in "FINE and DANDY"
HIS NEWEST, MADDEST MUSICAL
ERLANGER'S THEATRE—W. 44th St.—PEN. 7963
Evening 8:30; Matinees, Wed. and Sat., 2:30

The Theatre Guild Presents
MIDNIGHT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN
Martin Beck Thea. 45th Street, West of Eighth Avenue. Eves., 8:40. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., [illegible]

Dwight Deere Wiman presents
MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy Hit
VINEGAR TREE
PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - 2628
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

☐ CONCERT ☐

CARNEGIE HALL—Wednesday Evening, Feb. 9th
YEHUDI
Menuhin
Mgt. Evans & Salter (Mason & Hamlin)

☐ FILMS ☐

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT Continuous 10 A. M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Saturday

☐ LECTURES ☐

Rand School of Social Science
7 East 15th Street Algonquin 4-3094
Scientific Influence on Modern Philosophy
William P. Montague, Prof. of Philosophy, Columbia Univ.
Monday, January 26, 8:30 p.m. Admission 50c.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

Mexico Turns to Fascist Tactics

By CARLETON BEALS

DURING the past twenty years Mexico has embarked upon many military, social, and political adventures. Now, the leaders in control of the government have established an all-powerful official ruling party. They have forged the National Revolutionary Party (founded after Obregón's assassination in 1928) into a close-knit disciplined organization designed to control national affairs completely and be the final arbiter in matters of state. The Communist Party in Russia, the Fascist Party in Italy, the Kuomintang in China—all are dictatorial one-party expressions, but they all antedated the seizure of power. But like the Unión Patriótica of Primo de Rivera, the new National Revolutionary Party (PNR) is a post-revolutionary creation, imposed from above, to achieve support of the regime already in power.

The restricted official character of the new ruling party did not clearly display itself until toward the end of the provisional presidency of Portes Gil, when by executive decree every government employee was required to donate seven days' pay a year to sustain the party, thus converting it into a bureau of political control instead of a bona fide party.

The PNR was baptized in its official role at a meeting in the Ideal Theater in Mexico City, a meeting attended by high heads of the party from all over the country and by President Ortiz Rubio and his cabinet. Heretofore, during past "revolutionary" administrations, official groups camouflaged their governmental connections. Calles and his cabinet members were wont to attend the conventions of the Mexican Labor Party and the Mexican Regional Confederation of Labor (CROM), but these groups, while they basked in the sunlight of governmental favor, had no monopoly of political activities in the country.

Portes Gil, as new head of the PNR, defended the forced collection of funds from public employees. He declared that if these funds were used purely for political and electoral purposes, those affected would have the right to protest, but "everyone is advised, especially functionaries and public employees, that the funds gathered in this manner will be used for important and noble ends." Out of these funds, according to Portes Gil, the PNR would establish a life-insurance fund and provide doctors and medical supplies to care for all illnesses of all government servants and all members of the party. The PNR would aid the new government labor banks to promote workers' and peasants' cooperatives, would foster rural credits, and see to the proper functioning of the new peasant communes, preventing them from falling into the control of cheap political agitators. In Mexico City, the PNR would establish a "Proletarian Home" to care for workers' children and provide lodgings for all visiting workers' and peasants' delegations. Workers' cultural activities and ambulatory social missions would be furthered, and the Museum of the Revolution and a Workers' and Peasants' University would be founded. Finally, the party would attempt to develop new proletarian leaders "who will not exploit their followers." Such was the program laid down by the politician who has done more than any other single person in Mexico to destroy all existing workers' and peasants' organizations.

In detail, many of these proposals overlap present government activities, and it seems a device, in part, by which the PNR may take over certain radical undertakings and thus curry favor with the masses, who are not permitted to organize freely outside of the PNR, while at the same time the government itself presents a more diplomatic and respectable front to the world. Portes Gil concluded: "The PNR is frankly a government party. . . . The revolution having been made, the government needs an organization of agitation and defense. The PNR is proud to be this organ of agitation and defense. The government has the program of the revolution. The party has the program of the government and the revolution."

These are the avowed "important and noble ends" toward which the PNR will work by means of the funds extracted from government employees—a total of at least 30,000,000 pesos during Ortiz Rubio's administration. The functional theory behind the undertaking is, of course, that of the Roman-Prussian superstate, strained through Communist and Fascist practice and adapted to Mexican needs.

What chance has this unilateral party for success? The PNR is relatively a new organization, though directed by political and military personalities who have emerged successful during the past twenty years of strife. It was founded to bridge a definite crisis resulting from the 1928 assassination of President-elect Obregón. Almost anybody who could lay the slightest claim to being "a revolutionary" had clambered upon the Obregón reelection band-wagon. Among his campaign followers could be discerned: (1) the Calles group, including the Mexican Labor Party, led by Morones, then Secretary of Industry, and the more disciplined wing of the army, controlled by General Joaquín Amaro, Secretary of War; (2) the surviving anarchic but powerful generals, long closely associated with Obregón, those who had surged up recklessly during the worst years of disorder, such as Manzo, Topete, Escobar, Aguirre, Caraveo, Urbalejo; (3) the middle wing of the army, half pro-Calles, half pro-Obregón—Saenz, Almazán, Pérez Treviño, Rodríguez, and others; (4) the peasant groups, especially favored by Obregón at the time—the National Agrarian Party (founded by Soto y Gama in 1920), with whom was now associated Aurelio Manrique, ex-governor of San Luis Potosí, a party bitterly anti-Calles, and the National Peasants' League, under Ursulo Galván, indirectly supported by Secretary of Interior Adalberto Tejeda and at that time affiliated with the Moscow peasants' international; (5) the Communist Party; (6) the bureaucratic Alliance of Socialist Parties of the Republic, founded and swayed by the notorious gunman, Deputy Gonzalo N. Santos; and (7) the outstanding state bosses, such as Tejeda of Vera Cruz, Zuno of Jalisco, Garrido of Tabasco, Portes Gil of Tamaulipas. Some of the generals, such as Pérez Treviño, Saenz, Caraveo, and Rodríguez, were also powerful state bosses.

There was no fundamental cohesion, no unity of program. Even before the campaign was over the Calles labor group had broken sharply with Obregón, and it became open gunning season between the followers of both bands. After Obregón's election and death the political pattern broke up completely. The various soup-kitchen groups split badly. Things looked shaky. Calles was the only strong pivot, and about him swirled the torrent of frustrated ambitions. To save the situation Calles clung to the Amaro wing of the army but threw overboard his long-standing friends, the Laborites. The state bosses, or caciques, saved themselves out of the wreck because of their strong regional support. The middle wing of the army wavered, then fused with the Amaro wing. In March, 1929, the unruly old-line generals dashed into sordid revolt. Part of the National Agrarian Party, led by black-bearded Manrique, jumped in with the rebellious generals. The rest of the peasant elements pursued a policy of watchful waiting. The Communists launched bitter and insensate personal attacks upon Calles, Portes Gil, and other Obregón elements.

Portes Gil assumed the provisional presidency, a compromise man to bridge the gap between the pro-Calles elements and the pro-Obregón elements, except that the Labor Party was definitely out. Portes Gil intensified his onslaught upon Morones and the CROM by propaganda, by police coercion, and by subsidizing enemies of the CROM. The National Agrarian Party was subjected to a coup d'etat by official elements and died a natural death. The romantic Zapatista lawyer, Soto y Gama, retired to a life of quiet study. The National Peasants' League split into various factions, and an official coup ejected the founder, Ursulo Galván, who died planning a revolution after an operation at Rochester. The Communist Party was ruthlessly suppressed, its Moscow agitators were deported, and various members were shipped off without trial to the Islas Marías penal colony. Everything was smashed except the PNR, conceived and founded by Calles to inaugurate an era of liberal democracy. Now, back of the government stands the PNR; back of the PNR stands Calles, who, according to Luis León, "broke the shield of his own military leadership to cover himself with the tunic of democracy."

But in Mexico no ruler can long afford to wear the tunic of democracy. Political control is still too precarious. True, a freer system of political expression had grown up in the shadow of the revolution, but the PNR, under the stress of Obregón's assassination and the subsequent political confusion, not only had to consolidate itself internally, but also had to establish its sway in the tempest of conflicting groups and ambitions. The original democratic concepts were dumped. The first true demonstration of PNR democracy was the installation of an absolutely 100 per cent PNR chamber and senate, over which the pistol of Gonzalo N. Santos waved menacingly—no members of the Labor Party, no Catholics, no Vasconcelists, no representation whatsoever from any but the official group.

In April, 1930, Portes Gil left the cabinet of Ortiz Rubio to take over the party, which was threatened with its initial disruption. Congress had split into "reds" and "whites" quarreling over control of jobs and the permanent commission which controls the seating of future members. The whites had been given control of the commission by Pérez Treviño, Minister of Agriculture, then head of the PNR, but the reds, led by Campillo Seyde of Vera Cruz and Gonzalo N. Santos, made a coup. Seventeen of them were promptly expelled from the PNR. Portes Gil now reinstated the reds and a division of control was agreed upon, but the strife continued back in the states. Finally, however, differences were patched up.

No sooner had Portes Gil and León secured control of the party machinery than they began to use it for personal ends, installing their relatives and friends in key positions. One of Portes Gil's henchmen was General Ortiz Rubio, who had earlier in the year inaugurated a minor reign of terror and jailed all opponents of the PNR. He had been transferred to a northern state where he was again making trouble by attempting to undermine the control of Saenz and Pérez Treviño. Rumors of revolution against Ortiz Rubio even got under way. Calles jumped back upon the scene, Portes Gil and Luis León were ejected from the PNR, and it was turned over to the Amaro army group by the appointment of young General Cárdenas from Michoacán, Amaro's home state. The PNR, after having crushed all organized popular political expression, now represents an army party.

The only organization which has attempted, and to some slight extent successfully, to put up any opposition to the PNR steam roller is the flouted Labor Party under Morones. The Laborites have united with the two "out" factions, the Anti-Reelectionists and the Socialist Party. The particular bête noir of the Laborites was Portes Gil, and his recent elimination at least removes an element of personal bitterness from the controversy. According to Morones, Mexican politics have become a cemetery with the PNR acting as the hangman. The collection of the seven days' pay a year from government employees has led Morones to dub the PNR the "Thirty-One Club," because the money is collected on the last day of each thirty-one-day month. What the Laborites forget is that the idea was inaugurated by themselves, for when the Labor Party controlled public office, each bureaucratic chief forced all subordinates to belong to the Labor Party and pay a percentage of salary into the coffers of the party. The PNR differs only in that it has monopolized and universalized this privilege, forcing all other parties out of existence through presidential decree.

In the past, attempts similar to that of the PNR to dominate Mexican politics have been met by the cry of "Imposition." This accounted for the downfall of Carranza. But as the leading daily, Excelsior, shrewdly remarked at the time, the reason that Carranza did not succeed in imposing Ignacio Bonillas as a puppet president was precisely because the Liberal Constitutionalist Party of Carranza was more a name than a fact and he did not choose Bonillas soon enough or support him long enough. Also, Ortiz Rubio still had other supporting elements besides the PNR when he was thrust into office by Calles and Portes Gil; he had the nominal support of the Laborites and he had the army of Joaquín Amaro; and his way was paved by the successful suppression of the 1929 revolt.

The PNR, more than any of its bureaucratic party predecessors, bears the earmarks of the privileged parties of the dictatorial European regimes mentioned in the first paragraph of this article. The PNR is the government and the government is the PNR; and thus far no quarter has been given to any elements outside of that combination. Here is the first time an official government party, sustained by the government and dedicating itself to keeping the government in power through effectively destroying all opposition and even all sympathizers not definitely in the party, has functioned in quite this manner in Mexico. And by the militarization of the PNR, politics in Mexico have been reduced to factional feuds. The conflicts revolving around the problems of labor, agriculture, nationalism, the church, and foreign capital have been relegated to second rank.

What is to be done about the seven million people dislocated from the haciendas and thrust into free villages without the proper economic basis for self-maintenance? They must be driven back on to the large haciendas, which are now, in many places, in the hands of Calles, Portes Gil, Saenz, León, and others. Or the country must be rapidly industrialized. Or the population must be kept down by armed force. Or the agrarian revolution must go on to its logical conclusion. The immediate answer will probably lie in a partial reabsorption of the peasants into the large private haciendas and the suppression of all efforts at continuing the agrarian revolution by armed force. Industrialization still seems remote. American capital is still wary, and though it has seized a few key positions, such as new railroad extensions, the light and power resources (Electric Bond and Share), and the telephones, and though the National City Bank has installed itself, the major raw-product industries—petroleum, henequen, and mining—are in a ruinous state.

The evolution from one-man dictatorship to party dictatorship may represent a real advance in Mexico. But the PNR has cut the roots of its popular origin. Furthermore, the road of the one-party system is fraught with even more difficulties than one-man dictatorship. To survive, such a party needs a powerful personality at its head, an iron-clad organization, a fearless willingness to employ any opportunistic means; and at bottom it must have a military basis as in Italy, Russia, and China. Already Portes Gil has demonstrated how such a party may be turned into a personal machine. In eliminating him and turning to the Amaro war party, Calles has definitely jumped from the frying-pan into the fire, but he has insured more party stability.

For a time the regime made an honest effort to promote native industry and to create a sustaining economic basis for an independent governmental system along the lines of native capitalist development. The dilemma is now clear. Calles could not provide the support necessary for a native industry competing with foreign enterprise and at the same time support the Labor Party, which was making inroads from another direction. Obregón's program had better chance for success. He threw overboard the Laborites and turned to the peasants. Calles has now thrown overboard the Laborites and turned to the army. All the popular roots of the regime having been cut, it can only maintain itself by a foreign alliance, namely, with the American State Department. The present Mexican regime is now in the same position as was Leguía in Peru, Luis in Brazil, Siles in Bolivia, Machado in Cuba, and Moncado in Nicaragua. Mexico is a much harder country to control, but if Calles and Amaro are moderately successful they will come to depend more and more upon the United States. One of these days even a good fat bond issue may be in order.

☐ OPEN SHELF ☐ OPEN SHELF ☐

Henry George's Books Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men —sent free. None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

THAT BOOK YOU WANT! We hold 2,000,000 of the best books—new, second-hand, out-of-print, rare — all subjects. Also Sets of Authors. Catalogues free (30 issues). Outline requirements and interests. Books sent on approval. FOYLES, Charing Cross Road, London, Eng.

CURIOUS BOOKS Privately printed limited editions. Unexpurgated translations. Esoterica.
Send for Catalogue
The Falstaff Press
Dept.N. 489 Fifth Ave.,New York

MISCELLANEOUS

REGINALD [redacted] of London, England, has original letters [redacted]
MAHATMA GANDHI
which he [redacted] to [redacted] of the Friends of India [redacted]
which is in urgent need of funds for its work in England.
Prospective purchasers [redacted] copies of these letters from [redacted] Hoagland, Glenora, Yates Co., New York.

What Every Man and Woman Should Know!

Fascinating, Authentic Information on Life's Most Vital Subjects!

LOVE, MARRIAGE and DIVORCE
By JUDGE LOUIS HARRIS

Don't Get Married! Don't Get Divorced! till you have read this remarkable book. Learn the truth about problems that perplex a vast proportion of humanity. Know your Rights, Duties and Obligations in Life's Most Intimate Relationships. Every intelligent person should read LOVE, MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. $2.50 at Bookstores, or direct from
THE STRATFORD CO., Publishers
289 Congress St., Boston, Mass.

ATHEISM
Book catalog FREE. Tracts, 10c.
Am. Assn. for Adv. of Atheism.
307 E. 14th St., New York, N. Y.

An advertisement of HOUSE TO RENT or APARTMENT TO RENT
in a space this size, will get answers, in
The Nation
Rate $6.16
For further information write
THE NATION - 20 Vesey St., N. Y.

TOURS

EARN A TOUR TO EUROPE

Foremost Student Tours to Europe want one organizer in each city to earn all or part of tour to Europe. Fastest selling tours: Over 5000 clients in 1930. Lowest cost tours Seven Countries $375. 250 tours from 26 days $235 to 80 days $790. Most liberal commissions in cash or travel. State qualifications in first letter.
COLLEGE TRAVEL CLUB
154 Boylston Street Boston, Mass.

HELP WANTED

COLLEGE STUDENTS (male): experienced as waiters for adult camp, ability to entertain essential; full details in first letter to obtain interview. Box 258, c/o The Nation.

DRAMATIC DIRECTOR (male): adult camp, must also be experienced in scenic and lighting effects. Full details in first letter to obtain interview. Box 259, c/o The Nation.

SOCIAL DIRECTOR (male): adult camp; must also be experienced in scenic and lighting effects, full details in first letter to obtain interview. Box 260, c/o The Nation.

GRAPHOLOGY

THIS is stock-taking time. Do not forget personal inventories of yourself and associates. Graphology practical. Send handwriting. Character study, $2.00. Miss Florence Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1931 No. 3422

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 113

EDITORIALS:

- Confusion Worse Confounded 116
- New-Party Obstacles 117
- Bar for Sale 117
- Death of a Swan 118

WILL THE FIVE-YEAR PLAN SUCCEED? By Louis Fischer 119

THE PLIGHT OF THE PUEBLOS. By Nathan R. Margold 121

OUR OBSOLETE CONSTITUTION. By Henry Hazlitt 124

AN ECHO OF WHEELS. By Rollin Kirby 126

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 127

CORRESPONDENCE 127

BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:

- The Grindstone. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin 130
- Debate. By Henry Hazlitt 130
- The Meaning of "Ulysses." By Gerald Sykes 130
- Primitive Childhood. By Melville J. Herskovits 131
- The Upton Sinclair Enigma. By V. F. Calverton 132
- The English Romantics. By Horace Gregory 133
- Books in Brief 133
- Drama: Child's Plays. By Mark Van Doren 134
- Films: Shaw's First Movie. By Alexander Bakshy 135

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 136

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

- Social Welfare in Vienna. By Dr. Siegfried Kraus 138

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN
LEWIS S. GANNETT
JOHN A. HOBSON
FREDA KIRCHWEY
LUDWIG LEWISOHN
H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE RELEASE OF GANDHI and other Nationalist leaders in India, with the concurrent termination of the government order under which the Working Committee of the Congress Party has been an outlaw organization, will make fluid, at least temporarily, a situation that threatened to harden into deadlock. The release was made, according to the Viceroy, in order that the Nationalist leaders might be free to decide their future attitude toward the Round Table results. It is hard to see how the Working Committee in the light of past pronouncements can consistently accept the Round Table recommendations as they stand without convincing assurance that the self-government promised therein shall be real and the reservations shall not be merely a device for preserving British dominance. Unconditional amnesty to the thousands of political prisoners in Indian jails might provide that assurance. It might even break down the power of the Congress Party to continue its revolutionary activities. As it is, the release of the leaders serves to dramatize the plight of the led, who still remain in prison. At the same time it appears that the Round Table results, along with the gesture of amnesty so far given, will find considerable favor among the business elements, whose wide support of the Congress Party is amply proved by the statistics of British-Indian trade given out the day before Gandhi's release. In the event of a split in the Congress Party, the future course of events—the difference between further cooperation with the British and revolution—will depend of course on the strength of the two factions. At present only one thing is certain—the decision of the Working Committee will be the next important development in the Indian drama.

CASH FOR VETERANS, in the form of an immediate payment upon application of the adjusted service certificates held by veterans of the World War, has now been demanded by the national executive committee of the American Legion, notwithstanding that a resolution favoring such payment was tabled by the national convention of the Legion at its meeting at Boston last fall. The retirement of the certificates at this time would, in the opinion of the committee, "materially assist in the relief of present distressful economic conditions," "put new life into American business," and "benefit immeasurably not only the veterans themselves, but the citizenship of the entire country." The hard-headed Mr. Mellon does not see it that way. Commenting on the Garner bill calling for the immediate payment not only of the veterans' certificates, but also of the 25 per cent added for endowment insurance and 4 per cent compound interest from the date of issuance, Mr. Mellon points out that the Treasury would have to borrow at least $2,100,000,000, or $375,000,000 more than the face value of the certificates, and that such a loan, even assuming that it could be floated, would heavily deplete capital funds available for industrial or other use. We are entirely with Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover in their opposition to the immediate-payment scheme. Not only would the endowment insurance be swept away, but the bonus payments themselves, on the average only a trifle more than $1,000, would almost certainly be dissipated for immediate needs without leaving any provision for the future.

A SPECIAL FEDERAL GRAND JURY has indicted Victor Seymour, former Western manager of the Republican Senatorial Committee, and George W. ("Grocer") Norris, of Broken Bow, Nebraska, for perjury in their testimony in the Nye committee's investigation of the anti-Norris campaign in Nebraska. Senator Norris declares that the end is not yet, and newspaper dispatches state that additional indictments are expected. We set forth these facts only to remind our readers once more of the utterly unscrupulous nature of the campaign that was waged against Senator Norris, and the readiness of officials in his own party organization to defeat a man whose loyalty to the public interest was greater than his loyalty to that organization or its financial backers. Men whose memories go back a month will not forget the part played by Robert H. Lucas, executive director of the Republican National Committee, in the campaign against Senator Norris, and his attempt to read the Nebraskan out of the party when his own work was brought to light. There has been criticism of the work of the Nye committee, but certainly in respect to the anti-Norris campaign it has contributed materially to our understanding of the meaninglessness of the present political line-up and to our appreciation of the forces really at work in our politics.

THE CONFERENCE of seven governors of industrial States called by Governor Roosevelt to consider questions of unemployment and stabilization of industry has given needed stimulus to the discussion of unemployment insurance. President Hoover simply sits tight, and there is no hope of national executive leadership, though the problem is national in scope. The governors are to be commended for taking up the question, but at best State action is bound to be partial and inadequate. According to Governor Roosevelt's announcement, the adjourned conference of governors has authorized a series of subsequent meetings by representatives of the industrial and tax departments of the States concerned. The first one, to be held in New York, will consider European and American experience with both voluntary and compulsory unemployment insurance, and the modifications of such plans that ought to be made here if a general system by States should be adopted. Nothing but good can come of any genuine study of this problem, but we cannot too strongly insist on the essentially national character of any solution that even gives promise of being satisfactory. We hope that the representatives of the seven industrial States involved will help make that clear.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, in addition to urging Congress to repeal the recapture clause of the Transportation Act as not only useless, but mischievous in its possibilities, also recommends important changes in the rate provisions of the act. The fundamental theory that the regulating body should attempt to insure a fair return on the value of the property used in transportation has always appeared to us economically impracticable, and the Supreme Court in the O'Fallon and other cases has complicated the matter yet further with considerations of reproduction cost and other disturbing elements. The commission now invites Congress to help free it from court-imposed fetters by requiring it, in fixing the general level of rates, to give attention to the transportation needs of the country, the necessity for an adequate credit basis for the carriers, and the further necessity that the carriers furnish adequate service at the lowest possible cost. Transportation costs are a necessary charge against industry, which under private ownership must of course cover the cost of adequate service if industry is not to suffer. This public conception of a rate basis, however, differs sharply from the idea that the primary purpose in fixing rates is to insure adequate return to railroad capital, which seems largely to have dominated the court's thinking on the subject. It will be a public gain if Congress gives the commission the legislation it asks, thus lending legislative sanction to the more enlightened theory of rate-making held by the commission as opposed to the majority of the court.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS COUNCIL lacks courage. In setting February, 1932, as the date for the world disarmament conference, it privately intimated that it would like to have an American preside over the meeting. It is widely anticipated that the conference will resolve itself into an old-fashioned dog fight over purely European political questions. The United States, traditionally in any event, has no stomach for the job of sitting in as umpire at Europe's domestic quarrels. Hence the promptness and the coldness with which Washington rejected the Council's suggestion. The State Department quite properly pointed out that the main question at the conference will concern land armaments, that this question is peculiarly European, and that Europe therefore should seek among its own statesmen for a conference chairman. Again, in the Polish-German controversy the Council, though displaying more tact, showed little courage. A formula for rebuking Poland was found that not only satisfied the Germans, but was acceptable to the Poles. This is perhaps excellent diplomacy, but nowhere in the dispatches from Geneva is it even suggested that the minorities row between the two countries has been permanently settled. However, the New York Times reported Foreign Minister Henderson of Great Britain as describing "the solution as one of which the League could be proud and which would relieve all its friends." Obviously, it is more important to the peace of the world that the friends of the League should be relieved than it is to remove a condition that disinterested observers believe is leading Europe to a new war.

RUSSIA MUST HAVE ENGINEERS and technical experts to carry its Five-Year Plan through to successful completion, and it appears that capitalism out of its very weakness will help Communists to meet this need. Lack of adequate technical assistance has long been the largest problem the Soviet Government has had to face in its scheme of industrialization. An authority on Russia, writing in the conservative London Economist last November, said: "The training of hundreds of thousands of workers for the task of industrialization is one of the most baffling problems of the Five-Year Plan. The number, quality, and devotion of these cadres, as the industrial army is called in Russia, will in the end decide the fate of the industrial revolution." Moscow sought to overcome this difficulty by increasing the number of its training schools and speeding up the courses. Unfortunately, the schools have failed to produce enough qualified men to meet the demands of the industrialization program, and Moscow has now turned to the workers in the capitalist world for help. It has announced that positions are open for 3,000 engineers, 3,000 foremen, and 7,000 workmen. The appeal comes at a time when the capitalist countries are suffering from one of their protracted periods of depression and unemployment. There can be little doubt that of the millions of men out of work at least 13,000 will be found willing and competent to fill the positions Russia has to offer.

MUST THE WASHINGTON GOVERNMENT be continually reminded that its complete exclusion of Japanese immigration under the terms of the 1924 law has not been and cannot be forgotten by the Japanese people? Will Washington never awaken to the fact that until amends for this gratuitous Congressional insult have been made, there will always be an undertone of falsity and hypocrisy in our otherwise friendly relations with Japan? During and for a few weeks after the London Naval Conference hope was revived that Congress itself would, by putting Japan on a quota basis, take the initiative in repairing as best it could the damage it wrought six years before. Chairman Johnson of the House Committee on Immigration promised as much in a statement issued after the signing of the naval treaty. Japanese delegates returning to Tokio felt certain that some such action would result from the markedly more friendly relations between the United States and Japan. High quarters in Washington at least did nothing to discourage the Japanese in this hope. Yet our relations with Japan are still drifting along under the cloud of this insult. According to Foreign Minister Shidehara, the wounding of their national honor is still "weighing heavily on popular sentiment" in Japan. The Japanese remain patient, but Shidehara's recent message to the Diet reveals that they have not forgotten. "We shall," he said, "watch further development of the question with unimpassioned but keen interest." Cannot Washington act of its own accord to repair this wrong?

FRANCE ALONE of the important countries succeeded in staving off hard times when the economic depression was engulfing most of the rest of the world. Now, however, even France has hit the economic toboggan. There were indications of an industrial and commercial decline several months ago, but not until the official year-end reports were made public in Paris was the extent of the decline made known. Foreign trade for 1930 fell off 13,200,000,000 francs, or about 13 per cent, as compared with 1929, but as most of the decrease was registered in the last two months of last year, the drop was more severe than that which has taken place in American foreign trade. Industrial activity showed a similar decline, while the number of unemployed increased in the last three months of the year from 988 to 11,952, a gain of 1,000 per cent. A strong financial position and the well-protected domestic market were among the factors that helped postpone the hard times, and it is thought that they will now operate to keep the slump from reaching disastrous proportions. Nevertheless, economists believe, because of the wide spread between the various price levels, that France will be subjected to a severe price deflation that will tend to aggravate the depression to an extent that otherwise would have been improbable. Besides its economic difficulties France is still laboring under the strain of the Oustric and other financial scandals, and to these was added a few days ago the wheat-speculation scandal which forced the Steeg Government out of office.

EVENTUALLY the State Department may awaken to the fact that its defense and support of the Cuban dictator have not saved and cannot save American property from destruction. Protection of American investments has undoubtedly been the principal motive behind the department's present Cuban policy. Washington has reasoned that by throwing all its weight behind a strong man it could forestall revolution and thus prevent wholesale destruction of property. Until recently this policy met with the anticipated success. Those opposed to Machado realized only too well the hopelessness of attempting a revolution against the remarkably efficient Cuban army. Lately, however, the opposition has expressed itself in other ways; numerous cane fields have been fired and many sugar centrals have been burned. The damage has run into the hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars, most of the loss falling upon American owners and American investors. Details as to this wave of incendiarism are set forth in the flood of daily dispatches that have come to American newspapers from Havana in recent weeks. It cannot be long before the Department of State is confronted with complaints from American investors, whose losses in the sugar-field fires are mounting daily.

A DANDY TIME was had by all at the Poverty Ball held in St. Louis on January 24. Guests were invited to "Emerge from Depression; Celebrate Hard-Times Finale. . . . Your last chance to look poor, act poor, feel poor, talk poor, be poor!" Quaint costumes were helpfully suggested by the committee. Under a picture of an unfortunate-looking tramp with Monday-to-Saturday whiskers was playfully inscribed: "Dress in the New York Manner." An apple-vendor pushing a baby carriage full of apples was another brilliant suggestion with the caption: "A Fruit Magnate in an Executive Capacity." A young lady attired in a barrel was described as "Barreled Sunlight or a Keg of High Spirits." At the St. Louis country club where this merry party was held, three rooms, it was announced beforehand, were to be decorated "in the spirit of the occasion." "One will be a downtown street scene, with its apple salesmen, hot-dog stands, and stores advertising price slashes. One will be a winter scene in a park, with snow and cold benches. The third will be a cellar." There was much more in the same vein, but this will give everyone who was so out of luck as not to be present a good idea of the delicate wit, sympathetic understanding, and deep intellect of the sponsors of the affair. No doubt as a result prosperity will come back to St. Louis with a bang, and the unfortunate ones who didn't get invited but who had to keep on wearing their old clothes on the bread line will have a terribly nice evening reading about it all in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

NEWSPAPER MERGERS go on in England as well as in the United States, the latest to be announced being the amalgamation of the Nation and Athenaeum and the New Statesman. The old Nation and the Athenaeum, the former, under its great editor H. J. Massingham, long the foremost of English liberal weeklies, and the latter an equally distinguished literary journal, were merged in 1921. In 1923 the control of the paper passed into the hands of a group of which Professor John Maynard Keynes was the best-known member. The New Statesman was founded in 1913 as an organ of those whose political sympathies were with the Labor Party rather than the Liberals, but neither of the two journals was properly to be classed as partisan. The new weekly, which is to be known as the New Statesman and Nation, will, it is said, be "an independent organ of the left." The merger will thus leave the Liberals without a weekly organ. The change is in line with a political transformation which has reduced British liberalism to a position of hopeless minority among the parties, and at the same time taken from Labor much of its former socialistic radicalism. As the Liberals, from the standpoint of the Conservatives, are obviously a left party, an "independent organ of the left" may, it would seem, find place for Liberal as well as Labor sentiments. The Nation wishes well to the new venture, only hoping that the editors will speak out and hit hard.

Confusion Worse Confounded

AMAZING and amusing—that's the Wickersham Commission report. The day it was made public some New York newspapers changed their headlines on each successive edition, as they examined a new part of the report, and finally the Telegram came out with this head: "Figure It Out for Yourself—We Can't— Editor." The conclusions of the report contradict its evidence, so far as it supplies any evidence, and controvert the conclusions of the individual members. Eleven members, eleven opinions—it seems to be a faithful reflection of the present state of American thought on the liquor question. The London Morning Post observes caustically: "The ludicrousness of this babel of conflicting counsel is only equaled by the ludicrousness of the law itself." Opposed (collectively) to the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and to the restoration of the legalized saloon, the commission still finds that there is "no adequate observance or enforcement," and that there can be none without the cooperation of the States and the support of public opinion in the several States—which by implication does not exist. Nevertheless, "some of the commission are not convinced that prohibition under the Eighteenth Amendment is unenforceable"; but over their own signatures all except Mr. Lemann are able to agree that if the amendment is to be revised it should take a form giving Congress power to "regulate or prohibit"; after which the commissioners open their mouths, shut their eyes, take a long breath, and unite in recommending nine relatively minor measures for strengthening enforcement of the amendment as it stands. The palm for consistency must be awarded to Mr. Baker, who signs the report opposing repeal, yet states categorically that he favors repeal. Among all the commissioners, however, we confess that our heart goes out to Mr. Lemann, who alone refused to sign.

As one passes from the conclusions to the body of the report, on which presumably the conclusions are based, the wonder grows. It must be remembered that the "amount of scientifically provable facts bearing upon the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment" available to the commission was small; so it had to depend largely on opinion. Even so it is no great news that "taking the country as a whole, people of wealth, business and professional men, and, perhaps, the higher-paid workingmen and their families are drinking in large numbers in quite frank disregard of the declared policy of the national prohibition act." The report goes on, however: "From its inception to the present time the law has been to a constantly increasing degree deprived of that support in public opinion which was and is essential for its general observance or effective enforcement." The commission continues:

> If, with regard to any law, assuming a vigorous effort at enforcement, the result is found to be that, notwithstanding enormous numbers of convictions, there is little deterrent effect and, after a decade of experience, the volume of violations seems to increase steadily and the public attitude is increasingly indifferent or hostile, the question arises as to whether such a law is, in any proper sense, enforceable.

If we pass to the individual opinions, we only journey farther into wonderland. There is no space for quotation, but only four out of eleven commissioners even favor giving the amendment further trial before considering modification; five want immediate modification; two are for outright repeal now. In other words, seven out of eleven are for immediate change; yet the commission with a perfectly straight face advises no change. This is probably statesmanship; it looks like humor. If anybody can read this document carefully and deny that these commissioners are overwhelmingly against the Eighteenth Amendment he can do better than we can. We do not say that their opinions are necessarily much more important than those of any other eleven equally intelligent citizens; we do simply say that Senator Borah is right in observing: "The torpedoing of the report by the individual views of the members of the commission leaves the report without force or effect in the ultimate solution of the problem."

How did eleven intelligent men and women ever come to make such a report? Politics has bedeviled prohibition from the start; it has prevented the Wickersham Commission from doing anything really useful—and this even if we discredit the unpleasant stories of Presidential interference that lie back of the Tydings resolution. The commission method of dodging executive responsibility is yet further discredited, and prohibition is left where it was except that its opponents will draw much ammunition from the report. In appointing the commission, the President bravely called for "an accurate examination of fact and cause," followed by "constructive, courageous conclusions." Now, ignoring the whole body of the report and the individual opinions of the members, he rejects out of hand the uncertain suggestion of modification. Is his action either constructive or courageous? Is his treatment of the report in his message of transmittal even honest? He bends the report to favor prohibition; then, frightened by the storm of criticism, he lets disclaimers be put forth. Was ever a more pitiful spectacle of cowardice and futility?

We are back at the old possibilities. We may go on as at present, with perhaps more vigorous attempts at enforcement, but, so far as can be determined, with little promise that the lawlessness, corruption, hypocrisy, and nullification now prevailing in great sections of the country will be much lessened. We may conceivably repeal the amendment outright, and go back to State control, with its possibility of the legalized saloon, which everyone professes to reprobate. Or we may perhaps repeal the amendment by modification, thus keeping the liquor question in national politics, where it has already done vastly too much damage. On none of these possibilities has the commission thrown any particular light. Toward none of them has it made any clear-cut and convincing recommendation. For none of them has it offered a single carefully thought-out plan, if exception be made of Mr. Anderson's interesting recommendation of a modified Swedish system under a modified constitutional amendment. The commission is not to be blamed too much, for it was given an impossible task to perform under impossible conditions. The President declined the responsibility of leadership by seeking to shift it to the commission under a "fact-finding" mask, and the hobbled commission has been able to do nothing except to add to the general bewilderment. The report is another liability in the general bankruptcy of the Administration.

New-Party Obstacles

WE may be possessed of a burning desire to form a new party in the interest of better and more equitable government. We may adopt a compelling philosophy and a workable program. We may educate the masses and awaken them to the necessity for such a party. Still the road to success would be blocked by numerous political and constitutional obstacles. These, too, must be tackled and as many as possible removed before a party for the people can be launched with any reasonable hope of getting beyond the discussion and agitation stage.

In another section of The Nation several major aspects of this problem are effectively explored by Henry Hazlitt. He suggests that new parties cannot be brought into existence overnight; that they must take firm root in our political life and be permitted to grow normally and naturally. "But," he declares with equal truth, "it is precisely growth from the grass roots that our present election and constitutional machinery is calculated to stifle." He asks for the elimination of lame-duck Congresses and that the people be allowed to elect Presidents by direct voting. Citing unassailable examples, he reveals how under our present election system huge blocks of voters are not only disfranchised, but actually have their votes counted for the opposition candidates; and he shows that by a proportional-representation system all groups might be given a voice in the government.

These are some of the reforms progressives and radicals must fight to obtain. There are other reforms necessary to the success of a new-party movement. Among them are simplification of the present cumbersome election machinery, effective reduction and control of campaign expenditures, and regulation of campaign propaganda. Today our election machinery is so complicated by red tape that in many cases it is practically impossible for citizens to register and vote. Several plans for overcoming these defects have been suggested. Permanent registration instead of periodical registration would go far toward simplifying and facilitating the task of voting; central registration instead of registration by precincts or districts would work to the same end. Registering and voting by mail, which is now legal in only a few States and cities, would enable many citizens, temporarily absent from home or otherwise prevented from getting to the polls, to share more fully in the duties and responsibilities of government.

A more important difficulty is the multiplicity of elections. So many elections are held in most parts of the country that only the most elaborate and expensive party organizations are equipped to keep the voters actively interested and to bring them out on election day, and obviously these party machines want to bring out only those voters who will support their particular candidates. Moreover, the many elections serve to confuse the average citizen as to the essential differences between the great numbers of offices, candidates, and issues, and so it becomes a relatively easy matter for the well-equipped, permanent organizations of the two dominant parties to lead him into the one or the other of their camps. It is upon such local machines that the two national parties rest. At the present time any other national party would have to build itself upon the same sort of costly and complex local organizations.

Simplification of the election system would make the maintenance of a permanent party organization less expensive and less necessary; but it is during the campaigns that most money is spent. We have seen that the corrupt-practices act has failed to keep down campaign expenditures; the party with the largest contributions has usually won, and as long as elections continue to go to the party with the largest war chest, a party of the people will always be at a disadvantage. It has been proposed in the New York State legislature and elsewhere that the government bear all the election and campaign expenses. Under this system the State would print pamphlets for all the candidates of whatever party, giving each candidate for the same office the same amount of space. No other publicity or advertising would be permitted except over the radio and perhaps from public platforms. Radio time, however, would be divided equally among the various candidates in accordance with the prominence or importance of the office being sought. We cannot say that this proposal for limiting expenditures is flawless, but we do contend that until some such scheme is adopted a party of the people would be laboring under the greatest handicaps in trying to compete with the present two dominant parties, whose owners can at any time put up tens of millions of dollars to swing an election by publicity, propaganda, or other means.

Bar for Sale

IN 1695, in the Province of New York, there were only forty-one lawyers. In that year several wealthy litigants bought up the entire bar, and as a result the assembly of the province regulated the number of lawyers that any litigant might retain and fixed the number at two. The statute declares that if any more are retained "it shall be lawful for the judges of the bench where the suit is depending to order all such attorneys as shall be retained, more than two as aforesaid, to plead for the other side without returning the fee received."

The community might have been better off if the law had read that the state should supply every client with two lawyers. But the issue which prompted this statute (we intend to find out whether or not the law was ever repealed) is of interest today because of the wholesale purchase of the bar of the city of New York in defense of those men who were behind the failure of the Bank of United States. The State of New York, for investigation of this social calamity, supplies its prosecutors with $100,000 and has as attorney in charge Max D. Steuer, who receives as compensation $1. On the other side, the bank directors, its officials, and its attorneys have purchased the services of practically all the outstanding trial lawyers in the city. John W. Davis, formerly candidate for President on the Democratic ticket;

Joseph M. Proskauer, formerly Justice of the Appellate Division, a close adviser of former Governor Smith; former District Attorney Tuttle, who has just finished a campaign for governor of the State on the Republican ticket; Emory R. Buckner, formerly United States District Attorney; Samuel Falk, son-in-law of the Republican leader Samuel Koenig; Martin Littleton, of Sinclair-oil fame; and at least a score more have been retained at an expense that will no doubt run in excess of a million dollars. It will be the duty of this imposing list of counsel to prevent indictments and convictions being found against the directors and attorneys of the defunct Bank of United States.

If the bank had failed in September instead of in December, Mr. Tuttle in his gubernatorial campaign would have gloriously attacked the banking departments and those of the directors who are affiliated with Tammany Hall. Across Mr. Tuttle's lips now rests a large fee. These attorneys are now the advocates of a discredited banking group. To some of them New York has looked for guidance. Next time John W. Davis or even Emory Buckner discusses the problem of banking and the State we shall have to remember that they are split personalities, true to the basic fiction of the profession that a lawyer should never state his own belief in his client's case or in his client's innocence. Lawyers are merchandise sold off the shelf to the highest bidder. In this case as in others, the State's purse is restricted, the leaders of the bar are intent on getting Mr. Kresel, Mr. Marcus, and Mr. Singer freed from criminal charges, and the odds must be at least a million to a hundred thousand that the procedure will vindicate the directors and attorneys of the bank. We are altogether likely to find, when the trial is over, that the failure was entirely legal and that the unfortunate fact that the depositors are likely to get about fifty cents on the dollar is only one of the unavoidable exigencies of a harsh world.

Death of a Swan

IT was somehow surprising to learn that Pavlowa was just short of forty-six when she died on January 23. Watching her dance, one could not connect her with age at all; yet it seemed as if she had been dancing forever and would go on doing so. It is reported that she kept swans in her garden at Hampstead to watch their movements and learn from them in her famous swan dance. And no swan ever made a movement more ineffably graceful than hers, as with bent head and drooping arms she, in her imitation of the bird, sank to the floor in her imitation of its death.

Like all young Russian girls with a passion to dance, Pavlowa was trained at the school of the Imperial Russian Ballet in St. Petersburg, which she entered at the age of ten. It was a rigorous, monastic, disciplined life. The children danced all morning, ate a brief lunch, went for a brief walk in the yard, and were busy at classes—geography, arithmetic, history, music—until supper. Except for summer vacations, there were only three days off at Christmas and at Easter. Parents were allowed infrequent visits and the sweets they brought their darlings were carefully locked up and doled out to the young ladies piece by piece on Saturday night. Literally nothing was thought of except the dance, and the best ways of becoming an accomplished dancer. For this, technical perfection was necessary; and a liberal education was considered necessary in addition. Pavlowa was slender, delicate, hardly equal to the more rigorous demands on her muscles that the mode of the dance demanded. But she had her own excellences, she contained within herself her own perfections, and the ballet master was sensible enough to allow her to distinguish herself in her own way. She restored the romantic mode of dancing which had died out with the great Taglioni.

It is recorded of her that she once took part in a little revolution, when with others of her dancing mates—Fokine, the beautiful and famous Karsavina, and others—she attempted to bring the imperial ballet theater, the Marinsky Theater, into the rebellion of 1905 which resulted in the granting of the Duma by the Czar. The conspirators drew up a set of demands—autonomy, the power to choose their own committee to decide artistic questions and amount of salary—and presented them to the director, who coldly received them. The "committee" even attempted to make the other members of the ballet strike on the eve of a performance, with small success. They were first in disgrace and then graciously the recipients of the amnesty that was extended to all after the establishment of the Duma.

This, of course, was before the days of Pavlowa's triumphs, although even in her student days she was recognized as a dancer of great beauty and promise. She came to the heights of her career, as several fortunate dancers did, with Diaghilev's presentation of the Russian ballet in Paris. Such dancing, such costumes, such performances had never been seen in France. Diaghilev worked like a man possessed, with Karsavina, Nijinsky, Bakst, Ravel, Stravinsky, Debussy, as well as Pavlowa, to astonish and delight first Parisian, then London, finally American audiences. Even then, in the midst of unprecedented triumphs, when the ravished audiences crowded the stage and would hardly let the dancers escape, hard work, hours of it every day, was demanded to retain the perfection of grace and power that was necessary.

Pavlowa had kept up her skill and her power. She had announced another American tour for next year and thousands will mourn because they will not see her. It is worth asking, indeed, whether they will ever again see her like. Partly because she was herself, supreme, incredibly expert, graceful beyond compare; partly because the great days of the ballet may be gone. The old school, subsidized and heartily patronized by the Czar, will never come back, although a school of the ballet does exist now in Leningrad. But surely in Soviet Russia such unequivocal and undeviating devotion to pure art cannot be looked upon with much favor by the proponents of a proletarian dictatorship. And it is questionable whether outside of Russia there will ever exist that peculiar combination of passionate, almost pious devotion and exhilaration that resulted in technical perfection and incomparable grace. Pavlowa herself, at the close last year of a tour on the Continent, is quoted as saying that the talkies and the modern craze for mechanical entertainment were "killing the true dance, the most beautiful of all the arts." It may be that she was right, that with her death, and with the death in time of her contemporaries, the day of the dance in this particular form will be ended. If it should be so, a rare thing will have perished from the earth.

Will the Five-Year Plan Succeed?

By LOUIS FISCHER

Paris, January 14

AT the turn of the year, after a January-to-December stay in the Soviet Union, I permit myself a look backward to recapitulate and forward to anticipate. Fortunately, decisions adopted in Moscow late in November and in December make it possible to speak of future policy with some degree of certainty.

Nineteen thirty was a year of Socialist offensive. Nineteen thirty-one will be a year of retrenchment, of shortening the line, and of less buoyant progress. Construction efforts will be concentrated on a limited number of giant industrial plants and on fewer small factories. The pace of heavy industrialization will be slackened and more attention will be paid to the immediate needs of the population. Nineteen thirty passed under the sign of foreign hostility to the Soviet Union. The last phase of that hostility, the anti-dumping campaign, is one of the chief factors which induced the change of policy. The trial of Ramzin and the rest likewise contributed toward a modification of the 1930 course by revealing the pitfalls of an excessively rapid tempo. The strain on the nation has been very great. The state will therefore stop, inhale deeply, and rest. How long this period of recuperation will last it is difficult to predict.

How will all this affect the Five-Year Plan? Will it be carried out? The question is difficult to answer because there is no fixed plan. Indeed, no sooner does an industry give indications of approaching the production totals set as its final goal than that goal is moved forward in order to stimulate further effort. This has occurred several times in single branches of economy, so that the original minimum Piatiletka, or Five-Year Plan, adopted in 1928 was very different and much lower than the Piatiletka of today. And even the present levels will probably be raised before December 31, 1932. The Piatiletka is as much a political slogan as a practical economic task. Hence the psychological value of "raising the ante," so to speak. Now if one asks whether the plan as first inaugurated in October, 1928, will be carried out in the quinquennial ending December, 1933, the answer must be a categorical affirmative. It is more to the point, however, to inquire into the likelihood of the complete fulfilment of the much-modified and augmented Five-Year program, not in five years but in four, in accordance with the present firm resolve of the government, the party, and the proletariat.

In 1929-30 the Soviet state industries increased their production 25 per cent, which was 5 per cent ahead of the plan. A further increase of 45 per cent as compared with the previous year is contemplated for 1931. If this is achieved, 79 per cent of the Five-Year-Plan-in-Four will have been carried out in the first three years, and in heavy industry 98 per cent. At the end of the third year of the Piatiletka, that is, on December 31, 1931, moreover, the coal, oil, machine-manufacturing, and electrical industries will have exceeded their five-year schedule. According to the plan, the Union was to have produced 53,000 tractors in 1932-33. These will be turned out in 1931. When we say "will" it means that in each case the factories, funds, and all other facilities are available for such production and that past records warrant present expectations. Transport is a fair index: in 1931 the Soviet railways will carry 330,000,000 tons of freight as compared to 281,000,000 tons originally fixed for the fifth year of the Piatiletka.

In light industry success has not been so spectacular, and unless lost ground is made up as a result of the shift of policy determined on in November and December, the textile, shoe, food, clothing, and paper industries, as well as other branches supplying the immediate consumption needs of the country, may fall behind the requirements of the plan. But two years still remain; domestic raw materials that are sources of light industry—cotton, flax, leather, lumber, vegetables, sugar—have been stimulated by collectivization and the organization of state farms; and the Bolsheviks are apparently convinced that the nation must be better taken care of than in the past. The cumulative effect of these circumstances should permit the Soviet light industries to reach their goal during the second half of the four-year Piatiletka. In fact, the recent plenary session of the Central Committee promised an increase of 25 per cent to 30 per cent in retail goods for 1931.

In agriculture, too, tremendous advances have been made. The 1930 grain harvest amounted to 87,400,000 tons compared to 71,700,000 tons in the previous year. Collectivization has, with the aid of pressure from the authorities, made greater headway in two years than anybody could have hoped for in five. The Communists regard this as a guaranty of a higher rural productivity—a view which their first harvest tends to confirm—and a promise of more amicable relations between the village and the city—the crux of the whole Russian situation.

In considering whether the Five-Year-Plan has been or will be a success or a failure, I do not believe that percentages are altogether conclusive. The world wants to know whether the general purpose of the plan is being achieved; whether Russia is industrializing quickly and rationally. Here no doubt is admissible. The answer is yes. Whether the high standards of the program will be met to a degree of 90 per cent or 115 per cent—both are possible—really matters little. Thus, whereas almost every capitalist nation is at best holding its own, the Soviet Union is experiencing a period of enthusiastic high-speed construction.

I should be the last to forget the shady side of the picture: the poor quality and high cost of manufactured goods, the difficulties of management—it is easier to build a factory than make it produce—the subordination of the welfare of millions of individuals to the welfare of the state, which cannot yet pay dividends, and the innumerable mistakes by officials and leaders. The truth about Russia is Janus-faced. Everyday life is hard and black. People suffer. The gratification of primary requirements absorbs a huge amount of attention. But there is another, a bright and encouraging, side: the birth of new "Socialist" cities, the erection of giant factories and farms, the thrill of a whole continent tapping new sources of creative energy and marching toward economic independence and a better standard of living. Which phase one chooses to dilate on frequently depends on one's temperament and principles. The hardships of today sometimes impress and depress me, but more often the light of the future blurs them out of sight, and the focus of my mind's eye shifts to the positive, the constructive, the creative. The difficulties are those concomitant with growth and youth.

One of the outstanding developments of the year was the disappearance of unemployment. For all practical purposes anybody who wants a job can get one if he has qualifications of the slightest and often even if he has no skill whatsoever. Cities, factories, and offices compete violently for workers and offer special attractions to draw them away from their present places of activity. Hence the excessive "fluidity" of labor, which the government vainly seeks to combat with an endless series of decrees.

The scarcity of labor is a direct consequence of increased industrial production and construction and of the inefficient use of labor. Yet it also reflects significant, I am tempted to say epoch-making, changes in the Soviet village. Nineteen thirty was preeminently the year of agrarian collectivization—Stalin's chief contribution to the Russian Revolution. Collectivization has probably stirred the peasantry even more than the abolition of serfdom. It absorbs all the village hands and minds. It threw the torch of civil war into the countryside and aroused first the vigorous resistance of the masses of peasants, then the venom of anti-Soviet elements abroad, and finally the opposition of strong forces within the Communist Party itself. This struggle for the collective and against the kulak is by no means ended. But it will scarcely assume the sanguinary forms of January and February, 1930, and the state will scarcely again resort to the drastic measures of coercion employed earlier in the year. The Bolsheviks have learned a lesson. Nevertheless, I see no indication that the policy of further collectivization will be abandoned or even moderated. I believe, on the contrary, that the advantages of collectivization appeal so much to the village administrator that he will be tempted to push the movement as far as possible. He thus gets rid of the obnoxious kulaks, and grain procurements, formerly a perilous adventure, become a relatively peaceful pursuit. The Kolkhoz creates many problems, both economic and of organization, but once under way it eliminates or at least mellows peasant hostility. Further collectivization, however, should soon compel or enable the party to return to unchecked tempos of industrialization. The next few years may indeed witness such a cycle of retarded and then accelerated speeds, together with some noticeable political zigzags and, in consequence, renewed feuds in Communist ranks.

The crusade to destroy private capital in the village by means of collectivization and in the city by super-industrialization and the direct disfranchisement and arbitrary economic suppression of traders was inaugurated early in 1930. It colored all the events of the year and still continues, though with less crudeness. The Nepmen have not recovered from the blow. They are not likely to. The peasant peddlers who come into town with milk and vegetables do not replace them economically, much less socially.

The blows rained on the urban and rural bourgeoisie, the class war, in other words, took on harsher forms in 1930 than at any time since 1921. Inevitably, important social and cultural phenomena accompanied them. If this whole new development could be summed up in a phrase it might be called the "death of liberalism." The phrase, I hasten to add, is inadequate and very general, but it may help to explain a condition which is still too recent and vague to permit of final definition.

It will be difficult to describe just what has happened. In the realm of literature, for instance—in fact, in every field of art—emphasis on the class struggle is the demand of all critics and political leaders. Quality is a secondary consideration so long as the subject is new life in the collectives. What are love and personal life when the Piatiletka is at stake? Vsevolod Ivanov, the author of "Armored Train," therefore goes as a reporter with Leonov to tell about cotton planting in Turkestan; Pilniak, perhaps the most talented of Soviet authors, turns out a ream of sketches about the transition from feudalism to socialism in Tadjikstan of the Pamirs; while Gladkov, who wrote "Cement," goes in for a critique of collectivization. Of course, it does the popuchiki, or non-Communist novelists, who nevertheless are Soviet sympathizers, a world of good to come into contact with the new society instead of with the declassed, crumbling society which is their natural element. Yet it is scarcely conducive to literary production when unfavorable descriptions of conditions are condemned as "counter-revolutionary" and when the hero of every love story is expected, so to speak, to echo Stalin and praise the party's economic program. Not only is art for art's sake taboo—it was never very popular with the Bolsheviks—but art must frankly be only for the sake of politics.

It is an expression of the same general tendency when deviations from the official policy are combated more fiercely than ever. Tolerance toward dissenters is unknown now. More and more the slogan is, "If you are not for us you are against us." A middle-of-the-road attitude is anathema. The government asks the engineering caste to enunciate its credo; neutrality will no longer be countenanced. Similarly, Radek asks Pilniak to declare himself; he must not be an outside observer. Those who sit on the fence are finding that perch extremely uncomfortable. The result is that the doubters, the indifferent, the dissidents, and the enemies are either converted by the Communists' dynamic will to succeed, or keep their mouths shut and act the hypocrite, or are driven into active hostility as was the Ramzin party.

The class-war psychosis and a frantic faith in the early triumph of the Socialist cause explain this year's increase of the Bolsheviks' traditional antipathy toward neutrality and liberalism; while added practical difficulties have increased the popularity of the old Russian weapon—ruthlessness. On the other hand, during 1930 a sort of economic democracy struck deeper root. Stalin's famous article of March 2 and the decrees which elaborated it were a recognition of the principle that economic advantages are a more effective means of real collectivization than government fiat or administrative pressure. The mobilization of popular support and the elimination of certain faults in organization have worked wonders in the execution of practical tasks, yet when coal production in the Donetz basin commenced to fall in the spring, additional goods and food for the miners proved more effective than proclamations and circulars of instructions. Man does not live by enthusiasm alone; one happy chief engineer is worth five mass-meetings. The Bolsheviks forget this truth far too often.

These psychological, social, and economic factors in the domestic situation are inextricably bound up with Russian foreign relations. Indeed, the fear of capitalist attack and the partial boycott of Soviet exports contributed directly to making the internal policy and atmosphere what they were in 1930. Russia's foreign relations during the year have been more or less sterile. Negotiations with Great Britain have made practically no headway; frantic red-hunters in the United States have succeeded in obstructing Soviet-American trade; the Mongolian tangle is still in a hopeless mess. France has made herself the leader of anti-Bolshevik forces everywhere; sentiment in Berlin is not so friendly as in previous years; and, practically, only Germany and Italy have granted important credits to the Bolsheviks. After many years of passivity, relieved only by Litvinov's diverting performances at Geneva, the Moscow Foreign Office has at last displayed a bit of initiative—toward Italy. A rapprochement between Fascist Italy and Bolshevik Russia is certainly no comfort to the professional foreign Communist nor does it exactly clinch the argument which identifies the Soviet Government with the Comintern, but it is good Realpolitik, and the Kremlin will go farther if necessary. It would be very premature, however, to speak of a division of Europe between the Versailles Powers—France, Poland, Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Czecho-Slovakia—and the anti-Versailles nations—Italy, Russia, Hungary, Turkey. No revisionist bloc is complete without Germany, and Germany, still harboring illusions of French friendship and mindful of Rome's betrayal of the Triple Alliance in 1914, cannot decide where she belongs. Much will depend on internal German developments. Moscow is prepared to meddle in dirty European politics because it must maneuver against French hegemony on the Continent and because a role in the drama enhances Russian importance and brings commercial and political benefits. But if the war which pessimists see in the offing really materializes, the Bolsheviks will not be in it. They will let capitalism dig its own grave.

After thirteen years during which every brilliant seer prophesied the fall of bolshevism in six months, the world has suddenly discovered that the Bolsheviks are strong enough to be a menace to the existence of capitalist society. While American officials still tell private meetings of bankers and industrialists that Russia is a "bad risk," the press, Congressmen, and intellectual jacks-of-all-trades show how this semi-bankrupt will soon flood the earth with its goods, undersell the powerful capitalist magnates despite its inefficient, because Communist, methods of production—and thus pave the way to world revolution. On the one hand, tales of distress, starvation, revolt, collapse; on the other hand, pictures of a new and mighty giant preparing to destroy the bourgeoisie of the planet with one huge puff. Of course, if scare headlines and fake news send up circulation in these depressed times, the lies about Russia should by all means continue. But a little realism and truth would do no harm.

The Plight of the Pueblos

By NATHAN R. MARGOLD

THE sad plight of the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico and their eleventh-hour resort to litigation to avert the imminent disaster with which they are threatened should enlist the sympathy and active cooperation of all fair-minded Americans. These Pueblo tribes, twenty in number, represent the most ancient of our Indian cultures. For several thousands of years they have been irrigation farmers, peacefully cultivating the land on whose last remnants they still subsist. Deeply religious, glorious artists in dance, song, pottery, and pure design, they have developed and maintained a unique civilization richly worth preserving for its own sake. They have always been friendly to the white race; it was they, in fact, who enabled the whites to establish themselves among the wild nomads of the Southwest. They have been repaid for that friendship with impoverishment, disease, and incalculable suffering. Forced now into a desperate legal battle to secure the means for continued existence, they have a just claim to active assistance from every enlightened American.

The various Pueblo tribes are distinct legal entities, each Pueblo holding title in communal fee simple to the land cultivated by its members. The titles were recognized and confirmed initially by grants from the Spanish Crown antedating 1700, and subsequently by Act of Congress and patents issued pursuant thereto. Like other tribal Indians in this country, they are wards of the United States government, theoretically entitled to protection and actually disabled in large measure from protecting themselves as a result of the imposition of this guardianship. As population increased in New Mexico, numerous Mexicans and pioneer Americans without the slightest right or color of title helped themselves to various portions of the Pueblo lands. The guardian government did nothing to remove the encroachers, and the helpless Indian wards struggled along as best they could on what land was left to them.

The failure of the government promptly to dispossess the encroachers led eventually to a twofold result. One was the gradual impoverishment of the Indians and the crumbling of their civilization. The other was the intrenchment of the trespassers and the constantly increasing injustice of putting them off land on which they had become established with tacit government approval. Normally, an owner cannot permit another to occupy his land for a period of years under a claim of ownership without losing his title altogether. But the general statutes of limitation, specifying the requirements for obtaining title by long-continued adverse possession, do not apply to government-owned land nor to Indian-owned land under the guardianship of the United States. This prevented the squatters on Pueblo lands from acquiring any legal right or title to the land which they occupied; but it could not and did not prevent them from coming in time to regard themselves and to be regarded as the true owners.

In 1919 Richard H. Hanna, a conscientious United States attorney, commenced an action to eject some of the squatters from land urgently required by the Indians for subsistence. The case was tried in 1921 and was pending decision when Secretary of the Interior Fall and Attorney General Daugherty requested the court, on behalf of the United States as guardian plaintiff, not to render a decision, stating that legislation was being prepared which would destroy the ward's right to win the suit. The proposed legislation, known as the Fall-Bursum bill, provided practically for outright confiscations of large tracts of Indian land. It passed the Senate, but was bitterly fought and finally defeated in the House. The hearings before the House Committee on Indian Affairs contain a revealing picture of the sad state to which the Pueblos had been reduced by the inexcusable failure on the part of the United States government faithfully to perform its self-assumed duties of guardianship. Extensive quotation is impossible here, but a few tell-tale excerpts from the testimony of Mr. John Collier, then research agent for the Indian Welfare Committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, are here appended (Hearings before H. of R. Comm. on Ind. Affairs, 67th Cong., on H.R. 13452 and H.R. 13674, Feb. 1-15, 1923, p. 225):

> If conditions remain as they are without becoming any worse the majority of the Pueblos must perish. . . .
>
> Spokesmen for some of the non-Indian settlers appeared before the Senate committee and made statements tending to show that the Pueblo Indians were very well off. It is a question of fact which can be answered from data readily available. The case of Taos Pueblo is an example. There is appended (Exhibit A) a summary of investigations made by Dr. Richard Shevky, a scientist of repute of Leland Stanford University, California, in the fall of 1922. Doctor Shevky personally interviewed each of the 126 families representing the 548 people who are reported on. (The total population is about 635.)
>
> Doctor Shevky's conclusion was that the per capita income of Taos for 1922 was about $30, and the estimated income in a good year is about $36. . . .
>
> Taos is admittedly the most prosperous Pueblo north of Santa Fé, and of its approximately 5,000 irrigable acres it has retained about 1,500, or about 2½ acres per person. Part of these 1,500 acres, however, is water-logged and available only for the grazing commons.
>
> With regard to the Pueblos south of Taos there is attached (Exhibit B) a summary which was prepared in November, 1922, based on statistics of income from all sources in the Pueblos of San Juan, Tesuque, San Ildefonso, Nambe, and Santa Clara.
>
> A summary here appended is based on data which were collected by the government farmer for these Pueblos. These data have been checked up by Doctor Shevky, who made the original study of Taos, and he believes that the incomes stated in the report of Mr. Hubbard (the farmer) are rather in excess of the actual incomes.
>
> [The summary referred to showed the following average annual per capita incomes: San Juan, $31.01; Tesuque, $16.68; San Ildefonso, $13.11; Nambe, $46.02; Santa Clara, $32.50.]
>
> The committee may find it hard to believe that self-respecting human beings not the recipients of charity can live on incomes so small as are shown by these exhibits. As a matter of fact, the Pueblos are not living, but in the case of the Pueblos near Santa Fé are slowly dying on these small incomes. . . .

After a two-year struggle Congress worked out and enacted a compromise measure designed fully to protect the Indians and probably to vest many of the white settlers with legal title to their holdings as well. This was the Act of June 7, 1924. It created the Pueblo Lands Board, consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and a member to be appointed by the President of the United States. It set up a certain standard for discriminating between valid and invalid adverse claims to land originally owned by the Pueblos, and required the board to investigate and report which claims fell within the standard and which did not. It also provided, in effect, for the issuance of patents by the United States to the adverse claimants found entitled thereto, for the payment of compensation by the United States to the Pueblos for the loss of this land, and for the institution of suits by the United States as guardian for the Indians to recover all the tracts in the possession of adverse claimants found not entitled thereto by the board. In addition, the act provided that nothing contained in it should impair or destroy the right of the Pueblos before the lapse roughly of about two years after the filing of the board's report, "to assert and maintain unaffected by the provisions of this act their title and right to any land . . . in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Under the latter provision, the Pueblos could at once have gone into court and ousted every settler from their land. It was hoped, however, that they would delay action until they knew what land was returnable to them under the board's findings and what compensation was allowed for the balance, and that, finding themselves adequately provided for, they would voluntarily permit the two-year period to expire without taking any independent action at all against the settlers.

The Pueblos fully lived up to the expectations of Congress. They brought no independent suits and trusted to the board to deal fairly with them. The board made its investigations and began to file its reports. In the matter of compensation its awards have been shockingly meager. For many thousands of acres to which the Indian title was held extinguished, no compensation whatsoever was allowed. At the Pueblo of San Juan, of 3,000 acres lost to the Indians, only 1,000 have been made the subject of any award at all.

The sums so far awarded on the average have not amounted to more than one-third of the present value of the land, less improvements. In deciding between valid and invalid adverse claims, however, the board has been quite faithful to the provisions of the act. Its findings, if eventually sustained by the courts, would give back enough land to most of the Pueblos to enable them at least to continue a modest existence. In view of this, the Pueblos contented themselves with attempting to obtain judicial review and enlargement of the compensation awards and made no effort to regain possession of any land to which adverse claims were sustained by the board.

In obedience to the provisions of the act, the Attorney General, on behalf of the Pueblo of Taos, brought suit in the United States District Court in New Mexico to oust the settlers whose claims to title the board had found invalid. The District Court differed with the board and adopted a construction of the act under which most of the invalid claims became or could easily be made valid. The difference related to the method of satisfying the requirement for the payment of taxes by the adverse claimant during the period of his possession. Under the act the claimant was required in effect to show that he had continuously paid all the taxes levied on the land during the period of his occupation. The board interpreted this as a requirement of regularity and continuity in the payment of the taxes to evidence the good faith of the settler's claim of ownership and disallowed all claims where taxes were not so paid. The District Court, on the other hand, held that the payment of back taxes in a lump sum after the enactment of the statute, and, indeed, after the filing of the board's report, was sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute and to entitle the claimant to retain the land. On appeal the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court.

The government attorneys in charge of the case recommended that an application be made to the Supreme Court of the United States to review the case by certiorari. The papers were prepared, but five days before the expiration of the period allowed for such an application the Attorney General and the Solicitor General summarily directed their subordinates not to file the papers.

This was a bitter blow to the Indians, who are accustomed to defeat in the lower courts and final victory in the Supreme Court of the United States. But still they did not assert the full measure of their legal rights by means of independent suits. The Pueblo of Taos immediately pressed an independent suit previously instituted but deliberately framed so that only the tax question would be raised. The Indians being in control of this case, they intended by means of it eventually to obtain a decision from the Supreme Court on the merits of the tax question.

The Attorney General and Solicitor General, having already decided not to place this question before the Supreme Court, decided further to have all the other cases disposed of as quickly as possible and proceeded to put this decision into immediate effect. It was a foregone conclusion that every one of these cases would be lost on the tax issue and would ripen into a judgment adverse to the Indians, and that unless these judgments could be delayed, or the right to appeal therefrom saved, pending the final outcome in the Taos independent suit, the Indians would be stripped irrevocably of their land under the tax ruling of the lower courts before the Supreme Court had an opportunity to pass on the validity of that ruling. If the Supreme Court later held the ruling erroneous, its decision would affect only the comparatively insignificant amount of land directly involved in the Taos independent suit. It would be entirely ineffective with regard to the large bulk of Pueblo land awarded to white claimants under the judgments theretofore entered in the various other suits.

Here was a situation, certainly, where in fairness to the Indians all the pending suits, or appeals therefrom, should have been held in abeyance until the Taos test case had been presented to the Supreme Court. But the Solicitor General, despite urgent appeals made to him on behalf of the Indians, held fast to his original determination to reduce all pending cases to final judgment with utmost dispatch.

The government suit relating to the Pueblo of Picuris was immediately brought to trial, and of its many thousands of acres in possession of whites the Pueblo was allowed to recover only 119 acres. The significance of this will be better appreciated in the light of the following excerpt from the report of the board concerning this Pueblo (filed on October 20, 1928):

> The records—such as they are—seem to show that at the time of the Spanish conquest there were several thousand of these Picuris Indians. . . . Numbers of settlers from the Rio Grande moved into the hills and gradually occupied these valleys, since which time the Indians have rapidly decreased in numbers and have been crowded out by the non-Indian settlers until there are only about 116 Picuris Indians left altogether, and this number will dwindle to nothing in a comparatively short time unless something is done to rehabilitate them and much more attention is given them than has been the case during the last fifty years. The Pueblo village itself is a mere remnant of what it once was, and is in a sad state of demoralization. There is little or no sympathy for the Indians among the non-Indian inhabitants of the district. On account of the presence of undesirable non-Indians within or in the immediate vicinity of the Pueblo, many of the Indians are becoming demoralized, many of them are also ill and in actual need of food. On the whole, they are in a very distressing and deplorable condition. There are, however, some excellent men among the younger Indians, through whom a revival of the tribe and reconditioning of the Pueblo might with proper encouragement be brought about.

A decree returning 119 acres to a Pueblo so circumstanced, a Pueblo whose whole life, religion, and culture are all deeply rooted in the land, could serve only to seal the doom prophetically predicted in the board's report. Following Picuris, San Juan, San Ildefonso, Santa Clara, and Cochiti are each being led to judicial slaughter. The Taos independent suit even now has not been passed upon by the Circuit Court of Appeals and cannot possibly come before the Supreme Court earlier than next fall. By that time every other Pueblo can be stripped of its land through final adverse judgments in the government suits.

This, coupled with the assurance of pitifully inadequate compensation, has proved to be the benefit in exchange for which the Pueblos are asked to bargain their undoubted legal right through independent suits to sweep every white settler off their land. In such a situation only one course could be taken; and that course was initiated on December 27, 1930, when, immediately before the expiration of the period allowed therefor, an independent suit for Taos was filed. Similar suits will follow for the other Pueblos, each being instituted only just in time to prevent a loss of rights through the running of the two-year period.

Unfortunately, the Indian Defense Association has exhausted its resources in the long struggle to procure for the Pueblos the limited but essential benefits under the act. The new suits will entail an expense of from $5,000 to $10,000 for such items as typewriting, printing, court fees, and service of process on the defendants. Unable to meet this new burden, the association has asked the public for help.

To a fair-minded person familiar with the situation this question permits of but one answer; and that answer should be made in the form of a check for whatever amount can be spared, which may be sent to Fred M. Stein, Treasurer, 270 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Our Obsolete Constitution

By HENRY HAZLITT

IT is no accident that American national politics is shallow, unreal, irresponsible, that intelligent European observers find it frankly uninteresting and its present party division pointless and meaningless. It does not seem likely that this state of affairs has much to do with our qualities as a people. The stagnation in our political life contrasts too vividly with the dynamic energy of our business life to make any such assumption plausible. Our discussion of fundamental issues is superficial and half-hearted because the machinery of government under which we live, devised more than 140 years ago, is hopelessly antiquated. That machinery, as it stands at present, is uncannily calculated to smother living issues and to make genuinely responsible government impossible.

No candid and realistic observer can fail to see that the chances of building up a new progressive party, or of bringing about a realignment of the old parties on genuine and vital issues, are extremely small—indeed, almost negligible—under our present Constitution and our present election laws. It is still impossible, despite Mr. Shaw's hopes for the future, for a human being to spring into life as a full-grown adult; and it is nearly as impossible for a new party to do so. Usually it must have a long period of infancy and growth. It was eighteen years from the emergence of the British Labor Party as such until the day it became large enough to form a government. It has been remarked of late that a new party can grow only "from the grass roots." But it is precisely growth from the grass roots that our present election and constitutional machinery is calculated to stifle.

To ameliorate this condition Senator Norris and some of his progressive colleagues have long been advocating two constitutional amendments. One would provide for the elimination of "lame-duck" Congresses and the other for the direct election of the President by popular vote. There can be no question regarding the necessity for these changes. That members of Congress can be repudiated at the polls and still continue to carry on their repudiated course for four months—which may often happen, as today, to be four crucial months—is preposterous. That the new Congress, unless an early session is called, cannot come into real existence until more than a year after its election is perhaps even worse. Our present rigid system dissipates political responsibility and makes our government essentially inefficient and unresponsive as an instrument for carrying out the public will.

Nor is there any longer the shadow of an excuse for the existence of the Electoral College. That device sometimes, as in the notorious Tilden-Hayes campaign, actually reverses the popular verdict, and always distorts it. Because Mr. Hoover's vote in the Electoral College was 444 compared with 87 for Governor Smith, the myth was immediately created that his popular indorsement was far greater than it actually was. What happened can be most plainly seen in the case of New York. New York gave Mr. Hoover 2,193,344 popular votes out of a total of 4,405,626—an actual minority. Yet, instead, say, of twenty-two of New York's electoral votes going to Mr. Hoover and twenty-one to Governor Smith, all of New York's forty-five electoral votes went to Mr. Hoover. The 2,212,282 persons who voted for Governor Smith and other candidates were not merely in effect disfranchised; their votes were actually counted for the opponent of the candidates for whom they voted. Such a distortion of results is intolerable, and anyone with the slightest belief in popular government would vote for its immediate discontinuance.

It must be said, however, that both of these changes are of relatively minor importance in their bearing on the prospects either for a new party or for obtaining any meaningful realignment of the old parties. The alteration in our electoral machinery and in our Constitution must be far more drastic. Fortunately, one change of the very first importance in its possible results can be made without even a constitutional amendment. This is the inauguration of proportional voting for members of the House of Representatives. The present division of States into geographical Congressional districts, with one member elected from each district, is unknown to the Constitution. That document simply provides that Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective populations, that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, and that

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Proportional representation is an electoral arrangement designed to make the legislative body as exact a reflection as possible of the real voting strength of the parties. The case for the system is at bottom the case for representative government itself. Every shade of minority opinion should so far as possible receive its appropriate voice and its mathematically proportional representation in the legislature. It would take little argument to show that this ideal is far from fulfilment under our present arrangement. In the present lame-duck Congress, for example, thirty-five Republican Congressmen were elected from Pennsylvania and only one Democrat, whereas representation in the same ratio as the popular vote would have given the Pennsylvania Republicans only twenty-five seats and the Democrats eleven. North Carolina sent eight Democrats to the House and only two Republicans; proportional representation would have given the Democrats six seats and the Republicans four.

The bearing of this on a third party is obvious. The Socialist Party in the last Congressional elections polled nearly 240,000 votes for all its candidates, enough, under a system of proportional representation, to secure at least four seats in Congress. It did not secure any. What happened is obvious from a glance at the result in the Sixth Congressional District in New York. The Democratic candidate, Andrew L. Somers, polled 46,211 votes; the Republican candidate, J. G. Myerson, 29,901 votes; and Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate, 21,882 votes. The Democratic candidate, though only a minority of the voters wanted him, was thus elected, and will now ostensibly represent in Congress the interests and opinions of all the voters of that district. In reality, of course, he represents neither the 30,000 Republican voters nor the 22,000 Socialist voters; these 52,000 voters, constituting a majority of the district, are virtually disfranchised. If this Congressional district had been merged with at least four other districts around it, and this larger district had been able to send five men to Congress under a proportional representation system, a vote of approximately the same ratios would have sent, say, three Democrats, one Republican, and one Socialist to Congress; and thus the voters of each party in that district would have obtained some representation.

Proportional representation is in no sense merely an academic scheme. Some form of it is already used in all important elections in Germany, Austria, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Holland, and a number of other European countries. It has already been used for several years in municipal-council elections in Cleveland and Cincinnati, and in each city it has broken the former strangle hold of the political machine. The most satisfactory form of proportional representation seems to be the single transferable vote, otherwise known as the Hare system, which is the one used in Cleveland and Cincinnati and in the Irish Free State. This gives each voter a single vote in a district electing several members, so that each member is in effect elected by a separate group of the district's voters. It also gives each voter a chance to express his second, third, and fourth choices, and so on, so that his vote will not be wasted on a candidate who has either too many other votes to need it or two few other votes to be able to use it. This system has the particular advantage of doing away with the necessity for direct primaries.

Many may think that, aside from grounds of abstract justice, a voting system which would merely seat, say, three or four Socialists in the House under the present popular vote would not make any great practical difference in our political life. This contention overlooks the fact that, as soon as the possibility of electing Socialists appeared, the Socialist vote, or the vote of any other minority party similarly situated, would make astonishing gains, for under proportional representation small minorities would no longer feel that they were merely wasting their vote. Nothing discourages the growth of a small party more than the feeling of eligible voters that their votes are futile, even as a protest. And, by the same token, nothing does more for the life and growth of a party than to have some of its members constantly seated in legislatures, constantly making its demands articulate, constantly advertising its principles, and sometimes, by holding a possible balance of power, influencing the course of legislation.

Not only may the progressive group in Congress fight for proportional representation without having to fight for a constitutional amendment, but the political obstacles to the change may prove much smaller than they seem at first sight. Many Democrats may vote for it in order to enfranchise the Democrats in Pennsylvania and half a dozen other Northern States; many Republicans may vote for it to enfranchise the Republicans of the South. It need hardly be said that no other measure would do more to bring back real issues into our national political life by helping to break down what is still to a large extent the merely geographical division of the old major parties. Nothing would do more to encourage a larger volume of voting and public interest, and to make possible the growth of a new party.

But a far larger issue must be raised than proportional representation, important as that is. This is whether our whole constitutional system is not in need of radical revision. The result of fixed terms of office for the President and Congress and of chronological rotation in the Senate is to divorce both the legislative and executive departments from any close connection with public opinion. Our constitutional separation of executive and legislative powers, again, is ingeniously calculated to bring about constant friction, and the deadlocks are made even more frequent by the election of a new Congress every four years without the simultaneous election of a new President. It is impossible under such a system to fix real responsibility upon either the legislature or the executive. It is impossible to determine party responsibility. It is impossible to hold the President or a Representative or a Senator accountable for his acts until the end of his term; it is impossible for the voters to remove him before then. From the standpoint of a new party, so long as the single office of the Presidency carries such overwhelming powers as it does, there is no encouragement for the formation of a new party unless it may reasonably soon hope to become the majority party. The result of such a system must inevitably be, as it has been, to discourage continuous interest in politics or any serious political thinking except spasmodically at election time, and to cultivate in the public an easy-going indifference to abuses. This attitude is usually, and quite shallowly, attributed to our national temperament. The fault lies with our sacrosanct Constitution itself.

It is time that we seriously considered the radical revision of our Constitution to make our government at least as responsible, as flexible, as sensitive to public opinion as the parliamentary systems of Great Britain and the leading democracies of Europe. If the biological or economic descendants of Henry Ford, 140 years from now, were still turning out the present Ford model (with perhaps a slight change in the brakes and fenders), and argued in defense of their course that Henry Ford had been a great and wise man and must have known what he was doing when he designed the model, the contemporaries of those descendants would be justified in looking on them as pure idiots. Yet this is precisely the attitude that most Americans take toward our 1789-model Constitution today. The true heirs of Henry Ford would not really want to emulate the precise machine he designed, but his spirit of enterprise and inventiveness, and his own contempt for antiquated methods. The true heirs of the Founding Fathers will want to emulate, not their exact machinery or even their precise political philosophy, but some of their courage in founding a new form of government to meet the needs of their own time, and not least of all their sense and wisdom in abandoning their own former basic law, the original Articles of Confederation, when those had proved inadequate. "There is no greater disloyalty to the great pioneers of human progress," as even a conservative like Dean Inge reminds us, "than to refuse to budge an inch from where they stood."

An Echo of Wheels

By ROLLIN KIRBY

ON the fifth day of November, 1895, a man named George B. Selden of Rochester, New York, finally received a patent on an internal-combustion gasoline engine and a cluster of men humped over the handle bars of their bicycles flashed by. The pedestrians looked up sharply as they passed, some in indignation at these speed demons who imperiled life and limb on the public highways, and some in frank admiration of the zanies who perspired so freely and who were so humorlessly intent on completing a century run, which consisted of covering 100 miles within twelve hours.

After this group of "scorchers" had passed came the more leisurely cyclists, those who sat more erect on their Garford saddles and whose handle bars curved upward rather than down. And still they came, the young, the old, and the middle-aged. The whole world was awheel, men, women, and children. Ramblers with their copper rims, Columbias, Victors with their spring forks, Iver Johnsons, Monarchs, Barnes White Fliers—how well we knew the different makes as they spun by with a great whirring of chains over the sprocket wheels. Once in a while an imported Humber or a Rudge or a Raleigh appeared and gave a cosmopolitan touch to the pageant.

Those were the days of the L. A. W. (League of American Wheelmen, in case the reader is either too young or too forgetful), when every town had a bicycle club; when Colonel Albert A. Pope of Hartford was a Henry Ford; when the annual race meet of the league was a sporting event of major importance at which Arthur A. Zimmerman ("Zimmy"); John S. Johnson, the flying Swede from St. Paul; Eddie (Cannonball) Bald; Mile-a-Minute Murphy; little Jimmy Michaels, the Welshman; "Major" Taylor, the Negro sprinter; and a score of others rode and were national heroes.

At the meet at the World's Fair in Chicago "Zimmy" won the last mile open for "ordinaries" and closed the epoch of the old bone-shaker. Mounted on a Star whose little wheel was in front so that a header was impossible and which was propelled by levers instead of pedals, he nosed out John S. Johnson, and with that the old high wheel was relegated to the pile of discards at the back of the bicycle repairman's shop and the ascendancy of the geared safety became complete.

On December 31, 1930, there appeared buried on the eleventh page of the New York World the following item:

> WHEELMEN'S CLUB QUITS
>
> NEWBURGH'S BICYCLISTS DISBAND AFTER 44 YEARS' ANTAGONISM TO AUTOS
>
> NEWBURGH, DEC. 30.—After forty-four years' existence the Newburgh Wheelmen's Club has disbanded. It was decided today that the bicycle craze would never come back and officials of the club sorrowfully voted to disband.
>
> John Daly is the oldest member, a charter Wheelman. Daniel Becker was the club's last president. Mgr. Henry O'Carroll has purchased the clubhouse and added it to the nearby property of the Catholic church.

As though with the touch of a mysterious but awakening wand this little item galvanized into action the recollection of a time when the world seemed fresher (but perhaps wasn't), for it was the time of my youth and I was an ardent, obsessed cyclist; when to possess an imported Humber would have seemed the sum total of earthly bliss, and when an evening spent on my stomach beside the base-burner in the living-room poring over my various catalogues transported me into a realm of infinite joy and interest. Bells, lamps, spanners, pumps—all the gadgets that went to make up the accessories—were of surpassing wonder, and I lost myself in a world of mechanical things of which I have never had any but a very imperfect understanding.

And now the old diehards of Newburgh have capitulated. There is something admirable in the stiff-necked antagonism to the automobile of these old dwellers beside the Hudson. Year after year they have kept the Newburgh Wheelmen's Club together, and year after year Henry Ford has sown the roads with a contraption built around George Selden's idea which has forced them into the ditches and taught them that they were to venture on the highways only at very great peril. Yet they went on hoping that the thing might be only a passing fancy; that when the public was tired of being whirled at forty miles an hour along the roads and the novelty of effortless locomotion had worn off, once more sanity would return and they might with safety venture off on a modest club run, as suited elderly cyclists.

Doubtless they argued a bicycle was safer, less noisy, cheaper, healthier than an automobile and that facts so self-evident must, in the long run, bring people to their senses. One can almost see a meeting at the clubhouse. In the old days there would be copies of the L. A. W. Bulletin and the American Wheelman lying about and there would be much debate as to the relative merits of a high or low gear, especially on hills, or whether the spade handles of the Victor were as restful on a long run as the ram's-horn handle bars of the Barnes. On the walls would be fading photographs of groups awheel: tight knickerbockers, turtle-necked sweaters, and small caps. The men nearly all wore mustaches and here and there were sideburns. A banner bearing the club's name hung draped over the photographs, while on the mantel were three or four tarnished trophies won by the stout legs and hearts of the Newburgh Wheelmen.

Eheu, fugaces! A few years ago I came upon a crumbling old inn in Connecticut and there, overgrown by vines on a front porch that was a drooping ruin, was an almost indecipherable tin sign which announced that this was an official hotel of the League of American Wheelmen. And on the instant the place became peopled again for me and I saw dozens of bicycles leaning against the porch railing and the great elm that spread its branches over the house. Men and women—for the girls were beginning to perk up at that period—with cheeks ruddy from exercise sat on the steps or in the big chairs and rested from their labors. There was no sound of jazz nor was there a dancing floor. The few who drank, drank beer.

I do not know whether it was a better world than the one I now inhabit, but I am certain it was a more leisurely one and decidedly a quieter one. It seems, as I look back on it, a healthier one, although the statisticians tell me the span of human life has been extended since then. The deaths on the highways were trifling then as compared with those of the motor age, and although life, gauged by the ingenious but inconclusive graphs the actuaries present, may have been shorter, it most assuredly was safer on the main roads.

Gaffer though I am, I should like to throw my leg—whose power of propulsion is perhaps less than it once was—again over my Humber and start in the early morning, while the dew still glistens on the leaves and the sun is just coming up over there by the waterworks, for, say, Newburgh; for although the Newburgh Wheelmen's Club has gone down with the band playing and the flags flying after a gallant fight, there is still a very good, old-fashioned tavern on a wide and very precipitous Main Street in that old riverside town.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter always swells responsively with national pride when Oklahoma is mentioned. Of late years, perhaps, that allotment of national pride has concentrated on Will Rogers, the Last American. But since the inauguration of the new governor the Drifter hopes we have with us also a Next-to-the-Last American. There was a time in Oklahoma, in the early dignity of statehood, when "no gentleman would be seen in anything but broadcloth and no governor without a diamond stud." But Oklahoma has outlived her self-conscious adolescence, and America wakes again. Would that the Driftway had bent its course round Oklahoma City for the inauguration of "Alfalfa Bill"! The news accounts bring a whiff of fresh air that makes the Drifter prick his ears and whinny with delight. "Alfalfa Bill of the clarion voice, the gaunt figure, and the bristling mustaches," weather-beaten farmers, stately chieftains of Comanches and Kiowas in ceremonial feathers, the bent old father of the governor, at ninety-one murmuring, "This is my happiest moment, next to the time, under an elm tree, when I got religion." The American pattern has come alive again in Oklahoma—alive not only in its color but also in its simplicity.

* * * * *

"RICH man, poor man, beggar man, thief; doctor, lawyer, Indian chief"—Governor Murray is ready for them all. The rich man, he says, has no excuse whatever for violating the law; the poor man should have equal rights before the courts. "I don't believe much in pardons, but I do believe strongly in paroles. If prisoners do not keep the parole provisions, take them back to the prisons to stay." The present emphasis on college athletics is "the most deplorable of all our educational errors." He is for giving every boy and girl a chance at higher education "if they can stand the examination," but "when they are passed into the university, say to them, 'Do or get out.'" Which sound and simple advice brings the Drifter to the last of his buttons, "Indian chief." And here, of course, Alfalfa Bill is the real thing, or rather his wife is the real thing. For she is a daughter of the Chickasaws and he is adopted into the tribe. (The Drifter has one transient pang of envy, for he himself came within ten minutes of being adopted into the Ojibwa tribe.)

* * * * *

SUCH a state of affairs, or rather such a State of Oklahoma, should, if noised abroad, send travelers from England and the Continent scurrying for the Southwest. "Where is he?" they will pant as they rush through New York. "Is he real? Alive? Not a Rotarian or a cigar-store Indian?" The Drifter visualizes the procession, crossing ocean, mountain, plain, and three generations—reaching that domeless capital, entering the governor's office. When the Drifter was a boy, a hearty handshake was the governor's greeting and a cordial "I sut'n'y am mighty glad to see you," while the governor's wife, comfortably settled in a rocker in the gubernatorial chamber, looked up from her sewing with a friendly smile. If Oklahoma carries on this tradition of the governor's chair and the lady's rocker, the Drifter hopes for local color's sake that the governor's lady, dressed, needless to say, in the lovely costume of her tribe, may be beading bright-colored moccasins—or bags.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"The Coming of the War"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note the review of a group of books on recent diplomatic history, including Bernadotte Schmitt's "The Coming of the War, 1914," in your issue of December 31 by Professor Frederick L. Schuman of the University of Chicago. If Schmitt's actual views on war responsibility bore any considerable resemblance to those attributed to him by Professor Schuman in the latter's review, I would have little fault to find with them. Professor Schuman's statement, however, to the effect that "Schmitt comes nearer than any of his predecessors to a realization of the futility of the guilt-and-innocence dichotomy" actually raises the question as to whether he had read Schmitt's volumes at all. Professor Schmitt may be right in thinking Germany and Austria guilty, but no writer, not even Judge Bausman, has been more decisive in insisting on unique and black guilt. His volumes might well have been entitled "Let Germany Explain."

As to whether my charges against Schmitt's book are "worthy of serious consideration" or not, this will not be settled by Professor Schuman's inspired gesture of disdain or through reiteration by me. But I may offer in evidence the views of the chief authority on recent European history, who happens to be resident in Professor Schuman's own State of Illinois—Professor Joseph Ward Swain. Writing in the official journal of the history teachers of America, he said of Schmitt's book: "In the reviewer's opinion, Professor Schmitt's prejudices are so strong as to render him unable to write impartial history." In his competent and impartial review in the New York Times Professor Parker T. Moon observed: "Where there is conflicting testimony he [Schmitt] puts the evidence against Germany in the text and the evidence for Germany in the footnotes." What becomes of Professor Schuman's hero who "is thoroughly the historian and never the propagandist"?

New York, January 3 HARRY ELMER BARNES

Professor Schuman's Reply

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor Barnes's comments raise two questions: (1) the nature of Professor Schmitt's contribution to the literature of the origins of the war; (2) the utility of dealing with 1914 in terms of "guilt" and "innocence." As to the first, allegations supported by other allegations are seldom convincing. If Professor Barnes can cite a single passage in Schmitt's volumes in which the "unique and black guilt" of the Central Powers is insisted upon or even suggested, his criticisms of Schmitt can be taken seriously. Thus far he has not done so. In his view, any study of 1914 which is not an indictment of the Entente and a whitewashing of the Triplice is hopelessly partial and prejudiced. Since Schmitt is relatively uninterested in indictments and whitewash, but moves in another universe of discourse, he is condemned forthwith.

As to the second question, it is clear that Professor Barnes still regards it as useful to take sides in the war of the pots and the kettles. I would be the last to disparage the value of his services in helping to explode the myth of a guilty nation and to show the injustice of the verdict of Versailles. This was a task for the journalist and dialectician, and Barnes, as advocatus diaboli, performed it with neatness and dispatch. The historian's task, as this reviewer sees it, is to present a full and well-balanced statement of the facts and to interpret these facts, not in terms of indictments and apologies for individuals or governments, but in the light of the patterns of political behavior constituting the Western state system. This goal Professor Schmitt has come nearer to achieving than any of his predecessors, despite certain faults of partisanship, as any layman can discover readily enough by reading his volumes for their content and not for brickbats with which to continue the guilt-and-innocence brawl. It is for this reason that the reviewer regards Barnes's charges as irrelevant, as well as unsubstantiated, and that he considers Schmitt's work worthy of high commendation.

Chicago, January 17 FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Where the Fault Lies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Can progressives in Congress—or in editorial sanctums—learn from experience? The hullabaloo being raised by them about the Power Commission indicates that they cannot. All that they say about the commission is true enough, no doubt, but anyone surprised or shocked by anything favorable to monopolies done by it or by any other commission with similar functions needs a guardian. What other kind of commission did they think that Hoover would possibly appoint? No one able to profit from experience will expect anything else from a commission empowered to regulate a monopoly but that sooner or later the monopoly will regulate it. Occasionally, perhaps, a President may appoint a commissioner who cannot be so regulated, but such appointments are, and in the nature of things must be, exceptional.

The original error in regard to the Power Commission was made when the present water-power act was drawn up. A provision might have been inserted that title to all power sites should remain with the government or that in any event, no matter who might hold the title, the entire rental value of all sites must be paid into the public Treasury. This would discourage holding of sites for any other purpose than use. Further encouragement to use should have been given by protecting users against predatory tax legislation by means of a provision guaranteeing exemption of all improvements. This would have made giving the public the best service at the lowest profitable cost the best policy for the site-holders. No arbitrary regulations by a commission would have been needed.

There is no record, however, that any of those progressives who are now raising the roof with denunciations advocated anything of the kind or even now realize that they should have done so.

Baltimore, January 10 SAMUEL DANZIGER

Another Complaint

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In reviewing Bernadotte Schmitt's "The Coming of the War, 1914," in The Nation of December 31, Frederick L. Schuman writes:

> In reacting against the fantasies of the extreme revisionists, he [Professor Schmitt] perhaps leans slightly backward in an effort to be fair to the Entente. So long as the lie of Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles remains written into the public law of Europe, the usefulness of such an effort is questionable.

What is less questionable than the usefulness of any effort by a historian to be fair?

Geneva, Switzerland, January 10 C. K. STREIT

Aliens and the Courts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Because of my admiration for and devotion to The Nation, I regret what seems to me the inaccuracy and inappropriateness of the closing sentence of your editorial paragraph in the issue of January 7 on the pending deportation of the Italian anti-Fascist, Guido Serio: "Thus do the federal courts of the United States aid in enforcing the political laws of Italy."

As a lawyer I have appeared for about thirty aliens against whom deportation proceedings have been brought under the alien-anarchy statutes, and I think you will conclude after further inquiry that Judge Bondy was powerless to do other than turn Serio back to the not-so-tender mercies of the Department of Labor. The law clearly vests in that department the decision as to whether Serio shall be deported and to what country. The department's decisions of questions of fact are not subject to review by the courts, which are warranted in overturning departmental orders only when it appears that the proceedings have been unfair to the alien, or that there is no evidence to support the department's findings. It is true that on many occasions permission to depart voluntarily to a country of their choice has been granted to aliens. But that permission, in all instances, has been granted by the Secretary of Labor and not by the courts.

It appears from your editorial and from other sources that Judge Bondy did his best to induce the department to act humanely and permit Serio to go to Russia. Perhaps it should be pointed out also that presumably it is as a Communist, and not as an anti-Fascist, that Serio is deportable. The Department of Labor has repeatedly held (and the courts have upheld the decisions) that alien Communists are deportable as members of an organization that advocates the overthrow of our government by force and violence.

If you will start a rapid-fire campaign of protest to the new Secretary of Labor, and flood his desk with letters and telegrams from citizens in all parts of the Union, you may be able to save Serio's life.

Los Angeles, Cal., January 7 JOHN BEARDSLEY

Kings and Grandmothers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What a curious thing is a king! In today's New York Times, which is so careful to print only news that is fit to print, General Pershing gives a detailed account of his arrival in England and the glorious entertainment he received at Buckingham Palace. After the feast, which was probably not too dry, the good King George stood with General Pershing near a window overlooking the garden and made some observations on his first cousin, Kaiser Wilhelm, that deserve to be preserved for all time as the kind of thing a king would be worrying about while millions of his subjects were being slaughtered in the trenches. It appears that Cousin Wilhelm, the Kaiser, in return for what Cousin George, His Majesty, had been doing to the inhuman Germans, had been permitting some of his subjects to bomb good old London. And, in the words of General Pershing, the King, pointing to the beautiful statue of Queen Victoria just outside the window, suddenly exclaimed: "The Kaiser, God damn him, has even tried to destroy the statue of his own grandmother."

Sir John Pershing, who seems to be a theologian as well as a hero, says he "quickly realized that it was a solemn expression of profound indignation, and not profanity." Of course, of course! How could the titular head of the Church of England be profane? Does any patriotic American think George Washington was profane when he put over his verbal assault at the Battle of Monmouth? Perish the thought!

The more General Pershing unravels the inside of our participation in the war, the better understanding we will have of why America sent billions of dollars and millions of men to Europe to save the kings and their grandmothers' statues.

Princeton, N. J., January 16 PERCIVAL WILMOT

Bumpers and the Bumped

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your issue of January 21 contained a letter from Bertrand Shadwell in which he proposed to change the type of bumpers on motor vehicles to make them similar in action to the cow-catcher on a locomotive.

Because of my connection with the insurance business for a number of years I have been very much interested in death and injuries to persons. Although I cannot give any definite percentages, I would like to point out to you and also to Mr. Shadwell that although hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid in personal-injury and death claims through this office, I know of only two cases in which the injuries were caused by the bumper on an automobile. Our files will disclose innumerable cases of people being injured and killed by the cowl, lamps, door handles, and hinges of automobiles, which would seem to indicate that what is really needed is something to prevent people from running and walking into the sides of passing cars.

Hyannis, Mass., January 23 ROBERT M. KELLEY

Ideals and Meals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The question of incentive is again presented in the letter of Mr. J. C. Menzel in your issue of January 21, captioned euphoniously Better Ideals than Regular Meals. He indicates that an emergency minimum-wage insurance would damage the incentive to earn a full wage, i. e., that a brakeman would never want to be a conductor or the president of the road. It seems, on the contrary, that the instinct to activity is amazingly strong and can only be injured by enforced idleness.

Great fortunes are not made by earning and saving. Stories say that they start that way, but to leave the argument at this point is to indicate but not acknowledge the further incentive, after the start is secured, to exploit on the grand scale under political protection. The writer mentions the extremes "rich" and "poor," apparently unconscious that a medium may be desirable and extremes due to evils.

It appears more reasonable to suppose that if possible extremities due to our still defective industrial economy were covered to some fair extent by wage insurance, real efforts to solve the employment question would result as an alternative to paying insurance losses. Also, the earners would be encouraged to save capital by instalment buying of lands, bonds, and stocks, and increasingly become dividend recipients themselves. Insurance is a stabilizing factor and is not feared except, apparently, when put forward primarily as a slight measure of safety to wage-earners by insuring their purchasing power.

Detroit, January 23 CHARLES H. BENNETT

VISITS · TO SOVIET · RUSSIA

TRAVELING individually or in groups, the inquiring American is welcome in Soviet Russia. The Open Road, now in its fifth season, renders them a specialist's service based on a specialist's knowledge and facilities.

- In Moscow and Leningrad resident Open Road representatives facilitate access to key institutions and personages.
- Travelers who follow the Volga or visit the Crimea, the Caucasus Mountains and the Ukraine are provided with interpreters through whom contacts are made with moujiks, collective farm officials, industrial workers, red soldiers, officials of local Soviets, et cetera.

Booklets available on Russian or European Travel

The Open Road

11 West 42nd St., New York City

Books, Drama, Films

The Grindstone

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

Here by the grapevine is the altar stone.
Here was the place where mysteries were known
And men learned how to make their sons in sweat.
Here was a place where women never met.
Out of this wheel the splendid words of God
Ran like sparks and cried themselves abroad.
At this table men bowed down to pray
When they ground their scythes to mow the hay.
Old powers dim and mighty as a seed
Came upon them as they bent and kneed
The earth beside this whirling wheel of prayer
And gave these men tremendous wings to wear.

Debate

WHY do people go to debates? Is it for the same reason that they read a serious analysis of a serious question, to receive intellectual light, or is it for the same reason that they go to prize fights, to see two people pummel each other, more happy when either of them lands a terrific blow than when either makes a successful parry? Are they thirsty for knowledge or thirsty for blood? I suppose the answer is the banal one that motives are mixed. But certainly if such people come for illumination they must feel pretty consistently cheated. I confess that I am myself only an occasional debate attender, but all in all I must have heard a rather considerable number, yet except in a single instance (Mr. Bertrand Russell's argument in favor of democracy against Mr. Will Durant) I cannot recall a debate on any subject in which either of the speakers advanced considerations for his side that seemed to me in any way fresh or original. The spirit of debate is hostile, not only to originality, but to nearly all subtleties, to nearly all nice distinctions, to profundity, and above all to common candor.

These reflections are prompted by the recent debate which I attended between Mr. Gilbert Chesterton and Mr. Clarence Darrow, on "Will the World Return to Religion?" In the ballot that followed, the audience voted more than two to one for the defender of the faith, Mr. Chesterton of course, and if that vote was on the relative merits of the two debaters, and not on the question itself, it was surely a very just one. Mr. Chesterton's argument was like Mr. Chesterton, amiable, courteous, jolly; it was always clever, it was full of nice turns of expression, and altogether a very adroit exhibition by one of the world's ablest intellectual fencing masters and one of its most charming gentlemen. Mr. Darrow's personality, by contrast, seemed rather colorless, and certainly very dour. His attitude seemed almost surly; he slurred his words; the rise and fall of his voice was sometimes heavily melodramatic, and his argument was conducted on an amazingly low intellectual level. Ostensibly the defender of science against Mr. Chesterton, he obviously knew much less science than Mr. Chesterton did; when he essayed to answer his opponent on the views of Eddington and Jeans, it was patent that he had not the remotest conception of what the new physics was all about. His victory over Mr. Bryan at Dayton had been too cheap and easy; he remembered it not wisely but too well. His arguments are still the arguments of village atheists of the Ingersoll period; at Mecca Temple he still seemed to be trying to shock and convince yokels. Mr. Chesterton's deportment was irreproachable, but I am sure that he was secretly unhappy. He had been on the platform many times against George Bernard Shaw. This opponent could not extend his powers. He was not getting his exercise.

But I began by talking, it will be recalled, of the absence of common candor from debate. Both speakers, in the present instance, were notably lacking in that quality. Mr. Darrow actually attempted to dismiss Mendel's work on heredity as negligible or accidental when Mr. Chesterton reminded him that Mendel had been a monk; and Mr. Chesterton could profess to believe that the church, from the days of the monasteries—the church that burned Bruno at the stake and compelled Galileo to recant his views on astronomy—had consistently guarded and encouraged not merely all literary learning, but all scientific research. I need hardly add that Mr. Chesterton's whole method of argument, illustrated not merely in the recent debate but in most of his essays, is lacking in a certain fundamental candor. I am not now referring merely to his minor tactics, to his verbal acrobatics or his famous paradoxes, but to the larger strategy of his whole campaign. He almost never defends concrete myths or dogmas; he merely attacks the (usually unrelated) beliefs of agnostics or rationalists. Thus if someone doubts the story of the virgin birth, Mr. Chesterton will reply that scientists have recently been radically changing their theories of the atom, and possibly know very little about the matter. I should not think sincere Catholics would be particularly enthusiastic about that kind of argument. Controversy is often good fun and often unavoidable, but serene and original thinkers have always known in their hearts that one cannot have the spirit of controversy and the spirit of truth at the same time. The great defect of Mr. Chesterton's mind, though perhaps it is trite to say so at this late day, is not merely that he has become the victim of his own verbal virtuosity, but that he has lived too habitually on the debating platform. He has ended by becoming interested in what can be said, not in what might be true.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Meaning of "Ulysses"

James Joyce's Ulysses. By Stuart Gilbert. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE clearest indication that we have not yet produced a critic who can cope with "Ulysses" is that we are still waiting for Mr. Joyce to tell us what it means. When our true spokesman arrives, our world-seeing interpreter, we shall listen to him, not to Mr. Joyce. Mr. Joyce could not possibly know what "Ulysses" means (in spite of a consciousness of intention throughout the work which multiplies the effect of its novelty, erudition, and scope. But this consciousness simply signifies that Mr. Joyce is the master of his staggering material and his self-wrought medium, that he has conceived his message as firmly as he has executed it. Neither firmness of conception nor mastery should beguile us into thinking that he knows what his message consists of. We may depend on it, great artist though he is—without peer in this century—he more than anyone else is waiting for this instruction).

The present "study," by an English member of that group of writers who, we are told, have attached themselves to Mr. Joyce's Paris headquarters, can only be regarded as a semi-official lifeline—since it was written with Mr. Joyce's "assistance"—thrown out to those who are still floundering in the wake of the great liner which passed by a decade ago. Of itself this book by Mr. Gilbert has no value, but it can be recommended as practically indispensable to anyone who wishes the best possible understanding of "Ulysses." Everybody will perceive that Mr. Gilbert himself has nothing of moment to say, yet what he has said here, owing to his association with Mr. Joyce and his peculiar zeal as a fisher of symbols, trapper of cross-references, occultist, philologist, handyman, will be sure to prove valuable to that critic who is going to arrive finally and pass judgment on "Ulysses." We could do without most of what in the past has been written about "Ulysses"; this, though it is intrinsically worthless, for the time being we need.

Part I of Mr. Gilbert's book, while attempting to be a general introduction to the subject, deals principally—and most interestingly—with the ancient and esoteric learning that Mr. Joyce has drawn upon for "Ulysses." There can be few readers of "Ulysses" who will not have many passages cleared up for them by this information. But the bulk of Mr. Gilbert's book consists of Part II, which is devoted to a methodical retelling and analysis of each of the eighteen chapters of "Ulysses." Here, so far as the censorship will permit, Mr. Gilbert takes up every thread of the enormous pattern and relates it to its narrative and its symbolical significance. If we have not read "Ulysses" for some time this analysis often takes us by surprise. If we read carefully a chapter of the original, however, and then read Mr. Gilbert's analysis of it, we find little that we had not already observed for ourselves—except, perhaps, in the matter of Homeric recalls, or "symbols," "organs," "arts," and "colors." In other words, Mr. Gilbert's book makes better readers of those of us who have been lazy. It also provides us with a few of Mr. Joyce's working notes.

But Mr. Gilbert's chief service is performed through his errors. For it is while we are reading his book, which puts an almost priestly emphasis upon the esoteric aspects of "Ulysses," that we realize that these are not an end in themselves but simply a means. Mr. Gilbert belongs personally to an unusual category; he is fascinated by the recondite, the occult. It is not too much to say that he seems to believe that if you shut your eyes and gulp down a saying of the Buddha, meanwhile recalling that a certain line by Blake was anticipated by Thomas Traherne, you are certain to become wise. It is his ridiculous exaggeration of the esoteric doctrine employed in "Ulysses," therefore, which forces us to the realization that if Mr. Joyce has elaborated "Bloomsday" with so much learning, it was not to give meaning to it, as Mr. Gilbert would insist, but simply to round it out. Learning, in other words, could never be more than at the service of so profound a man as Mr. Joyce. The value of this realization, simple though it is, becomes apparent when we consider the much-discussed Homeric recalls. For we appreciate next that while these are an organic part of the comic plan of "Ulysses," their significance nevertheless is a minor one and they likewise serve only to round the story out. (It is possible that they also served another purpose in the private game played between Mr. Joyce, while he was writing the book, and his material. It is possible that the characters in "Ulysses" were for the most part given Mr. Joyce by his memory but some of the incidents had to be invented, that he made use of the Odyssey to stimulate him toward the production of the latter. It is possible that the "arts," "symbols," "colors," "organs" which so delight Mr. Gilbert were used by Mr. Joyce also not so much for their meaning as for the spark they set to his imagination.)

But what is the difference between "meaning" and "rounding out"? If the Homeric recalls, for example, merely round out the story, what is that part of "Ulysses" which has meaning? The answer, for anyone who has ever followed with clear eyes the line-by-line, exact revelation of that "allincluding" day in 1904, will be too elementary. The meaning of "Ulysses" is on the surface. It is to be found in that part which is simplest to see, once we have got the hang of Mr. Joyce's method, if we will only be simple ourselves. We can be certain that our world-seeing critic, when he arrives, will select the "simple" rather than the esoteric side of "Ulysses" for most of his attention. And he will find enough there to engage a lifetime.

GERALD SYKES

Primitive Childhood

Growing Up in New Guinea. By Margaret Mead. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

WITH this book Miss Mead continues the investigation which she began with her study of the adolescent girl in Samoa. The problem which she has set herself, both in her earlier research and the one on which she reports in the present volume, has to do with the manner in which a culture becomes instilled in the persons who are born into it, and how it acts on them. How do the members of a primitive group assimilate their culture? Can universals be discerned in the process which may be said to apply to all cultures? Finally, and for Miss Mead, most importantly, the question that interests so many persons in our own civilization is set: What is the significance of the answers to these questions for our own practical everyday problems of assimilating to our own culture the raw human material born into our civilization?

The people who furnish the data for this study are the Manus tribe of the Admiralty Islands, north of New Guinea. Comparatively untouched by the civilization of Western Europe, the traditions of these folk resemble those of our pecuniary culture in a curious, distorted fashion. Among the Manus wealth is the end of life, and he who has wealth has the means of gaining the only kind of social position that carries any significance to his fellows. This regard for wealth, almost religious in its intensity, is carried so far that in the presence of great possessions the voice is lowered, and people walk and behave with the circumspectness that is associated among all peoples with contact with the most sacred and worth-while things of life. The greatest business exchanges are made in connection with marriage, a peculiarly cruel institution according to Miss Mead's account, since the form in which it is cast makes it well-nigh impossible for the mated pair to hold for each other any feeling but distrust and dislike, and since it burdens the family of the man in particular with heavy debts that make first claim on his efforts.

Into this pattern of the worship of wealth, of fearsome traffic with the ghosts of the dead, and of the difficulties engendered by stringent family duties, the child is born. Except that he must respect property, he is in his younger years ruler of the household. His whims are deferred to, his time is his own, he pays no respect to anyone, nor are any duties exacted of him. With adolescence all changes, and, particularly if the child is a boy, this change comes not graciously, nor by careful steps, but with all the chilling experience of being plunged into the most distasteful experience of his civilization. In a few short months he becomes a grown man, with all the cares of adulthood placed roughly upon his shoulders. In the case of a girl, the process is somewhat more gradual, but only slightly less abrupt than in that of the boys. Miss Mead draws a skilful picture, and packs into her account a great deal of material to show how the process works.

After the presentation of the material collected among the Manus, the lessons for our own civilization to be drawn from it are discussed. Whether this part is as valid as Miss Mead's ethnographic contribution is not for me to say, for whether one likes one's science to stay within the confines of its own boundaries or to be applied to problems of the day is a matter of personal preference. Certainly Miss Mead has ample precedent for her ventures into what is being called "applied anthropology," and the morals she draws from her contact with the educational methods of two primitive cultures should be of value to those who are interested in the methods which we employ to introduce our children to our own whirring culture. But whether the emphasis is placed upon the ethnographic aspect of her book or on the lessons that are drawn for us from the data on which it is based, Miss Mead has produced a challenging work, and the reading of it should be stimulating to all whose interests are not bounded by the horizons of our own civilization. MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

The Upton Sinclair Enigma

Roman Holiday. By Upton Sinclair. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

"ROMAN HOLIDAY" is an arresting novel because its author is Upton Sinclair. If it were written, exactly as it is, by anyone else, I doubt whether it would receive any marked attention at all—which is simply to say that Upton Sinclair is far more arresting as a man than he is as a novelist.

Anything that Upton Sinclair writes, therefore, is bound to make us pause, if only because we know that it is the product of a mind sensitive to injustice, sincere beyond cavil, and burning with an eagerness to turn its art into a form of social inspiration. No one who respects personality, and admires character in a world which values only reputation, can fail to esteem such a man or fail to concern himself with his work. The very fact that his novels have sold by the hundreds of thousands of copies in many European countries, and by the millions in Soviet Russia, is a most convincing testimony of the international extent of this esteem among the masses. And despite the fact that his fiction has been praised by such intelligent literary critics as Georg Brandes, Johan Bojer, and Floyd Dell, I am sure that it is among the masses rather than among the literati that his work has been best appreciated. Does this mean that the literati are opposed to the work of Sinclair on the basis of class prejudice; that their minds are so distorted by the ideology of the bourgeoisie that they cannot appreciate the nature of his art? I should be one of the last to deny that such elements enter into the problem. At the same time, however, I am convinced that they are not the main part of the problem here. Did not these same literati praise Mike Gold's "Jews Without Money" and John Dos Passos's "42nd Parallel"? If it be argued that "Jews Without Money" and "The 42nd Parallel" are not radical books, which many radicals would argue and have argued, it need only be added that they are in every way as left in import as "Roman Holiday."

What then is at work in this problem—this Upton Sinclair enigma? It is not "Roman Holiday" which created it; "Roman Holiday" only raises it anew, as does almost every novel of Sinclair's. "Roman Holiday" is not, as the blurb on the book states, "a spectacular love story"—there is nothing spectacular about its love scenes except the intrusion of the automobile race, which after all adds but little intensity to the love element in the story—but it is, as the blurb states, "an indictment of our present civilization." As an indictment of our civilization "Roman Holiday" says many true things, many important things. In fact, I agree so completely with every aspect of its indictment that my main regret is that "Roman Holiday" is not a better novel, for then its indictment would have been all the more telling and significant. I have no disagreement with it, in other words, on the basis of its propaganda, and I am sure that those critics who trace the weaknesses of the novel to its propagandistic purpose are pursuing the wrong approach. If it were a more successful novel, as a novel, its propagandistic purpose would have been better served. The disagreement, on the other hand, is with its form, its organization, its execution.

Now what is wrong with the organization and execution of "Roman Holiday"? Just this: they fail to communicate the emotive force and intensity which are necessary to a successful novel. There is no quarrel with the conception of the novel. The conception is exceedingly ingenious. The idea of having Luke Faber, the wealthy son of an established American family, member of the American Legion, a Babbitt out-Babbitted, experience by means of a psychic trauma a plunge-back into Roman life, whereby his Roman existence, in keeping with the rhythm of the Rome of that day, is seen to be but a definite duplication of his existence in America today—the idea is indubitably unusual and clever. It is the execution of it that is not. I do not question the existence of Luke Fabers in American—or Roman—life, or of Virginia Tullys, Hortense Manleys, or any of the other characters in the novel. The love life of Luke runs true enough to type; the struggle between his affection for his mistress and his family obligation to find a wife of social station, colored for a moment as it is by his sudden infatuation for Marcia Penny—all this is in keeping with the characters, as many of us have come to know them in life as well as in this book. Certainly the attacks upon the radicals and the attempt to drive them out of town, ending up in the murder of the radical leader, Jerry Fields, we can recognize as all too real. Even the Roman scenes are faithful enough to fact. There is nothing in "Roman Holiday" that is incredible, then, nothing that we need to scoff at as being inaccurate, untrue, or even exaggerated, and I should disagree here most emphatically with those critics who would say that such capitalists as Luke Faber do not exist, that such scenes as are depicted in the novel are unreal, and that the whole conception of the novel is a vast exaggeration—or caricature. It is just those things that it is not.

But if the characters are real and the situations are true to life, then wherein is the novel weak? The weakness, in my opinion, is entirely one of method. The difficulty with Sinclair's characters and situations is not in recognizing them, but in feeling them. His characters are rational—or cerebral if you will—rather than emotive creations. One can see them—but not experience them. This is partly due to the fact that, in the main, they are types instead of individuals, types that you know, that you knew before you read "Roman Holiday," and which you do not know any better after having read it. The reason that you do not come to know these types any better in "Roman Holiday" is because Sinclair conveys their ideas to us but not their emotions, or perhaps it would be better to say that he is successful in conveying their ideas but unsuccessful in conveying their emotions. (And this is true despite the fact that he adventures rather interestingly in parts of the novel into certain deductions from psychoanalysis.) Literature, like all the arts, is primarily emotive in essence, and it is most successful in dealing with ideas, and "gets across" its propaganda most effectively, when it is emotionalized instead of cerebralized. Sinclair tends to portray his characters in terms of straight lines instead of in terms of all those zigzags of personality, those intricate and irrational contradictions of self, which create individuality in life as well as in fiction. Those penetrating glimpses of personality, those nuances of reaction, inner as well as outer, those intimate "slow-motion" shots of self which are necessary to make one feel, and be moved by, characters in fiction are absent from Sinclair's novel, and it is that absence which prevents "Roman Holiday," with all of its ingenuity of conception, from being a success as a novel.

"Roman Holiday" is a better novel, however, than "Mountain City," far better, and I only wish it were possible for Sinclair to get back to something of the stride that he struck in "The Jungle," which still remains the best of his novels. Then his indictment of present-day civilization would be a far greater challenge.
V. F. CALVERTON

The English Romantics

Leigh Hunt and His Circle. By Edmund Blunden. Harper and Brothers. $4.

The Friend of Shelley. By H. J. Massingham. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

THE English romantic movement seemed destined for a bad end. Byron and Wordsworth were exceptions to the rule, for Byron had the satisfaction of dying, still in the thick of the fight, at Missolonghi, and Wordsworth declined slowly and peacefully, his conviction of personal grandeur intact, surrounded by his beloved lake country. William Godwin, Keats, Shelley, Leigh Hunt, and Trelawny ran true to form. Even though Keats and Shelley died young, they had lived long enough to enter a period of violent disillusionment, encircled by petty quarrels and the tragic mismanagement of practical everyday life.

To speak of Leigh Hunt's failure as a man and as a poet in terms of high tragedy would be presenting his case in false colors. In his defense of his hero Edmund Blunden does not make the mistake of enlarging upon Hunt's talents or protesting too loudly against whatever injustice may have fallen upon Hunt's posthumous reputation. After all, Leigh Hunt was scarcely more than a literary man about town in the London of a hundred years ago. For the purposes of a literary career his family connections were excellent. His father, Isaac Hunt, an ex-American, a Tory, found London far more hospitable than his native city, Philadelphia. Related by marriage to Benjamin West, the portrait painter, Isaac secured the protection of London fashionable society for himself and his family. With the background of a few years spent at Christ's Hospital, then a veritable incubator for young men of literary ambitions, Leigh Hunt joined his brother John in the business of editing a popular liberal weekly, the Examiner. At the age of twenty-nine he had already published two books of poems, had made a considerable success as a dramatic critic, married, and by a brilliant attack upon the Prince Regent found himself in Surrey Gaol. He was a very famous young man indeed, and with a characteristic and charming lack of deliberation made Surrey Gaol an attractive home for himself and family. It became the fashion for literary London to visit Leigh Hunt in his new quarters; everyone of any importance, including Lord Byron and Thomas Moore, made a point of dropping in for an hour's conversation with the witty young devil's disciple and champion of liberty. It was a grand show. No one could afford to miss the spectacle of the brothers editing the fiery Examiner behind prison walls.

With this episode behind him, it is no wonder that Leigh Hunt attracted such personalities as William Hazlitt, John Keats, and Percy Bysshe Shelley. Although his talents for the writing of poetry, criticism, and political pamphlets never extended far beyond literary journalism, he was a symbol of revolt for the young men of his generation. His very weaknesses, a lack of control over domestic finances and excessive amiability, made him, for the moment, a personality of inimitable charm.

The rest of the story is anti-climactic. Leigh Hunt had an unfortunate habit of living beyond his means, and it is evident that Mrs. Hunt was a social as well as a domestic blunder. She was hopelessly inadequate to the management of a large family. The poor woman was kept busy at the task of bringing young Hunts into the world. No wonder she became a whining, gossiping invalid, borrowing money and articles of household furniture from the wives of her husband's friends. The union of the Hunts and the Shelleys in Italy was inevitably disastrous. It was an amalgamation of disorder on a large scale. Leigh Hunt's lack of money and Shelley's sudden death threw the burden of frenzied domesticity upon Lord Byron, who lived hard by with an Italian mistress. The fact that Byron did not go raving mad is a high tribute to the strength of his intelligence. Nor did the presence of Edward John Trelawny help matters. The super-romantic Trelawny, all fire and no brains, despite his good looks and fantastic costumes, must have been, to say the least, annoying. Byron coolly insulted both Hunt and Trelawny. Immediately following Byron's death Hunt and Trelawny wrote books describing Byron as the prince of darkness, the original devil himself. The quarrel with Byron was Trelawny's road to fame and the beginning of Leigh Hunt's descent into a period of chronic hard times. Hunt returned to England, and though he lived until 1859, welcoming the various talents of Alfred Tennyson, Thomas Carlyle, Charles Dickens, Robert Browning, and William Allingham, he never caught up with the rapid accumulation of his debts and domestic worries. Edmund Blunden has written the story of his life with admirable honesty and literary distinction. His portrait is clear, sympathetic, and just. Mr. Blunden must have had enough material at hand to fill a half-dozen volumes the size of the present biography. By exercise of exact literary judgment he has eliminated all superfluous detail and yet his story of Leigh Hunt may be taken as a fully rounded survey of English literary history during the first fifty years of the nineteenth century. Mr. Massingham's life of Trelawny is definitely limited in its appeal. It makes clear the relationship of Trelawny to the Byron-Shelley circle, but at best the book is scarcely more than a footnote to a remarkable period in English literary history.

HORACE GREGORY

Books in Brief

England's Greatest Statesman: A Life of William Pitt, 1759-1806. By E. Keble Chatterton. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $4.

It is often said that there is no satisfactory biography of the younger Pitt; but he was a man almost without a private life, and his political career has been adequately described by Macaulay, Stanhope, Rosebery, Whibley, and Holland Rose. Mr. Chatterton's biography will not supersede any of its predecessors. It is more thorough, but less readable, than the recent work on the same subject by Mr. P. W. Wilson. Mr. Chatterton is painstaking and accurate, and covers the ground well; but he uses no new authorities and suggests no new interpretations. His style is long-winded and prosaic; his efforts to brighten it by using colloquial phrases, making platitudinous generalizations, and suggesting trite comparisons with recent history are not successful. This book is little more than a narrative of events, and its hero never comes alive. By principle Pitt was a reformer and an enemy of royal influence; yet he consented to accept office as the king's instrument and the enemy of the reforming party; by this means he held the premiership longer than any other Englishman before or since, but he delayed reform for fifty years. Pitt's craving for power offers an interesting psychological problem; to Mr. Chatterton, however, he is merely "England's Greatest Statesman."

Charlemagne, First of the Moderns. By Charles Edward Russell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Mr. Russell's book is an excellent example of the kind of popular biography which combines exceptional knowledge of the subject with a lively style, and singles out for emphasis what is dramatic or entertaining without doing injustice to what is sober or matter of fact. Students will be interested to know that Mr. Russell does not repeat the time-honored views of Charlemagne for which the Monk of Saint Gall and the ubiquitous Einhard were mainly responsible, but relies instead upon modern studies, among which those of Professor Halphen, of the University of Bordeaux, are notable. Whether Charlemagne is properly to be hailed as the first of the moderns depends, of course, upon what one means by the phrase, but he at least looked ahead as well as about him, and his innovations in political administration, his curious interest in learning, and his efforts to make both kingly and imperial rule something more than a name make him a figure with which no other in the Middle Ages can well be compared. It is to Mr. Russell's credit that his admiration for his hero does not blind him to failings or inconsistencies, nor beguile him into ascribing to Charlemagne virtues which the latter did not possess. Among the best of the passages are those which deal with the career of the Empress Irene, the work of Alcuin, the provisions of the capitularies, and Charlemagne's relations with the popes. The twenty illustrations are well chosen.

The Great Crusade and After, 1914-1928. By Preston William Slosson. With an Editorial Foreword by Arthur M. Schlesinger and Dixon Ryan Fox. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Professor Slosson's conception of history does not appear to be a very profound one, and a number of subjects which have bulked large in political or economic interest during the fourteen years covered by his book, such as armament reduction, the war debts, and the tariff, are passed over with relatively small notice in his pages. He has, however, brought together a very large amount of information regarding a wide range of topics, and the reader who wants well-ordered and up-to-date surveys of American industrial and business achievements, the changing aspects of city and country life, education, journalism, sport, and the status of women will find the book readable, instructive, and entertaining. Particularly well done are the opening chapters in which Professor Slosson deals with the effect of the World War upon American opinion, the devastating sweep of war propaganda, the mobilization of industry and patriotic fervor, and economic and social readjustments after the peace. The chapter on prohibition, on the other hand, while packed with incidents and data, leaves the impression that the author is not much moved by the situation one way or the other, and the treatment of literature, drama, music, and the like is hardly more than a recital of names and titles interspersed with brief, obvious comments. An informative chapter on the progress of science during the period is the work of the late Edwin E. Slosson. The choice of illustrations shows commendable skill.

Toes Up: A Chronicle of Gay and Doleful Adventures of Alpini and Mules and Wine. By Paolo Monelli. Translated by Orlo Williams. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Down the Red Lane. By Henri Nadel. With a Preface by Romain Rolland. Translated by Blair Taylor. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Of these two war books the first is described on the jacket as "the great Italian war book" and the second as "the great French book of the war." Such blurbs do ill service to two valuable volumes. While neither may properly be described as "great," the Italian book is a vivid, worked-over war diary of the Alpine front, written in fascinating style, a book which may very well be, in its original tongue, a piece of distinguished literature, and which varies in mood from the rollicking or the genuinely sentimental to the terrible. The French book, also based on a diary, is notable for its seriousness. Individual readers may be weary of war books. But there can hardly be too many of this order, serious volumes which, whether of an outstanding literary quality like "Toes Up" or of a desperate sincerity like "Down the Red Lane," come straight out of individual experience. These two deserve a place among the growing body of war literature worthy of permanence.

Drama

Child's Plays

I SEEM to have suffered last week from an attack of something like senility. I do not say maturity, for that would be flattering myself, and anyway I am not sure what the word means. I am a little surer, perhaps, about the meaning of the word immaturity. So I shall say that I went to two plays with the expectation of being fully entertained and found them immature.

Booth Tarkington's "Colonel Satan" (Fulton Theater), which by the time this appears in print will have gone off the boards, was childish in one of the better senses of the term. One didn't at all resent the quality; one simply noted it and sat half-occupied through three long and superficial acts. If there were any youthful readers of historical romance in the audience, or if there were spectators of greater age who could remember "Monsieur Beaucaire" and could forget everything that has happened in the theater since, they—and only they—had a perfect right to be interested. "Colonel Satan" was singularly and completely lacking in the power to hold anybody else—anybody, for instance, who cannot wholly like a play which cannot at least occasionally surprise him. There were no surprises in "Colonel Satan." This could please the youthful reader of costume novels, because such a reader is pedantic and comes with definite expectations; and it could please an old follower of Mr. Tarkington, because it was exactly what Mr. Tarkington used to provide. For others the glitter of the intrigue was all too obvious, the bravery of the speeches all too neat. The limits of the characterization were apparent from the first, and the situations were so predictable that the author's labor in working them out became painfully apparent. Not that the hero, Aaron Burr, whom we saw here on a night in Paris in 1811, was anything less than excellent subject matter for a dramatist; and not that McKay Morris, who played the part, failed to be brilliant. Indeed, his performance was too energetically and consistently brilliant. But that, I fancy, was Mr. Tarkington's fault. The play was written too much in a single key—the expected key.

The revival of Schnitzler's "Anatol" with Joseph Schildkraut in the title part (Lyceum Theater), for which Jo Mielziner designed such extraordinarily beautiful sets, was childish in a much less inoffensive fashion. The child who would find it fascinating is the least attractive to me of all known children. He is the well-dressed sophomore who reads only the cleverest literature and is perfected in all the most nonchalant poses. As a matter of fact, it occurs to me as I write that I know some sophomores, and that they are not like this. I do not think they would care very much for "Anatol." Twenty years ago the situation may have been different however, and I suppose I had the mythical undergraduate in mind when first I spoke. Since the audience around me looked fairly grown up, and since it was enthusiastic from start to finish, I deduce that it was composed of persons who had not ceased to be sophomores and who therefore could mistake the sentimentality of this piece for sophistication.

It is Schnitzler's first play, and it is immeasurably old. Nothing ages so quickly as plays which take love lightly, as this one does—with the apparent difference, however, that it mingles melancholy with its wit. The mixture, which for all that might be something capable of enduring forever, is in this case so much a concoction of its time that the flavor has quite escaped the bottle. The imp has flown, and even the syrup which remains has lost its sweetness. A revival of "Anatol," I think, should have gone in for sweetness wholly, on the theory that such cynicism as used to be there is irrecoverable. At least we could have felt some tenderness for this antediluvian Vienna, been stirred by certain affectionate memories. Mr. Schildkraut, instead of restoring the sugar, made for me the great mistake of pouring the liquid out with condescending gestures. He vulgarized a play which already was vulgar enough—seeming to say, "Well, we'll put some kind of sparkle into this stale ale anyhow." Revivals should be undertaken with more humility than that, and with a better sense of humor. Walter Connolly as Max and Patricia Collinge as Gabrielle both had a saving sense of how to act their parts; Miriam Hopkins as Mimi and Ruthelma Stevens as Lona scarcely did. They were lively, of course, as the lines demanded. But they were too lively. They broke the bottle, which had been blown of the thinnest—though not the most expensive—glass.

MARK VAN DOREN

Films

Shaw's First Movie

THE inevitable has happened. For years George Bernard Shaw turned a deaf ear to all proposals to put his plays on the screen. He has at last relented, and one of his early plays, "How He Lied to Her Husband," has been made into a talkie by an English company. There was doubtless great wisdom in Shaw's refusal to submit to the ministrations of the Hollywood experts. For one thing, he spared us the disappointment of seeing his showman's display of a nimble and effervescent mind brought down to the level of the infantile understanding. He also spared us the painful experience of sitting through some of the worst films that could possibly be made. For as silent pictures, shorn of their conversational brilliance, Shaw's plays, with the possible exception of "The Devil's Disciple," would have been particularly lacking in the qualities that make the flesh and blood of a good movie. In talkies he is on safer ground, though one still has grave doubts whether any of his bigger plays can be successfully adapted to the screen.

"How He Lied to Her Husband" (Cohan's), regarded as an augury of what is to come, is disappointing. The film

ANNE GREEN

Author of "The Selbys"

the fiction sensation of last spring, presents another rollicking romance. "Reader, I Married Him," is the story of the misadventures of the harum-scarum Douglasses, and Catherine Douglass in particular, who "entered rooms like a March wind, smelled like April flowers and looked like May."

Here is sparkling champagne of the finest French vintage, offered to an American public, thirsty for gaiety and romance. For love and laughter, no novel will equal it this spring. The Dutton Prize Book for February. $2.50.

READER, I MARRIED HIM

PARADISE CITY

By Henry Channon . . . The first outstanding fiction success of 1931! "Mr. Channon has the two prime requisites of a great writer, understanding and wisdom. His theme he handles masterfully and with a bold logic that is convincing. 'Paradise City' is a literary achievement of depth and power."—Philadelphia Public Ledger. "His characters have all the humor and pathos, all the tragedy and comedy found in the lives of very real people. Mr. Channon writes realism of the happiest sort in a very charming fashion."—Boston Herald. $2.50.

THE UNDERWORLD OF PARIS

By Alfred Morain, Prefect of Police, Paris . . . The "Scotland Yard" of France unseals its secret files! Direct from headquarters comes this rare collection of true and terrible criminal cases, among them the first official account of Mata Hari's life, trial and death. Illustrated with actual photographs of the crimes. $3.50.

THEATRE STREET

The Intimate Autobiography of a Dancing Girl, by Tamara Karsavina . . . Sir J. M. Barrie says in his introduction: "This is one of the most delightful books ever written about the theatre." The story of this beauty of the Russian ballet will captivate all readers. Fully illustrated, $5.00.

DUMAS: Father and Son

By Francis Gribble . . . Rich in anecdote, frank, shrewd, amusing—this entertaining biography of "the incredible marquis" and his even more incredible son, is a racy account, worthy of its subjects. $5.00.

UNDER THREE TSARS

By Elizabeth Narishkin-Kurakin. Edited by Rene Fülop-Miller . . . Lady-in-waiting at the court of three tsars, the author had access to information no outsider could possibly possess. Her portrait of the late Empress, slave to Rasputin, is an extraordinary one. Illustrated, $3.50.

RUSSIA'S PRODUCTIVE SYSTEM

By Emile Burns . . . The story of the most unique and the most astounding economic system that the world has ever known. An accurate and up-to-the-minute account of what is happening in Russia under the Five-Year Plan. $4.00.

Our new illustrated Spring Catalogue is just off the press! It is delightfully modern in format, typography, illustration, and arrangement. We are so proud of its appearance and contents, that we hope you will send for a free copy before the edition is exhausted.

E.P. DUTTON & CO. Inc., 300 Fourth Ave., N.Y.

Present day subjects of vital interest

THE Extension School of Adult Education, New York University, offers a program of organized yet unrestricted study for those who would be abreast of the day. There are no academic requirements beyond an alert and open mind. Among the courses to be offered are: The Theater of Today, Contemporary Literature, Psychology Today, and other equally interesting courses. Second term registration begins February 3d. Write now for bulletin to

Rufus D. Smith, Director,
University Extension Division

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY
103 Washington Square East
New York, N. Y.

"Let us not allow the tradition of free minds to perish"
THE GROUP
A Clearing House Of Opinion For The Intellectually Adult
Meets at Auditorium — 150 West 85th St.
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 3RD AT 8:30 P. M.
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
will speak on:
"The Evils of Present Day Psychology"
Admission to all 50c

SUNDAY AFTERNOON DISCUSSION GROUP — FEBRUARY 8TH, AT 4:30
SEYMOUR A. SELIGSON
(Staff Lecturer for Free Library Lecture Society)
will speak on:
"Will the Moron or the Superman Survive"
(The Gospel of Friedrich Nietzsche)
Tea Served (Founded 1918) Subscription 50c
(Weekly notices mailed on request)

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th Street Algonquin 4-3094

H. N. BRAILSFORD Sat., Jan. 31, 3 P. M.
The Proposed Constitution for India Adm. 25c.

RAYMOND C. MOLEY Mon., Feb. 2, 8:30 P. M.
New Functions of Government Adm. 50c.

PIERRE LOVING Tues., Feb. 3, 8:30 P. M.
The History of Art II Adm. 50c.

DORION CAIRNS Wed., Feb. 4, 7 P. M.
Aristophle's Ethics and Politics Adm. 50c.

NORMAN THOMAS Wed., Feb. 4, 8:30 P. M.
The Place of Socialist Partisanship in Municipal Politics Adm. 50c.

HERMAN EPSTEIN Thurs., Feb. 5, 8:30 P. M.
Nineteenth Century Music Adm. 50c.

was produced under Shaw's personal supervision; and it is rather a pity, for Shaw's ideas of direction, which cramp his plays even on the stage, are little short of disastrous when applied to the movies. He evidently does not feel the difference between the movies and the stage. Though Cecil Lewis, who directed the film, has given it a pleasant fluidity of changing "shots," he has adhered to the stage original in practically everything else. So much so, indeed, that he has confined the entire action to a single room, showing even that only from one end, as if, like a stage set, it had only three walls.

But what seems to matter even more is the essential theatricality of the whole piece. The intimacy of contact with the audience which enables the actor to make his points on the stage is still unobtainable in the talkies. A deficiency affecting all the genres of the talkies, it makes itself felt with especial force in the conventional theatrical genre, and "How He Lied to Her Husband," with its invented situation of a husband welcoming and even demanding admiration for his wife from a lover who feigns indifference to her, has decidedly all the earmarks of a stunt. On the screen this simply does not work.

Yet even this failure does not quite explain the paucity of effect produced by the film. The truth is that besides its situation—a not very happy conceit at best—the play has little to offer. What is most surprising of all, it has none of the Shavian brilliance of dialogue and none of the sudden twists of characterization that have made Shaw's reputation as a playwright. One is still kept in a state of amused bewilderment in watching the antics of "You Never Can Tell," but "How He Lied to Her Husband" is not even mildly amusing. The one relieving feature of the film is the acting of Miss Vera Lennox. The finesse of her craftsmanship is admirable.

The outstanding picture of the fortnight under review is "Al-Yemen" (Cameo). Here at last is a travel picture that knows how to tell its story. After seeing it one knows not only something of the scenery of this inaccessible Arabian kingdom, but also a great deal of the ways of life of its ancient though still primitive people. The social contrasts between the feudal sheiks and the downtrodden peasants are effectively brought out, as are the conditions in the local trades, with a very subtle hint at the foreign exploitation. Not the least interesting feature of the film is the picture it draws of the Ghetto life of the Jews in the community, the only numerous section of the population that throughout the ages has preserved its identity under the dominant Moslems.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is at present in the United States on a lecture tour.

NATHAN R. MARGOLD, legal adviser on Indian affairs to the Institute for Government Research, is a practicing attorney in New York City.

ROLLIN KIRBY is the well-known cartoonist whose drawings appear regularly in the New York World.

ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN is professor of English at Wells College.

GERALD SYKES is a writer of fiction.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

V. F. CALVERTON is the author of "Three Strange Lovers."

HORACE GREGORY is the author of a book of verse, "Chelsea Rooming House."

SIEGFRIED KRAUS is the adviser of the Municipal Department for Social Welfare in Vienna.

☐ FILMS ☐ LECTURES ☐ DEBATES ☐ PLAYS ☐

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A. M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Saturday

Louis Fischer
Author of "The Soviets in World Affairs"
European Correspondent for "The Nation" Since 1924
Available for lecture engagements on Russia during February and March
Write: Manager, Room 1015, 32 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. C.

Saturday Eve., Jan. 31st, at 8:30
Dr. Samuel D. Schmalhausen
will speak on
"Why Our Intellectuals Betray Their Ideals"
at the
LABOR TEMPLE AUDITORIUM
14th Street and Second Avenue
Admission 35c.

DEBATE
This Friday Evening
JANUARY 30, 8:30 p.m.

HEYWOOD BROUN
NORMAN THOMAS
versus
CLARENCE DARROW
ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

HARRIOT STANTON BLATCH, Chairman

"Resolved: The Best Political Service Can Be Rendered by Joining the Socialist Party"

at MECCA TEMPLE
55th St., between 6th and 7th Aves.

Tickets, $2.50 to 75c. at League for Industrial Democracy, 112 E. 19th St.; Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15th St., or Mecca Temple Box Office.

Auspices: N. Y. Chapter, League for Industrial Democracy

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT appears on page 140,—dinners and luncheons on page 139

—"A SMASH HIT"—Walter Winchell, Mirror—
"Joe Cook perfectly marvelous and the show perfectly beautiful"—Heywood Broun, Nation.
JOE COOK in "FINE and DANDY"
HIS NEWEST, MADDEST MUSICAL
ERLANGER'S THEATRE—W. 44th St.—PEN. 7963
Evening 8:30; Matinees, Wed. and Sat., 2:30

The Theatre Guild Presents

Green Grow The Lilacs
GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

MIDNIGHT
AVON THEATRE 45th Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN
Martin Beck Thea. 45th Street, West of Eighth Avenue. Eves., 8:40. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents
MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy [illegible]
VINEGAR TREE
PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - 2628
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

THE DANCE REPERTORY THEATRE
Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey, Agnes de Mille, Tamiris, Charles Weidman
SUNDAY,, FEBRUARY FIRST, TO SUNDAY, FEBRUARY EIGHTH, INCLUSIVE
CRAIG THEATRE
Tickets $1 to $2.50 week days, $1 to $3 Sundays, at box office, 54th Street East of Broadway
CIrcle 7 - 4270 (Mason & Hamlin Piano)

CARNEGIE HALL—Monday Evening, Feb. 9th
YEHUDI
Menuhin
Mgt. Evans & Salter (Mason & Hamlin)

THE HOMESTEADERS* ARE GETTING TOGETHER AGAIN
ANNUAL DANCE AND REUNION
Hotel Pennsylvania Friday, February 6th, 9 P. M.
Music by Wolfstaedter's Syncopators
Bridge Entertainment
MEET THE HOMESTEAD CROWD
Tickets, $1.00 in advance $1.50 at the door
On sale at Community Church, 12 Park Ave.
*The Homestead—A Community Church Summer Activity

Social Welfare in Vienna

By DR. SIEGFRIED KRAUS

THE war and the years after the war brought in their train disaster and difficulty to the whole world; in Vienna the effects of those years were especially serious. Until the end of the war Vienna was the capital of an empire of fifty million subjects; the population of Austria as it was reconstituted after the war was six and a half million. The old was to the new Austria as the earth to the moon. Moreover, the countries which tore themselves away from the old Austria, among them Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia, were the richest of the old empire.

In Vienna itself four years of war had brought shortage of food for nearly all the inhabitants; for many those years had meant a deterioration in health; and for the youth, to some extent, they had meant neglect in education. There existed a terrible scarcity in lodgings. Thousands of young people had married and there were no homes for them. Food grew scarcer and scarcer from day to day and the number of those who could not find employment increased rapidly. At the same time many thousands of fugitives poured in, adding to the number to be fed and sheltered.

Help came from almost all parts of the world. We will not forget what America did for us then. But such help could be only temporary; its sources were bound to dry up some time. We must help ourselves and we must particularly bear in mind that it was our first duty, at any cost, to save our population from utter destruction, to restore its physical and moral forces. For only if the "organic capital" of Vienna, so to speak, was preserved, could we hope for an economic improvement in the future. We had to begin, therefore, with the children of all ages, from the baby up to the youth and girl. To that end the Städtisches Jugendamt, or the city department for juveniles, was established.

The organization turned its attention first to the care of the unborn child. Expectant mothers with no means received free advice about what to do before, during, and after confinement and were given financial assistance. I wish especially to mention what is called Mutterhilfe, or mother-help. Mothers who do not belong to any of the Krankenkassen, or institutions for sick insurance, are paid ten (Austrian) schillings per week for four weeks after delivery. They are required, in turn, to undergo a blood examination in the fourth month of pregnancy at the latest, as a safeguard against syphilis. If this examination shows a positive result, the mother is treated free of charge.

The Jugendamt successfully endeavors to ascertain all births in Vienna. For this purpose in all municipal institutions for confinement and also in all clinics there are municipal social workers, who call on the mother and child directly after the birth and procure for them what they need. Owing to the fact that nearly two-fifths of all legitimate and illegitimate children are born in the institutions mentioned, it is possible to obtain fairly accurate and comprehensive statistics of birth. Moreover, the Jugendamt is also informed of other cases, for the midwives as well as the local authorities are obliged to report births. Regardless of their financial condition, all mothers of newly born babies can, upon demand, receive baby linen free of charge, providing these mothers are natives and citizens of Vienna. Application for such aid may be made until the eighth month of pregnancy to the Jugendamt of the district in which the woman lives. And it is carefully pointed out that this help is not to be considered as alms, but as a gift which the city thinks it is its duty to give.

Besides its head office the Jugendamt has fourteen district offices and each of these has attached to it one advisory office for mothers, managed by physicians and kept open several days each week. The district Jugendämter are also the headquarters for the "General Guardianship," organized for the protection of all illegitimate children. Individual guardianship, that is, appointment of individuals as guardians for illegitimate children, had not in the past proved a great success. The guardians were often not in a position to safeguard satisfactorily the rights of their wards. The Guardianship was organized to meet the problem. Among other services it gives advice on all questions concerning education, and for its purposes it employs the services of physicians, psychologists, and teachers. It maintains close contact with the school through municipal social workers, whose duty it is also to call upon any family in their district likely to need help. Thus the school, the Jugendamt, and the physicians cooperate.

Such cooperation has proved valuable also in organizing the provision of meals for schoolchildren, which was undertaken during the war as a measure of public emergency and was greatly extended after the war through the help of the American relief organizations. Today we have a comprehensive municipal institution for the boarding of pupils, which offers a regular luncheon to all children who seem to be in need of it. The preparation and distribution of food is carried on by the Public Food-Distributing Company of Vienna, which was founded by the government and the city of Vienna in 1919. The children are first examined by a physician and then sent to one of the food depots, which in all cases are located in schools. The price of the luncheon is set at sixty groschen, but payment in most cases is waived.

The health of children is being fostered by several other institutions. In many city districts excellently equipped school dental clinics have been established and these report an ever-increasing attendance by the pupils. There are also numerous institutions for recreation, including many vacation homes in the country and day homes located on the outskirts of Vienna. These institutions are open not only to schoolchildren, but also to thousands of apprentices. At the same time the number of municipal playgrounds is increasing.

Another field of activity of the Jugendamt is the organization of kindergartens and children's homes. These institutions in many cases are considered to be models of their kind and are attended by many thousands of children. It is interesting to note that most of the kindergartens do not close at noon but keep the children during the whole day. In all of them children may receive breakfast and in those which are open the whole day they may receive luncheon as well.

The Horte, or homes for schoolchildren, offer adequate occupation to the children outside school hours and for the whole day during vacation. These homes look out for both the psychical and the physical education of the children. They provide lessons in gymnastics and swimming and excursions into the country. The development of these homes and of the kindergartens is of great importance in view of the living conditions of the modern family in a big city or industrial center, where the work of the father must be performed in a place separated from his home and where, often, the mother also must work outside the home in order to help earn the living.

Day homes, kindergartens, and similar institutions lead naturally to another kind, namely, institutions for temporary care of children, and others for more or less permanent care. The most important institution for the temporary care of children in Vienna is the municipal Kinderübernahmestelle. All the children who are to be taken in by municipal or private homes for pay have to pass through this institution and be registered and examined as to their special needs. It has several departments—one for babies, one for children from one to two years who are unable to walk, one for small children, and one for girls and boys of school age; there is also an infirmary. Each department is equipped with a tea-kitchen, laundry, and bathroom. In the event of a contagious disease it is possible to isolate each department immediately. After three weeks' observation, final decision is made as to where the child shall be sent. There are three possibilities. The child may be sent back to its own family, brought up in a foster family, or sent to an institution.

The Kinderübernahmestelle functions also as first-aid station. It receives children who may be found in the street, at home, or elsewhere in a helpless condition. Not only district social workers, but also the supervising officers for the poor, the police, the poorhouse, the hospitals, and similar institutions apply to the Kinderübernahmestelle in the case of necessity. A second institution for the temporary lodging of children, the observation center on the Wilhelminenberg, carries on more thorough researches into educational conditions of schoolchildren.

For the permanent lodging of children there is the large Zentralkinderheim, or central children's home, which cares for babies and, if necessary, their mothers. Children up to six years old are cared for. The city of Vienna owns also a number of orphan asylums and two homes for girls and boys who have had to be taken away from their homes but who show no great deficiency in education. The children in these homes attend the public schools. Special mention must be made of the great institution at Eggenburg to which children and youths showing great deficiencies in education are sent. Here are a school and a continuation school, where the children are prepared for trades by selected teachers and craftsmen. Finally there are apprentice homes in which orphans are lodged and fed while they follow their trades outside during the day.

Social work for adults in Vienna is conducted by institutions situated in various districts of the city and manned by Viennese citizens chosen for the purpose, who hold honorary office. Thousands of men and women are engaged in this work. The problems they have to solve are mostly

TUESDAY EVE., Feb. 3d, [illegible] 8:30
FLOYD DELL
Author of "Love in the Machine Age" etc. will speak [illegible]
"LITERATURE AND LIFE"
at the
WEST SIDE FORUM
West Side Meeting House
550 West 110th Street
(S. E. Corner Broadway)
New York

WED. EVE., Feb. 4th, [illegible] 8:30
ROGER BALDWIN
will speak on
"LIBERTY AND THE CLASS STRUGGLE"
ERNEST SOUTHERLAND BATES
will speak on
"THIS LAND OF LIBERTY"
at the
PROGRESSIVE OPEN FORUM
Schiff Center
2510 Valentine Avenue
(Fordham Road Station)
Bronx, N. Y.

Subscription 50c — Members [illegible]

Office: Affiliated Forums, 32 Union Square, N. Y. C.
Tel. STuyvesant 9-8072 Weekly notices mailed on request

LEAGUE FOR INDEPENDENT POLITICAL ACTION
Dinner and Discussion
HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH, AT 6:30 P. M.
THE LEAGUE AND AMERICAN POLITICAL LIFE
John Dewey
THE NEED FOR A NEW PARTY
[illegible] symposium
Bruce Bliven
Editor, The New Republic
Mauritz Hallgren
Associate Editor, The Nation
Reinhold Niebuhr
Editor, The World Tomorrow
Chairman, Henry Neumann
Leader, Brooklyn Ethical Culture Society
$1.25 per plate. Make reservations [illegible] at L. I. P. A. office
Room 401, 52 VANDERBILT AVENUE

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1931, AT 12:45
Social Planning or Industrial Chaos?
H. N. BRAILSFORD
Noted British writer and economist
COLSTON E. WARNE
Professor of Economics at Amherst College
H. D. PERSON
Managing Director of the Taylor Society;
Editor and author of Scientific Management in American Industry
Chairman, MCALISTER COLEMAN
Tickets $1.25 Non-Members $1.50
Undergraduate Students 75c
Make Reservations at the office of the L. I. D., 112 E. 19 St.

ATHEIST ANNUAL DINNER
Pythian Temple, 135 W. 70th St., New York
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 7 P. M.
SYMPOSIUM: "How Can We Best Advance Atheism?"
Which Attack on Religion Is the Most Effective?"
SPEAKERS: Dr. Paul Glaser, George Bedborough, George Macdonald, Woolsey Teller and Charles Smith. Open to the public.
For reservations, $2 per cover, and copy of program of meetings of the First National Atheist Convention, write or apply:
American Association for the Advancement of Atheism
307 E. 14th St., New York City Phone: Tompkins Sq. 6-7675

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

PLAYS TO SEE

*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Petticoat Influence—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
‡The New Yorkers—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

---

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

Sous les Toits de Paris—(French)—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Paris Bound, beginning Sat., Jan. 31, The Best People, beginning Wed., Feb. 4—The Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.
Vi Tva, (Lady Lies)—(Swedish)—5 Ave. Playhouse, 66 Fifth Ave.
Gretel Und Liesel (Kohlhiesel's Tochters)—8 St. Playhouse—52 W. 8 St.

MUSIC

Mary Wigman, dancer—Carnegie Hall—Sat. eve., Jan. 31.
League of Composers—Second concert of Modern Chamber Music—The Art Center—Sun. aft., Feb. 1
Yehudi Menuhin—Carnegie Hall—Mon. eve., Feb. 9.
Rachmaninoff, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Sat. aft., Feb. 14.
Myra Hess, pianist—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Feb. 15.

INDIA TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES

Edited by HARIDAS T. MUZUMDAR, M.A., Ph.D.
Gandhi's Companion on the March to the Sea.
Author of "Gandhi the Apostle," etc.

No. 1. INDIA'S NON-VIOLENT REVOLUTION
No. 2. PESHAWAR: THE EPIC STORY OF MEN VERSUS MACHINE GUNS
No. 3. THE BREAKDOWN OF PEACE NEGOTIATIONS
No. 4. THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE
No. 5. THE UNITED STATES OF INDIA

INDIA'S NON-VIOLENT REVOLUTION, by Dr. Muzumdar, just off the press, is destined to be an epoch-making volume. It portrays the personality of Mahatma Gandhi and graphically describes India's "Battle for Freedom." 25 cents per copy; 5 copies for one dollar.

A copy of India's Declaration of Independence will be sent free to all subscribers.

To make sure of your full set of the five volumes promptly send in a dollar to

INDIA TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES
20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

of a humanitarian nature. Financial assistance is given to adults who need help, sometimes in a lump sum and sometimes in instalments. Care must be taken also of those people who have no sick insurance, of drunkards, of consumptives, and of the victims of venereal diseases and mental disorders. Care of the sick is carried on partly through hospitals, partly through clinics, and partly through consultations. There is an advisory office for people intending to marry.

It can be truly said that social work in Vienna takes care of people in need from the cradle to the grave. All branches of welfare work are united in a huge municipal organization, the Welfare Office, and controlled by it. The Welfare Office is under the control of a single man, the town councilor in charge of it. This councilor is elected by the people and responsible to them.

The fundamental idea of the social-welfare work done by the city of Vienna is the moral conception of the dignity of man. The municipality is of the opinion that help granted to a man who needs it should never be regarded as an act of charity but rather as a duty, and that the man has a legal right to such help. But the municipality also is of the opinion that it is the duty of everyone who is in need to help himself. The community must help only in so far as the needy man cannot help himself. So it follows that the fundamental purpose of welfare work should be to make it possible for the needy man to help himself.

An ideal place for winter vacations. ¶WESTERN VIEW FARM, New Milford, Conn., 83 miles from Columbus Circle, elevation 1000 feet. ¶Hospitality that is unique. It brings back friends year after year. Eleventh season. ¶Riding, mountain climbing, winter sports, or rest and quiet if you want it. ¶Interesting people. ¶Rates $8 a day, $49 a week. Telephone New Milford 440.

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Sample free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland.

Classified Advertising Rates

Minimum 30 words $3.08

Each additional 6 words, 62 cents

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street
New York

FitzRoy [illegible] - 9074

Note: See that your classified ads reach us by Friday, together with remittance, to insure their appearance the following week.

"The Best Account of the Bolshevist Regime."—New York Times

SOVIET RUSSIA
By WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Steadily gaining in popularity — recognized everywhere as the best book on its much-discussed subject:

Published April 4, 1930
Second printing, April 14th
Third printing, June 7th
Fourth printing, June 25th
Fifth printing, September 15th
Sixth printing, October 24th
Seventh printing, November 24th
Eighth printing, January 17th, 1931

12th thousand. $5.00 everywhere

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.
Publishers, Boston

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1931 No. 3423

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 141

EDITORIALS:

Anarchy and the Red Cross 144
The British Labor Puzzle 145
On the Air 146
Higher Learning 146
THE BANKS OF NEW YORK. By Norman Thomas 147
FOOD AND DRINK IN WASHINGTON. By Paul Y. Anderson.......... 150
HUNGER—1931. By A. Robbins 151
WHOSE AGENT IS HE? By Isabel Paterson 153
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 154
CORRESPONDENCE 154

BOOKS, ART, MUSIC, DRAMA:

We Part the Husks. By Hal Saunders White 156
Thomas Mann's Obsession. By Clifton P. Fadiman 156
The Martyrdom of Mr. Justice Brandeis. By William Seagle 156
Selma Lagerlöf's Trilogy. By Eda Lou Walton 157
The Difficulties of Democracy. By William MacDonald 158
A German Caricaturist. By Walter Kien 158
Books in Brief 159
Art: Bread Lines and a Museum. By Paul Rosenfeld 160
Music: Toscanini. By Arthur Mendel 163
Drama: Oklahoma and the Riviera. By Mark Van Doren 164

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Prince Max and the Peace Treaty 166
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 166

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

SOVIET PLANS for largely increased employment of foreign technical experts are announced. Of particular interest, Charles A. Gill, superintendent of motive power for the Eastern lines of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and a supervising force of 150 other Americans are to put American railroad methods into effect on the Russian roads, with their 60,000 miles of line and 1,040,000 workers. The demands of the swiftly advancing Five-Year Plan, as is well known, have swamped Russia's transportation system during the past year, and it is stated that Mr. Gill and his associates will have at their disposal a budget of $1,700,000,000 for use during 1931 in the effort to meet the situation. It is a tremendous undertaking, and the decision to use American methods and technicians is one of great possible advantage to American industry, if we have sense enough to realize it. The employment of our engineers and other technical experts in the great Russian experiment is useful to both sides. Especially it will help us to a little better understanding of what is going on in the industrial development of the huge Communist state.

SUCH UNDERSTANDING is needed badly enough, heaven knows, with a new crop of Helsingfors rumors on Russian "convict labor" filling the front pages, and with fresh proposals for barring Russian goods being urged at Washington. We wish, therefore, that all Americans might read and ponder the words of Valery I. Meshlauk, acting chairman of the Supreme Economic Council, at a recent luncheon of the American-Russian Chamber of Commerce at the Bankers Club in New York. Mr. Meshlauk scouted the current idea of Russia being a trade menace:

> We want to increase the well-being of our people, not to compete with the world. Our domestic market is, under these conditions, constantly growing. . . . It is my belief that matters of ruinous international competition in wheat and other products could be solved by means of international agreements, in which the Soviet Union would willingly join. The U. S. S. R., by virtue of its vast natural resources, is in a position to produce most efficiently a number of materials which the rest of the world requires. And we are going to import from the United States for many years goods the production of which will not be developed in Russia for a long time to come. We are not going to destroy world markets. It is not to our interest to do so, for we want to import from and export to the rest of the world.

This horse sense is refreshing after the hysterics of our Oddies and Matthew Wolls and Hamilton Fishes and other industrial sob sisters. We have no taste for communism, and we see no evidence that Americans are inclined to that economic and political dogma. If the leaders of the United States, however, are unequal to the task of devising and working out a planned and ordered economic life, then their capitalistic order, we believe, will go crashing down to destruction. Any adequate plan must be world-wide in scope; it must therefore include in its scheme of cooperation the great Russian state.

THE DECISION OF JUSTICE ADKINS of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the Clarion River power case sustains the right of the Federal Power Commission to determine immediately, and not after fifty years as contended by the company, the cost of projects under the commission's jurisdiction and subject to recapture at the expiration of the fifty-year license period. The opinion is such self-evident common sense that it is hard to see how any other contention could be seriously put forward, but the power companies stop at nothing in their efforts to keep themselves and their rates free of any effective public control. In this case the company claimed capital expenditures of $11,132,000 (all of which, of course, will figure in the rate base). Chief Accountant King questioned no less than $6,386,000 of this amount, calling on the company to show that the items in question had been "actually and legitimately expended." Small wonder that the companies would like to get rid of Mr. King, and would like to have their accounting deferred half a century till we are all dead. Attempted regulation is one continuous struggle against the greed of the power companies. Meanwhile the House refuses any appropriation to build transmission lines for Muscle Shoals power. Is that power also to be turned over to the private companies for exploitation?

IT HAS BECOME THE FASHION to sneer at Congress and its works. Most of this Pecksniffian contempt has been aimed at the Senate and its many investigations. The other day Senator Moses of New Hampshire found it necessary to spread across twenty pages of the Congressional Record the detailed expense account of the Nye committee which has been looking into campaign expenditures. Chairman Nye declared he was "glad to have the report in the Record," although he objected "to the motive that places it there." This motive, as he saw it, was to give his political enemies a chance to show "how lavishly Nye lives when he is out on government expense." Whatever the motive, Senator Moses provided the critics of the Senate with another opportunity to sneer. As has become customary, the New York Times, from its high moral perch, led the chorus. Commenting on the fact that the committee had in nine months spent $96,503.12, the Times remarked: "That is a modest sum in view of the invaluable discoveries of Mr. Nye's investigators. We don't know what they expected to discover in some of the States which they visited as observers, but it is pleasant to know that they traveled freely, were well fed, and stayed at good hotels. Nothing is too good for Senators or their emissaries and collectors of information or surmise." Perhaps the Times meant it all in good fun. Certainly it did not intend to imply by its thin sarcasm that it would have been better to have saved this relatively small sum in order to have kept the lid tightly screwed down on such political scandals as the Grocer Boy Norris affair in Nebraska and the recent $1,200,000 election in Pennsylvania. Or do the critics really want these scandals and other violations of the Corrupt Practices Act suppressed?

GENERAL SMEDLEY BUTLER'S TONGUE at last has got him into serious trouble. It has often wagged indiscreetly. When the General, something over a year ago, in his jocular way told how the marines ran Nicaraguan elections in his day so that the right candidates were chosen, his remarks were "explained" to the satisfaction of the Navy Department, but when in a public address in Philadelphia on January 18 he charged Premier Mussolini with being a hit-and-run driver, that was a different matter, and a court martial has been ordered. An officer in active service, of course, bears a peculiar responsibility for public utterances, and the formal protest of the Italian Ambassador was both natural and proper. The Secretary of State, too, was perfectly correct in his apology for the "discourteous and unwarranted utterances by a commissioned officer of this government on active duty." The incident is disagreeable in every respect. Most fair-minded citizens will wish that if General Butler was to be reproved or punished for his public utterances it might have been done on some previous occasion rather than when he was repeating wild tales about the truculent head of the Fascist Government.

ON NOVEMBER 21, 1929, the White House announced that the big business men of the country had agreed "that they will not initiate any movement for wage reduction." That this agreement was not faithfully followed by big business we have only too much reason to suspect. There is, for example, the case of the Bethlehem Steel Company, which a few days ago asserted that "we have maintained our pay-roll force," but this was done only "through part-time operations." In other words, the wage scale was probably maintained, but Bethlehem Steel confesses that it has in fact reduced wages. And this confession came just a day after it was announced that the company's net earnings in 1930 totaled $42,242,980 as against $23,843,406 in 1929. Nevertheless, the prosperity howlers continue to pour out their false promises. Under date of January 3, Paul Block, the newspaper publisher, asked the managers of his various papers, among them the Milwaukee Sentinel-News, to "please notify every regular employee of the Sentinel-News that all their jobs are secure for 1931. We believe the business depression would be ended sooner if all employers acted in similar manner." Yet within a fortnight the editor of the Milwaukee Leader was able to publish evidence that a number of regular employees of the Block newspaper had been thrown out of work despite the January 3 instructions. In plain-spoken language the editor of the Leader asked Mr. Block how he justified this action in face of his dazzling promise to keep all his employees at work. Mr. Block replied that "of course, in assuring people that their positions were secure we did not mean that we will not replace incompetent help with competent help, and that general practices of good business administration will not be followed out." As the Leader editor pointed out, " 'good business administration' covers a multitude of sins."

GOVERNOR PINCHOT has announced his plan for getting rid of the coal and iron police, that unique private army of 1,100 men commissioned by the State of Pennsylvania but paid by private companies and responsible to them. When the commissions of the present force expire on June 30 next, the Governor would replace them "with officers selected and commanded by the Commonwealth and paid by it at company expense." It is not clear to us that the proposed changes will wipe out the long-standing abuses which have culminated in such incidents as the Barcoski killing of 1929. The Pennsylvania Civil Liberties Committee, affiliated with the American Civil Liberties Union, is opposing the Governor's plan and urging instead its own measure for outright abolition of the coal and iron police. The preservation of order and the protection of property are functions of the State, to be performed by its officers and not farmed out to private hirelings. Pennsylvania has a black record in the use of such hirelings with State sanction. It is full time to abolish them and to demand that Pennsylvania, like every other civilized community, do its full duty in respect to police protection.

TWO LYNCHINGS have occurred so far this year. One took place on January 28 in Shafer, North Dakota, when a mob took from the county jail the confessed murderer (white) of six persons, man and wife and their four children, and hanged him from a nearby bridge. The other ran more true to form. A Negro in Maryville, Missouri, had by his own admission assaulted and murdered a young white school teacher; although the National Guard was present and awaiting a call from the sheriff in case of attempted violence to the prisoner, no call was issued, the Negro was mobbed, chained to the roof of the schoolhouse, and the building burned about him. In both lynchings the victims were in jail, they had confessed to atrocious crimes, there was no doubt that they would be speedily punished to the full extent of the law. Yet the white man and the Negro, in the North and in the South, were left to the mercy of a murderous mob because local officials were not willing to do their sworn duty and protect their prisoners by force if necessary. Sheriff England of Maryville declared he did not call out the guard because he was afraid somebody might get hurt; Sheriff Thompson of Schafer said the whole affair was most discouraging. The Missouri House of Representatives refused to entertain a resolution condemning the county officials for not resisting the mob. By contrast, Governor Shafer of North Dakota calls the lynching in his State a "shameful act which destroys the good reputation of the State for law and order." It remains to be seen whether any citizen of North Dakota will be punished for it. In both cases lynch law is tolerated because local officials, backed up by local public opinion, tolerate it.

THE DANVILLE TEXTILE STRIKE was formally ended by the United Textile Workers on January 29, after a gallant four-months' struggle carried on by the strikers with extraordinary self-restraint in the face of overwhelming difficulties. The contest was waged primarily over the right of organization, and in calling off the strike union leaders asserted that the mill management had, in fact, conceded the principle by taking old employees back without raising the question of union membership. On the basis of an alleged agreement between representatives of the strikers and the brother-in-law of H. R. Fitzgerald, president of the mills, union members were assured by their leaders that they would be reinstated without discrimination. Mr. Fitzgerald, however, asserts flatly that the management has not entered into an agreement "of any nature, directly or indirectly, with any organization, individuals, or group of individuals," and that it is under no obligation to take back the strikers. This assertion of Mr. Fitzgerald's purpose to run his mills as he pleases is a flat denial of the implied claim of the union that some sort of concession has been secured from the management, and the organization, faced with a lost strike, is ready with charges of bad faith.

GANDHI and the working committee of the Congress Party, meeting in Allahabad, have decreed that the party will negotiate with the government only on four conditions: first, the granting of amnesty to all political prisoners; second, the withdrawal of all repressive measures; third, permission to continue "peaceful picketing" of foreign cloth, drink, and drug shops; and, fourth, permission to make salt during the period of the peace negotiations. In England Gandhi's refusal to modify demands which he has consistently said he would never modify has infuriated even so judicious a journal as the Manchester Guardian to the point of linking Gandhi, "the saintly politician," with Winston Churchill, "the mountebank," as the two "saviors" of India. Neither of them, in its estimation, will be of much help to the Round Table delegates in their attempt to persuade India to take a middle course and accept what England offers. The dictum of the Guardian may be irrelevant to realities in India, where Gandhi, for better or for worse, wields tremendous power and cannot be dismissed as lightly as a Churchill at home. As an indication of the possible future trend of public opinion in England and therefore government policy in India, where a new viceroy will shortly take charge, the Guardian's remarks are at least interesting. Meanwhile the "mountebank" has provided the "saintly politician" with fuel for his holy fire. In a recent attack on the Round Table results, Mr. Churchill said:

> It is this scheme which we are told that the Conservative Party will have to implement when it returns to office. Of course, we are sure there are all kinds of safeguards. What is given in word is taken back in fact; what is given with one hand is taken back with the other.

MRS. MARGARET SANGER, chairman of the Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control, announces that a bill has been introduced in the Senate and will, on February 13, come up for hearing before the Judiciary Committee permitting doctors to give contraceptive information to their patients at their discretion, to publish such information in medical journals, and to send and receive it through the mails. The ban on contraceptive devices is also, by the proposed bill, to be lifted if their distribution is under the control of physicians or properly licensed medical clinics. It is, of course, an interesting comment on American culture that such a bill need be introduced at this time, and that considerable opposition to it is anticipated. Yet it is obviously a long step forward from our present position, and it should be gratefully welcomed and generously championed by intelligent Americans. There is, of course, nothing in the bill that would make the giving or receiving of contraceptive information obligatory under the law. It is hard to see, therefore, just where ground for opposition to it might lie. Sincere professing Catholics, who will furnish most of the opposition, need have nothing to do with it. For the rest of the country it will afford relief for a state of affairs in which unjust discrimination is exercised against the ignorant and the poor, who are most in need of information.

WHEN SCHOOLS BURN DOWN, children ordinarily throw their hats into the air and shout for the vacation caused by the catastrophe. An instance of an exactly opposite reaction has just come to our attention. The Hessian Hills School, a progressive school in Croton-on-Hudson, New York, burned to the ground the other night, and within twenty-four hours nearly every child in the school had offered to help rebuild it. One offered pennies; many pledged allowances; one club of pupils offered to double the dues paid by every member so that the school might have "between $8 and $9 a month for the place where we will study next year." Another class voted to be "self-supporting" and buy paper, pencils, and a blackboard out of money in its possession. Here was the reaction of a new generation to a new type of education. No less exceptional, in view of the uninspiring character of much public and formal education, was the spontaneity with which the teachers seized upon the catastrophe for educational purposes. When some youngsters scratched down on paper plans for the new school, they were made the basis for lessons in arithmetic, geometry, mechanical drawing, and discussions on architecture. "What are schools for?" was one question asked. "How should the rooms, shops, auditorium, and so on, be located with respect to each other? What are the building problems of a school?" Maybe the new Hessian Hills School—if sufficient funds can be raised in a dark year to build one—will reveal some of the ideas worked out by the folks interested, the very children who will use it!

Anarchy and the Red Cross

SHALL we have the anarchy Mr. Hoover and the Red Cross so clearly desire, or shall we have some sensible and responsible measure of social control in administering relief to the more unfortunate members of our society? Shall the government honestly and fully aid and protect the society which it was created to serve, or shall the state leave this, one of its more important duties, to Mr. Hoover's haphazard and irresponsible "American tradition" and "spirit of voluntary aid"? This is the real core of the battle between the Red Cross and the Senate. There is no fleeting political significance in the struggle, and no question of undue Congressional interference or domination is involved; the issue goes straight to the heart of the meaning of government.

Either the organized state has certain duties and responsibilities to its individual members or it has not. If we agree that it has, then government is not only within its rights, but is morally and legally obligated to extend protection and relief to those of the individual members of the state who are suffering or in distress because of the faulty functioning or the unavoidable misfortunes of society as a whole. A laboring man loses his job; he is willing to work; but because of economic circumstances beyond his control there is no work for him to do. Must he choose, then, between starvation and the occasional and illogical charity of private persons? Does the state, to whose rules and limitations he has submitted by keeping the peace, by paying taxes, and by offering his body in time of war, owe him nothing whatever when he falls upon evil times? Similarly, the hungry farmer suffering as a result of the drought is a member of society and has abided by its rules. Must he, too, be left to shift for himself? If we admit that the state has no duties, if we admit that society exists to serve government instead of government having been created to serve society, then it cannot be denied that Mr. Hoover and the Red Cross are right, for in that case we shall be admitting that government is not the creature of society, but has been superimposed upon it from above.

This sharp cleavage between government and the people, which in practice does actually exist even in this land of theoretical democracy, can serve but one end, and it is doing so in very effective fashion. It is serving the relatively few individuals and interests who own and control the government. They are the persons and groups who benefit by government through high tariff rates, government-protected monopoly rights, government subsidies. They get what they want out of government; when, however, government help might be of benefit to society as a whole, as would certainly be the case today in the matter of relieving the jobless and feeding the hungry, contemplated assistance from the organized state is roundly damned as un-American, unpatriotic, even socialistic.

But why is it that this heated denunciation should come just from the very individuals and groups who so greatly benefit by government? Why should the Boston bankers denounce Congressional relief as a "soul-destroying dole"? Why should the ultra-conservatives like Mr. Hoover condemn the Senate plan as being in conflict with "the American way of meeting such a relief problem"? Why should the copper magnate, the multimillionaire steel man, the banker's widow, and the other eight representatives of the conservative ruling class, members of the Red Cross central committee, vote unanimously to refuse the Senate's proffered $25,000,000? The answer is all too obvious. If the people learn that the government can help them in times of distress, if the people learn that the government is really their servant, the people may decide to use the government for their own purposes at other times as well. They might even go to the seemingly improbable length of taking the government away from the party owners and managers who now control it. And thus would the plutocracy under whose rule we have been living be brought to an abrupt but conclusive end. This is the essence of the whole struggle between the Senate on the one side and Mr. Hoover and his Red Cross on the other. The question is not one of whether relief shall be extended by Congressional or private charity; the question is whether government belongs to the people or to a few private individuals.

We find the Senate upholding social responsibility and social control. Society at the moment is confronted with a grave problem. Shall society be permitted to guide and control the solution of this problem through its own organized agency, the government? Or shall the solution be left to private agencies over which society exercises no effective, organized control? The Senate has elected the former course. Opposed to this we find Mr. Hoover and the Red Cross sponsoring anarchy as a substitute for social control. They want the government to abstain from ministering to the needs of society in the present emergency, preferring rather to keep this task in the hands of private charitable organizations. They are in effect estopping the government from exercising one of the fundamental duties of the organized state, so that in this province, with government absent, anarchy rules.

It has been argued that governmental relief, to use Mr. Hoover's own words, would mean "playing politics at the expense of human misery." Although we confess that under our present party system this is possible, we cannot grant that the kind of politics Congress might play would be any more "soul-destroying" or any more misleading and deceitful than the type of politics the White House and the Red Cross have been playing. The President tried as long as he could to minimize the extent and the consequences of unemployment. His apologists in Congress denied that there was widespread suffering in the drought areas. Judge John Barton Payne went before a Senate committee with the same tale, declaring that the Red Cross was amply equipped to handle the situation. Yet the force of undeniable truth, coupled with the heroic efforts of a few Senators, ultimately prevailed and a call for a $10,000,000 relief fund was issued. In the end Mr. Hoover and Judge Payne were compelled to admit, though even then only by implication, that while hunger and hardship were spreading they were deliberately blocking all but the most essential attempts at relief. If this cannot be called "playing politics at the expense of human misery," we do not know the meaning of that phrase; and as we have already seen, this Hoover-Payne kind of politics serves the purpose of keeping the capitalist class securely in control of the government.

The British Labor Puzzle

THE British public, it is reported, is much at sea regarding the probable future of the MacDonald Government. There may well be confusion and apprehension, for the recent alternation of successes and rebuffs is rather bewildering. When Parliament reconvened on January 20, confident predictions were heard that Stanley Baldwin's New Year's wish for a speedy downfall of the Labor Government would be realized in about three weeks, in which case there would probably be a new election, but the hope was dashed on the opening day by Mr. Baldwin's bland remark that "there is no prospect of a general election now." Within twenty-four hours the combined opposition, in an exceptionally large attendance of the Commons, rolled up a majority of thirty-three against the Government on an amendment to the education bill, but Mr. MacDonald declined to see in the amendment any question of principle—the amendment postponed the operation of the bill until satisfactory grants for the support of sectarian schools were assured—and business as usual was resumed.

On January 26, five days after this rebuff in the House, Mr. Baldwin for the Conservatives and Sir John Simon for the Liberals lauded the work of the India Round Table Conference, Mr. Baldwin going so far as to pledge the Conservatives to the enactment of a law giving India a constitution in case his party should return to power. The only important dissent was voiced by Winston Churchill, who presently followed his attack by resigning from the Conservative "shadow Cabinet," thereby setting the tongues wagging over the possibility of a Conservative split. Before many hours had passed Sir John Simon was launching a broadside attack on the trades-disputes bill, only to see the bill pass on second reading by a vote of 277 to 250, and then sent to committee of the whole by a comfortable and comforting government majority of sixty-seven.

With the India program meeting the approval of a heavy majority of members of the two other parties, and with the trades-disputes bill speeded on its way, political prophecy affects to see Mr. MacDonald's position secure until April, when the budget will be submitted. The outlook for plain sailing, however, is anything but clear. Mr. MacDonald is still, as he has been all along, dependent upon the active support or benevolent neutrality of the Liberal minority. In the division on the trades-disputes bill, on January 28, all but nine of the Liberals present abstained from voting, while eight of the nine voted against the bill and one stood with the Government. Lloyd George's tactics are obvious. He is not going to help the Labor Government reinstate strike privileges, nor contribute to any prestige that may follow the passage of an education bill raising from fourteen years to fifteen the age at which British children may leave school. The only part of the Labor program that offers him any advantage is the electoral-reform bill, a measure providing for a form of proportional representation under which, it is believed, the Liberal representation in the Commons would be materially increased. As long as there is a chance of gaining that advantage, the Liberals are not likely to join the Conservatives in throwing Labor overboard.

Mr. MacDonald, accordingly, must steer his course with an eye on the Liberals. Between Conservatives and Labor there is, of course, an impassable gulf. Within the Labor Party, however, there is dissension. The Independent Labor following, perennially rebellious, grows increasingly restive over the slow approach of socialism, and Sir Oswald Mosley and his supporters would like to experiment with a super-Cabinet whose powers would be essentially those of a dictatorship. For this latter solution of the nation's difficulties, if the conclusions of C. E. M. Joad in a remarkable article in a recent issue of the Political Quarterly are to be accepted, there is significant favor among the younger British voters.

Mr. MacDonald probably feels the usual pride of high office, and accordingly seems disposed to ape other politicians in fighting to the last ditch to keep his place and refusing to resign as long as there is any chance of holding on. He may be expected to capitalize for political purposes the work of the Round Table Conference, especially now that his enemies have bestowed benedictions upon it, and to insist that the London Naval Conference achieved important results. The addition of a year to the period of required school attendance has already been pointed to as a relief of unemployment notwithstanding the added burden to the Treasury, and proportional representation can be defended as better than the present system. The failure of the Imperial Conference is embarrassing, but Mr. MacDonald is enough of a free-trader to make it appear that he preferred to let the conference fail rather than sacrifice an economic policy which the Liberals, as it happens, also approve. Even the wrath of the Labor dissenters can be made to praise him, for the radicals of the North may usually be counted upon to be raucous in urging their dissent.

The difficulties of the Labor Government are much the same as those which beset most governments at the present time—an inability to find sensible remedies for economic distresses which are not merely national but worldwide, and hesitation or compromise in crucial domestic matters. The vast unemployment in Great Britain is not to be laid at Labor's door, but the dole at best is only a palliative and its crushing financial burden points toward disaster. A great strike of cotton weavers and coal miners is nothing that a Labor Government could have desired, but the "rationalization" of industry which the Government would like to bring about means the closing of unprofitable mines, more labor-saving machinery in factories, and more goods at lower cost for world markets already overstocked. It is hard to see in the past eighteen months or so of British Labor policy any wisdom in meeting the economic crisis that merits greater praise than can be given to governments that do not bear the Labor name. Until the problem is approached with more fundamental intelligence and courage than Mr. MacDonald has shown, there seems little reason to think that his Government may not continue indefinitely from mere lack of a better. There is equally little reason to think that it may not be turned out at any time.

On the Air

THE National Broadcasting Company in 1930 took in $22,000,000, an increase of more than 50 per cent over its 1929 takings. The 2,000,000 letters that poured in were nearly six times as many as those received four years earlier. The company had 263 "clients" (advertising sponsors), 54 more than in 1929. The President spoke over the network twenty-seven times last year, more than twice as often as in 1929, and in addition 328 government officials made 850 addresses. So the figures run. It is all very gratifying. Best of all, the whole thing has happened since the war and is still growing.

To be sure, there are those who complain. They point out that the radio opened a new world of amusement, education, and cultural possibilities, and that in the absence of any effective control the profit-makers promptly preempted the whole territory, just as they had preempted land and forests and mines and oil and water power before. Having appropriated the air, they promptly sold it to the advertisers. They sold time and more time for money and more money, till now the man who wants the coast-to-coast chain of both big systems pays $20,000 an hour for it. This is the heart of the matter. The 263 program sponsors pay the National Company's bills and give it its profits. Despite the company's use of unsponsored time, therefore, the needs of advertisers inevitably limit the policies of this and every other commercially successful American broadcasting concern. The American listener must hear chiefly what makes for advertisers' profits, and must stiffen his sales resistance against tooth paste, soap, and shaving cream, cigarettes and department stores and hardware and radiators. We permitted the creation of a great private vested interest in the air, which was sold to advertisers, thus binding the companies hand and foot. And all this seems more or less inevitable to us.

But there is nothing inevitable either in what we have done or in the kind of programs from which American radio audiences suffer. In an admirable article on this subject in the January Atlantic Professor William Orton of Smith College calls attention by contrast to the work of the British Broadcasting Company, a public monopoly supported not by advertisers, but by a two-dollar annual license fee from owners of receiving instruments. Its programs not only provide entertainment for the mass of people, but also offer nourishment to the minority whom our system necessarily forgets.

> In England [says Mr. Orton] . . . I could obtain at least one full orchestra program every night, including whole evenings of Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, and modern work . . . I could listen to Eugene O'Neill's "Ile," to a first-class debate on the international-language question, to various lectures, including Dean Mozley on Christian theology and Mr. Francis Birrell on the cinema. . . .

But why go on? The point is simple. The British did not simply turn over the air to anyone who wanted it as a means of profit, but put it under social control for civilized purposes. Their scheme works. It deprives nobody of the ordinary radio features, but does not reduce the whole art to the mental "level of thirteen-year-olds," as our commercialized system inevitably does. On the air the honors certainly do not rest with our chaotic American system.

Higher Learning

IN refreshing contrast to the numerically large and financially impressive reports of certain university presidents to their trustees—and incidentally to the newspapers—comes the announcement of the Institute for Advanced Study under the donorship of Louis Bamberger and Mrs. Felix Fuld. The purpose of the institute, as described in a letter to the trustees, is "the pursuit of advanced learning and exploration in fields of pure science and high scholarship." No degree except the Ph.D. or professional degrees of equal value will be awarded, and it will be unique in the United States in being an institution

> . . . where scientists and scholars devote themselves at the same time to serious research and to the training of competent post-graduate students entirely independently of and separated from both the charms and the diversions inseparable from an institution the major interest of which is the teaching of undergraduates.

The donors have chosen Dr. Abraham Flexner as director of the institution, and both his professional standing and his recent sharp criticism of American universities will be assurance that the new organization will have a good chance of avoiding the pitfalls which threaten the modern "business" university. Dr. Flexner announces that there is no need for haste in beginning the work of the institute; that patience and wisdom in assembling a faculty are of far more importance than that classes begin with the new school year. Among faculty as among students no account is to be taken "directly or indirectly, of race, religion, or sex." Dr. Flexner is enough of a practical man of affairs to know that a desirable group cannot be assembled without assurance of adequate financial recompense.

> Poor salaries [he declares] frighten off the abler and more vigorous and compel the university instructor to eke out his inadequate income by writing unnecessary textbooks or engaging in other forms of hack work. . . . We should endeavor to attract into the institute a small number of scholars and scientists who will be free from financial worry and concern, who will live and work amidst conditions favorable to intellectual activity.

So much for the faculty. The students are to be chosen because of their announced desire to undertake serious and advanced study. "They will not," says Dr. Flexner, "in so far as we can judge and select, be immature or uncertain; nor will they in any department of intellectual activity be so numerous as to distract the members of the faculty from their own creative tasks."

This ideal, of course, lies directly across the aim of most American universities, in which so strong an emphasis is laid on number of students. The institute, moreover, lays all its stress on pure scholarship, abstract science, disinterested research. Nothing practical about it, nothing modern, nothing that even remotely suggests "good business." No president of this university will ever issue a report declaring his to be the largest institution in the country, nay, in the world. Probably no president will claim for it the largest endowment. If the generous promise of its founders and its director is realized, however, its influence on American culture may be immeasurable.

The Banks of New York

By NORMAN THOMAS

ON the morning of December 11, 1930, the New York Superintendent of Banks closed the doors of the Bank of United States. The bank had fifty-eight branches and upwards of 400,000 depositors. It served four boroughs of the City of Greater New York and had an unusually high proportion of poor folks as depositors. More than 50 per cent of the deposits were in thrift accounts. It has been publicly stated that 350,000 people have deposits in the bank averaging $400 or less. Obviously, the failure of such a bank in a winter of bitter unemployment was a social tragedy of great dimensions.

The newspapers, acting from the best of motives and at the urgent request of men high in the banking world, played down the story of the failure and, at first, played up optimistic prophecies of the reopening of the bank's doors through reorganization, merger, or sale to some other bank. Failing that, at least the ultimate payment to depositors of one hundred cents on the dollar was sure. But the banks of the Clearing House backed up no such rosy hopes by their deeds. The best they were able to offer was a loan up to 50 per cent of deposits, which loan was to draw 5 per cent interest. Since the Clearing House member banks were paying at most not more than 2 or 2½ per cent for this money, and since the demand for money just now is not great, it will be seen that this generosity was not only safe but profitable. Now, some seven weeks after the failure of the Bank of United States, no one is indulging in optimistic hopes of its reopening or of its paying depositors one hundred cents on the dollar. Superintendent Broderick's inventory of the bank's resources indicates the loss, impairment, or "freezing" of about $75,000,000, or nearly a third of its assets.

There has been no epidemic of failures of New York banks, and unquestionably the strong banks will henceforth go to great lengths to prop their weaker brethren in New York City. Nevertheless, lack of confidence following the failure of the Bank of United States has resulted in a pronounced withdrawal of deposits even from sound banks.

It is already possible to apportion blame for the fiasco of the Bank of United States to a great many individuals and groups, some of whom have no use for the others. It may simplify a tangled story to discuss it in terms of the responsibility, first, of the bank itself, second, of the State of New York, and, third, of other banks.

1. The Bank of United States and Its Directors.—It now appears that the bank was conceived in sin, born in iniquity, and nourished on unrighteousness. Thousands of depositors, especially those coming from other countries, thought that the bank was a government institution. The Superintendent of Banks, Van Tuyl by name, who permitted the bank to take this imposing and misleading title, shortly afterwards resigned to become an officer in it. In the boom times when the whole financial world went more or less mad, the Bank of United States grew not only through its own aggressive policy, but through various mergers with existing institutions, the stocks of which were bought or were replaced with the stock of the Bank of United States at extraordinary prices.

It now appears that these were not anything like the worst features of the situation. President Bernard K. Marcus, Mr. Saul Singer, and their particular buddies on the board of directors of the bank went into the popular game of organizing affiliates in a big way. When the crash came, the Bank of United States had sixty affiliates. Some of them were formed for specific purposes—for example, to negotiate a single real-estate transaction. Occasionally these real-estate corporations leased their property to the bank for branch buildings at exorbitant rentals, which were capitalized in the value of the property for the purpose of getting mortgages and loans on it. So many were the bank's affiliates that the officers ran out of handy names and were thinking of calling on the man who names the Pullman cars, until one of them, who had been in France, thought of the bright idea of using the names of streets in Paris.

Of these affiliates four were of fundamental importance in the complicated business of buying and selling and rigging stocks in which Mr. Marcus and his colleagues indulged. All four are now in bankruptcy, with the bank as a chief creditor and amazingly few liquid assets in sight. Of the four the basic ones were the City Financial Corporation and the Bankus Corporation. I have not space to tell of the complicated and ingenious relationship between these two corporations and the bank. The whole story has been well told by John T. Flynn in the New Republic. Suffice to say that after Mr. Marcus had got through playing with his companies, the City Financial Corporation dominated both the bank and the Bankus Corporation. On a boom market it was making money. Mr. Marcus and his friends carefully arranged that they, as holders of the Class B stock, got most of the profits and all the power. To these two important affiliates Marcus now added the Municipal Financial Corporation, again with Class A and Class B stock. The bank's officers were the Class B stockholders, who got the 47 per cent profit. The ordinary stockholders of the Bankus Corporation, who were also stockholders in the bank, got 6.75 per cent. Even this was not enough, however. A syndicate which included the principal officers of the bank, Mr. Kresel, a director and its general counsel (of whom more later), and Mr. Samuel Levy, recently elected Borough President of Manhattan, was formed to trade in bank stock. This structure of affiliates and syndicate controlled by the bank's officers had immense power, as long as a boom market was on, to rig the price of stock. When the market crashed, the members of the syndicate, it appears from press reports, were caught—with the exception of Mr. Levy, who proved his fitness for his present high office by knowing when to get out. All this, as Mr. Flynn points out, was not of itself illegal under present banking laws. Perhaps later investigations, or some of the inquiries now afoot, may show illegal transactions, but it is entirely possible that the only crime of the officers was failure. Personally, I have so much confidence in the astute Mr. Kresel, who was chief adviser to the bank, or rather to its directors, that I question whether even the astute Mr. Steuer will finally land any of the directors in jail.

Let no one think, however, that Mr. Marcus and his friends, who thus juggled stocks, were unwilling to let the humble depositors of the bank in on a good thing—especially after it had become less certainly good. In the summer of 1929 the bank opened a high-pressure sales campaign to sell units of bank and Bankus stock to depositors. One of its own directors, the plunging Mr. Rosoff, has publicly testified that he was "Mr. Sucker" and "Mr. Sap" in the series of transactions connected with the sale of the stock. He could afford it a great deal better than the small storekeepers and workers who were persuaded by a circular of the bank and by eager branch managers to buy these units of stock with a promise, in many cases, that the bank would buy back the stock if it fell below 198. This was just before the market broke, and it is to be hoped that some of the various investigations will discover just how many officials unloaded on the poor depositors. As matters now stand, many small depositors have not only lost on their deposits but as stockholders they face a possible double liability for par value of their stock. These lambs are likely to be not merely shorn but sacrificed.

As usual, the ordinary rank-and-file directors, chosen for their business and political affiliations, are now testifying that they did not know anything about what the bank was doing. Yet it appears that many of these directors successfully borrowed money from the bank on vague security far in its excess of their deposits, which means that they are well insured against the loss that has overtaken the ordinary depositor. The poverty, moreover, of these directors, all of whom profess to have lost heavily in the stock market, has not prevented them from employing the most expensive lawyers in the city, including Messrs. Tuttle, former candidate for governor in New York State, Proskauer, recently of the Supreme Court and the Smith kitchen cabinet, Buckner, of much fame as a prosecutor, and John W. Davis, more fortunate as lawyer than Presidential candidate. It is not known that these lawyers are donating their services.

2. The State of New York.—Banking is not an unregulated enterprise. Long ago, through sad experience, the public learned that capitalist honor, the automatic laws of competition, and the zeal for profit were not sufficient protection for money intrusted to bankers. New York State is blessed with a banking law and a banking department, and also with divers and sundry prosecuting officials. Moreover, New York's Banking Department was supposedly purged of wrongdoing and warned against bad banking tactics as a result of the lurid history of Clarke Brothers, private bankers, who—a fact unknown to most of the depositors—were not subject to the Banking Department under New York's inadequate banking law; and the episode of the City Trust, which was subject to the department. The City Trust affair resulted in the conviction of Bank Superintendent Warder, who, even though he was defended by the famous Max D. Steuer, was finally sent to jail by the Court of Appeals shortly after the Bank of United States was closed. Mr. Warder's conviction, be it said, was not due to the zeal of Tammany prosecuting officials; it was a necessary consequence of an unusually efficient investigation of the Banking Department in relation to the City Trust affair which was ordered by Acting Governor Lehman under the Moreland Act, with Robert Moses acting as commissioner.

Mr. Moses's vigorous report laid a solid basis for substantial reform. In particular, he demanded that thrift accounts be given the protection accorded to similar accounts in savings banks, and denounced the whole practice of allowing banks to set up affiliates and finance them with depositors' money to the profit of the acting officials of the bank. Mr. Moses also let it be known to newspapers, to the legislature, and to the Governor that other banks would go the way of the City Trust if his recommendations were not carried out. In testimony before a legislative committee he pointed a warning finger at the Bank of United States, but his testimony was kept off the record by the committee. Even more amazing was Governor Roosevelt's attitude. He appointed a commission of his own to consider Mr. Moses's report. It is understood that originally he intended to put Mr. Moses on the commission, but in the end he omitted Mr. Moses's name altogether and appointed Mr. Henry Pollak, a former State Senator and a director and counsel for the Bank of United States. No wonder that both the Governor's commission and the legislative committee almost completely disregarded the Moses report and solemnly concluded that everything would be all right if everybody would put his money in a sound bank.

Although the Moses report fell short of achieving the necessary reforms of the law, the investigation did bring about some reorganization of the Banking Department and the appointment of Mr. Joseph A. Broderick as superintendent. Mr. Broderick has had much experience in the Banking Department and in banking. Neither his knowledge of banking nor his personal honesty has been questioned. Since the failure of the Bank of United States he has thrown together a great number of recommendations for changes in banking law and procedure. Some of them are repetitions of suggestions already made by Mr. Moses. One of them is the extraordinary suggestion—which Mr. Broderick makes number one in his series—that in emergencies the superintendent be allowed to arrange mergers without the consent of the stockholders but with the consent of the directors. He says that if this provision had been enforced the Bank of United States could have been saved. This is probably true, but the law appears rather naive in its faith that, in an emergency, putting three cripples together will produce a strong man, or that a strong bank will always be ready to buy a weak bank. It is a striking commentary on banking under capitalism that a banking superintendent should make his chief concern, not the problem of keeping the system healthy, but the right to administer oxygen in an emergency.

Admitting Mr. Broderick's general good intentions, it remains true that he took some serious risks in the hope of saving the Bank of United States. He now says that for fifteen months he knew that the bank was shaky. Yet a few days before the bank was closed he permitted the opening of a new branch, and he allowed the bank to circulate a financial statement on September 24 showing that it had capital, surplus, and undivided profits of $42,000,000, which equaled 20 per cent of the deposits and was twice the amount required by the banking law. That is to say, the bank was, on the face of things, in unusually good condition. It is now known that weeks before this report was circulated the State examiners had marked off as doubtful items a total equal to the entire surplus and undivided profits.

They had also declared that some of the capital had been impaired. Obviously, in the face of such a showing Mr. Broderick should not have allowed the statement of September 24 to be circulated.

In spite of the statement of September 24, rumors of the real state of the bank were widely current and about sixty million dollars of deposits were drawn out in the two and one half months preceding its failure. Mr. Broderick must have known the effect of such withdrawals. To make matters worse for the Banking Department's reputation, the State Bank in Binghamton, New York, which appealed especially to immigrants—note again the misleading name—had to be closed, having been apparently so completely looted by its own president that it is doubtful if the depositors will get much more than five cents on the dollar. In the face of all this Governor Roosevelt has steadily refused my requests that he order a further investigation under the Moreland Act.

Instead of a Moreland Act investigation we have under way an inquiry by the Attorney General into the question of the sale of fraudulent securities under the Martin Act, and by District Attorney Crain into possible criminal action by officers and directors. These inquiries are of themselves proper and necessary. It should be noticed, however, that they do not and cannot go to the root of the matter, and that the Crain investigation is limited by law to the one county in which he is District Attorney, out of the four counties in which the bank operated.

Still worse is the political aspect of the situation. Tammany, as some cynics have observed, has thrown over prostitution as its leading racket and taken up banking. Certainly the records of the City Trust and Bank of United States indicate it. The directorates in both cases were loaded with Tammany politicians. The city kept a million and half of its money in the Bank of United States until the bitter end. Not all, however, of the directors of the Bank of United States were friends of Tammany. Tammany hates Mr. Isidor Kresel, chief counsel of the bank, with a deadly hatred because he has been an efficient counsel in the Seabury investigation into magistrates' courts. Moreover, it would be political suicide for Tammany not to appear deeply concerned over the fate of more than 400,000 depositors. Hence the venerable but politically shrewd sachem and District Attorney, Thomas C. T. Crain, has had to add one more to his numerous investigations beginning with the Rothstein case, all of which when they touched politics and racketeering have resulted in failure. There was ready to Mr. Crain's hand that very able lawyer, high in Tammany's graces, Max D. Steuer. Mr. Steuer at various times has been counsel for Mr. Marcus and had been involved in considerable litigation affecting the bank. His wife was well-enough informed of the state of affairs to draw out her $53,000 in deposits after banking hours on the last day of the bank's life. Early in proceedings after the crash Mr. Steuer occupied the limelight as counsel for a stockholders' and depositors' association. Just how he can identify the interests of stockholders and depositors beyond making the directors pay up all that they can, it is difficult to see. Obviously, it is to the interest of depositors who are not stockholders to enforce the liability of those who are stockholders. To this complicated set of relations with bank affairs Mr. Steuer adds a long-standing personal feud with Mr. Kresel.

It was this Mr. Steuer whom Mr. Crain made special assistant in complete charge of the present investigation, and for whom the Board of Estimate cheerfully voted $100,000 for expenses, Mr. Steuer's own salary being $1 a year. The young Attorney General also made Mr. Steuer a special assistant, so that the two investigations were consolidated. Of course the first thing the bank lawyers did was to seek to enjoin Mr. Steuer's acts as an assistant attorney general in view of his previous relations with the bank. This move failed in the lower court but an appeal may be taken.

Mr. Steuer, who has heretofore made his reputation by defending gentlemen like Harry Daugherty, Maurice Connolly, and Frank Warder, will now have a chance to use his great skill to handle a difficult situation—that is, if he is allowed to go on. It is expecting almost too much of our poor human nature to think that he will rise above the temptation to use this inquiry to win for himself credit as a friend of the people, to hurt his personal enemy Mr. Kresel, to discredit that gentleman's investigation into the magistrates' courts, and to save Tammany's chief friends on the board of directors of the Bank of United States. That latter job is easier than it may look to a layman because of the weakness of the banking law, which does not make directors criminally liable for much, if anything, short of outright theft or forgery.

3. Other Banks.—There prevails in banking circles plenty of condemnation for the Bank of United States in general and for Mr. Marcus in particular. Mr. Marcus is accused of shopping around with his stocks when sixty days before the failure he might have made an arrangement which would have saved the bank. Doubtless there is not much to be said for Mr. Marcus. But neither can one say very much for the big banks. It would have paid them in public confidence to go farther than they did to save the banking situation, even if some of their rich directors had lost a little money in the process. As it is, they are making money out of their alleged generosity in loans. Still worse is the fact that it was the big and strong banks themselves that originated the whole complicated game of security companies and other bank affiliates, that is, of buying with one hand and selling with the other. Doubtless they carry on the game more skilfully and perhaps more honestly than Mr. Marcus and his associates. But their interest in the game was such that they successfully blocked any legislative action such as Mr. Moses recommended. Certainly they are not now encouraging the discussion of more effective regulation, and there was considerable consternation in financial circles when Dr. Max Winkler, himself a banker of standing, proposed at a luncheon of the League for Industrial Democracy a system for setting up a fund to guarantee depositors against loss.

Such is the story in outline. It can be matched or perhaps exceeded in folly by stories of bank failures in other parts of the country, especially by the terrible crash in Tennessee for which that politician and newspaper editor Luke Lea seems to bear so heavy a burden of responsibility. Banking is in a bad way in a country where more than 1,300 banks closed their doors in a single year, 1,100 of them under circumstances which permitted no reopening. Yet the stronger bankers are the principal masters of America. What this suggests, a Socialist whose space is now exhausted will leave to the imagination of his readers.

Food and Drink in Washington

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 31

THE conflict between Congress and the President over appropriating money to feed the victims of drought and unemployment is rapidly degenerating into a blood feud in which compromise will be impossible. Ridden by that curious fatality which seems to attend all his major decisions, Hoover has elected to stand and fight on ground which cannot be defended. Some subjects are debatable, but a satisfactory apology for starvation has yet to be discovered. If the first duty of a government is to protect the lives of its citizens, how can it be argued successfully that famine sufferers should be compelled to rely on private charity? Knowing the answer, the wise men of the Republican Party have expostulated with Mr. Hoover until their throats are dry and their tongues parched. He has been told that public opinion is shocked by his attitude, that his present position cannot be reconciled with his past record, and that the members of his own party in Congress are overwhelmingly opposed to his course. In the House, dumb and docile as it is, such a callous cynic as Boss Snell of the Rules Committee privately acknowledges that about 5 members out of 435 are honestly in sympathy with the President. But all protest is vain. The same Herbert Hoover who fed the starving Russians, Belgians, Rumanians, Bulgarians, Hungarians, and Serbs at the expense of the United States Treasury insists it would be a crime to feed starving Americans that way. Thus he not only courts political ruin for himself and his party, but also involves the Red Cross by making it a partisan to his side of the controversy. It will be a long time before that organization recovers from the charge of permitting itself to become a political subsidiary of the Administration in this instance. Nevertheless, the situation has its bright side. Eventually the Administration will be compelled to surrender, and the sum ultimately appropriated for hunger relief is likely to be nearer $50,000,000 than the $15,000,000 first asked by the Senate or the $25,000,000 which it asks now. Meantime, the President's attitude has done more to increase the prospects of an extra session than anything which has happened since the present session began. A few days ago Representative Kahn, that witty and charming old lady from California, was asked whether the Republicans were counting on the Democrats to make the usual mistakes before the next election. "Have we left them any?" she replied.

* * * * *

HOOVER'S stubborn stand on hunger relief is in strange contrast to his frantic attempts to hedge on prohibition. Prior to the appearance of the Wickersham report he had definitely decided to cast his lot with the drys in 1932. He made that perfectly plain in his message of transmittal by declaring flatly against repeal or revision and by reiterating his intention to enforce the law. Yet such was the reaction of Eastern Republican leaders and such was its effect on this strong man that within forty-eight hours various newspapers carried Washington dispatches explaining that he had been "misunderstood," that he still had "an open mind" on the subject, and that he was not nearly so dry as his message sounded. Among the papers printing this explanation was the New York Times, which attributed it to "a close friend of the President." As a matter of fact, the President's "close friend" was his political secretary, Walter Newton. After the White House had been inundated with protests from Republican wets, Mr. Newton called certain correspondents to his office and gave them this moist "explanation," although with the candor characteristic of this Administration he forbade them to reveal its true source. Simultaneously Mark Sullivan, the President's closest journalistic associate, issued a syndicated article explaining that "any lawyer would understand" that Mr. Hoover had not definitely committed himself for or against revision in some form, but merely against the particular form approved by a majority of the commissioners. Moreover, he likened the President's position to that of a court which declines to render an opinion on a question which is "not before it." He did not state what would be necessary to bring the prohibition question "before" President Hoover. A few days later Frank R. Kent, whose reputation as an expounder of the Hoover mind approximates Sullivan's, predicted in the Baltimore Sun that as soon as the time seems propitious the Chief himself will make some gesture further calculated to appease the wets but not sufficient to alienate the drys. In short, the President's one consuming aim in connection with prohibition is to discover the winning side and get on it, or failing to be sure which is the winning side, to get on both sides. If there has been a more ghastly exhibition than this I do not recall it.

* * * * *

THUS far nobody has advanced an intelligible explanation of the outstanding mystery raised by the Wickersham report. In the individual reports signed by Judges William I. Grubb and Paul J. McCormick they dissented explicitly and in plain language from a recommendation which they presumed to be in the general report signed by them and eight other commissioners, but which in fact does not appear in the general report. Judge Grubb stated: "I join in the findings of fact and all the ultimate conclusions of the general report of the commission except that recommending that the amendment be revised immediately without awaiting further trial." Likewise Judge McCormick stated: "I am in accord with all the conclusions and recommendations [of the general report] except that in which a revision of the Eighteenth Amendment is suggested immediately." Nowhere in the general report is it recommended that the amendment be revised immediately. Under the head of Conclusions and Recommendations appears the statement: "All the commission agree that if the amendment is revised it should be made to read as follows," whereupon it gives a tentative form. That is all. It is obvious that these commissioners had read what they supposed to be the final draft of the general report when they prepared their individual reports. It is obvious, moreover, that they were distinctly under the impression that it contained a recommendation for immediate revision. Did it once contain such a recommendation, and was it deleted without their knowledge? Or was it deleted with their knowledge and did they forget to make their individual reports conform to the change? If such a change was made, at whose instance was it made? These questions are important and they have not been answered. The general report itself is full of interesting contradictions. The commission recommends changes in the law to prevent home wine-making—and then declares it is a practical impossibility to prevent either home wine-making or home brewing. It states that such a law cannot be enforced without public support—and admits that prohibition lacks such support. It declares against repeal—and states that "as things are at present, we have virtual local option." It recommends further increases in enforcement personnel and equipment—and declares that if Prohibition Commissioner Woodcock receives all the additional help he is asking, we shall still have "State nullification." The document abounds in internal evidence of a definite conflict between commissioners who had been impressed with the unenforceability of prohibition and someone who was determined the report should not be "too wet." This conflict explains much of the glaring incongruity between the statement of facts and the recommendations ostensibly based on them. The wets may be inclined to take comfort from the forthright manner in which the commissioners denounced the various under-cover methods which have brought enforcement into disrepute among respectable citizens. Let the wets take notice that within a week after the House received the report it voted overwhelmingly to appropriate funds for the continuance of wire-tapping, spying, use of stool pigeons, operation of government speakeasies, and the employment of ex-convicts.

* * * * *

NOT all the current mysteries are the product of the Wickershammers, however. When the $116,000,000 public-construction bill was before the Senate—as the Administration's principal contribution to the relief of unemployment—Senator Couzens offered an amendment to provide that contractors engaged on those government projects be required to pay the scale of wages prevailing in the localities where the work was done. It was defeated, but on December 23 a statement was issued at the White House which read as follows:

> The federal government has necessarily required contractors to maintain wage scales at the pre-depression level. There have been some differences with minor contractors but these have been adjusted. The President has informed the various executive departments that the policy of the federal government is that wages on contracts let by the government shall be held up to the standard existing in the district where the work is done.

Nevertheless, officials of the American Federation of Labor report that wages are being cut drastically by contractors engaged on government projects. One such contractor advertised that only Mexican labor would be employed. Others have reduced the wages of skilled mechanics more than 50 per cent. More surprising still, inquiries made at the executive departments by union officials and newspapermen disclosed apparently that no instructions had been received from the White House, and that a number of department heads were letting contracts without any attempt to stipulate wage scales. It recalls the time when the White House issued a press statement announcing that the construction of certain battle cruisers would be suspended. Months later two enterprising reporters ascertained that no such instructions had ever been received by the Navy Department and that work on the cruisers had proceeded according to schedule. This is one of the refreshing features of a Business Administration. The old-fashioned politician was so untrustworthy!

Hunger—1931

By A. ROBBINS

Hickman, Kentucky, January 31

THE magnitude of the drought disaster of 1930 is not realized by the country at large, while only those who have observed them at first hand can have any adequate conception of the tragic and pitiable conditions that prevail in the drought area. The American Red Cross is feeding farm families in more than seven hundred counties scattered through a score of States, but the States hardest hit on the whole are Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, Oklahoma, with parts of Texas, Louisiana, Missouri, Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, West Virginia, and Maryland. Final statistics issued by the Weather Bureau indicate that Maryland and Virginia received less rain in 1930 than any of the other States, but crop averages, curiously enough, were lower in Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi. It must also be pointed out that the drought is not yet broken in large sections of this area. Ponds, streams, springs, and wells are still dry and thousands of farmers continue to haul water many miles to supply their live stock as well as their families. The subsoil is almost as dry as it was last September before the scattering fall rains relieved conditions a little in most sections; and unless heavy and continuous rains come soon the subsoil will not be moist enough to grow a good crop in 1931. For instance, the Mississippi River has been lower during the past eleven months than it has ever been known to be.

The drought area may be roughly divided into two sections—the cotton and the tobacco sections. In both of these the tenant-farmer and sharecropper systems are largely prevalent. In those sections where more diversified farming is practiced and live stock is a large farm item, the farmers have been able generally to weather the drought on their own resources, but throughout the cotton and tobacco areas large numbers of tenants and sharecroppers, as well as the farm laborers, have been reduced to absolute want and privation. The outsider may find it hard to believe that hundreds of thousands of farm folk can be starving in the United States in this year of grace, 1931, but it is true nevertheless. Stand in front of any Red Cross headquarters in any one of a thousand communities in the drought area and watch the ragged children, blue with cold and undernourishment, who have come to ask for clothing; anxious men, with large families, waiting to receive the disbursing order that means food for another week; frantic women begging for medical aid for babies dying of malnutrition or the many forms of disease that attack the underfed and underclothed.

These people are reduced to such straits not through any fault of their own; they are victims of a system and of the worst drought in recent history. They have weathered lean years before; many of them—in the great Mississippi valley—have weathered several flood disasters; but none of them can remember a year like the past one. They have no resources to see them through an unusually bad year because of the system of sharecropping, which is in general vogue in the cotton country and large sections of the tobacco country. A man with a large family is nearly always in debt to his landlord except in unusually good years. In those years, being what he is, he buys a used automobile. By the next spring he has spent all his money and is back expecting the landlord to "furnish" him through the crop season.

The landlords, in most instances, are doing and have done the best they can. The great majority of them are not much better off today than their tenants. Most of them are heavily mortgaged; their credit facilities are strained to the limit. They hardly know how they are to finance a crop in 1931, and it is impossible for them to take care of their people through this winter. The usual time to start furnishing tenants and sharecroppers is from March 15 to April 1. They are allowed so much a month, according to the acreage they cultivate and the size of their families, on which to live until the cotton is picked and ginned, or the tobacco cut, cured, and stripped. At that time the accounts are cast up and the tenant is given his profit on his year's work, if any. This year few tenants were able to pay their debts to the landlord, and few landlords made enough to pay the taxes on their farms and plantations.

Even among the small farmers who own and work their own farms this has been a year of acute distress. The drought ruined their gardens, cut the corn crop in large areas to almost nothing, reduced the hay crop, and hurt their live stock. On small farm after small farm visited by the writer in several States anxious men and women were wondering how they were going to "get by." That is the general expression in the drought area. If they can just "get by" until spring; if they can just "get by" and make another crop; if it will only be a good crop year and if prices will only be a little better so they can get enough ahead by the fall of 1931 to see them through the winter of 1931-32, they will be satisfied. Gone are any thoughts of new clothes, new cars, new radios; the farmers are thinking in terms of food and feed for family and stock.

Cupboards, cellars, and closets that never before have been bare are swept clean this winter. There was little to "put up." The housewife will tell you that the garden was almost a complete failure, that the fruit did not do much, that even nuts and berries were very scarce. But the biggest worry of the average small farmer in the drought area is the problem of feed for his live stock. His cribs and barns are empty in thousands of cases. He is afraid the government feed loans will not be available in time to keep his stock from dying. In some cases the Red Cross is making allowances for feed to keep work stock alive, but the Red Cross does not have the money to go into any extensive feeding program and few people realize the extent of the feed shortage.

Most of these small farmers and better-class tenants are loath to talk about their troubles, or to write to the newspapers or their Congressmen. They have never been in such a predicament before and they are proud. Most of the population in the drought area is of Anglo-Saxon stock.

I have not mentioned the Negroes specifically for the reason that no distinction is being made in administration of relief between white and black, just as the drought made no distinction when it reduced them to want. In the cotton country, of course, a large number of the sharecroppers and farm laborers are Negroes. On the whole, they are a bit more thrifty and shifty, a bit more loath to ask help, than the whites on the same economic level. However, thousands of them are being fed and cared for by the Red Cross.

The Red Cross is doing its best in this great emergency and the country is fortunate in having an organization able to take over the task; for it is a tremendous job—the biggest job the Red Cross has ever tackled in its history. Beside it the task of feeding and caring for the people left destitute by the Mississippi flood of 1927 seems small. The present disaster is much more widespread, involves much more territory and many millions of people. The Red Cross, unfortunately, has not enough trained workers to fill the need. It must rely on local chapter officers to attend to the details of the relief work in their communities, and, naturally, when untrained workers take over such a task mistakes are made, but so far it appears that the hungry are being fed as fast as possible. The chapters I have seen in operation are doing good jobs, and the thousands of men and women in the hundreds of towns and villages who are giving their time and energy so unselfishly and freely to this work without compensation, without even thought of reward, thanks, or appreciation, deserve the thanks of the nation.

The aid of the Red Cross will tide the drought sufferers over until spring, but the outlook for spring in many sections is none too encouraging to those who know conditions. The drought is not yet broken. Many landlords do not know whether or not they will be financially able to farm their land this year. Much work stock is in too poor condition to work, while in some places many work animals have died. Last but not least, the widespread closing of banks in the drought territory has crippled credit. All these things may make it impossible for thousands of families to earn a living. For those who do find it possible to carry on, future security depends on the yield and price in 1931, and the outlook, for prices at least, does not seem reassuring.

Because the majority of our farmers have been in a bad way for years, even the most prosperous have been hard hit by the drought. The failure of banks in the drought area, largely due to frozen credits, indicates the unsound conditions that prevailed before the drought put the finishing touches on the farmer—as well as on those dependent on the farmer, for conditions in the towns and villages in the drought area are almost as bad as conditions on the farms.

It is probably true that our entire system of farming is wrong and out of date, but it cannot be changed overnight, and meanwhile the drought has brought real suffering, privation, untold tragedy and hardship to hundreds of thousands of American citizens who make their living from the land. Farm relief has been a football of politics and a joke for columnists for years; it is time the nation woke up to the real plight of the farmers, for while farm conditions remain economically unsound the country cannot truly prosper.

Whose Agent Is He?

By ISABEL PATERSON

WITH all the indignation that has been expressed over the convictions, by paid perjury and framed evidence, of girls charged with soliciting on the streets of New York, the protests have significantly and rather sickeningly avoided touching the real issue. Nobody has cared or dared to face the fact that the law under which such convictions were obtained—and the New York law is typical of most American State laws on the subject—is a source of corruption because it is inequitable by intention. In itself it is a kind of blackmail, being a legalization of privilege, of the double standard.

The definition of the crime or misdemeanor of "soliciting" betrays the determination of those who put it on the statute books and keep it there, to secure a masculine advantage. In earlier times no trouble was taken to disguise the purpose. The inequality of the sexes was not only assumed but stated. Women were frankly penalized in innumerable ways. Often enough it was predicated that they had no standing whatever in law. Only as property were they entitled to legal recognition, and then not for their own benefit but for that of the men of their family, fathers or husbands. On the other hand, some extra responsibility attached to the men of the family. This theory could not maintain itself in a political system based on axiomatic human rights and equality. After hundreds of years of gradual change most of the disabilities of women have been lifted. Even this particular law had to be redrafted in new terms to retain the one here involved.

But in its present form it is rather more obnoxious than before, since it adds hypocrisy to injustice. Men of decent instincts avoid thinking of it. When forced to do so, they save their feelings, if not their self-respect, by denunciation of the mere incidents of its operation. They don't care to stand up in court beside Chile Mapocha Acuna. But that is where they belong, as long as they approve the law.

For if the law is not meant to suppress venal sex relations, then it has no object whatever. Its only possible purpose is to prevent making sex an article of commerce.

Serious reasons, both social and emotional—call them moral and religious, if you prefer—can be adduced against prostitution. Whether or not legislation is an effective means of stopping it is another question, still open to debate. The most stringent laws have failed in the past, under economic pressure. If there is less commercialized vice in the United States than there was, say, thirty years ago, it would seem to be chiefly because the opportunities for women to earn a living in other ways than that of selling themselves have been correspondingly increased.

But a venal sex transaction is an act which requires two principals to commit. There are other crimes of this dual nature, such as bribery, in which the guilt of both parties is obviously equal. Also it is a legal maxim that whoever pays for the commission of a crime assumes full guilt: "Who does it by another does it himself." By these fundamental principles of law the man would be a little more guilty than the woman, having paid for and then participated in the act. To dodge this basic axiom, the law in question was carefully and consciously drawn. The girls are not charged with illicit sex relations, in which some man would necessarily be involved. They are accused of "soliciting." It is thus made a crime—in the present instance, specifically, a misdemeanor—to suggest to another person, a man, that he commit with them an act which is not in itself a crime. Could a more contemptible chicanery be imagined for the purpose of exculpating the man? How are the legislators and magistrates and lawyers engaged in enforcing such a statute, and the worthy citizens who lend it tacit support, any better than the nasty little informer who gives paid testimony?

It may be argued that it is a misdemeanor for a man to "solicit," that is, to accost a woman on the street with improper proposals; and therefore there is no lack of equity. This is another quibble. It is a misdemeanor for any person to annoy any other person, on the street or elsewhere, for no good reason. If one should address a stranger and follow him and persist in talking about the weather, the law would afford protection on request. It is a disorderly act. If any man cares to complain of the undesired attentions of a strange woman he must be heard.

But when the man has followed her, without compulsion, to a room, and further indicated his willingness by some overt sign, such as removing his coat, before the police can break in, after which the woman only is arrested, the travesty of justice is palpable.

With such a law, the employment of an agent provocateur inevitably follows. He is pernicious, but he is a symptom; an effect, not a cause. Whose agent is he? The phrase itself reveals a higher responsibility. In short, if prostitution is a crime, and two persons are shown to have intended to commit this crime, then the law has a fair pretext. As it stands, it is devoid of the slightest shred of equity. Puritan laws against sexual immorality have been much jeered at. Certainly it is arguable that they were both harsh and futile. They may have been mistaken, and they might cause resentment, rebellion, and of course lawbreaking. But they do not poison the sources of justice. They don't contravene equity. The issue is drawn on principle, and opinions may be honestly held on either side.

The present law against soliciting is vitiated by the same humbug on the part of respectable people which taints the prohibition law. The sale of liquor is a crime, but not the purchase. The only conceivable object of prohibition is to prevent drinking. It is based on the belief that drinking is wrong. The buyer is the one who intends to drink. But even if he actually does drink the liquor, still he is not guilty under the law, while the vendor is.

In the case of the convicted girls, men are only silencing their own uneasy conscience by an outcry against the police and the decoy. This is nothing new; it is the immemorial way in which respectable people seek to avoid responsibility for an iniquity by which they profit. Before the Civil War slave owners professed to despise slave dealers and over-seers, who were in fact their agents, executing their orders. At the same time they defended the institution of slavery, and demanded that the law as embodied in the Constitution be respected. Justice commands respect; it does not need to ask for it.

Good men and true who are willing to defend the law against soliciting, as it stands, ought not to repudiate Chile Mapocha Acuna; they are all members of the same club.

In the Driftway

EVEN in the days of prosperity the Drifter was often troubled by doubts concerning the quality and capacity of that much-touted phenomenon, the American business mind. His worst suspicions have been confirmed, unfortunately, by the spectacle of that mind at work on the first proposition it had ever met which held out no possibility of immediate private gain, namely, the current depression. The Drifter's admiration for the magnificent industrial mechanism that has risen before his eyes within the past twenty years has been seriously undermined by the fact that such inefficient and primitive devices as charity and the bread line can exist in the same country and the same city block as the machine age. Now the Drifter is a humble soul—in some ways. He knows his place, for instance, in the presence of that mysterious and awful science, economics. Nevertheless, he feels quite sure that if he set even his unpretentious brain to the task, he could bring forth some more effective solution for unemployment than football games and apples, not to mention buy-now drives, spruce-up-the-home campaigns, and public works that have, up to the present, yielded a good deal more publicity than work.

* * * * *

IF the works of economic experts and business leaders have been a disappointment, the words of other Americans have been something much less appetizing. Indeed, the depression, like famine, seems to have brought in its wake a pestilence of pettiness. The Drifter could make a list two columns long of examples in this category but he will mention only a few: (1) the pious platitudes of well-fed ministers who have been earning their dole for months with sermons on the spiritual benefits of economic distress and the joy of giving; (2) those "woman's-place-is-in-the-home" economists who suggest that all married women be fired; (3) the barber-chair philosopher who, between applications of the lotion and the talcum (with the "masculine" scent), states firmly that the only people out of work are the ones that don't want to work; (4) the angry opposition of the Great Engineer to the Senate's $25,000,000 food appropriation on the ground that "we should maintain the sound American tradition and a spirit of voluntary aid"; (5) the further smug Republican remark of Representative Wood that government aid to the Red Cross would have a "deadening effect on our sources of generosity." As for Calvin Coolidge's dictum, in discussing unemployment insurance, that "not even the unemployed have a right to what they do not earn," the Drifter would like to ask Mr. Coolidge in person if he thinks he earns the two dollars he gets for each of the puny words he syndicates.

FROM the modern "efficiency" and "service" of his native land, the Drifter turns for relief to ancient Europe, to Mother England where kings and queens still live in castles and the graceful culture of an earlier day survives. And what does he find? He finds that Queen Mary has just packed her two oldest boys off to South America to drum up trade for British Goods, Ltd. He finds, moreover, three paragraphs by Catherine Milnes Gaskell, J. P., in the London Saturday Review which read as follows:

> The queen has most graciously let it be known through her lady-in-waiting that she is now constantly wearing a coat of moleskin, as her majesty is anxious to promote the wearing of moleskins among ladies for capes, muffs, and coats, or for gentlemen as waistcoats, to help in all ways English industries.
>
> Every order helps, and ladies and gentlemen have only to order locally or in London such capes, muffs, and waistcoats as they may wish to have.
>
> Formerly mole-catchers were able to get 4d. to 6d. for each good moleskin, now they often receive only ½d. each. Help in this way would be of great value nationally, as it would mean employment and that English hands were doing the work they could do.

So far as the Drifter knows, nothing so beneficial and presumably heartwarming to the English workingman has occurred since the king "let it be known" some months ago that he had purchased two Daimler cars in order to speed up the wheels of British industry.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Rights in Cuba

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The inclosed copy of a letter which I have just received explains itself. For obvious reasons the identity of the writer is withheld.

The conditions portrayed in this letter direct attention to the little-regarded Article IV of the Platt Amendment, which became incorporated in the Permanent Treaty with the United States, signed May 22, 1903. By this article the government of Cuba agreed that "all the acts of the United States in Cuba during the military occupancy of said island shall be ratified and held as valid, and all rights legally acquired by virtue of said acts shall be maintained and protected."

Havana, January 17, 1931

DEAR SIR: On the morning of December 26, 1930, a group of men (about fifteen) surrounded the house of Colonel Aurelio Hevia, entered the house, and, without any judicial order, took him away. Since that moment he has been kept incomunicado, in a dungeon in the military prison of La Cabana fortress (an old fortress of Spanish times). All this has been done in violation of the Cuban constitution and Cuban laws, which prohibit the placing of civilians in military prisons. Colonel Hevia is not a military man, he is a civilian; he was a colonel in the Cuban War of Independence, but he is not and never has been a member of the Cuban army. The Cuban laws prescribe that when seventy-two hours are passed the prisoner must be presented before a judge; in a case when individual rights are suspended this must be done before ten days have passed.

Five writs of habeas corpus have been presented in court. The first one was presented on December 30 before the Supreme Court, which declared itself incompetent; the second on December 31 before the third section of the Audiencia of Havana, which denied it on the ground that it was not signed by Colonel Hevia; the third one on January 1 before the first section of the Audiencia, which denied it on the ground that Colonel Hevia was in a military prison by order of an army officer. The fourth writ was presented on January 6 before the second section, which ordered the presentation of Colonel Hevia—the order was disobeyed and the presentation did not take place. The court left things at that, acting against the law which compels it to order the arrest of the person who disobeys a writ of habeas corpus. The fifth writ was not granted on the ground that Hevia was under military orders.

During the present month numerous writs of habeas corpus have been presented in favor of numerous individuals that are in prison by order of Machado; all have been denied. Today, January 17, twenty-two days after the arrest of Colonel Hevia, he has not yet been presented or indicted by any judge. [An Associated Press dispatch reports that Hevia was finally charged for trial on February 2.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The writ of habeas corpus, the only guaranty the citizens have against the oppression and misbehavior of force, has become merely words on paper in Cuba. Yet this law was promulgated by the American intervention government in Military Order 427 of October, 1900, and today is part of Cuban law.

Would not the United States be justified, in view of Article IV and Military Order 427, in inquiring of the Cuban government just what steps it is taking to fulfil its solemn treaty obligations?

Wellesley, Mass., January 28 LELAND H. JENKS

The Washington Honor Roll

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The one serious criticism of Paul Anderson's Washington honor roll of newspaper correspondents is its incompleteness. To the ten correspondents cited by Mr. Anderson might well be added the following:

LOUIS J. HEATH, of the United Press, for his intelligent and sympathetic Latin American correspondence, as well as HARRY FRANTZ, also of the United Press, for Latin American and other foreign correspondence, including Hawaii and the Philippines. Much of their work does not appear in American papers.

DREW PEARSON, of the Baltimore Sun, for keeping the spotlight unflinchingly upon the State Department.

THEODORE C. ALFORD, of the Kansas City Star, for being the major source of news concerning the antics of the Federal Farm Board.

RUBY A. BLACK, of the Portland Evening News, for supplying the State of Maine with the first Washington correspondence estimating fairly and honorably the achievements and shortcomings of the State's delegation at the Capitol, and making known, likewise for the first time in Maine, the national aspects of the tremendously important power question.

JOHN SNURE, New York Herald Tribune, for his conscientious and searching reporting of the United States Senate, despite the handicap of working for an official Republican paper.

FRANKLYN WALTMAN, JR., of the Baltimore Sun, for his excellent reporting of the work of the Haitian commission.

MARK THISTLETHWAITE, who has developed an extraordinary faculty for reporting to his constituency in Indiana what goes on underneath the surface in Washington, especially in relation to the power issue.

HENRY HYDE, of the Baltimore Sun, for his brilliant and unremitting "debunking."

This list, added to Anderson's, doubtless still falls short of just inclusiveness.

Portland, Maine, January 30 ERNEST GRUENING

Russia's Challenge to American Business

The Economic Life of Soviet Russia

By CALVIN B. HOOVER

The significance to the capitalistic world of development in the Soviet Union cannot be exaggerated. Whatever your station in life, you are being affected every day by what the communist régime in Russia is doing. What is it doing? Inform yourself now through Dr. Hoover's illuminating chapters on every phase of Soviet economic activity: Organization of Industry, Capital Investment, Agriculture, Internal Trade, Foreign Trade, the Banking System, Money, the Co-operatives, Labor, Communism and Human Welfare. There is no other current picture of Russian activities so complete, or so stimulating to thought.

At all bookstores—$3.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY · · NEW YORK

JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

is in need of men and women possessing:

1. good personality; 2. a genuine desire to contribute to the social welfare of American Jewry; 3. adequate academic preparation; 4. training in the theory and practice of individual and group adjustment, as well as of communal organization with special reference to Jewish life in America.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work

offers a course of study designed to supply the fourth qualification. The candidate is expected to provide the first, second and third.

Social workers who have not had the advantages of professional preparation, and college graduates, are invited to examine the course of study offered by the School.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1,000 for each academic year, are available for especially qualified students

For full information write to
M J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)
71 W. 47th St., New York City

We Part the Husks

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

We part the husks and feed like mice
Upon the grain of paradise.
The secret growing on its stalk
Is always with us when we walk.
The earthquake of a bursting seed,
The dark decision of the bud,
Being a motion in our blood
Is heaven encountered in a deed.

Thomas Mann's Obsession

Mario and the Magician. By Thomas Mann. Translated from the German by H. T. Lowe-Porter. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

AT a small Italian watering-place frequented by foreign tourists a conjurer, Cipolla by name, announces that he will give a performance. Influenced perhaps by the pleas of their two small children, the narrator and his wife decide to attend. Soon it becomes clear that this is to be no ordinary evening of sleight-of-hand and parlor conjuring. This Cipolla, with his ravaged face, his sinister, not undignified deformity, his arrogant grimace, his silver-clawed hunting crop, and his cognac decanter, is no itinerant trickster but a hypnotist of parts. He insinuates numbers into the minds of his audience; forces the village youths to dance to the crack of his whip; entices women from their husbands. "Freedom exists," says Cipolla, "and also the will exists; but freedom of the will does not exist, for a will that aims at its own freedom aims at the unknown." None can withstand him. He draws from his seat the guileless waiter Mario, the friend of the narrator's children, and lo! forces Mario into seeing in him, the humped Cipolla, the face of his beloved. Mario kisses him; is released from the spell. Sobbing with humiliation, he stumbles down the platform steps, turns, and shoots the wonder-worker dead.

To call this the story of "Mario and the Magician" is equivalent to saying that "Moby Dick" is about a mad sea captain who revengefully pursues a white whale and is at last destroyed by his quarry. This tale is brief, simple, a small fragment of life, and "Moby Dick" is as vast as the Pacific; but they are written on the same emotional level. Mann and Melville are identically obsessed: both are tortured by the metaphysical problem of evil, though Mann, writing in a psychoanalytic age, sees evil as illness, as a multiform malady. His is the true morbidezza—that concern with death, so far removed from the mere fascination of the decadent, which first troubled, then uplifted Melville and Baudelaire. Confronted with a riotously rotting society, he has sought always the cancerous spots, particularly in their subtler manifestations. From the diseases of its parts he deduces the nature of the whole. The groundtheme of "Buddenbrooks"—what is it but the sickness of an acquisitive society, considered as a sickness? To the same problem, more grandly, more elusively treated, the volumes of "The Magic Mountain" surrender themselves. And this little tale of Mario and the magician emerges from the identical preoccupation. It is a study, in terms of pure, unemphatic narrative, of malevolence, of the power the will attains when it is distorted and willing to crucify itself that it may dominate other, healthier wills. "Shall we go away," muses the author, "whenever life looks like turning the slightest uncanny, or not quite normal, or even rather painful and mortifying?" And, as ever, his answer is: "No, surely not."

Had Mann been content merely to pose and examine the problem of the will to evil in terms of Cipolla and Mario, his story would have been interesting, but possibly rather thin, as this sort of symbolism is apt to be. But with weird skill he thickens his narrative, carefully blurs its implications, so that the idea skeleton does not affright us with its bare and pallid bones. By insensible degrees we are led along a pathway of conflict and unwholesomeness, beginning with the petty irritations offered by an overbearing hotel management and closing with a horrible psychic struggle ended only by death. When we reach the last page we realize that it is the honor of the human race which has been resisting the evil Cipolla. Thus the tone of the story preserves a deepening unity of atmosphere which mesmerizes us apart from the incidents themselves. Again, the macabre quality of these incidents is touched with its own special irony when we are bidden to view them through the gleefully uncomprehending eyes of the little children. To them, of course, Cipolla's entire performance is a sort of glorified romp. Who, indeed, can tell how far Mann's irony extends? Is not Cipolla, with his strident and theatrical patriotism, a deep thrust at the domination-ideal of the Fascisti—and a prophecy of the pit they are digging for themselves? Also, and perhaps more obviously, this Cipolla is a type-figure out of Freud: his hump is a symbol of his organ-inferiority, he is destroyed by the very Eros he thinks to mock.

Finally, the chiaroscuro attains an added density and terror through the circumstance that the chief character is both trickster and miracle worker. To that misty mid-region of phenomena which seems to partake both of charlatanry and the supernatural Thomas Mann has always been attracted—witness the manifestation scene in "The Magic Mountain" and his description of the Schrenck-Notzing seances. What attracts the psychologist in him is the ambiguity of the human will which, even when it seeks merely to exercise itself playfully or out of the mere pride of technique, finds itself involved in the darkest of human relationships and even, at times, with powers we cannot or dare not name. Cipolla becomes more than a super-Svengali. The theatrical atmosphere with which he surrounds himself is more than theatrical. It is agonized and broken and disturbing. It haunts us, not like the elegiac violin strains of "Death in Venice," but like a nightmare out of some old Gothic legend.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

The Martyrdom of Mr. Justice Brandeis

The Social and Economic Views of Mr. Justice Brandeis. Collected with Introductory Notes by Alfred Lief. The Vanguard Press. $4.50.

SO often have Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis been united in dissent that after "The Dissenting Opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes" the present collection was practically obligatory. The two volumes when read together make the characters of the two great justices emerge clearly by way of contrast. It is an illuminating commentary upon the workings of the human mind that two men who are so profoundly different in their mental constitution and outlook should have been so often companions in dissent. Some literary gentlemen who commented upon the opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes when published seemed to discover for the first time that he was not a liberal. Yet he had never pretended to be anything but a constitutional skeptic. He always took particularly great care to say that he was indifferent to the actual merits of the social causes before the court for judgment. That such an attitude of constitutional boredom redounded to the benefit of liberalism is obvious, and that it has been welcomed by liberals is natural and inevitable, but Mr. Justice Holmes never entered any camp. He is the only judge in the history of the court he has adorned who has remained as aloof and unprejudiced in the struggles of classes and factions as it is possible for a human being to be. He has remained always imperturbable and epigrammatic.

Now, on the other hand, Mr. Justice Brandeis is the only judge in the history of the court who has been openly partisan in favor of the common man. It is surely doing him no dishonor (except to mention him in the same breath) to say that he is obviously as much in favor of labor as Judge Parker is in favor of capital, and it may as well be honestly admitted by liberals that the struggle which resulted in the former's confirmation was as inevitable and justifiable as the struggle which resulted in the latter's rejection. If it is important that the Supreme Court be "picked" it may as well be recognized that God will be on the side of those who can marshal the most votes. Mr. Justice Brandeis is a liberal. He believes passionately in human rights as above property rights, and is as sensitive to economic injustices as most Supreme Court judges have been indifferent to them. He is an economist where they have been lawyers, and he believes in twentieth-century socialization as they believe in early-nineteenth-century individualism.

Mr. Justice Holmes's Olympian remoteness makes it impossible to regard him as a sacrifice to constitutionalism. But considering the character of Mr. Justice Brandeis, and the character of the Supreme Court, it becomes obvious at once that his membership in it has been a lifelong martyrdom in the public interest. His warm advocacy has condemned him to the pathetic business of teaching elementary economics to the class of jurists who are his colleagues. It has been his fate to attack simple constitutional solecisms with a formidable array of data and statistics. Indeed, the famous Brandeis briefs of the period of his practice before the Supreme Court bar are supposed to have established the furnishing of such material to the jurists on the bench as a new method in constitutional exegesis, although it hardly amounted to more than proving the obvious facts of life. In other words, he has been compelled to devote his energies to establishing beyond the peradventure of a doubt such truisms as that the United States Steel Corporation has a greater bargaining power than an individual steel laborer, or that the Nineteenth Amendment has not abolished the physical disabilities of women. If such a task is not martyrdom the world has never known it. It must particularly tax the patience and the strength of a first-rate economist. Mr. Justice Brandeis seems particularly out of place upon the Supreme Court. From its bench his opinions sound almost paradoxical and utopian. One wonders if he could not have better served the "new freedom" to which he was devoted in his early years from without the court.

Yet, if any radical judges are to be appointed to the Supreme Court in the future, they are far more likely to be of the type of Mr. Justice Brandeis than of Mr. Justice Holmes. At present the Supreme Court is undergoing a rapid change of personnel, and the importance of personalities in the work of the court has been stressed. But the career of Mr. Justice Brandeis makes it quite apparent that while some minor concessions can be won through the influence of individual liberal justices, no really profound and revolutionary modification of the Supreme Court as an institution existing to render stillborn all radical experiments can be accomplished. Constitutional teachers, leaving out of account the uncanny skill of the Supreme Court justices in keeping their ears to the ground to see how much the people will stand, have fallen into the somewhat naive habit of attributing whatever liberalization has taken place in the attitudes of the Supreme Court to the constitutional method of Mr. Justice Brandeis. But it seems difficult to believe that any group of hard-headed lawyers would be so devoid of sense as to believe honestly that to forbid a man to work more than twelve or fifteen hours a day in a factory is to interfere with his freedom of contract. But even if Mr. Justice Brandeis is to be regarded entirely as deus ex machina, it must be small comfort to him on blue Mondays. He may well reflect that his martyrdom has in the long run done more harm than good. Both his own and Mr. Justice Holmes's dissents are cherished by liberals, but it may well be that they only serve to lend an appearance of honesty to an institution that must in the very nature of things remain fundamentally iniquitous. As long as voices of dissent issue from the chamber of the Supreme Court itself, the delusive impression is created that the dice are not loaded against the common man. After all, only five justices are needed to prevent "dangerous" tinkering with the Constitution. If, as is often proposed, the Supreme Court is forbidden to hold a statute unconstitutional except by a two-thirds' or three-quarters' vote, the only result would be to make the appointment of liberal justices impossible. From the honest point of view this would be highly desirable. As it is, if our Rulers of America are real Machiavellis, they will appoint radicals to succeed Messrs. Justices Holmes and Brandeis when they have ceased their labors upon the land's highest tribunal.

William Seagle

Selma Lagerlof's Trilogy

The Ring of the Löwenskölds. Selma Lagerlöf. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

SELMA LAGERLÖF'S art is an art rooted in a tradition. Back of the simple audacity in character portrayal lies the author's assurance that these types are familiar to her readers, that a certain homogeneity of feeling concerning the old aristocratic families and their legendary backgrounds persists. For the American novelist every background presented is sectional, and any culture is a veneer upon the changing surface of cultures in this country. Nothing, therefore, may be taken for granted here, no values, no history. But in Sweden there is a literary history and a well-established folk tradition. The romantic and heroic sagas are not lost to the knowledge of the race; they are merely translated into more modern versions. Therefore it is with the greatest economy that Selma Lagerlöf is able to present her story and its character types, all of whom are individualized, each of whom moves within the definition of a certain social rank and attitude.

"The Ring of the Löwenskölds" is a trilogy: "The General's Ring," "Charlotte Löwensköld," and "Anna Svard." The first part would seem to be a ghost story only, did it not serve to introduce the curse fallen upon the Löwensköld family. The avaricious ghost is laid, but the curse persists. The two following books indicate how this curse worked upon the characters of the story and, in particular, upon Karl Arthur, the religious fanatic, and his female counterpart, Thea.

The reader is, however, likely to forget the curse entirely, for it is unnecessary to the motivation of such fully analyzed characters as the author now presents. These are men and women controlled not by the supernatural, but by human passion. Here is a study of religious fanaticism which is unforgettable. Karl Arthur, upon whom the curse rests, is a perfectly understandable egocentric and melancholic young boy who must find some outlet for his vanity. This outlet comes when he accepts a "faith" and comes to believe himself "like Christ." He is engaged at this time to Charlotte, his cousin, whose essential sanity might save him, since it is in every way the antithesis of his own passion. But he resents this sanity and flees from her to take, as wife, the first woman who may cross his path. He marries the peasant girl, Anna Svard, because over her his pride and egotism may triumph. Poverty and self-torture have become the necessary outward signs now of his religious power. But Anna is better able to endure poverty than he is, and again he finds himself the less important person in a situation. This he cannot endure, so he joins himself to the fanatical Thea, and they go out together to preach on the streets. Karl Arthur's madness grows. He is selfish and cruel to everyone, and all in the name of Christ. Finally he who began by preaching love ends by denouncing all mankind in a kind of frenzy. Gradually this man's fanaticism destroys all whom he might have loved, and the curse is carried out.

As in "The Story of Gösta Berling," Selma Lagerlöf is interested here in the psychology of religious fanaticism, and not in the influence of any so-called curse upon a family. The folk superstition is used and to advantage, but the novel is a powerful study of the disintegration of a character whose powers overleap themselves. EDA LOU WALTON

The Difficulties of Democracy

The Public and Its Government. By Felix Frankfurter. Yale University Press. $2.

THE four Yale Lectures on the Responsibilities of Citizenship which make up this volume have for their respective subjects The Demands of Modern Society upon Government, Does Law Obstruct Government? Public Services and the Public, and Expert Administration and Democracy. Like the Beards in their recent "American Leviathan," Professor Frankfurter concerns himself mainly with the actualities of American government and only secondarily with theories, and frankly warns his hearers that he proposes to offer perplexities rather than guidance. A good deal of guidance creeps in, of course, for citizenship involves moral and intellectual as well as legal obligations, and most of the counsel, while rather obvious, is to the point. We are reminded, for example, that we have not adjusted our thinking to the demands which modern society makes upon government, and view with disquietude the multiplication of laws without sufficiently considering the expanding range of calls which they attempt to meet. The difficulty with the Constitution, again, itself "a strange phenomenon of permanence" as constitutions go, seems to Professor Frankfurter to be not so much with the instrument as with the judges who interpret it, and his survey of the judiciary offers some sharp criticism of the Supreme Court. The criticism is widened when the subject of the regulation, and particularly the valuation, of public utilities is reached, and Professor Frankfurter sees that question standing in the forefront of State and national issues now and in the immediate future.

The guidance is less certain when we come to democracy. Professor Frankfurter insists that democracy is not contracting its territorial spread except in Italy, but he appears unable to find anything better to say for it than that its "ultimate justification . . . still remains the lack, in the long run, of a decent and workable substitute"—a negative commendation which contrasts strikingly with "the lyric note which characterized the democratic faith a hundred years ago." If we cannot be entirely comfortable under democracy in this time of disillusionment and machine civilization, we may at least hope that popular education will improve, scientific study of governmental problems be more generally applied, and a high standard of civil service prevail over the demand for spoils. All this, of course, is merely the hopeful note which most holders of university public lectureships feel obliged to sound before they get through. Professor Frankfurter's final lecture would have been more worth while if he had more thoroughly exposed the difficulties of democracy in a technological age, as the second would have been better if he had not straddled the issue of the Eighteenth Amendment. WILLIAM MACDONALD

A German Caricaturist

Das Neue Gesicht der Herrschenden Klasse. Sechzig neue Zeichnungen von George Grosz. Berlin: Malik-Verlag. 4 and 6.50 marks.

Die Gezeichneten. Sechzig Blätter aus Fünfzehn Jahren von George Grosz. Berlin: Malik-Verlag. 4 and 6.50 marks.

THERE can be no doubt that since his stay in Paris the work of George Grosz (an exhibit of which can now be seen at the Weyhe Gallery) has entered a new stage. In 1917, when he was one of the leaders of the revolutionary dada movement in Germany, and for some years to follow he was not concerned with visible reality, but aimed solely at stressing traits in the individual which were socially significant. These earlier drawings, with their contempt for perspective and substance, in which all walls were transparent and the persons wore their faces like masks, achieved immediate fame by the way in which they overpowered the spectator. Each sketch reported an infinity of minute traits, observed with the most cruel accuracy, and assembled so as to call forth the wrath of heaven upon the Germany of the war and the "inflation." George Grosz's craftsmanship was then mainly admired, or abused, as the means by which he lent expression to his revolutionary ethical pathos. His realism, which, for instance, caused the confiscation of his "Ecce Homo," lay entirely in the unsparing cruelty with which he reported facts; there was no trace of it in his technique.

Of the present two collections, "Die Gezeichneten" contains sixty drawings culled from earlier collections and chosen to illustrate the artist's development over a period of fifteen years. Although neither chronologically arranged nor including exactly his best, and most bitter, drawings, the selection gives a fair idea of the development of that unique artist and, incidentally, furnishes a commentary on the reverse side of Germany's reconstruction.

"Das Neue Gesicht der Herrschenden Klasse" (The New Face of the Ruling Class), a sequel to Grosz's famous collection called "The Face of the Ruling Class," besides containing some older material and some of Grosz's purely political cartoons, includes a few drawings which manifest, by the delightful way in which they catch actual types, characterizing rather than caricaturing them, that they are of recent date. Both collections are splendidly printed, and sell at a price that must seem incredibly low to American book lovers.

Both collections, however, above all present George Grosz the fighting satirist, the champion of a social cause. There is another George Grosz who employs a mixture of tempera and oil wherever it is necessary to enhance the structural lines of his intensely realistic paintings, an artist whose nature studies and portraits have won even critics whose political antagonism caused them to heap personal abuse upon the satirist. As he grows more mature, concern with form seems to prevail more and more over an interest in the subject of his work; a development which is to be welcomed, as, once Grosz was stamped the "Daumier of our age," the danger was imminent that he would forever imitate himself. WALTER KIEN

Books in Brief

Together Again. By Helen Grace Carlisle. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

Miss Carlisle is a story-teller. She has the gift of clutching a reader and holding him to the end of her story and making him believe, against his wish, every word she has to say. But the next morning he is apt to sober up. She has power and passion, and for each of her novels she has developed an original technique that seems almost perfect. And each of her novels marks an advance, a definite forward step. With her natural gifts she will bear watching. Her chief fault lies in a certain superficiality that, with the aid of the new psychology, leads her to make her stories "work out" rather than grow. "Mothers Cry" had moments of power and truth. It had a moment or two of near-greatness. But after all was over, the critical reader had a serious relapse. In "Together Again" the Boy, the Girl, and the Doctor (none of the characters have names) form a triangle which, though not new, remains unusual and is here developed with conviction. But it is supported on the same flimsy structure. The psychology is too ready-made; the technique a little too obvious; the whole a little too stagy. One would like to see Miss Carlisle do, instead of a fourth "stunt," a novel that in its purely surface aspects was wholly conventional.

The Water Gipsies. By A. P. Herbert. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

This long novel, modern in its psychology but strangely reminiscent of Dickens, is about an attractive little London housemaid who becomes a model to improve her "stattus," and who lives with her queer, mild father and her sister, a working-class beauty, on an old barge moored to the bank of the Thames. The story is about her and her adventures with her three men—Fred, the stodgy and faithful, a bargeman as were his father and his grandfather and his great-grandfather before him; Ernest, the socialist agitator, the son of the widow proprietor of the Black Swan; and Mr. Bryan, the aristocrat turned bohemian artist. A. P. Herbert is a genial and delightful story-teller. But if there is none of the false sentimentality, the unreal development of plot, the artificial moral groundwork of Dickens in his novel, neither are there the infectious humor, the irresistible characters, the inexhaustible gift of invention which testify to Dickens's genius. But this is a good story. All is by no means beer and skittles with Jane Higgins and her little circle but, first and last, there is a great deal of both between the covers of this "true story" of London work-a-day life.

White Jade. By Maude Meagher. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

There is a tale in China, based on historic fact, which like the Occidental story of Cleopatra is told again and again—that of Yang Kuei-fei, the imperial concubine, whose body was like "an altar lamp carved of clear white jade"—so perfect in her loveliness that the Emperor Ming Huang, hypnotized by her beauty, forgot his other three thousand women, and to gratify her slightest desire discarded everything else. With one of China's greatest emperors now unconcerned with state affairs, the court became more and more demoralized, until another of Yang Kuei-fei's lovers, yearning for her, captured the city, and the people demanded her death. Before they had seized her, she had hanged herself. Maude Meagher has attempted to tell this tale in English and to tell it by imitating the involuted and exaggerated style of Chinese prose, with its frequent bursts into poetry. Such a style, with its heavy embroidery

"THESE ARE THE TIMES THAT TRY MEN'S SOULS"★

UNEMPLOYMENT and financial crises are proving a direr threat than Howe's army to the liberties of the average American. Is the present catastrophe "man-made" or due to causes beyond our control? If unemployment preventable? Is social justice possible?

No single book contains the answers to these fundamental questions, but vital testimony bearing on the case is presented in many of the volumes in the inexpensive and ever useful Vanguard Series. Below are listed some of the most pertinent books. The publishers will be glad, on request, to send you a complete list. THEY COST ONLY 75 CENTS EACH.

These volumes are on sale at almost all progressive bookstores or may be ordered on the coupon below.

Number
2. WAR—PATRIOTISM—PEACE—Leo Tolstoi.
3. PROUDHON'S SOLUTION OF THE SOCIAL PROBLEM—P. J. Proudhon.
4. THE ESSENTIALS OF MARX—Karl Marx.
5. IMPERIALISM—THE STATE AND REVOLUTION—N. Lenin.
6. THE CONQUEST OF BREAD—Peter Kropotkin.
7. KROPOTKIN'S REVOLUTIONARY PAMPHLETS—Peter Kropotkin.
11. THE THEORY OF THE LEISURE CLASS—Thorstein Veblen.
12. THE STATE—Franz Oppenheimer.
13. PROGRESS AND POVERTY—Henry George.
52. WHAT IS COOPERATION?—James Peter Warbasse.
53. WHAT IS THE SINGLE TAX?—Louis F. Post.
54. WHAT IS SOCIALISM?—Jessie M. Hughan.
55. WHAT IS COMMUNIST-ARNARCHISM?—Alexander Berkman.
69. THE STORY OF CIVIL LIBERTY IN U. S. HISTORY—Leon Whipple.
70. THE WAR MYTH IN U. S. HISTORY—C. H. Hamlin.
72. WHERE IS CIVILIZATION GOING?—Scott Nearing.
91. HOW THE SOVIETS WORK—H. N. Brailsford.
93. SOVIET RUSSIA'S ECONOMIC SYSTEM—Nearing and Hardy.
98. WOMAN IN SOVIET RUSSIA—Jessica Smith.
99. SOVIET TRADE UNIONS—Robert W. Dunn.
100. THE NEW SCHOOLS OF NEW RUSSIA—Lucy L. W. Wilson.
101. LIBERTY UNDER THE SOVIETS—Roger N. Baldwin
117. THE JUNGLE—Upton Sinclair.
121. HEAVENLY DISCOURSE—Charles Erskine Scott Wood.
122. THE LETTERS OF SACCO AND VANZETTI.
146. SOCIOLOGY—Lester F. Ward (Summarized).
171. THE FOUNDATIONS OF MODERN CIVILIZATION—The ABC of History, Vol. I—Thomas and Hamm.
172. CIVILIZATION IN TRANSITION—The ABC of History, Vol. II—Thomas and Hamm.
173. OUR OWN TIMES—The ABC of History, Vol. III—Thomas and Hamm.

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Please send me Numbers..........
..........in the Vanguard Series.
I enclose check or money order—80 cents per volume ($.75 each plus $.05 postage) or send books C.O.D.

Signed......................
Street......................
City......................

When ordering four or more books it is not necessary to include postage

★The fact that today the trials are economic rather than political measures the distance that separates the twentieth century from the eighteenth.

and inevitable repetitions, is apt to seem dull to most Western readers, though the translation a short time ago of the authentic "Tale of Genji" was eagerly received here, and Miss Meagher's tour de force is not without delicacy and charm.

A Modern Galaxy. Assembled by Dale Warren. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

This collection of short stories seems designed as a piece of publicity for its publishers. It is a kind of publicity of which we could stand a great deal more. All the contributors are Houghton Mifflin authors and the book that results from its editor's selection is a fascinating one. The stories, arranged alphabetically according to authors, are of all kinds; but each in its field is good. Sabatini's Blood Money stands in contrast to Willa Cather's poignant Double Birthday. Harold Nicolson's brilliant, sophisticated portrait study, Lambert Orme, precedes Roland Pertwee's charming short piece of youth and old age and fishing called The River God. Mary Austin and Oliver La Farge write diverse studies of the American Indian. John Buchan contributes a mystery tale, while Henry Sydnor Harrison is represented by an unusual detective story. Choices will differ. In the opinion of one reader Katherine Newlin Burt with her story Herself, Willa Cather, and Anne Douglas Sedgwick with The Rat carry off highest honors. But Esther Forbes, Phyllis Bottome, James Norman Hall, Dennis Mackail, Elsie Singmaster—all are very much in the running.

The White Devil. By Luis de Oteyza. Translated from the Spanish by Frederic Tabor Cooper. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

Luis de Oteyza, globe-trotter and journalist, had put together several vivacious but not epoch-making compilations and travelogues, when suddenly, in the year 1928, he startled Spanish readers with a daring novel of a Barcelona bookkeeper's frenetic adventures in revolutionary China. This Spanish Richard Harding Davis found himself an internationally famous novelist almost overnight. The novel was speedily translated into almost all the leading European languages except English. The belated English version, an excellent one, has at last appeared. This narrative homily on the demoralizing effect which the cruelty and corruption of the Orient may have on the sedatest of Occidentals, is full of blood and sadism and cynicism; but it moves like a Kansas cyclone, and the best way to keep from reading it through is not to read the first page.

River to the Sea. By George Agnew Chamberlain. Brewer and Warren. $2.

Here is another of those romantic novels the receipt for which is: one fairly sophisticated young man to meet one glowing, earthy, utterly unsophisticated young girl, a veritable child of nature. In this case the girl is possessed of a magnificent voice and comes of an interesting family, all of whom are individualists with a touch of mystery. The young man undertakes to educate the child of nature, and of course ends by falling in love with her. The book is well written and even, in its way, convincing; the locale of the story, the Connecticut hills near Torrington, allows for some pleasant description of the countryside.

Egil's Saga. Translated from the Icelandic by E. R. Eddison. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Mr. Eddison has attracted attention for his remarkable novels "The Worm Ouroboros" and "Styrbion the Strong," historical romances that had their impulse in saga literature. In the present work he pays homage to his source by a direct translation of what is regarded as artistically one of the most perfect of the sagas, and the most representative, in its totality, of the Icelandic civilization of which the sagas are the classics. With this version Mr. Eddison takes rank as the foremost translator of the sagas. His efforts to equate in modern English the effects of the saga style result sometimes in archaic passages, but on the whole his rendering is remarkably sensitive. Added to the text are valuable introductory material, notes that are in themselves penetrating and informative, short essays on phases of saga literature, and a long and interesting article on the principles of translation.

A History of Spanish Civilization. By Rafael Altamira. Translated by P. Volkov. Richard P. Smith. $5.

This volume, edited with an introduction by J. B. Trent, is the author's own abridgment of his well-known four-volume "History of Spanish Civilization." It is obviously designed to appeal to two groups of readers, the interested layman and the student of Spanish history and culture. Into 240 pages are packed an amazing amount of material on the arts, crafts, sciences, trades, and social and economic development of Spain. The space given to political events and international relations is consequently restricted, a fact that doubtless will fail to satisfy the expectations of those who interpret history chiefly in terms of past politics. Spain of ancient and medieval times is given considerable attention. The contributions of the successive invaders to Spanish culture are estimated with the accuracy and fairness of the historical scholar. In dealing with overseas expansion and its effect upon Spain, the author is equally capable. He clearly portrays how colonization drained the mother-country of its best blood, its ablest administrators, and in the end contributed to its rapid political and economic decline. In the last chapter the author has sketched the developments of Spain during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. His treatment, although brief, helps toward an understanding of the difficult problems confronting present-day Spain. The book contains fifty admirably chosen collotype plate illustrations and an excellent bibliography.

Ballads and Poems, 1915-30. By Stephen Vincent Benét. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Stephen Benét has collected his verses of the past fifteen years and presented them in a single volume which indicates clearly that his is a talent for light verse in particular, for fantasy, gaiety, and facile lyricism. His later attempts at serious poetry are less successful than, for example, the delightful Rosemary poems of several years ago. When he would be serious, this poet is likely to show his worst faults: his overelaborate and at times absurd imagery, his too great agility in rhymes, his general superficiality of conception. But none of these faults mar seriously his light verse. And although he has not the intellectual wit or fine craftsmanship of the English light-verse writer Q (Quiller-Couch), he is probably one of the most graceful of the American ballad and parody writers.

Art

Bread Lines and a Museum

GRAY bread lines wound about city blocks refer us to the Museum of Modern Art. Pardon, this connection of the miserable state of things with the conduct of an institution for the appreciation of painting and sculpture is not frivolous, the phantom of a narrow aesthetic preoccupation, given to moonraking among splendid objects. It is a very pertinent and realistic one. Together with its purely aesthetic virtue, the work of art has a property, possibly identical with its aesthetic one, of intense practical value in a practical world; it has a power of quickening, orientating, humanizing. And when the effects of arrogance, insensitivity, and mismanagement shriek on every side, it is perhaps anything but irrelevant to recognize the partial responsibility of all those in whose hands one of society's best means of consciousness, vision, and self-knowledge is consistently misused—and, because of its strategic position, that of the well-meaning but pathetically blind management of the museum in the Heckscher building in particular.

Art—one is obliged to say it again and again—is not an entertainment. Art is a shock of reality, a communication of the sense of life. What is revealed to the colorist, the sculptor, the draftsman in inspiring visual and sensuous images or material balances is the present way of things and the forces at play in man, the wonder of creation in its affinitive horror and splendor, the exquisitely articulated structure of life. The pregnancy of his medium, the problem of the relationship of lines and shapes and volumes demanding solution by whatever means the artist has or can invent, is but the effect of the stimulating impact of life on his intimate philosophy, referred by his aesthetic nature to his material. The quality of the object he produces is itself merely the result of complete responsiveness to the vision or image or material balance; the power to reproduce itself in the mind; inhering in proportion to the force of the inspiring idea, and the relentlessness of the selection of detail making for clarification. In the beginning, there is the sense of life, the picture of things, the shorthand expression of what exists. And in the end, there is the sense of life, the system of values, the shorthand expression of what is at work and going on.

And what in the world is more generally useful than direct, untheoretical contact with things, to the man who wishes to sell a pair of shoes no less than to the statesman and philosopher in their watchtowers? The success of the narrowest as well as the widest interests very largely depends on it. It quickens and orientates and humanizes. It adjusts the balance. It yields intimations of the trend of the world, the state of human forces. Flaubert was perhaps not merely boastful when he asserted that had the authorities comprehended "L'éducation sentimentale," the Franco-Prussian War might have been avoided. And whether or not it can actually control the course of events, the sense of life can at least prepare for them, forearm for them. Even in distress and defeat the recognition of an impersonal, almost abstract adventure is the most serviceable of possessions, standing with the poor devil in the bread line, modifying even the ultimate agonies.

But the virtue inclosed in art as richly as in any other human product renders its light to society only when a sense like that which produced it presents it to the world. If the work of art is to function, the feeling of livingness, the intuition of the forces at play in man and in the continually changing balance of nature, must be as largely present in the showman, the museum director or curator, as in the artist himself. The director too must have the compulsion to clarify what is in process of creation, the sense that certain representations are well-nigh categorical and salutary because of all that is living today. Existence itself must always have an absolute meaning, interest, and satisfactoriness for him, no matter what its condition; even though tomorrow the heavens themselves should fall. Perception of quality is ultimately dependent on such artistic feeling; and the efficient showman must not only be able to recognize quality, he must be able to recognize what expressions are relevant to and illuminant of the present moment, and what ordering and disposition can help them to effectiveness. Above all, he must be able to understand the new expression almost unbearable because of its radicalism, its relation to what folk are living today and still not aware of—the truth that has not yet a name.

"FIDDLING" WHILE ROME BURNS

THEY say Nero "fiddled" while Rome burned. Probably just to show what a callous monster he was. Nero denied the story. Said he was out helping the firemen.

Really, it is difficult to believe that any human being could view such a frightful tragedy without emotion.

But the unhuman Robot can and does "fiddle" while the Art of Music starves—a human disaster of far greater consequence than the burning of Rome.

Those who believe that the Robot and his sponsors should be rebuked may join millions of others in the MUSIC DEFENSE LEAGUE by signing and mailing the coupon.

N-2-11
AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS
1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Without further obligation on my part, please enroll my name in the Music Defense League as one who is opposed to the elimination of Living Music from the Theatre.

Name ....
Address ....
City.............................. State..................

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS

(Comprising 140,000 professional musicians in the United States and Canada)

JOSEPH N. WEBER, President, 1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

for unforgettable impressions VISIT SOVIET RUSSIA

WORLD'S ENIGMA! THE FIVE YEAR PLAN!

Individually arranged tours or in small groups at as low as $255.—including return Steamship fare. Interesting itineraries. Frequent sailing dates. Write for Booklet "N"

AMALGAMATED BANK TRAVEL DEPT.

11-15 Union Square, New York City
and 111 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

☐ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT ☐

PLAYS TO SEE

*As You Desire Me—Maxine Elliott's—39 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Petticoat Influence—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†Private Lives—Times Square—W. 42 St.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
‡The New Yorkers—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Le Collier de la Reine—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
Cimarron—Globe—B'way and 46 St.
Free Love, beginning Sat., Feb. 7; Tol'able David, beginning Wed., Feb. 11—Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.
Nar Rosorna Sla Ut—(Swedish)—5 Ave. Playhouse—66 Fifth Ave.

MUSIC

Philharmonic Symphony, Molinari, conducting—Carnegie Hall—Thurs. eve., Feb. 5; Fri. aft., Feb. 6; Thurs. eve., Feb. 12, and Fri. aft., Feb. 13. Zimbalist, soloist. Thurs. eve., Feb. 19, and Sat. aft., Feb. 20.
Boston Symphony—Carnegie Hall—Fri. eve., Feb. 6.
Aguilar Lute Quartet—Columbia University—Sat. eve., Feb. 7.
Andres Segovia—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Feb. 8.
Yehudi Menuhin—Carnegie Hall—Mon. eve., Feb. 9.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Feb. 10.
Cyrena Van Gordon, Contralto—Carnegie Hall—Fri. eve., Feb. 13.
Serge Rachmaninoff—Carnegie Hall—Sat. aft., Feb. 14.
Myra Hess, pianist—Town Hall—Sun. aft., Feb. 15.
Friends of Music, Friedrich Schorr, soloist—Serious Songs of Brahms—Metropolitan Opera House—Sun. aft., Feb. 15.
Beethoven Association—Town Hall—Mon. eve., Feb. 16.
Musical Art Quartet—Town Hall—Tues. eve., Feb. 17.
Leon Theremin—Ether Wave Instrument—New School for Social Research—Tues. eve., Feb. 17.

Now, there can be no doubt that what has been absent in Washington, in Wall Street, all over the land has been the direct feeling of life. Unpreparedness has been almost criminal. And while it would be absurd to lay special blame for the almost universal failure on such things as museums of art, their form of inactivity is none the less too influential a contribution to the general stupefaction to bear passing over. They are the guardians of the sibyls, and have not been able to exploit their sentences. They have not found means of showing art significantly, relevantly. An amount of vital strategy no doubt is at work in certain of them. One glimpses it in Newark and Brooklyn. One hears of it in Boston. But it is not large—possibly on account of the terrific handicap under which the form of their bequests places the managements. Hampering provisos usually accompany them. Still, one suspects that the inefficacy of most of these institutions is due to something besides lack of funds. They frequently come into possession of important works, both old and new. They have ample opportunity to use their halls to reflect whatever illumination art can throw on life; and one tediously finds them grouping works by schools and periods. It is more likely that the nigger is a very vague sense of what art is all about.

That is what the Museum of Modern Art makes one feel. Few institutions are more admirably situated to refract the peculiar light of art than this one is. It is endowed to house running exhibits of contemporary and recent art. It has a metropolitan seat; it is free of the responsibility, incumbent on certain other galleries, of supporting a number of workers. While it has the general purpose of forming a permanent collection and of constituting the modern museum the Musée du Luxembourg so miserably fails of being, this objective would by no means interfere with its use of art to reflect and clarify the present world. But in the long year of its existence the museum has failed to make any genuine connection between art and life, and has succeeded only in compromising the endeavor it pretends to foster. True, it has advertised modern art; and it has shown many interesting works by important contemporaries. But in all its exhibitions there has been no vestige of a creative idea; no order, significance, development. It began by showing the work of four dead Frenchmen; and followed it by an exhibition of nineteen living Americans, in which good and bad, important and unimportant work was jumbled together. None of its shows have been living issues. Daumier hung on its walls awhile, but his social revolutionary idea was not built up into the present through Forain and the rest of his successors. A number of inferior Americans have made their appearance there; meanwhile, the idea of a photographic show has been rejected by the direction; nor is there any sign of an architectural or a water-color exhibition. And yet photography, architecture, and water color happen to be three arts particularly germane to the present American temper, and of great future importance.

Not only are all vestiges of ideas wanting in the exhibits; traces of a sense of quality are equally absent. While Mr. Goodyear and his henchmen have shown Paul Klee, they have also thought fit to introduce Hassam, Tack, and others of like accomplishment into a museum of "modern" art. The directors seem to have no sense of workmanship, of what is good and what is bad, of what is interesting as "life" and art and what is dead. Nor have the exhibits been hung with effect or point. And the lighting is indifferent. And the background is inappropriate. Indeed, one is finally obliged to ask whether, in their blind attempts to advertise modern art, these gentlemen have not befuddled the whole issue and confused the present American effort to produce the seer, the artist.

Again, let us repeat, it is with regret that we find ourselves forced to challenge the museums, in particular the Museum of Modern Art. The intentions of the latter have been especially serious. Its attitude has been most kindly. Its benefactions have been numerous. But when the country, beginning with the Eminent Personage in the White House, seems to be suffering from nothing so much as from an incapacity to face reality and accept the world as it is, it is perhaps a not unpardonable offense to point to the misuse of a power most gloriously able to correct the all-too-human tendency to evade the facts.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Music

Toscanini

ON the occasion of Mr. Toscanini's vacation from the conductor's stand of the Philharmonic Symphony Society it is perhaps worth while to consider a few of the elements that contribute to his extraordinary artistic and popular success. It may as well be admitted at the outset that a portion of his spell is in the remarkable magnetic force of his personality. There are certain artists, oratorical and dramatic as well as musical, who, although not by any means all of equal artistic stature, make the same sort of direct personal appeal. Each listener or spectator at times feels a special personal understanding and sympathy, even affection, for the artist. Briand, Duse, Chaplin, Kreisler, Myra Hess—all have worked, in varying degrees, this same sort of personal spell. With Chaplin, of course, it is an integral part of his art—he has the good fortune to be his own interpreter. In orators, actors, and musicians it is a dangerous power, and the listener needs constant critical alertness to separate the artistic from the quasi-hypnotic.

But the force of this power wears off a good deal after frequent hearings over a considerable period. Mr. Toscanini can still burn us with the ecstasy of Wagner or Brahms. But he gives us almost no illusion of warmth nowadays from the tepid theatrics of his composer-countrymen. The spell of the magnetic personality enhances the effect of whatever truly artistic ability its owner possesses long after its power to deceive has worn off. That is to say, the truly great qualities of an interpreter can be adequately observed only when the material he interprets is adequate. Just as full knowledge of a composer's greatness can be approached only when the greatest performers give life to his conceptions, so the insight of such interpreters can be fully measured only in the greatest works.

It is frequently objected that certain works of the masters are imperfect as to form or mediocre as to content, and that to make them seem perfectly proportioned or weighty with meaning is to inject something that does not belong to them. Toscanini's performance of the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven is instanced. It is true that under his baton it seems better unified, less repetitious, than ordinarily. But the fact that even so one still hears imperfections in the work is proof that he has merely penetrated farther into its inner logic than most of us—not added to it, nor glossed over real faults.

Complete absorption in the music itself is the condition upon which excellent performance is based, I think, and Toscanini fulfils it more completely, perhaps, than any other musician. The extraordinary thing with him is that he is acutely alert to a whole work at once. His architectural sense consists not in an understanding of the structural plan but in a feeling for it as intense as Kreisler's feeling for the phrase.

He is, in the best sense, phenomenally long-winded; he can play on a single rhythmic "breath" for minutes on end. And this is exactly what the greatest composers demand—

COVICI• FRIEDE

"Belongs to the honorable company of novels of pathology . . . it is powerful because it is frank, open and unashamed."
—Harry Hansen.

●

$2.50 At All Bookstores
COVICI • FRIEDE • PUBLISHERS

A JEW IN LOVE
BY BEN HECHT

HOW LONG WOULD IT TAKE a line of 20,000 people to pass in and out of your shop?

There are in and about New York, 20,000 readers of The Nation, all of whom have the means and taste, to purchase in your shop if you have something unusual and of value to offer.

Rates: $6.16 per inch single insertions, $5.55 per inch for ten or more insertions.

For further information write

Shopper's Corner
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York

Monday Eve., February 9th, at 8:15
MAX EASTMAN
will speak on
"MARXISM and LENINISM"
(THE SCIENCE OF REVOLUTION)
at the
LABOR TEMPLE AUDITORIUM
14th STREET and SECOND AVENUE Admission, 35c.

WEST SIDE FORUM
West Side Meeting House - - 550 West 110th Street, New York, N. Y.
TUESDAY EVE., FEB. 10th, at 8:15
SYMPOSIUM—"THE WORLD CRISIS"
CAPITALISM - - - - - - PROF. J. P. CHAMBERLAIN
SOCIALISM - - - - - - McALSITER COLEMAN
COMMUNISM - - - - - - MAX BEDACHT
Subscription 50c. - Members 25c.

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 EAST 15th STREET Al 4-3094
JOHN DEWEY Mon., Feb. 9, 8:30 p.m.
Author "Human Nature and Conduct"
"Historic Individualism and Collective Industry"
GEORGE SOULE Sat., Feb. 6, 2 p.m.
Asso. Editor "New Republic"
"Can the Business Cycle Be Eliminated"
Tickets on Sale in Advance
Write or phone for further information

INDIA TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES
Edited by HARIDAS T. MUZUMDAR, M.A., Ph.D.
Gandhi's Companion on the March to the Sea.
Author of "Gandhi the Apostle," etc.

No. 1. INDIA'S NON-VIOLENT REVOLUTION
No. 2. PESHAWAR: THE EPIC STORY OF MEN VERSUS MACHINE GUNS
No. 3. THE BREAKDOWN OF PEACE NEGOTIATIONS
No. 4. THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE
No. 5. THE UNITED STATES OF INDIA

INDIA'S NON-VIOLENT REVOLUTION, by Dr. Muzumdar, just off the press, is destined to be an epoch-making volume. It portrays the personality of Mahatma Gandhi and graphically describes India's "Battle for Freedom." 25 cents per copy; 5 copies for one dollar.

A copy of India's Declaration of Independence will be sent free to all subscribers.

To make sure of your full set of the five volumes promptly send in a dollar to deep breaths, taken seldom. (I call a breath the moment of rhythmic relaxation, the caesura, that comes at the end of a musical idea.) The immense difficulty of proper rhythmic breathing is twofold. Refusal to yield anything to the demands of the phrasing results in the inflexible, nervous, often exciting performances of Landowska and Samuel. Preoccupation with individual phrases to the exclusion of their place in the larger scheme leads men like Koussevitzky and Iturbi into fragmentary and sentimental performances. The latter tendency is by far the more common and the one that Toscanini never shows. On the other hand, he does occasionally tend toward inflexibility (as in the Beethoven First Symphony, early in the season). Perhaps at these times, for one reason or another, the emotional content of the music is less vivid to him than usual, and he falls back on classical conviction and principle.

INDIA TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES
20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

Besides his extraordinary rhythmic understanding, and connected with it, his greatest single distinction is in the phenomenal climaxes that he builds. "The word crescendo," said Hans von Bülow, "implies piano." Ritardando, he might have added, implies accelerando. There are physical limits to dynamic intensity and rhythmic deliberation, and one can make a climax really loud and really deliberate chiefly by contrast with what has preceded it. To hear Toscanini build a climax, carefully holding back his crescendo and his retard, is to realize for the first time the full import of Bülow's remark. Without any forcing of tone and without the slightest exaggeration of the rhythmic emphasis he achieves climaxes for which the overworked word "incandescent" is truly appropriate.

In a small space it is possible to hint at only the most salient virtues of so extraordinary a man. But when one considers his unfailing virtuosity and the versatility of his imagination, in music from Mozart to Wagner and from "La Mer" to "Pacific 231," one begins to realize the height of the standards by which we now must judge conductors. And Mr. Molinari, who stands the test amazingly well, must realize that the warmth of his reception is temperate only because we hear him through ears made cruelly fastidious.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Drama

Oklahoma and the Riviera

MUCH has been made of the novelty which Lynn Riggs slipped into Broadway through one of its many side doors when the Theater Guild last week put on his Indian Territory folk-play, "Green Grow the Lilacs" (Guild Theater). It was indeed a novelty, but I suspect that the discussion of it has for the most part lacked the proper emphasis. There has been a tendency, for instance, to say that Mr. Riggs with one puff blew artifice out of the theater, replacing it with the strong, free, natural air of life as it is lived, or was lived, in one very real portion of this inhabited continent. If there was something naive and undramatic about the piece, that didn't at all matter—in fact, it made it what it was, and stood as nothing less than a guaranty of the author's sincerity, and of his desire to bring a full-bodied population into the region of thin wings.

But "Green Grow the Lilacs" was packed with devices that are very old on this or any other stage; it thronged with easily recognizable properties; it was one of the least natural pieces imaginable. The hero, for instance, was a cowboy—and might not one have expected that he would be fine and hearty, rough but good, with a grand flow of words on every occasion except that of his wooing, when of course he would be stricken dumb? Might not one have foreseen, given as setting an Oklahoma farmhouse, the presence there of somebody's old aunt, a woman with a kind and knowing heart but with a pretty tart tongue? Couldn't one have looked forward to seeing a lovely, timid heroine threatened by a dark, designing villain with a dirty mind—a hired man, perhaps? What would be surprising about the arrival of a Jewish peddler with a derby on his ears and with a pack of trinkets at his feet which he gesticulatingly recommended? Might there not also be a fat, ridiculous neighbor girl whose gaucherie would contrast with the rather miraculous grace of the heroine, though both were farmer misses? And wouldn't such a contrast make a pleasant parallel to the contrast already established between the sunny-hearted cowboy and the dark-minded hired man? Nor would a rustic dance be out of order, or a set of local songs.

Of such things was Mr. Riggs's piece composed. Which is not saying at all that it was anything less than it should be. It should have been, and decidedly was, a play that could be thoroughly enjoyed in the theater. The theater is not an exhibit hall for nature, it is hardly convertible into a museum of ethnology. Mr. Riggs must have known very well what he was about when he refrained from taxing the powers of his audience's attention in the mere matter of plot. He made his story conventional so that we could be free to listen to his language. That was his novelty, and that deserves the praise. I haven't the slightest idea whether the speeches he put into his people's mouths were authentic or not, nor do I care; but I know that they were good to hear—rich, full, and carefully flavored. After the first few minutes, in which they seemed a bit forced, we became accustomed to them and soon got to listening for only them. It is really an event on Broadway when the audience grows interested in the language of a play. In that sense "Green Grow the Lilacs" was a triumph, and an important one. Also, it was triumphantly staged. Franchot Tone, Helen Westley, June Walker, and Richard Hale contributed greatly to the success of the whole affair, since their acting was lively and imaginative. And the group-singing of old songs between the scenes was done with precisely the proper lack of professional pose.

I suppose that the critic who would rave over the freshness of Mr. Riggs's play would rave over the staleness of "Private Lives," Noel Coward's new bit of fluff at the Times Square Theater. But "Private Lives" is stale only in so far as we have seen almost exactly the same thing done a number of times before. To an Oklahoma cowboy I can imagine it coming with a very considerable degree of novelty. The folkways of sophisticates in the Midi—the long, slender cigarette-holders, the gigantic brandy glasses, the mysteries of overnight divorce, the subtle sense of just what is tiresome in conversation and what is not—these would have their fascination. This would be a folk-play, too. The only difference for us is that we know the folk. Mr. Coward relies upon that knowledge, and succeeds chiefly by what he does not say. He does manage to give a neat, new turn to the old story; and he does manage to keep his audience laughing from first to last by appealing to their further knowledge of what it would be old stuff to have his ladies and gentlemen remark in the familiar crises that come with coffee and cocktails. The dialogue is certainly funny, and the whole thing is very amusing. The effect of the brief speeches, however, depends so entirely upon the situations in which they are made tonight that it will be quite impossible to remember them tomorrow. One will remember the delicious acting of Mr. Coward and of Gertrude Lawrence. But in what play?

Samuel Shipman's "She Means Business" (Ritz Theater) is about woman in the office and the home, and it is probably true. But in no sense whatever is it original.

MARK VAN DOREN

□ RENTALS □

ATTRACTIVELY furnished 3-room apartment (Grand Piano) in the Bronx, until April 1st. Call Raymond 9-4145, mornings.

SEVENTY-FOURTH ST. EAST. Studio 12x16, with excellent North light for artist; three smaller rooms and large sunny kitchen, in rear, two fire places, hot water and bath. $40. CHelsea 4213.

SHARE APARTMENT

BUSINESS or professional woman to share privileges of apartment Gramercy region. Fireplaces, kitchen. Box 272, c/o The Nation.

TWO girls desire girl to share beautifully furnished 3 rooms, kitchen and bath apartment. Sacrifice $30. monthly. W. 39th Street. Wis. 7-0527.

STUDIO

STUDIO apartment, day use, by month, week or hour, suitable artist, writer, musician, etc. Excellent north light, grand piano, fireplace; attractively furnished, centrally located, reasonable. Call Miss Jewel, Rector 7850, days.

SHOPPER'S CORNER

RESTFUL READING

WONDERCLIPS hold pages from springing back. Make reading easier—more fun. Used also as napkin holders or paper clips. Best shops, or send direct. Copper or Bronze, $1.00 per pair; Silver, $1.20; Gold or Cromium, $1.50. Any initial.

UNITEX CO. - - 1860 Broadway, New York

REAL ESTATE

SUMMER CONFERENCE CENTER

At non-profit rates, Putnam County center available for small conferences and seminars. Details and reservations, apply J. COUNT, 285 Madison Avenue, New York.

IN ADIRONDACKS, Gas Station and Tea Room on N. Y. City to Montreal pavement; overlooks Lake Champlain. Make your vacations pay. $1,900.00. $700 cash. 6 years on balance. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

HOME WANTED

REAL HOME WANTED

Wanted, a real home in New York City for two high school boys, 13-15. Prefer Jewish family. $85 monthly for both. Box 273, c/o The Nation.

HOME FOR CHILDREN

By week, month or year in beautiful country home, near excellent private and public schools.

MRS. NORA VAN LEEUWEN
Harmon-on-Hudson, N. Y. Tel.: Croton 469
References: Dr. Ira S Wile, Dr. S. Ellsberg and others.

TOURS

SOVIET RUSSIA
A NEW TRAVEL FIELD

THREE TOURS
Departures:
July 1 · July 4 · July 8

Additional features: North Cape, Sweden, Finland and Continental Europe . . . Inclusive rates from $763. New York to New York.

Co-operation in Russia of the Official Travel Bureau of the Soviet Government.

Full particulars from

THOS. COOK & SON
587 Fifth Avenue, New York
Philadelphia Boston Baltimore Washington
Chicago St. Louis San Francisco Los Angeles
Toronto Montreal Vancouver

AROUND COOL SOUTH AMERICA THIS SUMMER — $800

This untrodden continent awaits you. Pleasure. Culture. Economy. [illegible] miles [illegible] travel. 1300 miles rail deluxe. 19 colorful cities. Two glorious months. All inclusive. Write for Folder Y

1st Class THRUOUT

PACIFIC ERA TRAVELS, INC.
307 Crary Bldg., Seattle 112 E. 19th St., New York

Prince Max and the Peace Treaty

[Margrave Berthold of Baden has just made public a letter which his father, Prince Max of Baden, wrote a few days before his death to Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald. Prince Max saw clearly, as far back as 1919, that the inequities of the Versailles treaty unless corrected were likely to lead to national and social upheaval in Europe, and as recently as October, 1929, he predicted that a Germany deprived of hope with respect to revision of the treaty would turn away from peaceful means of obtaining liberation. The statement of Margrave Berthold in which the letter is incorporated is here published in English for the first time.]

I AM in a position today to make public the letter which my father, Prince Max of Baden, wrote to the British Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, in October, 1929, in answer to a message of sympathy which he had received on his sick bed. This was his last letter; he died on November 6, 1929.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER FROM PRINCE MAX OF BADEN TO MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD

Salem-Baden, October 7, 1929

I wish I could profess my faith in the League of Nations, but such a profession would be a lie coming from me. Only considerations of expediency can lead the German nation to Geneva as long as there is no hope of undoing the wrong of Germany's eastern and the Austro-Italian frontier.

I am sure we still ought to wait for many years to come, and my last message to my countrymen will be a plea for patience, but in this letter I think it incumbent upon me to utter a frank warning: without any hope, however distant, of the revision of the Versailles treaty Germany will not look to pacifism for her liberation. Those who believe in force as the dominant factor abroad and are encouraged by Italy's example even at home draw their strength from the Versailles treaty and its broken pledges. (I may refer here to my analysis of the agreement of the Fourteen Points of November 5, 1918, in the second volume of my "Memoirs," page 369.)

Millions of Germans are ready to believe in the new world which you have proclaimed at Geneva, provided they are made to feel that at least the Labor Party of Great Britain is ready to face the realities of the international situation and is loath to see the grand structure erected on a rotten foundation; so that we are not called upon any more to regard the Versailles treaty as a holy shrine which ought not to be tampered with.

[Signed] MAX PRINCE OF BADEN

The analysis of the Fourteen Points to which my father refers in this letter was first published on June 11, 1919, as a last warning against the signing of the treaty.* It is perhaps appropriate to quote the following passages:

> If the Treaty of Versailles now comes in place of peace, then the 15,000,000 who will be de trop [sic] in Germany cannot be expected simply to die out quietly, and thus if Germany's fetters are not broken, we shall experience a fratricidal struggle more terrible than all that war and the armistice have brought upon us.
>
> The newly created Poland, too, would become the scene of uninterrupted struggles for liberation.
>
> Even should the inconceivable happen and a German government be found ready to give up Upper Silesia or East Prussia or West Prussia, these German territories would not be willing to give up Germany.
>
> To establish by force a Polish imperialism as planned by the Entente means doing a great wrong even to the Poles themselves, who would be able to administer a national state but are not equal to the task of ruling one composed of heterogeneous nationalities.
>
> The Poles are unscrupulous guardians of the national minorities intrusted to their care—today just as much so as in the days of the Polish republic. I need only refer to the news of Polish pogroms which is now appearing daily in the English press, in particular to the report of the American food expert, Mr. Zuckermann (Manchester Guardian of May 9), on the massacre at Pinsk, which was furthered by the local authorities and condoned by the government.
>
> To put the peace treaty into execution means moving the frontier . . . of the pogrom countries further west.
>
> Here the objection may be made that revision will soon come even if Germany signs. There is a mistake in the calculation here. On the conclusion of peace the victors will first of all be occupied in celebrations and festivities, and after that their own internal problems will absorb all the available energy of the peoples. . . . There will be no demand on the part of public opinion for the statesmanlike effort necessary to save and reorganize Europe. And such a demand is the only thing that really counts.
>
> It is true that revision of the peace treaty would be bound to come, even after signature; but it would come piecemeal and haphazard. On every hand the oppressed would break loose from their chains. Europe would become a chaos of national and social upheaval.

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN THOMAS, who has been repeatedly characterized as "New York's most useful private citizen," is a contributing editor of The Nation.

A. ROBBINS, editor of the Hickman (Kentucky) Courier, is disaster chairman of the local Red Cross chapter.

ISABEL PATERSON, author of "The Road of the Gods," is on the staff of Books of the New York Herald Tribune.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is in the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

WALTER KIEN, on the staff of Brown University, is an authority on German and Scandinavian literature.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art" and "The Boy in the Sun" and one of the editors of "The American Caravan."

---

* This article was first printed in the Berliner Tageblatt and has since been reprinted in the "Memoirs of Prince Max of Baden." Authorized translation by W. M. Calder and C. W. H. Sutton. London: Constable and Company, 1928.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1931 No. 3424

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 167
EDITORIALS:
- The Bonus Raid 170
- Mr. Stimson Explains 171
- Diplomats and Peace 171
- Sport for Sport's Sake 172

INDIA AND THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE. By George Slocombe 173
GOING HOME. By Mark Van Doren 174
BALLYHOO AND THE HIGHER LEARNING. By Benjamin Stolberg 175
TRAGIC CONCLUSIONS. By Virginia Moore 177
YOUR GASOLINE TANK. By Lawrence M. Hughes 178
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 180
CORRESPONDENCE 181

MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION

FOUR PRELUDES. By Conrad Aiken 183
THE FETISH OF SIMPLICITY. By Isidor Schneider 184
BOOKS:
- George Jean Nathan. By Henry Hazlitt 186
- A Daniel for Shylock. By Granville Hicks 187
- The Facts About Prohibition. By Peter H. Odegard 188
- A Duchess and a Dancer. By Freda Kirchwey 190
- Mr. Shorey's Plato. By Scott Buchanan 190
- Welcome the Counterfeit. By Gerald Sykes 192
- Brandes on Voltaire. By Clifton P. Fadiman 193
- Books in Brief 194
- Art: A Painter of the Machine Age. By Matthew Josephson 196
- Drama: The Theater of Phrases. By Mark Van Doren 198
- Films: Glories of the "Epic." By Alexander Bakshy 199

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 200

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENR RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE QUARREL between Mr. Hoover and the Senate over the question of drought relief seems likely, as we go to press, to be settled by the adoption of the $20,000,000 loan "compromise." If Secretary Hyde's interpretation of the terms of the proposal is correct no part of the fund could be used directly for the purchase of food for hungry farmers and their families. Thus the main purpose of the compromise from the Senate's standpoint would be defeated. An examination of the loan plan reveals the correctness of Mr. Hyde's position. As it is now written the farmer would have to pledge some of his goods as security for the loan. Those without property or other security would get no money and therefore no relief. Those still possessing property or other valuable goods—and few are the starving tenant farmers in the South and Southwest who are so fortunate—would be privileged to borrow from the $20,000,000 fund, but their situation is doubly unfortunate if they are forced to borrow money to spend on food. In buying seed or equipment they would at least have the means of producing crops, from the proceeds of which the loan could be repaid, but in buying food they would simply be eating up this extra capital without at the same time augmenting their means of repaying the debt. It is clear that the compromise represents a victory for Mr. Hoover and a complete rout of the Senate. Moreover, it does not give the slightest consideration to the jobless in the cities, who outnumber the needy farmers and who are just as hungry and destitute as they are. A conscientious Senate would refuse to accept this deceptive and inadequate compromise.

THE WAR-TIME ESPIONAGE ACT still defaces the statute book. Senator Walsh of Montana, its author, introduced in the Senate a bill for its repeal and secured a favorable report from the Judiciary Committee, whereupon the Senate unanimously passed the repeal measure. The House referred the bill to its Judiciary Committee, and there is little hope of its being reported out unless public pressure is brought to bear. The Espionage Act, it will be recalled, instead of being repealed was simply suspended till the "next emergency," and the section giving the Post Office Department power to exclude from the mails any matter that it regards as seditious was left in effect. Under this section four radical papers have been barred from the mails in recent months. The Senate Judiciary Committee is "of the view that it is unwise to invest the Post Office authorities with the power to determine whether an article . . . in a newspaper does or does not offend against this statute," which "has been so administered as to make it to all intents and purposes a censorship law." The operation of the act during the war was worse than unsatisfactory; the continuance of its post-office provisions in peace time is an anachronism; and the Senate committee rightly thinks that we had better leave to Congress the enactment of proper legislation in the unhappy event of another war. Readers who want to help should write promptly to Representative George S. Graham, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

THE TARIFF COMMISSION, acting in response to Senate resolutions, has reported on seven commodities, and the President, acting on its recommendation, has raised the rate on woven-wire fencing, lowered the rates on wood flour, pigskin leather, straw hats, and maple sugar, and left unchanged the duties on ultramarine blue and wood floor coverings. Even after the reductions, wood flour alone pays less than it did previous to the rate increases of 1930. The commission attributes the speed of its action to its decision "to use foreign invoice prices as evidence of, or as a supplement to, foreign cost data, as provided in the statute." The whole theory that tariff rates can be exactly fixed on the basis of differences in cost of production is absurd. The commission reports, for example, that it costs twenty-two cents a pound to make maple sugar in the United States and fifteen and eight-tenths cents in Canada, which is plain nonsense. There are as many costs of producing maple sugar in the United States as there are farmers producing it. The only question is how much you think it worth while to hamper imports by a tax. Luckily, in four out of the seven cases above the commission decides on less obstruction rather than more. To indicate the measure of our enlightenment on the question of international trade, the Commerce Committee of the Senate has just decided by a vote of nine to six to report favorably a bill prohibiting the importation of crude oil in excess of 16,000,000 barrels annually during the coming three years. Apparently the pressure of the small operators, unable to maintain themselves, in the face of the depression, against their big competitors, has been too much for the Senate committee. It will take more than an embargo, however, to make all our oil operators prosperous.

AN INTERESTING LEGAL SITUATION has developed as a result of the Senate's action on the nominations of Messrs. Smith, Garsaud, and Draper as members of the Federal Power Commission. Despite President Hoover's refusal to return the papers of confirmation, the Senate proceeded to a reconsideration of the nominations and confirmed Messrs. Garsaud and Draper by narrow majorities, but rejected Chairman Smith by a vote of forty to thirty-three. Following this vote, the Senate passed a resolution directing the district attorney for the District of Columbia to institute quo warranto proceedings against Mr. Smith. We thus have the chairman of the commission holding office under what the President, acting upon the advice of the Attorney General, maintains is a perfectly legal appointment, while the Senate, acting through a subordinate official of the Department of Justice, seeks to have the appointment declared illegal. The case is believed to be entirely without precedent and it involves interesting questions of constitutional law. However it may be determined, almost irreparable damage has been done to the prestige of the new power commission.

THE PROPOSED MERGER of the Standard Oil Company of New York and the Vacuum Oil Company, former subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, which was attacked by the Department of Justice as a violation of the Standard Oil dissolution decree of 1909, was approved by the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis on February 7. It is announced that an appeal will be taken promptly to the Supreme Court. The judges hold that the proposed merger is "an entirely new undertaking" supported by "sound business reasons" which are "wholly unconnected with any desire to create a monopoly." The possible significance of the decision in respect to the marketing of petroleum products, notably gasoline, is indicated in a striking article that we publish elsewhere in this issue, describing the business rivalries that lie back of the proposed merger. If the decision is sustained by the Supreme Court, it is considered probable that further consolidations of former Standard Oil units may be brought about, and in view of changed business conditions and changing public opinion there is no telling just how far the courts may go in permitting such mergers.

THE RECOMMENDATIONS by Owen D. Young of a thoroughgoing revision of our national banking laws will deservedly carry weight with the Senate Banking and Currency Committee before which they were made. But though Mr. Owen Young has evidently thought much on the subject, he does not appear to have thought enough. In his formal statement he recommends, in one breath, that State as well as national banks be legally compelled to become members of the Federal Reserve System, and in the next breath he proposes that if unsound practices are persisted in by any member bank, the Federal Reserve Board may expel it from membership. Obviously Mr. Young has not made up his mind whether membership in the Federal Reserve System should be made a duty or a privilege. Nor does he indicate what is to happen to the expelled bank. Again, Mr. Young's whole statement implies that the main cure of our banking evils lies in Federal Reserve control; yet he admits that as one of the directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York he was delinquent in his own duty in failing to recommend the raising of the rediscount rate in 1928, and he points out that when the bank's directors did approve a rise of the rediscount rate beginning in February, 1929, the Federal Reserve Board week after week turned their recommendation down. It was precisely the Federal Reserve Board, in other words—whether through timidity, lack of intelligence, or purely political motives does not at present concern us—that was responsible for a fundamentally unsound banking practice in 1928 and 1929. What guaranty is there that if the board had more power it would follow sounder practices?

TRADE FIGURES FOR 1930 just made public by the Department of Commerce indicate plainly the business folly behind the wild attempts now being made at Washington to hamstring trade with Russia. Out of thirty-eight countries listed, Russia alone showed increases in our export and import figures last year. The press has been filled with tales of Russian dumping. In fact, we bought $21,520,000 worth of goods from the Soviet Union in 1929 and $21,963,000 worth in 1930—an increase of $443,000. On the other hand, our sales to the Russians came to $81,500,000 in 1929 and $111,300,000 in 1930, a year when our trade with every other country reported fell off disastrously, our total exports declining by a full one-fourth from $5,241,000,000 to $3,843,000,000, and our imports falling proportionately. We sold Russia in 1930 five dollars' worth of goods for every dollar's worth that Russia sold us. The Russians pay their bills and they increase their purchases at this time when all other countries have to cut theirs. With millions of men out of work because our factories cannot get orders and with one country in the world able and willing to give us more orders, our statesmen go out of their way to kick that one customer in the face because, forsooth, that customer is Communist.

THE WASHINGTON ADMINISTRATION has managed awkwardly to escape the embarrassment of having to try Major General Smedley D. Butler by court martial. We shall probably never know the truth of Butler's allegation that Mussolini had run down and killed a little girl with his automobile and then had unhesitatingly driven on with the remark: "What is one life in the affairs of the state?" But we do know that little or no good, at least as far as Washington's relations with Rome were concerned, could have come out of a military trial. A public hearing would have been unavoidable, and the consequent widespread and protracted public discussion of the case, together with the renewed editorial comment on it, could only have added to Washington's embarrassment. It is alleged that representations from the Italian Ambassador, who was not unaffected, doubtless, by the widespread protest the court martial evoked in Washington and elsewhere, caused the State Department to recommend that the trial be dropped. In any event, it is just as well that someone learned in time that the Administration had overreached itself in paying its compliments to the Dictator of Italy.

THE FRENCH LOANS to Poland, Rumania, and Jugoslavia, to an aggregate amount of 1,500,000,000 francs, together with French participation in a proposed German loan of $32,000,000, are indicative of a radical change in the loan policy of French banks. Since the World War France has been an inconsiderable factor in the foreign-loan market, partly, of course, because of the heavy financial cost of reconstruction, but also because French investors lacked confidence in foreign securities and French fiscal policy burdened the export of capital with taxes and other charges. Meantime gold by the billion has flowed into the Bank of France, and for the most part remained there. Now, thanks to recent legislation, foreign loans have been made easier, and a change of government policy has also changed public opinion. The latter influence is probably quite as important as the former, since government approval, not infrequently with more or less of urging, has usually been necessary to induce a Frenchman to part with his money. The loans of 500,000,000 francs each to Poland, Rumania, and Jugoslavia are to be made to three of France's political allies, and political as well as financial considerations doubtless lie back of them. The loan to Germany suggests that German credit is believed to be good and that serious political difficulties between the two countries are not expected. Whether the loans mean that France is to become a close competitor of Great Britain and the United States as a lending nation cannot yet, of course, be safely predicted, but French gold is at least being put at work.

ELECTIONS IN SPAIN, unknown for seven years past in that distracted country, are at last to be held, those for the Congress, or lower house, on March 1 and those for the Senate on March 15. The Cortes, or Parliament, is to meet on March 25. The royal decree calling the elections speaks briefly of the need of restoring parliamentary government after a long period of dictatorship, refers to "grave problems" facing the country that need legislative treatment, and points to the necessity of various constitutional changes. With the announcement of the elections goes also the restoration, formally at least, of freedom of speech, of the press, and of political and religious organization. On its face the decree makes good the assurance given by General Berenguer several months ago of an early return to parliamentary methods, and to that extent may be regarded as a victory for those who have long opposed the dictatorship. There is nothing to indicate, however, that the monarchical system is to be in any material respect altered, and the radical groups which have been demanding a republic may be expected to continue their agitation. Curiously, while the center and moderate left parties are reported ready to boycott the elections as a means of emphasizing their protest against the dictatorship, the Communists, who intended to abstain, have changed their minds and will name candidates for both the Congress and the Senate. The next few weeks promise to be a period of stirring political discussion.

FROM GERMANY one of the most discouraging pieces of news in recent years is the announcement that economic circumstances have compelled the famous liberal newspaper, the Frankfurter Zeitung, to dispose of a large part of its stock to the German dye trust. Thus one of the few remaining independent journals of the country has fallen under the influence of the industrialists. The Frankfurter Zeitung successfully withstood Bismarck's bulldozing and his vicious libel suits; it retained its freedom despite the efforts of Kaiser Wilhelm II to force his naval, colonial, and Bagdad policies down its editorial throat; it stood fast against the war censorship; and even during the great uncertainties of the inflation period it defeated the efforts of Hugo Stinnes to undermine its authority and independence. Now at last, to quote the Berlin Tagebuch, it has fallen victim to the present "economic and political terror." What Bismarck, Wilhelm, Ludendorff, and Stinnes failed to accomplish, the present crisis has achieved. To the Tagebuch it seems impossible that a newspaper like the Frankfurter Zeitung could ever descend to the level of other German journals which now have become blatantly fascist organs, and it also admits that the dye trust is not quite of the "cannibalistic type of our heavy industrialists," but nevertheless it has already noticed in the Frankfurter Zeitung "a growing sympathy for those destructive political and economic ideas which would previously have been wholly out of place in its columns, and at the same time there has been a departure from those ideas which heretofore had been so warmly supported."

FROM WEEK TO WEEK this paper is on the alert for constructive suggestions with which to edify its readers. Our thought for the current week is that Captain Malcolm Campbell and his torpedo racing car ought to be abolished forthwith. The whole performance, by which the captain attained a speed of 245 miles an hour—for 14.5 seconds—is without justification in nature, science, enterprise, or art. The car itself looks like a mechanical sausage; it is geared so that it cannot travel at much less than fifty miles an hour, and when the brake is released it shoots forward, in low speed, threatening to dislocate the neck of the unwary occupant. Its radiator, so we are told, must be filled with ice; it requires a new set of tires after every trial. Captain Campbell drove it over a course twelve miles long—five and a half miles for a start, one mile for the furious, top-speed test, five and a half miles to slow down to a stop. If there were any course sufficiently long and straight for an actual hour's run, it is plain that any car ever constructed would be shaken to pieces in the struggle. What would happen to the driver we cannot even conjecture. Captain Campbell himself declares he is not in the least thrilled by the adventure, and is only desirous of traveling at a speed of 300 miles an hour—for 12 seconds—before his racing days are over. He is thus risking his neck for nothing, not even a personal thrill. And the silly spectators who "watch" the "race" are rewarded by a loud noise and a blur. Compared to this sort of automobile racing, Tom Thumb golf is an intellectual exercise.

The Bonus Raid

ALL the testimony of bankers and industrial leaders before the House Ways and Means Committee, even when allowance is made for those who weakened their remarks by obvious overstatement, made clear that the payment of a cash bonus of $3,400,000,000 at this time could only bring about most damaging economic results for the whole country, with greater eventual injury than benefit to the great majority of the veterans themselves. Most of the bankers expressed grave doubt that a bond issue of the size originally contemplated could be sold at all. To sell such an issue in 1917 and 1918, under the enormous enthusiasm of war psychology, with the posters, four-minute speeches, "quotas," threats and social pressure, plus the suspension of municipal and other construction work at that time to prevent any competition for funds, proved extremely difficult. If such an issue failed now, it is hard to estimate how serious the effect would be. Even if it succeeded, it would not only depress the market value of all outstanding bonds, with all the possible dangerous effects on the solvency of many banks whose portfolios have already suffered heavily by shrinkage in values, but it would absorb the available investment funds of the country to such an extent that the very capital that is so greatly needed at this time for municipal, State, and industrial construction could not be raised. The inevitable effect would be not only to make present conditions worse, but to postpone the period when more jobs—the only permanent form of relief—would be available. The spending of these cash payments by the veterans would not be likely to hasten any real return to better conditions. Most of the money would probably find its way into the luxury trades, giving them a temporary fillip. As one witness remarked, the effect would be much like that of a hypodermic injection, with no more lasting results.

It is not, however, mainly because of its serious economic consequences that the proposed cash payment is vicious, but because it has no real moral justification. Its proponents put it forward at the present time under the pretense that it is a measure of unemployment or distress relief; as such it is a palpable fraud. Under its proposed terms young doctors, lawyers, stockbrokers, and bankers who served in the war would receive exactly as much as men out of work; men with dependents would receive no more than men without them. Further, as most of the veterans, at the time of the war, were between the ages of eighteen and thirty, the cash payment would only reach men now between certain age limits—say thirty to forty-five. Such men are likely to be at the peak of their earning power. The proposed bonus payment would not, of course, go to unemployed unmarried women at all.

The complete dishonesty of the proposed soldiers' bonus as a measure of unemployment relief was unintentionally made clear in the statement of Owen D. Young before the House Ways and Means Committee, though Mr. Young was in favor of granting at least part of this bonus. He remarked that there are perhaps 5,000,000 persons out of work and that there are nearly 50,000,000 persons still gainfully employed. If one accepts these figures, it means that only about 10 per cent of the veterans—assuming that they suffer in about the same proportion as the rest of the population—are actually out of work, while the remaining 90 per cent are employed. But this means that 90 per cent of the bonus would be paid to employed persons at the expense of those actually out of work. At least four-fifths, and probably an even higher proportion, of the unemployed do not happen to be veterans. Even when he added veterans on reduced incomes and those in the drought areas, Mr. Young came to the conclusion that not more than one-fourth, or at most one-third, of the total number of veterans need cash now to relieve actual distress. This means that anywhere from two-thirds to three-quarters of the cash distribution originally proposed would be worse than thrown away. To the extent that from one-tenth to at most one-third would be real unemployment relief, it would be relief of the most idiotic sort—for no government with any sense of responsibility would dream of relieving unemployment by handing out lump sums of $1,000 to $2,000. The present contemplated Treasury grab can only increase the regret of all sincere persons that we do not have in actual operation at present a complete and thoroughly business-like national unemployment-insurance plan, for if such a plan were in operation few Congressmen could have had the effrontery to put forward the present specious arguments for an immediate soldiers' bonus, and even the tireless lobby maintained by the American Legion might have been a bit shy and backward.

Mr. Young, as a compromise, suggested that the government might advance to veterans who are really "in need" a substantial percentage of the face value of their certificates over the present loan value. As a business man, Mr. Young must know that the administrative expense of determining who was actually in need and who was not would be an enormous one. Some modification of this plan is now being most seriously discussed in Congress. Its proposal has caused considerable relief; but the only thing to be said in its favor is that it is less evil than the plan originally proposed. It will call, it is announced, "only" for $500,000,000, though there is no real assurance that the amount would remain within this figure. That Mr. Hoover would have the courage firmly to veto such a modified measure is extremely doubtful.

When the United States entered the World War, the admirable war-risk insurance plan was drawn up, and there was gratification on all sides that by this means a repetition of the Grand Army pension-grabbing scandals after the Civil War and of the Spanish War pension scandals would be made impossible. When the men were discharged at the end of the war, they were paid about $270,000,000 in federal bonuses. The individual States paid several hundred millions more. When the present bonus certificates were voted for in 1924 by a vote of 355 to 54 in the House and passed over President Coolidge's veto, The Nation said editorially: "This raid upon the Treasury is but a precursor to many similar raids for fifty years to come." There is nothing in the present situation to modify that prediction.

Mr. Stimson Explains

SECRETARY OF STATE STIMSON, in his speech before the Council on Foreign Relations on February 6, gave a lucid and plausible explanation of American recognition policy. In South America, he said, we do thus and so because that has been our historic policy. In Central America we do the thing somewhat differently because there we have certain treaty obligations. In Russia—but on this point Mr. Stimson was silent. After all, the reader must consider that Mr. Stimson was sufficiently burdened in trying to justify our having two policies for application to countries in this hemisphere without having to go into the other policies we apply to the rest of the world. He saved himself this additional embarrassment by confining his discussion to our relations with "the other American republics."

"The practice of this country," Mr. Stimson asserted, "has been substantially uniform" from 1792 to 1913, although "there were slight departures from this policy during the Civil War." This general policy, he continued, "was to base the act of recognition not upon the question of the constitutional legitimacy of the new government but upon its de facto capacity to fulfil its obligations as a member of the family of nations. This country recognized the right of other nations to regulate their own internal affairs of government and disclaimed any attempt to base its recognition upon the correctness of their constitutional action." The Secretary declared that this was the policy followed during the last few months in recognizing the "new governments in Bolivia, Peru, Argentina, Brazil, and Panama." One might, of course, raise the question of whether it was a sincere desire to follow this historic formula that prompted the early recognition of at least some of these governments, or whether it was in fact the fear that if we waited until they had proved their stability Great Britain might win a marked advantage in a commercial way by extending the hand of friendship before we did.

In any event, this is the policy we are following for the moment with regard to South America. When we come to Central America our recognition policy wears a radically different face. There our attitude is determined "by preexisting treaty." In the Central American treaties of 1907 and 1923 the five republics agreed that a revolutionary government would have to be constitutionally reorganized "by the representatives of the people" before it could be recognized. The 1923 treaty provided further that recognition would not be extended if the new president "should have been a leader in the preceding revolution or related to such a leader by blood or marriage, or if he should have been a cabinet officer or held some high military command during the accomplishment of the revolution." Immediately afterward our own government announced that it would "in its future dealings with those republics follow out the same principle which they had thus established in their treaty." Hence, with regard to Central America, we are obligated to inquire into "the constitutional legitimacy" of any new government, which, of course, as Mr. Stimson pointed out, "is a departure from the regular international practice of our government." That it also gives the United States the power to dictate the personnel of any Central American government has been proved on more than one occasion, although Mr. Stimson did not mention this.

Perhaps it was just an accident that these five republics should have adopted a treaty which compelled the United States to abandon its historic policy in so far as they were concerned. Perhaps we made this change grudgingly and against our will. But the records show that it was President Roosevelt who called the 1907 conference, and that it was President Harding who arranged for the conference in 1923 (the arrangements actually being made at the direction of the White House aboard the U. S. SS. Tacoma lying in Amapala harbor in August, 1922). Both of these meetings were held in Washington. So it appears that we were not disinterested. What our interest was based on Mr. Stimson himself revealed in saying that Central America > has been the one spot external to our shores which nature has decreed to be most vital to our national safety, not to mention our prosperity. It commands the line of our great trade route which joins our eastern and western coasts. Even before human hands had pierced the isthmus with a seagoing canal, that route was vital to our national interest. Since the Panama Canal has become an accomplished fact, it has been not only the vital artery of our coastwise commerce, but as well the link in our national defense which protects the defensive power of our fleet.

It is refreshing to know that our South American policy, at least for the moment, is based upon history; that our admittedly imperialistic Central American policy is based upon self-interest; but when will Mr. Stimson get around to explaining and justifying our Russian policy?

Diplomats and Peace

"THE common aim of diplomacy the world over at the present time," so the French Ambassador, Paul Claudel, assured a Franco-American audience in New York the other day, "is peace. War today ends in revolution, and while it is inevitable that the situations out of which war arises must always exist, the dangers of war are understood today by all the nations of the earth rather than just by small groups of diplomats and financiers. Peace is the common interest of all countries at this time." M. Claudel was undoubtedly quite correct, in a formal and literal sense, in what he said about the diplomats, but if he intended his hearers to draw the conclusion that the kind of peace the nations are interested in is hopeful and reassuring, his words must be taken with some important qualifications.

On February 4, for example, A. V. Alexander, First Lord of the Admiralty, informed the House of Commons that Great Britain might have to "reconsider" its program of naval construction in view of the naval building that was going on in France and Italy. The British Commonwealth, he stated, was building 46,145 tons of warships, 2,656 tons of that amount being for Canada. France had under construction 100,684 tons and Italy 100,777 tons. Mr. Alexander did not wish it to be inferred that Great Britain was falling behind in European waters, since the whole imperial situation had to be considered, but he left his hearers with the impression that the so-called "escalator" provision of the London naval treaty, under which any of the signatory Powers may increase its tonnage if other Powers increase theirs, might have to be brought into operation.

The House of Commons had no reason to be surprised at Mr. Alexander's statement. France and Italy, as everybody knows, declined to accept the limitations of the London treaty because of Italy's refusal to concede to France the right to have a navy any bigger than that of Italy. Months of negotiation, in the course of which both Great Britain and the United States are reported to have used their good offices, have failed to settle the controversy, and a building truce which was agreed upon expired on December 31. On February 6 the French Chamber of Deputies was informed that it would shortly be asked to authorize the immediate construction of 41,000 tons of warships as part of a four-year program intended to meet the ambitious proposals of Mussolini. Included in the French program is the first of a series of cruisers designed to surpass the German cruisers of the Ersatz Preussen type. As the United States insists that its own navy must be at least equal to any other, a resort to the escalator clause by Great Britain would at once open the way for the United States to add to its own tonnage, with the likelihood that Japan would soon follow suit.

On the military side, France is pushing to completion some 200 miles of modern fortifications on its eastern and northeastern frontier as a defense against another German invasion, and Belgium is planning to make its forty miles of German gateway secure against attack. France, Belgium, Italy, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, Rumania, and Jugoslavia, the last three offensive and defensive allies of France, had between them on October 1, 1930, standing armies of 1,914,990 men, while their army reserves reached the enormous total of 17,767,261. France, which has been supposed to lead the world in military aviation, is much concerned lest it should still be in danger in the air, Great Britain and the United States are busily developing their air services, and in the United States elaborate plans have been completed or are being worked out for the mobilization of industry in the event of war.

In a world a considerable part of which has solemnly renounced war as an instrument of national policy, the diplomats may well feel that a heavy burden has been laid upon them in keeping a peace so sententiously espoused and so little, apparently, believed in. Nobody knows better than a diplomat the danger that lurks in such a dispute as has just flared up between Bulgaria and Greece on the heels of a Balkan conference that paraded the olive branch, or in the oppression of minorities in Poland and Jugoslavia, or in the continued agitation in Germany for a radical revision of the Young Plan, or in the political and financial plight of the Nationalist Government in China. In spite of treaties and conferences and solemn pronouncements, nations great and small appear to be still of the opinion that peace, unless supported by armed forces capable of waging war on a grand scale, is as yet hardly more than a dream, and that agreements to keep the peace are not to be understood as deterring any of the parties from being constantly in trim to fight. Perhaps the international conference that is to meet next year may pave the way to better things, but in the meantime the diplomats have quite enough anxiety to keep them on the alert.

Sport for Sport's Sake

THE recent announcement of President Gates of the University of Pennsylvania that henceforth at his institution football would be no more important than philosophy should be surprising only in that it discloses the prevalence of the opposite state of affairs. Athletics at Pennsylvania will in the future be under a department of physical instruction, headed by a dean, controlled by the university, and coached by men who have not only university rank but the salary that goes with that rank. At Pennsylvania, as at many another large institution of learning in this land of plenty, it has been customary frankly to exalt athletics far beyond the academic subjects which an untutored person might have thought were the university's main concern. President Gates declares that no longer will the noble athletes who win fame and gate receipts for the university by successful competition with other colleges be given the run of the campus, no longer will they, merely as athletes, be supplied with scholarships, special training tables, special trainers, trips South for their health, and supervision by a coach who draws a salary about twice as large as that of the oldest and most highly esteemed professor on the campus.

It has been suggested that the first real test of Pennsylvania's new athletic policy will come with the loss of the first big game. In the meantime it is pleasant to see a university with the courage to remove its intercollegiate athletics away from the field of big business. In the main it has been the alumni who have exerted pressure to make their particular college outshine all the others in the matter of impressive stadia, high-priced coaches, the largest gate receipts, and the most earnest shopping around in preparatory schools for likely team material. President Gates has a suggestion for these alumni that they may or may not receive with open arms:

> If colleges and universities are to continue to meet the demand for enlarged and more luxurious facilities for the staging of sports spectacles, involving large capital expenditures, it is only reasonable that those for whose benefit and entertainment the contests are presented should, through alumni and public gifts, provide the necessary funds. Certainly funds intended and required for the educational program should not be used for this extra-educational phase of college athletics.

All this, as we said before, is so self-evident, irrefutable, and plain common-sensible that we should hesitate to set it down were it not so unusual a departure in the conduct of American universities. But while suggestions for the control of big-business athletics are in order, we have one of our own. It is to abolish intercollegiate contests altogether. That would leave the whole business of great football contests, rowing races attended by thousands of spectators, and track meets for which months of rigorous training are essential in the hands of professional athletics, where it belongs. Professional baseball has stood on its own feet for years; professional football is kept off its feet by the great "amateur" college games. So far no college or university president has thought of this remedy, simple as it is, or if he has thought of it, he has neglected to make his thoughts public. We offer the suggestion free of charge.

India and the Round Table Conference

By GEORGE SLOCOMBE

Paris, January 30

BY two criteria must the results of the Indian Round Table Conference be judged in their consequences for the immediate history of India. How far do they satisfy the demand for independence made by the All-India Congress, the largest body of public opinion in India, at Lahore on December 31, 1929? How far do they satisfy the somewhat different demands made by Mr. Gandhi?

Mr. Gandhi himself has left his own attitude in no doubt. Hardly had the door of Yerovda jail closed behind him after nine months' imprisonment, than Mr. Gandhi indicated that for him at least the struggle was not over. On the constitutional issue he might possibly be satisfied. He even hinted that the Congress leaders might be induced to cooperate in the labors of the Round Table Conference or of its committees when they are resumed this year in India, and might accept the offer contained in the Prime Minister's final speech at the conference as a basis of negotiation. But for the Mahatma the moral issue remains paramount and unchanged. Until the salt tax was repealed, the Congress ban on foreign cloth made legal, the prohibition of liquor placed on the statute book, he could not recognize the sincerity of the British offer of self-government.

In his insistence on these concessions—the three essential points to which, in an interview with the present writer last May, Mr. Gandhi reduced his original eleven demands—the Mahatma, it may be suspected, stands alone. The other Congress leaders—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel—are mainly concerned with the constitutional issue. And whereas Mr. Gandhi is content to accept the relief of the starving millions of India from the burden of the salt tax, from the ruinous rivalry of cheap foreign cloth, and from the degradation of the liquor traffic as the substance of independence, his political colleagues will demand less impracticable but more stringent guaranties of the good faith of Great Britain.

The "substance of independence" in the eyes of the political realists of the Congress Party is something at once more drastic and less visionary. They demand, if not separation from Great Britain explicitly, at least the right to secede implicit in the constitutions of the self-governing dominions of the British Commonwealth. They demand full responsible self-government, with control of the army, finance, commerce, and external relations, and they even threaten—although this, one suspects, is merely the polemics of warfare—the repudiation of India's foreign debt.

What are the Indian Nationalists offered by the All-India constitution adumbrated in the agreements and the partial agreements of the Round Table Conference and confirmed in the Prime Minister's declaration of January 19? The substance of these agreements, representing at once the maximum concessions made by the three British political parties and the Indian delegations, may be indicated as follows:

1. An All-India Federation to include the provinces of British India (without Burma) and the native states.

2. Responsibility for the government of India to be placed upon legislatures, central and provincial, "with such provisions as may be necessary to guarantee during a period of transition the observance of certain obligations, and also with such guaranties as are required by minorities to protect their political liberties and rights."

3. Responsibility at the center to be partial. Responsibility in the provinces to be complete.

4. In both central and provincial governments the executive power to be partly or wholly vested in a ministry responsible to the legislature and formed by an elected member of this body who in the opinion of the Governor General or the provincial governor is capable of securing the support of a majority in the legislature.

5. The Governor General having chosen as his ministers persons who possess the confidence of the legislature, it is suggested that these persons shall retain office only so long as they retain this confidence. This is what the federal structure subcommittee of the conference understands by responsibility of government to legislature in the sense in which this expression is used throughout the British Commonwealth. The ministers are to be collectively responsible to the legislature.

6. During the period of transition (duration unstated) the Governor General is to be responsible for defense and external relations, including relations with the Indian states outside the federal sphere. In certain situations, such as an outbreak of hostilities on the frontier, the Governor General is given liberty to act on his own responsibility and is empowered to secure funds for the discharge of his special duties. Financial supplies for the subjects so reserved to the Governor General will not be subject to control by the legislature, but will be contracted for a period of years as a permanent charge outside the ordinary budget. The Governor General is also given overriding powers in regard to budgetary proposals and borrowing in circumstances when the proposals threaten the credit of India in the money markets of the world. Any amendment to the currency or coinage acts will require the Governor General's previous sanction. The service of existing loans and the salaries and pensions of public servants already engaged, together with the sums required for defense and external relations, are to be secured as consolidated fund charges. With these limitations no differentiation is contemplated between the position of the finance minister and that of any other minister responsible to the legislature.

7. The Northwest Frontier province becomes an autonomous governor's province instead of, as now, a territory administered by the central government. Burma is separated from India. Sind is separated from the Bombay Presidency and becomes an autonomous province.

8. An Indian Sandhurst is to be created, and the Indianization of the army in India is to proceed as rapidly as possible provided the Committee of Imperial Defense is satisfied that military necessities will be provided for.

So much for the superstructure of the elaborate constitution envisaged for India. The ambitious proposals—at once cautious and far-reaching; audacious in principle but heavily safeguarded in practice—have already met with a destructive fire of criticism from many quarters of India.

The principal weakness of the edifice lies in its base. The crucial issue of Hindu-Moslem representation in the legislature and the provision of safeguards for the Moslems, Sikhs, depressed classes, and other minorities, which must be the very foundation of any workable constitution for India, has not been settled. Both Hindu and Moslem delegates left the Round Table Conference with their communal rivalries and jealousies slightly more exasperated than when they came. The fate of the constitution—quite apart from its reception at the hands of the Congress—may therefore be endangered by a failure or a prolonged delay in the settlement of this thorny problem.

The chief criticism which the constitution meets in India is that it does not represent dominion status, and not even dominion status with safeguards. The Indian liberals, and chief among them Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, the wisest and most balanced and also the most unprejudiced politician in India, believe, however, that in practice the safeguards will be found considerably less onerous than they now appear, and that any consistent and arbitrary interference by the Governor General against the spirit of representative government will be exceedingly difficult.

The position of the princes in the federal system and the considerable representation they claim—at one time they actually demanded 50 per cent of the seats in both ministry and legislature—are also vigorously criticized. The Servant of India, the responsible organ of moderate Hindu opinion, has already voiced the apprehension that if the representatives of the Indian states are nominated by the princes themselves and not elected by the peoples of the states, the dominion status of India will be rendered illusory. Even if the princes are content with one-quarter of the seats of the federal legislature—this is the proportion which would accrue to them on a population basis, and which will probably be adopted in the end—a permanent bloc would be constituted in the legislature which, it is argued, would replace the present official bloc nominated by the Viceroy and would therefore create an irremovable core of reactionary interests.

It is feared, too, that the princes, some of whom now look to Great Britain to protect them in their autocracies, will inevitably be subservient to British interests when these are in conflict with those of India. And if, this journal argues, the princes are given equal representation in the federal executive, representative government will be utterly impossible.

The most bitter attack leveled against the proposals of the Round Table Conference comes from the depressed classes and the representatives of Indian labor. It has been proposed that the provincial legislatures should be elected by direct suffrage, and that the members of the federal legislature should be elected in part by the states and in part by the provincial legislatures. With regard to the actual extent of the suffrage, the franchise committee of the conference was unable to agree. It is noteworthy, however, that the majority of the committee rejected the arguments of the labor representatives, Mr. Joshi and Mr. Shiva Rao, and of Dr. Ambedkar, the delegate of the depressed classes, that the immediate introduction of adult suffrage was both practicable and desirable.

With the exception of these members the committee appears to favor an increase of the suffrage to 25 per cent of the total population and the lowering of the age limit for women from twenty-five to twenty-one years. This proposal is condemned as hopelessly inadequate by all spokesmen of the trade unions and the depressed classes, who express the fear that the political power in India for years to come will be in the hands of an oligarchy of wealthy industrialists and landed proprietors, or their representatives.

Nevertheless, if the new constitution fails of acceptance, its rejection will come not from its critics among the economic or religious minorities, but from the vast body of youth of all classes and communities and of both sexes now ranged under the white, red, and green banner of the Congress. At the time of writing, the reply of Mr. Gandhi and of his fellow Congress leaders has not yet been uttered, but I make bold to predict that the working committee of the Congress, which is now meeting in Allahabad, will reject the offered constitution. The politicians of the Congress will refuse it not merely because it does not grant Mr. Gandhi's "substance of independence," but also because it offers something less than the substance of dominion status. And Mr. Gandhi himself, the moralist and the prophet of renascent India, will reject the constitution because it is not accompanied by the moral and economic revolution which he regards as essential—the liberation of the peasants of India from the triple slavery of the salt tax, the liquor traffic, and foreign cloth.

Going Home

By MARK VAN DOREN

His thought of it was like a button pressed.
Far away the figures started going;
A silver watch ticked in a sleepy vest,
And on the porch an apron string was blowing.

His thought again was like a fly-wheel cranked,
And circular machinery set gliding.
The little town turned truly, as the banked
Brown houses followed in and out of hiding.

His travel, once he went, was like the troop
Of farmers in an autumn to the fair.
All year the field was flat, but now the coop
Of turkeys and the horses would be there;

People moving everywhere and nodding,
Little boys with birds and yellow whips;
A person at a counter would be wadding
Rifles, and the girls would hold their hips.

His coming near was like the soft arrival
Of gods around a thing that they have made;
And will again forget; but long survival
Saves it, once again the trance is laid.

Ballyhoo and the Higher Learning

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

I

THERE is always something wrong with the higher learning. There is bound to be, for the growth of organized knowledge is such a delicate business that it is peculiarly sensitive to all kinds of cultural infections. For one thing, there is the inner antipathy between administration and wisdom, between the clerk and the savant. Then, to repeat the invincible platitude, there is the chronic sabotage of learning, the moment it socially matters, by the intricately vested and reinvested forces of any society. The higher learning is in the eternal perplexity of being an ineffable value in search of endowment. And the powers that be, in return for their patronage, are forever exacting a pedigreed alibi for their continued intrenchment. At Chicago one can become a "doctor" in "social-service administration" and believe that Marx is the junior partner of Hart, Schaffner, and Marx. And at Moscow, I venture, one cannot become a doctor in mathematical physics unless one holds that the incorrigible error in the quantum theory is really a dirty bourgeois trick. While the true scholar refuses to dignify the publicity of falsehoods with the methods of science or to raise the apologetics of follies into a philosophy of values, there are always enough pundits and mountebanks who can be trained to doctor bunk into a semblance of reason and hokum into the likeness of truth. And the ironic part of it all is that academic fakes are so seldom manufactured by real fakers. The pseudo-scholar almost always lacks both the humor and courage to be consciously and profitably spurious. Poor fellow, he pays the price of the quack in vulgarity without his fun in adventure!

But though scholarship is faked the world over, each national culture stamps these imitations with its own peculiar marks. Fake learning in Germany is likely to be doltish, in France it is a bit knavish, in England it wears a high hat, and with us it tends to become silly, immaterial, clerical, and excited. The incredible vulgarization of our higher institutions of learning since the war is, of course, but a reflection of the growing tawdriness of our social conditions in general. But what is peculiar about it is the technique by which fake learning has so rapidly muscled its way into high learning.

Our characteristic national vice is the assumption that life and behavior are synonymous, that the meaning of life can be gauged most accurately in terms of active and optimistic extravagance. Hence we do not really believe in tragedy, in the intrinsic dilemmas of spiritual conflicts. We suppress them, under the impression that we are facing them by doing something about them. Now since, by and large, our institutions of learning can do very little of which the forces in control of our culture do not approve, the more active these institutions become and the bigger they grow, the deeper they intrench themselves in the predicament of much ado about nothing. The noble dilemma of the advancement of knowledge is that it grows on the infinitely difficult and creative adjustment between tradition and revolution. The aim of learning is to gather ever more facts of strategic significance to upset the laws and orders by which they are supposedly governed. In other words, the higher the learning the greater its discipline, yet it must have complete license. There is obviously no sense to "research" which is pointless, and "objectivity" without some hypothesis has no object. But since we are afraid of such intellectual license, we have developed an insect-like industry in meaningless "social research" and we make a virtue of our "objectivity" in gathering "data" sufficiently irrelevant and trivial to point no conclusions. And conclusions are invidiously called "propaganda." This collection of trivia soon becomes so unwieldy that it takes whole congeries of committees to handle it, and these committees manufacture more "data" in the very process of examination. Thus we resolve the ancient dilemma of scholarship, the conflict between the conservation of knowledge and the revolution of learning, by turning our universities into monkey houses for elaborate monkeyshines, except in those disciplines which in their nature are neutral to any society.

Neither Dr. Flexner's brilliant chapter on the American Universities * nor this essay is an attack on American learning. They are in defense of it. In those branches of learning in which theoretical abstruseness, an authentic technique, or the discipline of a historic subject matter cannot be faked, American learning is not merely distinguished but magnificent. It is still possible to receive a sound education at Harvard or Columbia College, to my mind sounder than at Oxford or Cambridge, where the acquisition of personal culture is constantly stultified by the code of a gentleman. In medicine America leads the world, and it is far safer to have an appendectomy at Kalamazoo than to catch a common cold anywhere in the British Empire. The only time we may pardonably permit ourselves the folly of vicarious pride is when we think of the work of American natural and, especially, physical scientists, though it is annoying to read Dr. Millikan's naive stuff on his "maker," which is piling up a good deal of trouble for the future of the work he loves so ably and so well.

But after one has said all this, one must add that the American university just now is probably in a more dangerous position than the advancement of learning has ever been before in the history of modern Western society. Paradoxically, its contemporary tragedy lies in the fact that it is no longer in a genuinely tragic predicament. The implications of tragedy are too exalted for the comic absurdities from which it suffers. And nothing is so fatal to the life of organized reason as its burlesque. Our higher learning is no longer engaged primarily in the historic struggle with scholastics, Pharisees, pundits, and pedants. It has to put up with an army of mountebanks and nitwits. The great rebels against the various forms of scholasticism, from Abelard to Daniel C. Gilman, fought them with the renaissance of learning. One can attack a professor grinding Greek gerunds with quotations from Plato's "Republic." But how in the world is one to overcome a glorified floorwalker who professes Personnel Administration or the "scientific" merchandising of brassières at a School of Business Administration? How is one to overcome a fancy room-clerk who is a Privatdozent in Hotel Management at Cornell? With flit or with listerine? The answer, alas, is probably that we need a new social metabolism altogether. But that is a long and difficult process. And in the meantime the American scholar is bewildered and helpless and lonely.

---

* "Universities—American, English, German." By Abraham Flexner. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

Where the true scholar treads cautiously to guard his intellectual integrity, his apes can rush in with noise and with fury. They have got themselves endowed in our higher institutions of learning into vast zoos for their own keeping, into schools of journalism and business administration, into graduate faculties of "scientific" philanthropy, into collegia of cookery and child guidance, into hundreds of fantastic "institutes" of one kind or another. And in the evenings they rig up their loud speakers in home-study courses and in the extension divisions. They cavort amidst crazy "experiments" in bizarre laboratories, they jabber a pseudo-technical lingo, and they confuse the public mind with statistical nonsense. All these stunts have the advantage of a "new" and "liberal" appearance. Our "enlightened" institutional big business has discovered, or, rather, unconsciously encouraged, this new technique of intricate flapdoodle to divert academic attention from significant issues.

II

Among the main parasites which have entered the host of American learning and have infected it with this strange dementia are the "foundations." These foundations are intellectual trusts of educational philanthropy with all the unconscious cleverness of an invincible social force. There is the Social Science Research Council, largely a Rockefeller-supported organization, nowhere officially connected with our universities, which is more and more controlling social research in our higher institutions of learning through the power of subsidy. There are other powerful foundations, such as the Rosenwald Fund, the Commonwealth Fund, the Russell Sage Foundation, and an increasing number of others. Their interlocking committees are odd assemblies of big business men, "scientific" social workers, professional visionaries, professorial clerks, and fat-boy bureaucrats. They see to it that the right people are selected for social studies. Their underlying theory is that if you can get all the "da-h-ta" on the Negro, race prejudice will vanish; that if you can get all the facts about industrial exploitation, you will resolve it into the sweetness of capital and the light of labor; or that if you develop "methods" of teaching a subject you will be saved the trouble of learning it. Frequently the foundations crash the gates of the universities by endowing "institutes," which are no longer societies of scholars freed from the burden of teaching for creative research, but are committees of academic foremen driving statistical wage slaves to "correlate" trivia into nonsense. Among the most recent discoveries of these big-business intellectual trusts is the value of cradle-snatching to fill in university presidencies. An enfant terrible like President Hutchins of Chicago, who loves to snap his intellectual milk teeth at the hands that feed him, is as harmless as he seems militantly "enlightened." President Hutchins is reorganizing the faculties of the arts and sciences into four divisions in order to remove the "barriers" of specialization. The new Dean of Social Science is Mr. Beardsley Ruml, formerly director of the Laura Spellman Foundation, a philanthropic agent without pretense to academic distinction. That the University of Chicago is more and more ridden by the foundations is obvious. Incidentally it may be said that President Butler of Columbia has so far refused to delegate his university to such foundation control.

Undoubtedly the best example of foundation intrenchment is the so-called Yale Institute of Human Relations, whose endowment Mr. Hutchins secured from the Harkness millions while he was dean of the Yale Law School. This macrocosm of all human knowledge is as yet in a nebulous stage, calling itself the Human Welfare Group. The object of the Human Welfare Group is to "break down all divisions" of science and learning in order to "integrate" everything from animal husbandry through child study and social hygiene to thermodynamics. The authentic correlation of knowledge is no doubt extremely desirable. But it must be the creative correlation by free scholars. The reckless telescoping of the various faculties under the lay pressure of scores of philanthropic committees is quite another matter. The Human Welfare Group proposes to "include the Yale School of Medicine, the Yale Law School, the Yale Divinity School, the Division of Industrial Engineering, portions of the University departments" dealing with everything under the sun. In the meantime if you happen to be rich don't forget that the Human Welfare Group needs a Women's Pavilion for $500,000, a Clinical Sociology Endowment for $1,000,000, and other such merry-go-rounds, as well as a number of endowed wheel-chairs for distinguished scholars by which they may propel themselves from one "pavilion" of learning to another.

Then there is the Vassar Institute of Euthenics, which is defined as "the science of efficient living." It is, as Dr. Flexner puts it, a salad made up of scraps "of mental hygiene, child guidance, nutrition, speech development and correction, family problems, wealth consumption, food preparation, household technology, and horticulture." By such "integration" lecturers in euthenics are enabled to teach virgins the science of matrimonial adjustment, while in the summer time alumnae-husbands can be taught "scientifically" how to stay put.

Teachers College at Columbia of course was not going to be left behind in this proliferation of institutes. Indeed, today it leads all other competitors. There is, says Dr. Flexner, "in Teachers College . . . an Institute of Educational Research, an Institute of School Experimentation, an International Institute, which is an administrative group, an Institute of Child Welfare Research, about which the less said the better," and many others. The Institute of Child Welfare Research has recently issued an "Inventory of the Habits of Children from Two to Five Years of Age" by the "Acting Director." During these three years children may have "a maximum of 2,325 habits, emotional, mental, motor, and social-moral. A child's score in each division is found through the formula $\frac{T}{S-3x} \times 100$". The Child Development Institute has made an extended "study" by tickling babies and then timing their laughter, finding thus the weighted average of infantile risibility as deduced from 2,325 laugh "exposures." A similar scientific contribution can be found in the New York World of January 20, 1931. It shows a picture of Dr. Arthur Frank Payne, a "scientician" in "educational psychology" at the City College of New York. He is holding an elaborate slide rule of his own concoction with which he is just about to "test scientifically" a young lady next to him, a Miss Helen Robinson of Columbus, Ohio, in order to determine whether she is really "America's sweetest girl" as decided by a recent national contest.

One of the favorite indoor sports of this type of higher learning is the making out of questionnaires. Questionnaires puzzled out in the schools of business administration are usually perfected models for yellow-dog contracts of employment. The psychological gentry, on the other hand, usually concoct a series of highly impertinent, far-fetched, extremely personal and imponderable questions, often with that pseudo-scientific salacity which requires anonymous answers. The questions, of course, are answered only by dolts, whose answers are patent absurdities, or by wits, who enjoy telling plain lies. Then all these answers are carefully correlated into a synthesis of errors and jargonized into technical chatter.

Among the hundreds of courses at the teachers' colleges at Chicago and Columbia, Dr. Flexner cites as fair examples courses on "manuscript writing," "teaching of educational sociology," "music for teachers of literature and history," "awareness of situations and planning of behavior," and innumerable courses in mental "measurements." Do you wish to know what "the relation of scholarship to a combination of all tests" is, as devised at the University of Chicago? Here goes:

$$\text{R s. 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8}$$

$$\frac{\sqrt{1\text{-}(1\text{-}R^2S\ 1)\ (1\text{-}R^2S\ 2.1)\ (1\text{-}R^2S.4.123)\ (1\text{-}R\ S.\ 6.12345)}}{(1\text{-}R^2S\ 7.123456)\ (1\text{-}R^2S\ 8.1234567)}$$

The teachers' colleges are not the only ones which offer burlesque courses. If you are too poor to see Joe Cook or Ed Wynn, just write for the catalogues of the Chicago Graduate School of Social Service Administration, the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, the Columbia School of Journalism (where they teach how to sell sonnets by correspondence), and especially the mail-order catalogues and full-page newspaper advertisements of the various extension departments and home-study divisions.

Here are some Ph.D. theses at Chicago, Columbia, and Harvard: "Pupils' Participation in High-School Control," "The Technique of Estimating School-Equipment Costs," "A Scale for Measuring Antero-posterior Posture of Ninth-Grade Boys," "An Analysis of Janitor Service in Elementary Schools," "Vocational Activities and Social Understanding in the Curriculum for Stenographer-Clerks," "The Technique of Activity and Trait Analysis Applied to Y. M. C. A. Executive Secretaries as a Basis for Curricular Materials," and finally "The Intelligence of Orphan Children in Texas." "Why orphans? Why Texas?" Dr. Flexner wonders.

III

Dr. Flexner points out all these absurdities with irony, brilliance, wisdom, and with that genuine objectivity which is highly significant. And he also gives some excellent advice for the cure of these phantasmagoria. He shows just wherein the American high school fails to prepare for higher education. He points out that our universities suffer from trying to digest both the English undergraduate college and the German graduate system. Of course, he would abolish from the universities all pseudo-trade, semi-vocational, and ad hoc schools. Whatever legitimate higher courses are given by authentic scholars in these "professional" schools, he would redistribute into the established departments of the university, whence they have been abducted. It is a pity, by the way, that Dr. Flexner does not go into the so-called "experimental college," the variety of companionate learning of teacher and student of which Dr. Meiklejohn is the most articulate exponent. This "new" theory of collegiate learning is based on a sort of diaphanous self-expression on the part of the student, who is encouraged to believe that there is no relation between one's right to opinion and one's investment in knowledge. The most fantastic expression of this sort of education we can find at Rollins College, where President Hamilton Holt has hired a "professor of books" and a "professor of evil," and where the acquisition of knowledge is a wild whirl of seminar dances.

But for all his suggestiveness, Dr. Flexner seems to me far more descriptive than analytical. He quotes with approval Lord Haldane's remark, "it is in universities . . . that the soul of a people mirrors itself," yet he fails to probe the social basis of our distortion of the higher learning. He fails to relate the degradation of learning with our general cultural conditions, which are but the miasma of deep social injustices under the control of an impersonal, institutionalized, monopolistic plutocracy, cheap, vulgar, and empty. In due process of history, this vulgarity will probably come to an end. For the present the light of American learning will be kept burning by those genuine scholars who are too shrewd, too wise, and too honorable to be spiritually corrupted. Such efforts as Dr. Flexner's own new Institute for Advanced Study, which intends to do for our day what Gilman did with the original Johns Hopkins, will help a great deal. Yet there is something more we can do. We must never tire of exposing the fake advancement of learning. And above all we must appreciate that each kind of freedom has its own carriers. The relevant freeman in the university is not to be found among a "liberal" board of trustees nor even among the students. He is the scholar and teacher. When he is free, his students will also be free to learn what he knows and to think what they want. The radical critic of our university is too much concerned with the freedom of the student and far too little with the freedom of the savant. It is not the freedom of immature knowledge but the protection of genuine learning that we want. For a true advancement of learning is bound to point the arrow of American history.

Tragic Conclusions

By VIRGINIA MOORE

Tragic conclusions we cannot escape.
In thought and action let us be mature,
Compact and weaponed like the hornet's shape
That teaches caution as the only cure.
But let us be two children in our love,
Taking time's sweetness from each other's hands:
Suspicion is the badge of base-born minds
And calculation never understands.

Your Gasoline Tank

By LAWRENCE M. HUGHES

IN an address before the American Federation of Labor at Boston in October President Hoover suggested that the time has come to "reconsider" the anti-trust laws in the light of modern conditions. Speaking before the American Petroleum Institute at Chicago in November, Colonel William A. Donovan, former assistant attorney general, pointed out that "we may have reached a point where attempts will be made to modify the economic policy of the Sherman law and to substitute some form of government control." Colonel Donovan believed that in view of present chaotic conditions in the oil industry and the large supply of crude oil above ground, concerted efforts by producers to limit production and stabilize prices on a reasonable level of profit would not be in violation of the law.

Standard Oil became the "mother of trusts" primarily by its ability to control refining and transportation. The most significant trend in the industry today is toward control of markets. The dissolution of the old Standard Oil Company of New Jersey in 1911 introduced a period of vigorous competition in the industry. Independent concerns were able to combat the segregated members of the "Standard Oil group" on more nearly even terms. Coinciding as it did with the rapid extension in the use of the automobile, this new competition assumed the form largely of a fight for filling stations. A dozen large factions have grown tremendously in scope and power. Today most of the stations not already owned or controlled by one or another of these factions have been forced to become exclusive agents.

Thus the chain-store system has been extended in the oil industry on a wider scale than in any other. Not only are filling stations centrally controlled, but the products which they sell are controlled by the company from the time the oil issues from the earth until it is poured, as gasoline or lubricating oil, into your car. This might be described as the "internal" basis of monopoly. The "external" basis is the ability of a company to acquire or defeat competitors and to outwit the government and the public.

The dissolution created a number of intentionally unrelated regional Standard companies. Several of these have been forced to fight single-handed against stronger and semi-national companies whose growth has not been hampered by the anti-trust laws. Although certain members of the group sell in almost every country in the world, none, except Vacuum, a comparatively small member, sells throughout the United States. Vacuum, devoted primarily to lubricants, was immune from the regional restrictions. Mergers with independent companies have broadened the scope of some of them. Standard of New York has acquired General Petroleum and is selling along the length of the Pacific Coast, as well as in New York and New England. Subsidiaries of Standard of Indiana have enabled it to expand west to the Rockies and east to New England. Standard of New Jersey sells in Texas and Louisiana, as well as the East. But on the national marketing map there are still large gaps which none of these Standard Oil members alone has been able to fill.

Two independents, on the other hand, have already achieved fairly national distribution. The Texas Company and Shell Union (controlled by Royal Dutch-Shell) now have stations, owned or affiliated, in every State, and almost in every city of any size, in the country. The number of their filling stations is larger than that of any member of Standard Oil. Gulf, Cities Service, Sinclair, Tidewater Associated, Pure Oil, Continental, and Richfield—each has wide marketing territories. The freedom granted Shell here, coupled with the resources of its sponsors and the fact that it can undersell in many localities through the use of cheap Venezuelan oil, is particularly a thorn in the side of Standard Oil because Standard has such a large share of its business in British markets that it cannot raise a patriotic appeal here.

Royal Dutch-Shell today is the largest unit in the oil industry. With subsidiaries, it is perhaps two-thirds as large as all the members of the Standard Oil group combined. Gasoline, owing to the increased use of automobiles, now accounts for two-thirds of the industry's business, and more than three-fourths of the world's automobiles are in the United States. Regardless of success abroad, if Standard cannot defeat Shell here, it must fail. In order to defeat it Standard must have a unified chain of outlets.

And Standard is not beaten. Men responsible for the success of the original New Jersey company—notably John D. Rockefeller—are still large holders in the leading members of the group. Their methods still prevail. And these members—especially New Jersey, New York, Indiana, California, and Vacuum—still rank as large as or larger than their leading independent competitors. New Jersey's assets, for example, are two and one-half times as large as those of any other American oil company, twice as great as those of the older New Jersey company at the time of its dissolution. New York and Indiana each is larger than Texaco, Gulf, Shell Union, or the oil interests of Cities Service, and California compares favorably with them. Even Harry Sinclair's proposed $1,200,000,000 combination would fall half a billion dollars short of Standard of New Jersey. Because of their size and their close relationships, any large member of the Standard Oil group, conditions being opportune, might form a sound nucleus for monopoly.

Standard, frankly, would like to bring back the trust. But it wants no more $29,000,000 fines. By an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars for philanthropy and promotion, over a period of nineteen years, the group has brought itself back into the good graces of the government and the public. It wants to hold this esteem. Its efforts, therefore, to set aside the dissolution decree have been circumspect and entirely legitimate. A year or so ago New Jersey was permitted by the government to reacquire Anglo-American Petroleum as a subsidiary in the British Isles. A more important step in this direction was the announcement, last February, of plans for a merger of Socony and Vacuum as the General Petroleum Corporation. This proposal is now being fought by the Department of Justice. Decision on it will be made by the federal court at St. Louis, where the dissolution decree was rendered. Socony-Vacuum would not form a dominant company. It would market only about 9 per cent of the petroleum products sold in this country and would be in assets only about half as large as Standard of New Jersey. Favorable decision on the proposal, however, would set a significant precedent, and might set the wheels in motion for more important mergers among members of the family of Standard Oil. New Jersey, Indiana, and California might form a company with assets of nearly three and one-half billion dollars—virtually as large as all the Royal Dutch-Shell enterprises throughout the world. If all the members of Standard Oil were to recombine they would control half the assets of the world's twelve-billion-dollar oil industry.

Decision on the Socony-Vacuum plan, however, may take months, even years, and competition will not permit Standard Oil to be patient about it. Standard Oil is not lacking today in any of the qualities which could make it dominant, and it feels it must reach out for control in other directions. With the secrecy and almost with the speed with which the elder Rockefeller gained control of the oil-refining business of the country more than a half-century ago, the group is now setting out to control markets.

Vacuum has the most ambitious program. It is seeking to build up a chain of 122,000 filling stations by 1935, and it is now about a fifth of the way toward that goal. It is hardly too much to say that in this program Vacuum, smallest of the five Standard leaders, has been chosen for the role of marketing agent for the entire group.

But owing to the rush to build and acquire filling stations there are now three or four times as many as can profitably be operated. There are in fact some 315,000 stations. In more vivid terms, there are nearly as many filling stations as grocery stores and six times as many as there are drug-stores; there is one station for every eighty cars.

In its expansion program Vacuum, wisely, does not seek to add to this number. It is acquiring existing stations, not by outright purchase, but by obtaining, usually, 51 per cent control. This accomplishes the double advantage of control at about half cost (even so the program will involve an aggregate expenditure in excess of one billion dollars) and of keeping the operation in the hands of experienced local men. Vacuum, in fact, goes a step farther—it generally retains the name of the local company or operator. Thus, playing a silent part, it profits not only from the established identity and good-will of these stations in their local markets, but from efficiency and economy brought about by great resources and standardized methods. Moreover, in order to present itself as a local independent in all public contacts, each station usually carries several brands of gasoline. Under this guise, Vacuum may obtain a measure of control over the sale of competitors' products. And Vacuum, be it noted, is no longer merely a refiner and marketer of lubricants. It has introduced its own brand of gasoline, which will soon be sold nationally.

Despite its relatively small size, Vacuum is better qualified than any other member of Standard Oil to carry out such a project. For many years it has sold its lubricants not only in every State but in every city, town, and hamlet in the country. It has in the United States today some 75,000 outlets—"general stores," garages, and other places, as well as filling stations of its own and of other companies. The company boasts that every village large enough to support a post office has a Vacuum Oil dealer. Such is the framework on which the company can build.

If there were no other reason to suppose that in this project the company is acting largely for the other members of Standard Oil, there is the fact that, alone, Vacuum could not raise a billion dollars with which to finance it. Its entire assets are only a fifth of that amount, its entire annual sales not more than a third of it. Even New Jersey, eight and one-half times as large, could not hope to achieve this goal alone in six years. In its execution the plan shows evidence of coordinated effort on the part of all the major members of Standard Oil; in its inception it suggests the methods and personality of John D. Rockefeller.

The plan was formally launched early in 1929. Today some 25,000 of the stations already have been taken over. The number is steadily increasing. Because the operation of filling stations is not profitable and gasoline sales today, for the first time in many years, are not increasing, it is doubtful whether there will be more than 315,000 stations in the country by the end of 1935. When Vacuum has 122,000 it will have more than a third of the number. Actually its position will be much stronger. The stations being acquired represent in many respects the cream of the independents in the country. By 1935 Vacuum will probably be doing at least half of the gasoline business.

More important still, it can then be effective in coordinating and unifying all the scattered forces of Standard Oil, making it unnecessary for that company to seek repeal or modification of the anti-trust law or to attempt mergers in the face of them. A firm basis of monopoly will have been re-established. That goal has not yet been reached. It will not be reached uncontested by Shell and other independents. Several of them are still strong enough to put serious obstacles in Standard Oil's path. Shell Union, for instance, has expanded rapidly in the past few years. Today, throughout the nation, it owns or controls some 35,000 stations.

Texaco reached nation-wide proportions even earlier. If it has not been expanding so rapidly as some of the others of late, it is still a factor in the fight. The other leaders are not idle. This year the aggressiveness of Cities Service and Sinclair has been especially notable. The presence of the Mellons in Gulf, of the Daweses in Pure Oil, of J. P. Morgan and Company in Continental lends power and intensity to the struggle.

Of all the independents, however, Shell Union is the most to be reckoned with. Behind it are all the world-wide assets of Royal Dutch-Shell and forty years of growth and prosperity such as no oil group except Standard at the height of the trust has ever experienced. Behind it also is the sponsorship of the British government. For expansion in the United States Shell Union is now spending from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year—pocketing temporary loss to intrench itself for ultimate gain. At its present rate of growth, it may have 75,000 stations by the end of 1935.

If both Vacuum and Shell Union were to achieve their objectives, the American gasoline market would then be divided between them. With the resources at their command it is not inconceivable that they could wipe out or absorb even the largest of the other factions.

Between Standard and Shell there might then ensue a battle to the death—a battle of price-cutting, "diversification," and "super-servicing" far more exaggerated than that in which they have long been engaged; and a battle from which the consumer would derive much temporary profit. Deterding admits that his interests are "always ready for a good fight." Standard has fought, too, on occasion; but with large competitors it would rather make agreements (in which the competitors, incidentally, have not usually had the upper hand). It goes without saying that neither Standard nor Shell can afford to "fight away" its profits.

There have in fact been recent evidences of willingness on the part of both, but particularly Shell, to cooperate. Standard of New Jersey and I. G. Farbenindustrie Aktiengesellschaft, the German chemical trust, control the hydrogenation process for extracting gasoline from coal, oil shale, and other minerals—a process which not only is said to return 105 barrels of refined from every 100 of crude, but which extends almost infinitely the oil resources of the nation. New Jersey has formed a company to license the process in this country. With other independents, Shell Union has taken stock in it. The control, however, remains in the hands of Standard Oil. Shell Union has been forced to participate because it dares not be left behind. It is not improbable that New Jersey may make as much from the licensing, over a long period of years, as it has ever made from the sale of oil.

With the other independents out of the way and Shell alone in Standard's path toward monopoly, it is logical that such agreements would be made. Controlling future refining through hydrogenation, and controlling a majority of the markets of the country, Standard could probably persuade Shell to the wisdom of such cooperation. The mere fact that they have long been enemies would not alter the supposition. In modern business, profits come first. Dividends must be paid. In order to continue them companies must be able and willing to adjust themselves to new situations as they arise. No one understands this better than those who guide the destinies of Standard Oil and Shell. There would be no necessity for merger or even for open agreements between them then. After all, such things are better done on the quiet. But if the Vacuum project goes through, if New Jersey can retain control of refining, Standard's control of the industry would follow. Monopoly would have closed its grip on the oil industry and on the public who must buy its products.

Now monopoly as such is not to be condemned. If such monopoly were established under close government supervision, then the development of closer relationship between production and consumption, the greater efficiency through elimination of waste in product and of duplication of facilities, the nation-wide uniformity of product and service would on the face of the matter be worth while to the public. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company as a virtual monopoly is doing a better job than its constituent companies could do separately. If the oil monopoly were built up openly, under close governmental and public supervision, it might even be a step toward government ownership and operation of this basic industry. If, however, the new Standard Oil trust were built up secretly, so that its existence or the extent of its control was unknown, it is probable that the increased efficiency would react only in favor of an "inside" few. Even the rank and file of the stockholders, collecting reasonable dividends regularly, need not be apprised of it. The effects of the monopoly would extend farther than the sale of oil products. Because of the immense profits and power which a few would enjoy, it might in time extend into every important phase of American life.

Standard is already powerful. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and the group which shares with him the control of the leading Standard Oil companies are today probably the most influential "rulers" in America. Rockefeller personally holds 25 per cent of New Jersey and a similar proportion in the four other leaders. These men are more than "oil magnates." Not only are their products bought by every industry, every utility, and every home; not only are they among the largest customers of other industries, but of several they are among the largest owners. The Rockefeller money has gone into steel, into railroads, into banks, and a variety of other enterprises. The investments of Harkness, Archbold, Flagler, Bedford, and others of the Standard Oil crowd are almost equally widespread.

Their influence, moreover, is not only economic but social. Rockefeller alone has given more than three-quarters of a billion dollars to education, religion, science, and hundreds of specific "social services." Harkness has given many millions to Yale, Harvard, Columbia, and other institutions. It is true that these donations have been made to a large extent without "strings." It is also true that they have done much good. But the mere fact that a great university or a great church is brought into being or supported so fully by the patronage of one man must affect the teachings of that institution.

Thus the fight for monopoly of oil markets becomes a vital public issue. Thus Standard Oil, unchecked, may mold American and world opinion, and curb still further the freedom of human life.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter had not meant to revert so soon to idleness. It is an ideal, however, to which he is so firmly devoted that he is willing to avoid any amount of work in its behalf. He is glad, therefore, to give space to a correspondent whose letterhead bears the tantalizing address, "laughing horse, taos, new mexico."

> DEAR MR. DRIFTER:
>
> Your column of January 28 interested me even more than your column generally does, for I am particularly interested in idleness—probably because of my own struggle against an inherited New England conscience which keeps me too often "worried" over my also inherited Southern torpor! And I prefer the latter.
>
> But I'm not writing this to tell you that. I thought you might be interested to know that, stimulated by your article, I am actually planning to make and hang a sign at the gate of my hermitage—a mud house in the curve of the Rio del Pueblo, near Taos, New Mexico—announcing it as an "Idleness Institute: Classes and Private Lessons in How to Be Idle and How to Use Idleness." Or perhaps simply: "College of Idleness. Apply Within." ("Apply within" might not be a bad slogan for the school, matching Mr. Socrates's "Know thyself.")
>
> I shall make you an honorary professor, and am hoping that you will accept the post and take it as one of your duties to devote your column more frequently to further development of your ideas on the subject. Such essays will, like your first one, be used as a part of the preliminary reading course for beginners. And I hope that the next time you will mention further references. Stevenson, of course, has spoken on the subject; also Montaigne, surely; and I remember much valuable comment in Thoreau. But I may have difficulty in compiling a bibliography owing to the unfortunate limitations of my own library and the practical non-existence of good public libraries in this part of the country.

In other words, I realize the difficulties of planning such a college—or, rather, of actually carrying out such a plan. But I shall send you my prospectus when I have finished it and shall list you as a Drifting Honorary Professor, even though I never learn your name.

* * * * *

HERE, in the Drifter's opinion, is an excellent proposal, laughing horse or no laughing horse. New Mexico, where there is a great deal of sun and practically no machine age, is of course just the place for an Institute of Idleness. And the Drifter will cooperate in the enterprise in every way compatible and to a degree commensurate with his devotion to idleness. Some time he will even go so far as to make a list of the most effective commentators on idleness—a list which will assuredly be headed by Stevenson, who, as the Drifter now remembers, gave him his first intimation—fortunately early enough in life to be of use to him—that idleness was not another term for immorality. As for the kind and unprecedented offer to make him an honorary professor, the Drifter, sight unseen, can think of no academic berth he would find more comfortable than a Chair of Idleness in Taos.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Red Cross Finances

[The Nation in its issue of January 21 referred to a statement by the People's Legislative Service that at the beginning of the current fiscal year, July 1 last, the Red Cross had on hand or "substantially assured" $44,000,000, of which amount $38,000,000 was immediately available. The authenticity of these figures was later questioned by Judge John Barton Payne and by other persons. An inquiry addressed by The Nation to the People's Legislative Service brought this reply.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Replying to your query as to how the figures used in our news release of January 12 on the Red Cross can be "reconciled with the figures given by the Red Cross itself," the answer is: The figures used in the financial statements made by Chairman John Barton Payne before the appropriations committees of the Senate and the House cannot be reconciled with our figures.

The reason is: Our figures (based solely on authenticated Red Cross data furnished directly to us) are absolutely accurate. Judge Payne's figures are grossly inaccurate.

The crux of our statement was: "The Red Cross entered the current fiscal year (July 1) with $44,000,000 in hand or substantially assured." The retort by telephone from the Red Cross was: "You have overstated the amount by about $20,000,000." Within the hour Mr. James K. McClintock, vice-chairman in charge of finance, and Mr. J. D. Cremer, Jr., assistant director of disaster relief, arrived at our office to show us the error of our way. What was the result?

There is before me as I write a statement in the handwriting of Mr. McClintock, checked and double-checked by him, confirming our use of the figure of $44,000,000. I affirm this as though on oath. The statement was made out at my desk, in the presence of Mr. Cremer and myself—and not under duress! Confronted with the figures on pages 177 and 181 of the annual report of the Red Cross for the year ending June 30, 1930, there was no other honest thing for Mr. McClintock to do but admit that we were right. Quite spontaneously Mr. McClintock met the situation in honest fashion. It is just too bad for the reputation of the Red Cross that Judge Payne refuses to face the facts.

The $44,000,000 is arrived at in the following manner: Balance on hand July 1, 1930 (national organization and chapters—p. 177), $24,100,000. Add $8,800,000 for revenue for the current year "substantially assured." (That is the reported revenue for last year—p. 177. The average for the past ten years has been more than $14,000,000, but we use the minimum figure. It is composed largely of roll-call subscriptions—now actually in hand—and interest—as good as in hand.) This gives us $32,900,000. Now add $6,232,393.37, "endowment fund," and $5,000,000, "special reserve" (p. 181), and we have $44,132,393.37, or $44,000,000 in round numbers.

Deduct the endowment fund (even Judge Payne now admits the so-called "special reserve" is answerable to a great emergency) and the balance "available for expenditure" is, in round numbers, $38,000,000, as we stated in our release.

How much of this $38,000,000 is available for expenditure for disaster relief? About $20,000,000 in addition to the $5,000,000 the Red Cross has so far agreed to spend out of its hoarded funds, and entirely exclusive of the $10,000,000 it is now seeking to collect for drought relief. An expenditure of $25,000,000 could be made by the Red Cross to meet the present emergency without touching its endowment fund or interfering with its ordinary, more or less legitimate budget.

Judge Payne, in his frantic efforts to conceal the golden nuggets of the Red Cross hoard, reminds me of a solemn penguin on a nest. Somehow, either because of the clumsiness of the bird, or the cantankerousness of the eggs, the latter keep rolling out from under.

Washington, February 4 MERCER G. JOHNSTON

The Cycling Internationale

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article on cycling in The Nation of February 4 warms my heart, although I am unable to accept the past tense in which it is written as I am still an active bicyclist. Born too late to have experienced the joys of the pioneering days, I nevertheless have been imbued with its traditions and hope to continue to cycle until some juggernaut of the road finally smashes me into limbo. Mr. Kirby mentions century runs. I included thirty of these in my riding last year.

There are many and various difficulties confronting the cyclist of today in this country—the contumely and contempt of the general public in this standardized land, the ever-increasing traffic, and the impossibility of obtaining first-class bicycles and accessories, which must be imported.

But even though the Newburgh club has disbanded, there are still many active clubs, and if our numbers here may not be great we are satisfied to know we are outposts of a great cycling Internationale, numbering its devotees by the millions, throughout the more leisurely countries of the world.

Philadelphia, February 6 ARTHUR C. VICKERY

BORZOI BOOKS

ARE ALWAYS WORTH YOUR ATTENTION

Send for the New Borzoi Catalogue

THE MORBID PERSONALITY

By Sándor Lorand, M.D.

Personality problems and the psychoanalytic methods by which they can be treated are ably dealt with in this volume by the leading American exponent of Dr. Ferenczi of Budapest. Documented with ten case histories.

$3.00

THE MEANING OF PSYCHOANALYSIS

By Martin W. Peck, M.D.

This layman's guidebook to psychoanalysis contains complete histories of the development of the Freudian and subsequent schools and excellent outlines of their doctrines. To be Published February 20th.

$2.50

CONTEMPORARY THOUGHT OF INDIA

By A. C. Underwood, M.A., D.D.

The problems of India today are much illuminated by this thorough survey of her political, social, and religious conditions.

$2.50

CONTEMPORARY THOUGHT OF GERMANY

By W. Tudor Jones, M.A., Ph.D.

A concise exposition of the most important trends of philosophic thought in modern Germany, of their origins, growth, and significance.

$2.50

GANGLAND AND THE POLICE

BEHIND THE GREEN LIGHTS

By Captain Cornelius W. Willemse

"These engrossing pages . . . reveal the real, behind-the-scenes, grim death battle which is being waged in every large American city by two great forces—those of a criminal class whose menace is not yet fully understood, and those of the police," says Dr. Charles Norris of this book by a man who was for twenty-five years with the New York Police. Captain Willemse was known as "the gang-buster" and was responsible for ending the reigns of many notorious gangsters including Kid Dropper and Little Augie.

WITH 16 ILLUSTRATIONS IN HALFTONE—$3.00

WAR ON THE HIGH SEAS

THE KAISER'S COOLIES

By Theodor Plivier

This is the first book to picture the war from the standpoint of the common sailor. The author, already referred to in Germany as "the Remarque of the navy," takes the reader with the crew of a tramp steamer who were forcibly drafted by the German War Lords in 1914. It is an amazing experience to sweat and curse with these men through four ghastly years, to go with them on the "Wolf" on her epic cruise, to fight actually at Jutland and Heliogoland, and finally to break out with them, in open rebellion. To be Published February 20th. $2.50

THE ETERNAL POLES

By Claude Bragdon

The subject of this new book by the author of Old Lamps for New, is Love in all its forms and phases—initial, daemonic, celestial, personal and sexual. Written in what James Huneker once called "an eloquent and persuasive style," it is a provocative and bold contribution. With many designs by the author. $2.00

TESTAMENT OF A CRITIC

By George Jean Nathan

"Contains a lengthy estimate of modern American playwrights; a scurrilous but side-splitting attack on the new Humanists . . . To continue is futile. Anybody who is interested either in Mr. Nathan or the theatre will buy this book anyway."—The Forum. $2.50

JAMES JOYCE'S ULYSSES

A Study by Stuart Gilbert

An able commentary which will enable the reader to approach Joyce with a far greater understanding. The New York Times has said of this study, "There is probably no exact parallel in all literary history for the labor of scholarship that Mr. Gilbert has here performed." $5.00

At the Better Bookshops

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · 730 FIFTH AVE · NEW YORK

Four Preludes

By CONRAD AIKEN

I

Come let us take another's words and change the meaning,
Come let us take another's meaning, change the words,
Rebuild the house that Adam built, with opals,
Redecorate Eve's bedroom. We were born
With words, but they were not our words, but others',
Smacked of the kitchen, or of gods, or devils,
Worn and stained with the blood of centuries,
The sweat of peasants, the mean gold of kings.
Shall we be slaves to such inheritance?
No; let us sweep these skeleton leaves away,
Blow them beyond the moon; and from our anger,
Our pride, our bitterness, our sweetness too,
And what our kidneys say, and what our hearts,
Speak with such voice as never Babel heard;
And bring the curtain down on desolation.

Was this rich tongue of ours shaped by our mothers?
Has it no virtue of its own? says nothing
Not said before at church or between sheets?
Must Shakespeare, with his phrase for the stormed heaven,
Hot midnight veined with lightning, babble only
Such mother's milk as one time wet his cheek?
Then let's be dumb: walk in the little garden:
Watch the wise thrush delight as once in Egypt;
And hear the echoes of Thermopylae.

And this is peace; to know our knowledge known,
To know ourselves but as old stones that sleep
In God's midstream of wreckage, worn as smooth.
All's commonplace: the jewel with the rest.
. . . The demon truth, sharp as a maggot, works
His destined passage through the Absolute.

II

When you come back from Memnon, when you come
Into the shadow, the green land of evening,
And hear the leaves above you, and the water
Falling, falling, in fountains;
When you remember Memnon, and the sand,
The stone lips crying to the desert, the stone eyes
Red with the daybreak not yet seen by you;

When you shake out the desert from your shoes
And laugh amongst you, and are refreshed,
And go about your business, now secure
Against the mockery of the all-changing moon;
And most of all, O sly ones, when you sell
So dearly to the poor your grains of wisdom,
Or barter to the ignorant your belief;

Oh think of this belief and think it evil,
Evil for you because you heard it only
From a stone god whose prophecies you mocked;
Evil for them because their hunger buys it;
Evil for both of you, poor pitiful slaves,
Who had no heart, when chaos came again,
Who had no love, to make the chaos bright . . .

Go back again, and find the divine dark;
Seal up your eyes once more and be as tombs;
So that yourselves may be as Memnon was.
Then, if you have the strength to face the darkness,
And praise a world of light, remember Memnon—
Stone feet in sand, stone eyes, stone heart, stone lips,
Who sang the day before the daybreak came.

III

Or daylong watched, in the kaleidoscope,
While the rain beat the window, and the smoke
Blew down along the roof, how the clear fragments
Clicked subtly inward to new patterns, seeming
To melt from rose to crystal, moon to star,
Snowflake to asphodel, the bright white shrinking
To let the ruby vein its way like blood,
The violet opening like an eye, the pearl
Gone like a raindrop. Never twice the same,
Never remembered. The carpet there, the table
On which the dog's-eared Euclid with fixed stars,
The cardboard battleship, the tops, the jackstones,
And the long window lustred with changing rain,
And the long day, profound and termless.

Or
The ship's deck, midnight, winter, and the stars
Swung in a long curve starboard above the mast,
And bow-ward then as the sea hoists the bow,
And back to port, in a vast dance of atoms,
Poured down like snow about you, or again
Steady above the mast-light, the wide span
Of brilliant worlds, not meaningless, watched bravely
By him who guards the lighted binnacle, and him
Dark in the swaying crow's nest, who beats his arms
Against the cold. What mind of stars is this?
What changing thought that takes its ever-changing
Pattern in burning worlds, worlds dying, named
Sirius or Vega or the Pleiades?
What voyage this beneath them, termless, but
Not aimless wholly, trackless in the trackless
Changing of thought in that wide mind of stars?

Back from that bitter voyage to this moment:
Where the clock's tick marks hunger from disgust,
And the hour strikes for laughter, causeless, caused
By one strayed particle, unseen, between
The heart's Nile and the brain's unknown Sahara:

Rolando's fissure and the Island of Reil.
Who watches here, O mariners and surgeons?
What Pole Star lights these shores? The atom grows,
If so it will, much like a tree, its light
Orion's now, and now the Bear's, the clock
Seeking in vain its time. We will go on,
Since go we must, bending our eyes above
The little space of light we know, watching
Thought come from news, love come from thought, desire
Come to fulfilment or defeat; and all
Swinging beneath us like that mind of stars
Which alters when it must, alters for nothing,
In the long night that guides the ship to death.

IV

Came down by night with voices in his heart,
Came down from the high altar of the mountain
Where the white eagle clutched the sheep, and stones
Rattled dislodged by wind; there the wet rock
Had burned before his eyes, so bright the angel
Who beat upon it many-wondered wings,
Beating his wings, yet moveless in that place;
So that the grass a little space about
Was lighted as by lightning, and he saw
The mountain flower at the angel's feet,
The drops of water on the hanging fern,
The daisy like a star against the moss
A circle of pale green about the rock;

And he came down again, but had heard nothing;
Nor heard the village bell; nor heard his friend;
But entered his own house; and in the dark
Stood by the window, looking out at darkness;
Looking again toward the mountain altar
Where now was darkness also; but his ears

Were filled with voices, filled with a sound of singing,
The wind's voice from the mountain; and his heart
Radiant in his breast was like a lamp . . .
And from that time his house was dark no more,
But housed an angel who was silent there,
Beating bright wings, yet moveless; and the light
Went forth from him; although he said no word.

The Fetish of Simplicity

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

I

SIMPLICITY as a literary virtue—perhaps, too, as a general virtue—is being seriously overstressed in our time. If my readers will search through book reviews they will perhaps be impressed as I was by the frequency with which "simplicity" and cognate words and phrases occur. The criterion of simplicity is, moreover, often applied to books which plainly are complex in style and structure. In such cases the critic speaks of some "fundamental," "elemental," or "classic" simplicity. For instance, in the case of such a pronounced stylist as Conrad, critics have pointed to the "simple" psychological motivation of the personal sense of honor by which all of Conrad's heroes move into complex situations. Apparently it is enough to approve of a book to find it simple. Simplicity has become a sentiment rather than a critical term having a strict meaning.

Currently, simplicity as a term of praise is accorded equally to the "lean athletics" of the followers of Hemingway, the direct factual accumulations of "realism," and the "purity" of neo-classicism—to mention only the more conspicuous schools. Their writers are believed to go at their work without literary self-consciousness and by direct methods. It is, however, obvious that negative self-consciousness is as actual as positive self-consciousness. The writers of the Hemingway school, who cut out literary effects, are as self-conscious as the writers who put them in; and the writers who aim at classic simplicity are not only self-conscious in style, but in their mental attitudes. As for a "direct" method, the accumulations of the realistic school make that impossible.

It is the writers of the Hemingway school, however, who have been chiefly responsible for the present over-accent on simplicity. They have a sturdy group-consciousness, and are the nearest approach to a school that we have come to in our recent literary history. They have been militant and apostolic, certain that their way of writing alone is sincere. Their program, which has been much affected by the concentration on single phrases of Gertrude Stein and the effort of the sur-réalistes to synchronize impression and event, may be summarized as follows: to suppress literary personality or "style," to substitute actual colloquial speech for conventional literary conversation, and to rule out all effects designed to stimulate emotion.

These ideas, if followed to their logical conclusions, would lead to the replacement of the writer by the dictaphone and the camera. In no other way would it be possible to suppress the personality of the writer and record conversation exactly. It is as impossible to suppress literary personality as it is to suppress one's face. The attempt leads to eccentricity or dulness, vices which may both be laid at the doors of the Hemingway school.

The writer who is intent to reproduce colloquial speech has perforce to fall back upon a colorless, average vocabulary and upon simple declarative sentences. Observation, however, will prove to anyone who takes the trouble to analyze a conversation that this is an unnatural kind of speech. All people have conversational mannerisms. Almost nobody speaks in simple declarative sentences. We speak rather in long breaths uniting disparate structures by any catch conjunctions. Besides, we speak to persuade, to convince, to excuse ourselves, to complain, and these ends require other means than the simple declarative sentence. These means are conversational devices which, when examined, prove to be either identical with or analogous to precisely those literary effects regarded as artificial by the Hemingway school.

There is another aspect, too, which tends to be forgotten in these discussions. Most people are inarticulate. They read books partly to have articulated for them emotions which are or which they can believe to be their own. The writer can escape neither the task nor the responsibility. Since very few people observe and judge for themselves, they rely, to a degree which is not sufficiently realized, upon newspapers, movies, the theater, and books. Of these, books, least resorted to, are the most important, for they tend to form a common source for the others. The very career of the conversational clichés of Hemingway's characters illustrates this. Many young men and women among his readers identified themselves with the lost generation. "Swell" became the fashionable adjective; and people swore and swelled in imitation of the gay despairers of "The Sun Also Rises."

Writers who use a rhetorical conversation with a philosophical content represent one ambition of their readers. The dialogue of the Hemingway school represents another. Both may be artificial (though in any good novel the most stilted conversation will sound natural and convincing), and both are flatteries. For the Hemingway picture of a hard and disillusioned generation is a flattery; just as the previous picture of a world of sensitive souls was a flattery. Fashions will change of course. In time this style of literary conversation will seem as preposterous as the melancholy Wertherisms which soothed and flattered the generation after the Napoleonic wars.

Finally, the attempt to rule out emotional response is impossible. The emotions cannot be and are not evaded. Our generation may use the drug of alcohol and a discipline of disdain rather than Puritan restraint of emotions, but the outcome will be much the same—deformity. In the "unemotional" writing of this school what we most often have is almost medicinal extracts of emotion that are raw on the nerves. Instead of catharsis we have a kick. Repression of emotion has not cured the false expression of emotion. It produces a false restraint. We shall have to experience much of the latter before we can decide which of the two is the lesser evil.

II

In a curious way this school which has repudiated philosophy and ideas has come into alliance with the chief active philosophy of our time—behaviorism. The effort to suppress the personality of the author results in the suppression of the personalities of his characters. The author, like the reader, fulfils himself in his characters. He cannot clip his style and his ideas without correspondingly clipping down his characters. These tend more and more to be reduced to types. They are almost ideal behaviorists. Instead of the inevitability of tragedy they offer the invariability, the automatism, of type reaction.

Somewhere I remember reading of an invader who destroyed a town because one of its citizens blew a bugle. The fault of one condemned all. The attack of the neo-realists upon style is reminiscent of that measure. There is no doubt that they have been honestly enraged by the abuses of literary devices. They have forgotten that style is more than its abuses. I am willing to admit that few things in literature are so offensive as bad "fine" writing. But because bad rhetoric is functionless, it must not be forgotten that rhetoric has a function. It has several important functions, one of them being to simplify, by metaphor, subtle and complex material. Some great books have been written in a bare style, but most great books have been written in an elaborate style, making use of all the resources of rhetoric. It would be unnatural in a writer deliberately to ignore devices which would intensify and allusions which would enrich his work. To write barely is to meet the problem of style, like that of the emotions, by an evasion.

Bare writing presumes a public unconscious of its cultural heritage and insensitive to style—a reading public at the level of children. Read for instance this piece from a story by Erskine Caldwell in the Winter, 1930, number of Hound and Horn. "Mal was a fine woodsman. In the spool mill, though, he was not such a good workman. He didn't like to work in the mill in the summer time. The mill made spools for electric wire." This sounds very much like the literature offered to immigrants as a literacy test. We have, however, a reading public which derives something from its traditional culture, and understands and enjoys allusive writing. It enjoys prose rhythms and all the riches of rhetoric. For whom then is Mr. Caldwell writing?

III

I will take advantage of a personal friendship to give what I think is a very good example of the unnaturalness of the new technique. One of the better-known novelists of the new school is Josephine Herbst, author of "Nothing Is Sacred" and "Money for Love." Miss Herbst believes that in her writing she is natural and realistic because she avoids literary effects and reproduces what she considers authentic speech. Miss Herbst is a writer with definite narrative gifts. But to know how genuine and abundant are these gifts one should hear her tell a story. It may be a casual meeting with a shopkeeper or a neighbor that she tells about, but at once it becomes an important occasion; it stirs in us that warm glow of acceptance which fine narrative makes us feel for all its characters.

I have always anticipated hearing Miss Herbst talk and I have given her closer attention than she knows. While she was speaking I made an analysis to discover what made the stories she told so effective. I found that in these spontaneous narratives she used a multitude of adjectives, metaphors, and similes, and those gestures, pauses, and facial expressions which in writing have to be conveyed by prose rhythm and the weights and intensities of well-chosen words. In her speech, in short, she is unashamedly rhetorical. However, when she sits down to write, she is overcome by scruples. She avoids the literary effects that she uses naturally in her speech. As a result, her novels have not realized to the full her narrative powers.

In what I have written I have not intended to deny that simplicity is a virtue. But it is one virtue among many. It may be a virtue for some writers and a vice for others; just as rhetoric in the hands of a master is a virtue, while in the hands of a bungler it is something ludicrous and even obscene.

The overemphasis on simplicity has had two unfortunate results. One is the effect upon writers, who are, like all other human beings, a mystery to themselves. Some never understand and never realize their powers. Most arrive at comparative self-knowledge only after years of effort and error. Most writers also are as imitative and envious as other human beings and dominated by the necessity of "keeping up with the Joneses." The Joneses of today happen to be the successful writers of the Hemingway school. Many writers are forcing themselves out of their natural bent and are giving us unlovely artifice in the name of simplicity.

The effect on the reading public is a flattery of one of the worst sides of its nature. Just as Werther flattered its generation by confirming its romantic sense of despair, so the vogue of simplicity is flattering our generation by confirming its sense of inferiority, its wish to relax and give up its efforts to be disciplined and socially responsible. There is apparent in contemporary thought a notion that science and industry are making it both unnecessary and impossible to be cultured. Watson's behaviorism and Spengler's "Decline of the West" have encouraged this feeling; and now in literature, the effect of which upon behavior is, I think, not sufficiently recognized, the Hemingway school is bringing forward the heroes and heroines of the new mores.

The dislocations of war accelerated the process. But the social acceptance of these ideas lies in the democratization of culture, which until recently was a class product. When the whole mass of the population of the Western world found itself obliged to understand a music, art, literature, science, and conduct for which only leisure and cultivation could fit it, the outcome was that some despaired and some repudiated. The despair and the repudiation penetrated upward. Even for the educated and the wealthy culture had become, by the inclusion of science, so broad, and involved so much effort in its mastery, that a tendency to revolt seized upon them. And they too felt a necessity for simplicity, and experienced a relief of tension whenever taste, by a turn of fashion, became lowbrow. Thus, although they themselves are no democrats, the writers of the Hemingway school came to regard it as their mission to establish in literature a direct contact with life, which they believed they achieved by discarding literary effects.

IV

The realization of this has made many observers pessimistic, but, I think, needlessly. New cultural publics are forming, and in time, I believe, historians will comment upon the rapidity with which the naturalization of the masses into the world of culture has proceeded. Mistakes that have been made are teaching their lessons. Educational authorities now understand that some proportion of the school population requires other than an academic training. There is already taking place, again, a stratification of audiences. The Theater Guild, the little-theater movement, the little motion-picture houses, and similar developments in the other arts are separating the public into homogeneous sections. It is a stratification by unconscious choice and to a smaller degree than ever before by inequality of opportunity. Publics will soon not be crowding together to their mutual discomfort.

Vulgarization of knowledge will not be necessary at the present pace of increase in education. Those who are ambitious to learn are acquiring the dignity to suit their ambition. The writer who does not admit a compulsion to be falsely simple and confidently trusts to find an audience receptive to the highest expression of his talent helps enormously to create such an audience, as the history of art shows by innumerable instances. Vulgarization, professional simplicity, is a poor weapon. Lenin was hostile to the propagandists who weakened their message and unintentionally falsified it by popularization. He commanded them to stop using "baby talk." And the event proved that agitators who took their task seriously and did not make concessions to stupidity and laziness got attention and respect. Their audiences appreciated being spoken to as matured men and women.

As I have said, a number of masterpieces have been written in a bare style. They are masterpieces, however, for other reasons than their simplicity; just as Shakespeare's plays are masterpieces for other reasons than their rhetoric. A work must be considered as a whole. We must decide not whether it is simple, but whether it is good.

Books

George Jean Nathan

Testament of a Critic. By George Jean Nathan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THOUGH it will doubtless only be regarded as an affectation of singularity on my part, I make bold to say, in spite of all that has been written to the contrary in recent years, that Mr. H. L. Mencken and Mr. George Jean Nathan have a very great deal in common. I have frequently seen in print the comment that the prose styles of the aforesaid Messrs. Mencken and Nathan bear only a superficial resemblance to each other; it may be merely my lack of discernment, but it seems to me that the resemblance is profound. So similar are their vocabularies, including their own verbal inventions, that it is by this time impossible to recall, if one ever precisely knew, which writer originated which. Their vulgarity is pretty much the same kind of vulgarity, though Mr. Nathan's leans rather more toward the lascivious and Mr. Mencken's toward the macabre. (I might remark that I here use the word vulgarity in no invidious sense, any more than I should in referring to the vulgarity of Rabelais. Mr. Nathan writes with more gusto than any other living critic of the theater, just as Mr. Mencken writes with more gusto than any other literary critic or essayist this side of the Atlantic; and I hazard the generalization that wherever one finds great gusto —one thinks of such classic examples as Rabelais, Voltaire, Swift, Carlyle—one always finds vulgarity, i. e., what are called breaches of good taste. I do not mean to imply, of course, that wherever one finds vulgarity one finds gusto.)

Mr. Nathan's attitude toward the subjects of his discourse, again, is very nearly that of Mr. Mencken. To be sure, while Mr. Mencken prefers to thwack his victims on the cranium, Mr. Nathan more often aims for their pantaloons; while Mr. Mencken suggests a Roman emperor turning thumbs down, Mr. Nathan reminds one more of a small boy thumbing his nose and making obscene noises with his mouth: but this distinction could easily be carried too far. Finally, the very rhythm and sentence structure of Mr. Mencken and Mr. Nathan are so alike that it requires a sensitive ear to detect the difference. Mr. Mencken's sentences are on the whole more dextrously managed, more compact, and land with a more resounding thud; but Mr. Nathan's achieve a more rapid movement. In Mr. Mencken one hears more of the drum and in Mr. Nathan more of the flute and piccolo. But when all this is set down the distinction remains a tenuous one. Anyone who does not think so may review the old Smart Set and tell us who wrote what among the double-signature pieces.

There can be little doubt, in brief, that the stylistic debt of Mr. Nathan to Mr. Mencken is a heavy one. Mr. Nathan's sentences are managed vastly better than they were fifteen years ago, and the Mencken influence is unmistakable. But I do not mean to fall in with the widespread critical notion that Mr. Nathan is a mere ex-satellite of Mr. Mencken, or that, like the moon, he shines by a reflected light—that it was merely his association with Mr. Mencken that brought him into prominence. Doubtless the association hastened his recognition, but his position as a critic today would still be pretty much what it is if that association had never been publicly heard of. If his prose is an imitation of Mr. Mencken's prose, then it is the only successful one—successful because perfectly fused with his own personality, and supported by a native fertility of pungent simile and epithet perhaps equal to Mr. Mencken's own. To return to our astronomical figures, we may say that Mr. Nathan and Mr. Mencken were twin stars, revolving about each other and affecting each other's orbits.

Certain differences, to be sure, there have always been between them. Mr. Mencken's heroes are Huxley and Nietzsche, and he is probably most comfortable with his coat off; Mr. Nathan is a dandy and a man about town, with leanings toward the philosophy of the Cyrenaics and Oscar Wilde. Mr. Mencken's interests have been drifting more and more away from pure literature into politics, biology, and theological speculations; Mr. Nathan clings pretty close to Forty-second Street. It seems impossible to drag Mr. Nathan out of the theater and impossible to drag Mr. Mencken into one. Mr. Nathan points his difference from Mr. Mencken by remarking in the present volume:

> Since we are all now duly and perfectly aware that America has its full share of Rotarians, Kiwanians, and Ku Kluxers, not to mention the Anti-Saloon League, the W. C. T. U., the Y. M. C. A., the D. A. R., and the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, we may as well stop harping on the subject.

We are all, it might be added, quite as duly and as perfectly aware that America has its full share of bad playwrights, bad critics, absurd talkies, and preposterous actors, but no recognition of this general awareness—fortunately—prevents Mr. Nathan from harping on fresh examples.

But let us drop this comparison, which is perhaps becoming tedious, and look at Mr. Nathan by himself. His merits are many, and not to be briefly catalogued. The writing of few critics is so continuously entertaining for its own sake. He has the sharpest realistic discernment of any theatrical reviewer now in regular practice. No other has so keen a scent for every shade of sham, pose, affectation. His intelligence is certainly as high as, and his range of knowledge of the drama—European and American, ancient and contemporary—equal and perhaps superior to, that of any other dramatic critic in these parts; yet though in this sense a highbrow he is never taken in by highbrowism. He has repeated often and in many forms his belief that "the place of the theater in the community is infinitely less the place of the university, the studio, and the art gallery than the place of the circus, the rathskeller, and the harem." He is for "horse-play, belly-laughter, pretty girls . . . farce, flippancy, folderol." He has argued year in and year out against the insufferably persistent notion "that a bad play that views life soberly is somehow better than an equally bad one that views it lightly." Mr. Nathan, again, is less taken in than most of his colleagues by the mere themes of plays, their so-called philosophy. He never, for example, confuses "a mere loud statement of some hitherto theatrically unspoken phase of sex with meritorious drama." (He finds that the Anglo-American sex drama, on the whole, "resembles nothing so much as a guinea-pig that has gone intellectual.") Mr. Nathan's exuberant flow of words, once more, giving the impression of a man writing as rapidly and spontaneously as he talks, disguises the solid work and tedious research that must go into so much of his writing. Ten pages in the present volume, for instance, set out to prove that Bernard Shaw, in spite of his occasional efforts to mask the fact, has not only an aversion to sex but a fear of it; these pages prove their contention completely and unanswerably; but it takes little imagination to realize the heavy spade work that Mr. Nathan, in spite of his pose as a gay and indolent fellow careering down the primrose highways of the world, put behind them. Mr. Nathan has for years been accused of a mere contra mundum attitude. That he loves contradiction for its own sake, that he may even enjoy it when his boos and catcalls turn out to be solos, I should be the last to deny; but when one looks over his record for a quarter of a century one finds it amazingly sane and balanced; one finds that his perspective and his standards have seldom deserted him, while the enthusiasms of most of his colleagues have come to look as ludicrous as he represented them to be at the time. Mr. Nathan has always held that Eugene O'Neill stood in a class apart among American dramatists, that, in spite of his failures, he is the only one who has what may be called size. The truth of this judgment has become more and more obvious with the passage of the years.

Perhaps it is not too much to say that Mr. Nathan is the most completely honest of our theater critics. By honesty I mean to imply certain intellectual as well as moral qualities—independence, the ability to remain unswayed by other judgments, the courage to state one's position unequivocally and to make enemies in all camps. We may note in the present book, for example, the wholesale consideration of American dramatists, with brief summaries of the importance of each. I quote one sentence in illustration:

> The so-called New Playwrights group, John Howard Lawson, Em Jo Basshe, John Dos Passos, E. E. Cummings, and Michael Gold, disclose nothing; they may be dismissed.

The point here is not whether this sweeping judgment is just or not; the point is that we have here a group of writers that have been highly praised by literary critics and by some of the dramatic critics that Mr. Nathan might be expected to respect most, and that, not through moral indignation or fear of their revolutionary social doctrines or lack of hospitality toward technical innovations, Mr. Nathan can still dismiss them peremptorily and unapologetically.

May we not say of his dramatic criticism what he himself says of Shaw's—that what he has brought to it, aside from his own contribution, is the gift of independence and courage to others?

HENRY HAZLITT

A Daniel for Shylock

The Last Days of Shylock. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

"THE ISLAND WITHIN" established Ludwig Lewisohn as one of the more considerable of contemporary novelists. It was not only an important contribution to fiction; it was proof that Lewisohn had found himself, that he had at last discovered a tradition that he could accept, a cause that he could follow, an interpretation of life that he could believe. In "The Island Within" Lewisohn the propagandist and Lewisohn the artist both found complete expression without sacrifice of either unity of form or unity of tone. The reader of Mr. Lewisohn's earlier works could only regard this book, perhaps the most nearly perfect thesis novel of our generation, as evidence that the author had achieved both intellectual and aesthetic maturity.

In view of the effectiveness of the legend introduced in the last book of "The Island Within," and in view of Lewisohn's expressed desire that Jews should be more familiar with their own traditions, it is not surprising that in his new novel he has turned from the contemporary scene to an earlier period. For his purposes the story of Shylock offered two advantages: it permitted him to redress an ancient wrong and to introduce certain colorful and little-known episodes from that saga of suffering, the history of the Jews. There was, however, one danger involved in the utilization of this story that should perhaps have outweighed, in Mr. Lewisohn's mind, the advantages: there is only one Shylock, Shakespeare's Shylock; no antecedent tradition justifies a different tradition; one must take the merchant as Shakespeare presents him. And there can be no doubt that Shakespeare thought of Shylock as a malign, avaricious, relentless person. The actors who have tried to make of Shylock a tragic and even an appealing character have had some assistance from the text, for Shakespeare was too wise a playwright to make his Jew such a monstrosity as Marlowe's Barabas; but Shakespeare was writing for an audience with prejudices he probably shared and certainly did not intend to affront. Shylock's defeat was planned to arouse not pity but righteous joy, and his character was shaped to warrant that emotion.

Lewisohn, then, was confronted in the first half of his book with the task of reconciling his Shylock and Shakespeare's. Does Shakespeare make Shylock vindictive? Then Lewisohn will explain his vindictiveness by telling what he has suffered, by presenting Antonio as an active enemy of the Jews, by explaining that Shylock wanted merely to humiliate and not to kill the Christian merchant. But the effort is futile. Lewisohn's Shylock is simply not vindictive; he is noble, long-suffering, not forgiving perhaps but certainly not vengeful. This Shylock would never have put his hostility to Antonio even partly on the ground that he had lowered the rate of interest; this Shylock would never have lamented the loss of his ducats equally with the loss of his daughter. Try as he will, Lewisohn cannot believe in Shakespeare's Shylock; he has created a different person of that name. And in the opening chapters, which are necessarily filled with echoes of the play, the two Shylocks appear, first one and then the other, as confusingly as the twins in "The Comedy of Errors."

After the chapters that are located in Venice Lewisohn has his own way, and his Shylock emerges, growing clearer and clearer until finally the other Shylock vanishes from the reader's mind. In this part of the story the absence of any pre-Shakespearean tradition is an asset, for Lewisohn can invent for Shylock whatever adventures suit his purpose. Escaping from Venice shortly after his forced baptism, the merchant journeys to Constantinople, to Joseph Nassi, Jewish treasurer of the Sultan. Nassi has received permission from his master to rebuild the city of Tiberias, and Shylock is placed in charge of the enterprise. Thus Lewisohn is able to tell a story that, in a remarkable and tragic way, parallels certain events in the recent history of Palestine. After the failure of this experiment in repatriation, Shylock goes to live in Cyprus, where he eventually finds Jessica and where, with her and her sons, he spends the closing years of his life.

"The Last Days of Shylock" is, despite the unsolved problem of its central character, a moving book, written with great dignity and much beauty of a somber sort. There is one point, and one that ought to be noted, in which Lewisohn's Shylock and Shakespeare's are identical. Heine once said that as Portia represents the grace and beauty of the Renaissance, so Shylock represents the stern hostility of the Jew to art. Lewisohn's Shylock, though there is a moment when he recognizes the grandeur of the church of San Marco, and though he wonders for a time if he has not too rudely shut Jessica away from the gaiety and charm of the city, is fundamentally antipathetic to the virtues of the Renaissance; his high ethical purpose makes no place for beauty. One remembers what Lewisohn himself wrote of Venice in "Cities and Men":

> Beauty is not enough. Too high a price can be paid for it. . . . Could Italy or the world once more be free from the oppressor, could one lasting blow for liberty and peace and mercy be struck at such a price, I would stand unmoved while all this golden beauty, which stirs my soul no less than others', toppled forever into the overwhelming sea.

In these words Lewisohn has put himself on record as being, if there must be a choice, on Shylock's side, not on Portia's. But fortunately he has written many books bearing witness to the fact that beauty does indeed stir and haunt his soul, that in him love of righteousness and love of beauty are fused. The sense of a strong ethical purpose is perhaps Lewisohn's most important contribution to the existing cultural situation, just as it is certainly the quality that gives substance and force to his books; but it is important precisely because it is wedded to that other quality without which the desire for righteousness has done so much damage in the world.

GRANVILLE HICKS

The Facts About Prohibition

The Dry Decade. By Charles Merz. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

HERE at last is an honest book on prohibition. Mr. Merz, although a wet, neither denounces nor defends. He is content with stating facts.

When Mr. Billy Sunday preached his funeral sermon over the presumably dead body of John Barleycorn there were thousands of upright and earnest citizens who echoed with a loud Amen. These good people were willing to admit that the liquor traffic was all right in its place but its place was in hell. The friends of prohibition were confident that the dragon had been slain. The liquor traffic with its attendant evils of drunkenness, crime, and vice had been finally banished to the outer darkness of illegality.

The experiment began January 16, 1920, with an "era of good feeling." The problem of enforcement was scarcely mentioned. Mr. Wheeler was sure that five million dollars a year would be ample and that this sum "could be reduced when the need disappears." The battle had been fought, the victory won, and the dry hosts left the field. Congress, having been bombarded for generations by both wets and drys, was happy to think that the "liquor question" had finally been disposed of.

This optimism was short-lived. Within six months "every major question which is now prominent in the problem of enforcement had already raised its head." The diversion of industrial alcohol, congestion in the courts, non-cooperation on the part of the States, home brewing, illegal prescriptions for medicinal liquor, and smuggling on a large scale—all had appeared.

The States promptly dumped their enforcement burdens upon Washington. The prima donna had appeared and the supporting cast fell away. But like most prima donnas the national government was long on sound and short on action. When Congress did act, it was not to provide adequate resources for enforcement of the law but to provide more law.

With about three thousand poorly paid employees the Prohibition Bureau in 1924 faced this problem:

> . . . to prosecute 40,000 prohibition cases in the federal courts, to guard 18,000 miles of seacoast and of border, to safeguard > against diversion of 57,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol, and with what help it could obtain from the States and municipalities to prevent the manufacture of intoxicating liquor in the kitchens or the basements of 20,000,000 homes.

Congress in 1920 appropriated slightly over $2,000,000 for enforcement. This was increased from year to year until it reached a total of $12,000,000 in 1929—but it is still far short of the $300,000,000 which Dr. Doran says is necessary.

The States, after the fashion of Congress, have been willing to provide legislation but not the wherewithal to make it effective. In 1923 they spent a total of $548,629 for enforcement. In 1927 this total had increased to $689,855 spent by eighteen States. In other words, the States were spending on the enforcement of prohibition about one-fourth of what they spent on monuments and parks and about one-eighth of what was spent on the enforcement of their fish and game laws.

The drys have never ceased to denounce New York for repealing its enforcement act. Yet the record under that law was not encouraging. While it was in force, a total of 6,902 cases was presented to grand juries. Of these 6,074, or 88 per cent, were dismissed; 496 cases, or 7.2 per cent, were settled by pleas of guilty; and only twenty cases, or 3 per cent, resulted in conviction and jail sentence following a trial by jury.

Faced with glutted calendars, the federal authorities resorted to "bargain" days to clear the docket.

> Here justice was dispensed with a broad hand and no necessity for juries. On set days in the court calendars, large numbers of bootleggers, restaurant proprietors, hotel keepers, waiters, smugglers, distillers, and go-betweens would plead guilty to violation of the law, provided they were assured in advance that they would avoid jail sentences and escape with fines.

These pleas of guilty, without jury trial, accounted for over 90 per cent of the convictions by 1925. "The fact of the matter is," says Mr. Merz, "that by 1925 the government had established a new license system, differing from the old license system only in the fact that it was low license rather than high license."

Lacking the necessary facilities for systematic and consistent enforcement, the Prohibition Bureau resorted to a series of spectacular "drives." With the help of the coast guard, rum row was routed; then the battle shifted to the industrial-alcohol front; thence to the harrying of petty patrons of night clubs and resorts; once again to a war on medicinal and sacramental wine, and finally to the "big fellows" who operate the huge stills. But if the enforcement agents were alert, the "conspirators" were more so. It began to appear impossible to suppress the ubiquitous small stills which operated as feeders to the "big fellows."

From the beginning there has been a policy of gambling in generals. Prohibition directors and commissioners have been changed so rapidly that one has scarcely taken off his coat and entered upon the inevitable task of "reorganization" than his head is demanded and his successor is on the way.

In the meantime a mighty war of words was being waged between wets and drys. The wets saw only the wholesale corruption, vice, and crime resulting from the failure of enforcement. The drys saw increased prosperity, happy homes, and smiling faces in a "saloonless land." With the possible exception of Professor Feldman, whose book Mr. Merz does not mention, there has been little effort to get at the facts. The thing has long since become a King Charles head with both factions.

Upon this scene in 1929 came Mr. Hoover.

> Common sense [he said] compels us to realize that grave abuses have occurred—abuses which must be remedied. An organized, searching investigation of fact and cause can alone determine the wise method of correcting them.

New Scribner Books

Puritan's Progress
by Arthur Train

A distinguished author here follows the trail of his Puritan ancestors from colonial days down to the World War. His findings make up a shrewd, witty, and revealing social history of the American people, full of strange facts and forgotten episodes. $3.50

These Russians
by William C. White

"In seventeen pen pictures of various types of ordinary folk Mr. White has packed 'an amazing mass of information. Nowhere in recent writing is there so intimate a revelation of what the common folk are thinking, suffering and doing as in these seventeen conversations." —The Philadelphia Ledger. $3.00

The Dynamic Universe
by James A. MacKaye
Professor of Philosophy at Dartmouth College

"This is more than a book. . . . It is a crusade, undertaken with a full realization of its perils, against the heretical notions of Albert Einstein, and his many highly gifted followers." —New York Times. $3.50

Wilson, the Unknown
by Wells Wells

This "Explanation of an Enigma of History" clears up many of the glaring inconsistencies in Woodrow Wilson's career and throws a new light on the leading events of his administration. $2.50

Festival
by Struthers Burt

"An excellent novel, rich, mellow, mature and undeniably stimulating. . . . Its picture of one aspect of the American scene is a broad and a truthful one. Its point of view is civilized but never complacent."—New York Sun. $2.50

Axel's Castle
by Edmund Wilson

An informing and provocative appraisal of the work of W. B. Yeats, James Joyce, T. S. Eliot, Gertrude Stein, Marcel Proust, and Paul Valery, by a leading American critic. $2.50

Digging up the Past
by C. Leonard Woolley
author of "Ur of the Chaldees," etc.

The aims and methods of field archæology described with a wealth of fascinating examples from many fields. 30 plates. $2.00

This Our Exile
by David Burnham

A brilliant new novel of American family life and the reactions on an over-civilized group in times of stress. $2.50

One-Volume Edition

The World Crisis
(1914-1918)
by Winston S. Churchill

In this 850-page book Mr. Churchill has combined the four separate volumes of his internationally famous war memoirs, eliminating special discussions and adding much new material. With maps and plans. $5.00 at your bookstore

Charles Scribner's Sons · New York

And so a fact-finding commission was appointed and set to work.

Now after nineteen months we have the final report. It reveals nothing new. The members of the commission are agreed on the facts but are hopelessly divided on the remedy. Thus, after ten years, the problem is exactly where it was in 1921, with Mohammed's coffin suspended between heaven and earth.

The situation is the same with one exception—the appearance of an organized opposition. It is no longer possible to dismiss the opponents of this law as "gullible guzzlers" or as "tools of the liquor traffic." They are too numerous and too respectable. The drys are preparing for a long siege. "Prohibition will be enforced if we stick to it long enough," said Mrs. Catt. "Ten years is but a little time with 100,000 years ahead."

By all means read this book. It does not point a way but it gives us our bearings. PETER H. ODEGARD

A Duchess and a Dancer

Education of a Princess. A Memoir by Marie, Grand Duchess of Russia. The Viking Press. $3.50.

Theatre Street. The Reminiscences of Tamara Karsavina. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

HERE are two books which may be counted as pleasant by-products of the Russian Revolution. They were written by women who, if the Czar still ruled, would doubtless today be following a set and preordained way of life in St. Petersburg. Karsavina, perhaps, would make occasional comet-like flights around the world, following the bright orbit of a successful prima ballerina; but Marie would have settled down, none too happily, to the precise routine of Russian royalty. The war and the revolution changed all that. In a court so dull that nothing seemed ever to happen, everything suddenly happened in a succession of terrific explosions; and when the clouds had cleared there was no court, and Marie and Karsavina were blown clean out of their niches into new worlds.

Marie's story goes to prove that given a fair chance princesses may be people. Even when she was a child she showed traces of ability and personality—she secretly learned to lace her own boots—but these flare-ups were quickly stifled. Though a grand duchess in a country ruled by an absolute monarch, she was taught not to command but to obey; to be submissive, dutiful, domestic. This was the temper of the royal family and the court. When Marie's father, an uncle of the Czar, took as his second wife a woman who was only a countess he was speedily banished to Paris. Marie and her brother were brought up by their cold and rigid aunt, a sister of the Czarina. Both of these women were granddaughters of Victoria of England and had spent their youth under her ponderous influence. It is impossible not to suspect that some of the indomitable dulness of that magnificent royal bourgeoise had percolated through them into the Russian court. At any rate Marie was fed on a depressing diet of don'ts and better nots; yet when the war came to set her free she braved her own incompetence and got down to work—bandaging wounds, scrubbing floors, and actually running a large war hospital. And when the revolution swept her remaining landmarks away, along with her property and security, she put up with discomforts and dangers quite as gallantly as the more considerable part of the population that had never shared the repressions of royalty.

She finally ducked out of Russia, but one can hardly blame her for leaving a country which had been deliberately rendered uninhabitable for grand duchesses. The only spot at which Marie disappointed me was when she fainted at the sight of several sailors, with "their ladies in woolen, colored kerchiefs," lounging in the ex-imperial box at the ballet. For a girl who had seen all the life—and death, too—that Marie had seen, a thirty-minute swoon seems excessive on such provocation. I can only conclude that box and sailors suddenly lost their material identity and loomed as symbols of all that was gone, and that Marie's nervous system responded with a general collapse such as her cool intelligence would never have tolerated. With almost no other exception, she reveals a vigorous personality and surprising perception. She knew what was going on around her. She knew herself. And she has mixed her history and autobiography with skill and a sharp sense of relative values.

Much the same may be said of the reminiscences of Karsavina, though her writing is of a less conscious, sophisticated order. The early lives of the two women were in several ways similar. Karsavina, like Marie, was subjected to years of rigid discipline and regimentation. But a fundamental difference existed which makes all comparisons empty and unreal. Marie's training was for no other purpose than to satisfy the empty ideals of upper-class propriety. Karsavina's was directed to the end of producing a great artist. This difference was reflected in the attitude of the two girls. Marie was bored and feebly rebellious. Karsavina worked like a little fiend to accomplish each step in her laborious progress, to graduate from the Theater School, to dance at the Marinsky Theater, to become at last a prima ballerina. These aims made everything worth while—endless practice, stern governesses, brown dresses, even having one's hair combed with a curry comb. With simplicity and humor Karsavina has told the story of her years on "Theatre Street," and has brought to life that compact world of men and women and children all soberly engaged in the achievement of a disciplined perfection. One of the most beguiling incidents she describes is the descent of Isadora Duncan, like an exploding rocket, into those ordered ranks. The tale of her later experiences, especially her work under the inspired direction of Diaghilev, is invaluable as a record of one of the world's great artistic adventures.

The stories of Marie and Karsavina cover almost the same span of years in the same city. They seldom overlap. Put together they form a fragment of a civilization that is not only gone but is already in need of historical reconstruction.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Mr. Shorey's Plato

Plato: The Republic. With an English Translation by Paul Shorey. Volume I, Books I-V. The Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THESE are the days of the dictatorship of the literati. The grammarians, the rhetoricians, and the poets have taken over the commonwealth of human beings and are reapportioning the territory in the realm of mind. A Northern professor of English asks us whether we are humanist or naturalist, Southern poets ask us whether we are industrialist or agrarian, and philologists from far corners of the globe ask us whether we are children or adult, whether we think in images or abstractions. For the most part we are happy to be ruled by these makers of dilemmas, since we have light opinions and little familiarity with ideas. It therefore has a certain dramatic interest that Plato's "Republic," which is at least in some respects an attack on grammar, rhetoric, and poetics, should be translated by a grammarian with rhetorical and poetical affiliations.

But it is of more than passing interest that Paul Shorey

Has labor ever won with its "most powerful weapon?"
Have American labor leaders sold labor out?
Can labor build a new order TODAY?

The GENERAL STRIKE IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

by WILFRID H. CROOK

The origin and theory of the general strike; its use in Belgium, Holland, Russia, Canada, the United States, and all other countries; its successes and failures; its lessons for the present day labor movement. Scholarly, scientific, comprehensive, and impartial, this book gives all of the facts, and analyzes labor's gains, losses and mistakes. It is indispensable to everyone interested in the labor movement, regardless of affiliation.

Just published, $6.00 net, postpaid from the publishers.

University of North Carolina Press
Chapel Hill, N. C.

THE LAST DAYS OF SHYLOCK

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN. This amazing new novel by the author of The Island Within and Mid-Channel "ranks him with the masters."—Phila. Public Ledger. 12 illustrations by Szyk. 6th printing. $2.50

AFRICA VIEW

By JULIAN HUXLEY. "If you want to feel the heat of Africa, to glimpse something of the meeting of her black millions, sit down for a few evenings with Africa View. It contains more than all the travel books and romances put together."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. Illus. $5.00

WORLD WITHOUT END

By HELEN THOMAS (H. T.). Here, in the form of fiction, is the story of a truly great love. The author was married to Edward Thomas, the young English poet killed at Gallipoli, and this is their story. "None but an unusual woman could have made this confession in this way."—J. Middleton Murry. $2.50

HOUSE PARTY

By E. M. DELAFIELD. "A comedy done in pastels, delicately tinted, yet with firm strokes of humor and definite character. The book provides ample entertainment of a distinctly patrician nature."—N. Y. Evening Post. $2.50

BEST SHORT STORIES OF THE WAR

Introduction by H. M. TOMLINSON. 66 prose masterpieces by such famous modern authors as Galsworthy, Remarque, Conrad, Hemingway, Tomlinson, Wharton, Mottram and others. $3.50

Harper & Brothers, 49 E 33 St., New York

JUST PUBLISHED IN THE BONIBOOKS
50c each

THE HIGH PLACE by James Branch Cabell	AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI	MOBY DICK (Illustrated) by Herman Melville
THAÏS by Anatole France	MADAME BOVARY by Gustave Flaubert	BATOUALA by Rene Maran
INTENTIONS by Oscar Wilde	SALAMMBO by Gustave Flaubert	THE WAY OF ALL FLESH by Samuel Butler

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN by Lafcadio Hearn

THESE AND 36 OTHER TITLES AT ALL BOOKSTORES

should be translating Plato for the Loeb Library. In the first place, this library is the one remaining hope of keeping the ancient classics and what they say effective in the modern world about which we hear so much. The educational devices for bringing students to the classics have failed. Now the few remaining classical scholars are bringing the classics to the student. In the second place, it is important that the work of translation should be done by first-rate scholars, since translators' minds act like sieves, saving only what they can distinguish. Thus the character of whatever renaissance may result from these translations will be determined fundamentally by the quality of scholarship that goes into them. It is therefore important to estimate the quality of mind of the translator before one draws conclusions about the translation and what Plato in this instance says through it. There is no doubt about the first-rank quality of Paul Shorey's scholarship. We may be very grateful to the editors and to him for bringing this quality to bear on "The Republic."

But there is still another kind of judgment to make, one which is suggested by the ancient and medieval divisions in linguistic science. There is the grammarian who studies words—their forms, variations, and interrelations. There is the rhetorician who studies literary forms—their decorative properties and their practical effectiveness. There is the poetic critic who loves grammar and rhetoric for what they can help to express. Finally, there is the dialectician who refers all these to ideas, and notes the logical locus of what is being said. Each sort of scholar has his proper excellence, but there are few who actually achieve adequacy in all respects. Plato's "Republic" has materials that call for all these critical capacities. It has an abundance of verbal subtlety; it carries a heavy load of morals; it is the European prototype of intellectual comedy; and it dialectically reveals a large portion of the ideal basis of Greek thought. Mr. Shorey is primarily a grammarian, but he also has a strong rhetorical and dramatic sense. I think we can safely say on the evidence of the present translation that his interest is not dialectical.

It may be possible for an original author to meet the demands of all these literary sciences and make his work an incarnation of their ideals. One is tempted to define Plato's genius in precisely this way. On the other hand, it is quite certainly true that a translator will have to fall short in some respects just at the points where he achieves excellence in others. The grammarian will show his leanings when he is faced with an idiom; he will choose nicety of verbal detail and let rhetorical effect, aesthetic harmony, and even clarity of ideas go. We may be grateful to Mr. Shorey where he instructs us in Greek verbal mechanics and nuance although he makes us read the passage two or three times to see what Plato means. We may enjoy the tang of Plato's Greek conversational style even when its ambiguity when turned into English leaves us a little poorer in ideas. We may lose the point of the text in following Mr. Shorey's voluminous and sometimes labyrinthine footnotes, and we may even in the end wish to read Mr. Shorey rather than Plato because the comments are so instructive in many subjects and so entertaining when they report Mr. Shorey's associational processes. But there will be times when even the lay reader will stop reading and sigh for a word of encouragement from the dialectician. Certainly the philosopher who has labored with the Greek with the help of Adam's commentary, or lost himself in Mr. Jowett's honeyed and pious version, will be a little disappointed in at least these first five books of "The Republic." He will still wish perversely that Plato had translated his own work into mathematical symbols, or that Mr. Shorey had been a philosopher instead of a philologist.

Perhaps this comment is not fair. Mr. Shorey has written his philosophical interpretation of Plato in "The Unity of Plato's Thought," and a translation is a good place to let us see just how he has used the original material. The two parts are complementary. There is also objective love of the original text which carries over the kind of vitality that we call poetic into his translation. If he has not helped us, he still has not spoiled Plato. After all, there may be less logic in "The Republic" than philosophers have often supposed. There never has been a philosophical writer who tempted his reader more to read between the lines, and it is always difficult to disentangle Plato from his victim in the end. It will be interesting to see the forthcoming second volume to which Mr. Shorey promises to attach some of his conclusions. Perhaps the grammarian and the dialectician will meet there.

SCOTT BUCHANAN

Welcome the Counterfeit

A Night in Kurdistan. By Jean-Richard Bloch. Translated from the French by Stephen Haden-Guest. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THERE is talent in every line of "A Night in Kurdistan." Few living novelists could hope to compete with M. Jean-Richard Bloch, the well-known author of "—— & Co." and frequent contributor to the Nouvelle Revue Française, in the matter of "style." He is a master in the application of the Best French Literary Manner. And it is because he is talented that a worthless book like "A Night in Kurdistan" should be condemned with especial severity.

In his Prelude M. Bloch informs us that despite his love of France he has never been able to overcome a nostalgic inclination toward the East, "the Continent of Passion." His story, therefore, is to be an imaginative excursion to Asia. Its hero is Saad, a young Mohammedan warrior who is sent as a spy into the Christian city of Kasir to open its gates to his comrades. Disguised as a merchant, he contrives to be invited to spend the night at the home of a prominent Christian. Both the wife and daughter of the Christian fall in love with him. After nightfall he permits himself to be seduced by the wife, but at the climax of their wordless embrace he recovers his self-mastery and kills her without a sound by biting her jugular vein. He also kills her sleeping husband and hurries to the city gate to prepare the entrance of his comrades. Kasir is entered by the Mohammedans and sacked. Saad defends his former host's daughter, but cannot prevent her, when she learns the nature of his relation to her mother, from stabbing herself. When he returns to his mountain home and wife he is unhappy because he is in love with the Christian girl. Finally he decides to return to Kasir in another disguise, in the hope of seeing her. (It turns out that she had not killed herself, but is well once again and more beautiful than ever.) As a blind beggar and convert to Christianity he contrives once more to enter her home. Slowly she becomes aware of his identity, but when he reveals himself she delivers him up for execution. At the moment when he is about to be stoned to death she runs to his side and they die together.

There are several reasons why it is not possible to attach significance to this story. The best is that M. Bloch himself did not. It is evident on every page that he cares neither for Saad nor for Asia nor for what happens, but solely for the preservation of his Manner—that is, the Best French Literary Manner. He puts such an extraordinary valuation upon this Manner, in fact, that he imagines it exempts him from the obligation to seek each moment for a better understanding of his characters and his story. Therefore he floats above the scene at a great height and occasionally drops a golden word which is supposed to let us know that he has observed and understood the whole of life.

There is no need to describe the Best French Literary Manner. Everybody will recognize the following, which is the first paragraph of the book:

> O France whom I love so dearly, people of France in whose midst I have so willingly, so ardently lived and fought, I would I could feel myself born of you, like unto you. But the language of affinity calls more loudly than my wish.

The last paragraph of the book, however, reveals something which is peculiar to M. Bloch:

> Here ends the tale. In Anatolia they often say to the newly married: "We wish for you that your deaths may be as happy as the deaths of Evanthia and Saad."
>
> Better than he who tells this tale, God knows the heart of the matter.

There is something about the mellifluous humility of the last sentence which is peculiarly ostentatious. (Of course there was no need for the sentence: until then M. Bloch had assumed the paternal omniscience of God for himself.) If we look closely we find that ostentation is the central vice of M. Bloch. After each line he cocks his head to listen, his shrewd eyes gleaming, for our applause. There are few books which are so consistently inspired by vanity.

It was his vanity that led him to betray his talent and produce something of no value, a counterfeit. (Perhaps on second thought his talent is less than we imagined. After all, he has but a slight sense of character, scene, or locale; no particular insight, and no message at all—little, in fact, except his "style." Perhaps we never admire the engraver's hand except he has wasted it on a counterfeit, and never think of style unless, as here, it is appliqué.) In any case, there is not a page of "A Night in Kurdistan" which does not seek to win our applause by suggesting something else that we have read before. As a result, when we have concluded this well-wrought imitation our inner experience amounts to zero.

The book should have a success in America. First, because so many will like its style. Second, because of its erotic passages. Third—best reason of all—because it is a counterfeit. We all know that the bank is the only place in America where the counterfeit is not liked. Art like this, in particular, is made immediately to feel at home.

GERALD SYKES

Brandes on Voltaire

Voltaire. By Georg Brandes. Translated by Otto Kruger and Pierce Butler. Albert and Charles Boni. Two volumes. $10.

IT is a little hard to understand just why these two massive volumes should have been rescued for us from the Danish (or the German—it is not made clear which language is being translated from). That they form a just and vivid appraisal of a great figure is undeniable; but they add nothing, on the interpretative side, to Morley's classic volume; and from the point of view of scholarship little that is new appears to have been added by Brandes to the labors of the French researchers. He tells the story well, but it is one that has been too often told, perhaps, to enlist our attention very vitally.

Throughout, the sustaining viewpoint is that of the humanitarian-liberal-rationalist, the progressive "good European," so admirably typified by Georg Brandes, himself a son of the enlightenment. The modern reader, as he peruses these careful and sympathetic pages, feels constantly the lack of the Lytton Strachey touch. To such a reader, perhaps, it is more important to point out the superficial and literary quality of Voltaire's skepticism (eighteenth-century "scientific" optimism with its

REGISTER NOW
For These Lecture Courses
Starting Next Week
•
By MORRIS R. COHEN
The Philosophy of Liberalism
Mondays — Beginning Feb. 16 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Six Lectures - $7.50
•
By J. E. SPINGARN
Literature and the New Era
Wednesdays — Beginning Feb. 18 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Six Lectures - $7.50
•
By PARKER T. MOON
International Problems of the United States
Mondays — Beginning Feb. 16 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Twelve Lectures - $15.00
•
By SIDNEY HOOK
The Philosophy of Karl Marx
Wednesdays — Beginning Feb. 18 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Twelve Lectures - $15.00
•
By THOMAS BENTON
Craftsmanship and Art
Thursdays — Beginning Feb. 19 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Twelve Lectures - $15.00
•
By HAROLD LASKI
The Present and Future of British Political Institutions
Tuesdays — Beginning March 3 — 8:20-9:50 P. M.
Twelve Lectures - $15.00
•
SINGLE ADMISSIONS - $1.50
•
The NEW SCHOOL For SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street New York
TELEPHONE ALGONQUIN 4-2567

Dept. 12,
New School for Social Research,
66 West 12th Street, New York.
Please send me complete descriptive catalogue of all courses.
Name ....
Address ....
City ....

The Russian Experiment

ARTHUR FEILER

"I WISH it could be made compulsory reading for those who talk about Russia. It seems to me sympathetic to the great things being attempted, yet loyal to fact."—Norman Thomas.

"A masterpiece of creative reporting, of significant and close historiography. His opinions never go beyond his facts."—Benjamin Stolberg. $2.00

That Next War?

MAJOR K. A. BRATT

"SANE, thoughtful, stimulating. Major Bratt is aware that professional Pacifists and Bellicists are equally mad, equally foolish. His book is packed with matter that should be of interest to everyone, and no one will lose his time in the close conning thereof."—N. Y. Sun. $2.50

Harcourt, Brace and Company, 383 Madison Ave., N. Y.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

By ELLERY C. STOWELL

Contains a comprehensive outline of the law of nations as it exists today. Every pertinent aspect of the vast subject is discussed at once with scholarly detachment and first-hand knowledge. Individual cases of importance are analyzed with a view to revealing their influence on the development of international law. $4.75

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

REVISED EDITION

By RAYMOND L. BUELL

"The revised edition brings the book up to date and greatly increases the value of what has proven to be one of the most important contributions to the literature of international relations which has been published since the war."—J. W. Garner in The Annals of the American Academy. $5.00

POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE WORLD WAR

By RAMSAY MUIR

A distinguished historian outlines the effects of the World War upon European history. (Home University Library.) $1.25

THE HISTORY OF SCIENCE AND THE NEW HUMANISM

By GEORGE SARTON

The Colver Lectures of 1930 delivered at Brown University illuminate a current intellectual controversy. $2.00

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY

One Park Avenue New York

fangs bared) than to retell for the fiftieth time the history of the Calas and Sirven affairs. One would like to see it demonstrated, possibly, that Voltaire, far from being a "mystery," was great in his very lack of complication; that despite his versatility he was at the opposite pole from the Da Vinci universal-genius type. To a critic of Brandes's background, such misgivings, such questions, could never occur; he never departs from an attitude of judicial hero-worship.

The book is far less valuable for its tracing of Voltaire's career than for its frequent brilliant vignettes of minor eighteenth-century personalities.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Books in Brief

A Roving Commission. My Early Life. By the Right Honorable Winston S. Churchill. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

Mr. Churchill has already recounted a good deal of his part in making history in the three volumes of "The World Crisis" and in "The Aftermath," the latter bringing the story down to 1928. In "A Roving Commission" he goes back to the cradle and comes down to the time when, returning to England after the South African war, the "khaki" election landed him in the House of Commons. It is a racy narrative, vividly and at times brilliantly written, abounding in good stories, striking descriptions of personalities, and caustic comments on matters as varied as primary and public-school education, military training, polo-playing in India, and politics. More than most English public men, Mr. Churchill has had the fortune to "land on his feet" in difficult situations, and he lets us see the play of luck, not unmixed with dash and skill on his own part, in his experiences as a newspaper correspondent in India with a military command that did not want him, his campaign with Kitchener in Egypt and the Sudan, and his theatrical escape from the prison camp to which the Boers consigned him. Of this last adventure, told in part and with some necessary variants shortly after, he here gives for the first time a full report. Through the narrative runs a note of affectionate regard for his mother, Lady Randolph Churchill, whose devotion was constant and resourceful. It would be hard to find a more entertaining book of reminiscence, or one from which, considering the rapidity of the advance and the spectacular nature of some of the experiences, the tone of self-satisfaction is more conspicuously absent.

Marcel Proust: Sa Révélation Psychologique. By Arnaud Dandieu. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

M. Dandieu's book is for the advanced Proustian rather than the beginner. No work of recent years, not even "Ulysses," has given rise to so many commentaries as has "A la recherche du temps perdu," and no other recent work could have been so fruitfully approached from so many different angles. M. Dandieu has concentrated on what seems to him the most fundamental consideration, namely, Proust's conception of reality. In his analysis he has drawn upon anthropology, psychology, and philosophy. He has tried to show how Proust's evocation of the past resembles primitive magic, and how his preoccupation with this process resulted in a kind of split personality. Dandieu does not, however, attack Proust, as some critics have done, on the ground that his work ends in moral and psychological chaos; on the contrary, he maintains that the final result, after the process of dissociation and disintegration is complete, is a kind of recomposition of the human personality. Much of Dandieu's discussion is illuminating, especially his comments on Proust's theories as expressed in "Le temps retrouvé."

A Woman on Her Way. By John Van Druten. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

It is only in the last few pages of this novel that the events which make up the story of Elinor, female novelist, kind friend, and disappointed lover, achieve anything near interest. The round of gossip and literature and beds that Mr. Van Druten spins his lengthy novel on is tiresome in the extreme. Snatches of dialogue, an amusing anecdote occasionally brighten its waste spaces, but none of the characters become more than names with the exception of a little typist, whose genuineness is due principally to her bit part and to her resemblance to the characters in Frank Swinnerton's novels. Perhaps it is the deadly evenness of the narrative, the flatness of the style, or the boring commonplaceness of the events which makes this novel by the author of "Young Woodley" so unimpressive. If "the sterility of sophistication" was his topic, then he might have made the sterility of his characters at least positive enough to merit the space he devotes to them.

Back Street. By Fannie Hurst. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.50.

This is an absorbing novel. It seems a bit over-written. And Miss Hurst is guilty, as usual, of exaggeration, of piling things on too heavily, of stacking her cards through a sense of logical necessity. Things have to fit a little too neatly in her world (as in that of many others) and so she resorts to glamorous depths and heights, logically worked out but a bit obviously arranged. But "Back Street" certainly ranks with the best work she has done. It is the story of Ray Schmitt, the "tony" and somewhat "fly" Ray (to adopt the slang belonging to her early years). Men of all kinds like Ray; and Ray likes them. She can't help it. She is born the good fellow. But she finally falls in love. And in her love for the mediocre-souled Walter Saxel that lasts so many years positions are reversed. Ray is the true wife of this rising banker who grows so enormously wealthy. Corinne, the wife, is much more the petted and lavishly supported mistress. There is a curious streak in this Walter, who cannot bear that Ray should be out of contact with him for five days, which makes him keep her down to bare necessities—though he forbids her to keep her job. And so when Walter dies she is left stranded. The rest is true and tragic and not without a certain beauty. Miss Hurst has done her backgrounds with complete understanding. And she has described an interesting girl and woman, one without great abilities or special qualifications, with an insight which should have wide appeal.

Naked on Roller Skates. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Horace Liveright. $2.

Maxwell Bodenheim has written another of his wild-eyed novels in which words, words, words, big words and little words, are scattered about like bullets from the mouth of a machine-gun. If one could distil the essence of these novels into a long poem like, for instance, Mr. March's "The Wild Party," one would have a brilliant and penetrating study of a certain stratum of American life. But amid the profundities, the bits of sheer illuminating insight, the powerful juxtaposition of nerve-racked minds, taut muscles, and romantic sordidness, there is a good deal of nonsense. Words and figures carry Mr. Bodenheim away. At his best he is a better poet than novelist. The present novel, which is much superior to its absurd title, is a study of Terry Barberbilt, wanderer, adventurer, old-timer, who has gone through the mill of a life of dangerous, wandering adventure; of Ruth, the Connecticut girl who is eager for life, for experience, for adventurous living, who marries him; and of three backgrounds—a Connecticut town, Harlem, and lower Eighth Avenue. The chief characters are "proletarians"; gentility and the passion for property play little part in their lives.

NEW TITLES IN THE MODERN LIBRARY

TOM JONES
BY HENRY FIELDING

THE OLD WIVES' TALE
BY ARNOLD BENNETT

AGAINST THE GRAIN
BY J. K. HUYSMANS

THE PHILOSOPHY OF PLATO
EDITED BY IRWIN EDMAN

THE MEDICI
BY G. F. YOUNG

COMPLETE AND UNABRIDGED—AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

95c A COPY

The most sensational exposé since MOTHER INDIA!

MASSACRE
by ROBERT GESSNER

This startling book gives an accurate survey of today's American Indian, and will probably shock a great many readers, although the majority of the author's exposures are not new to students of the Indian problem. Mr. Gessner spent over two years in gathering material for his book, and has travelled over 13,000 miles in his visits to the various reservations. He is not a member of any Indian welfare organization. His work has been unsubsidized and purely individual.

Just published, 3.50

JONATHAN CAPE & HARRISON SMITH
139 East Forty-sixth Street :: New York

By the author of
"HEAVENLY DISCOURSE"

TOO MUCH GOVERNMENT
by Charles Erskine Scott Wood

The author of the inimitable "Heavenly Discourse"* here sums up his theories of life and society.

$2.00 VANGUARD At Bookstores

Over 50,000 copies have been sold to date*

AT LAST... THE STORY OF All Things Living —in a great companion work to The Outline of History—the book five million people have read—by

H. G. WELLS
JULIAN S. HUXLEY—G. P. WELLS

Famous Scientists are saying:

"The supreme possible achievement in a vital tabloid."—WILLIAM BEEBE

"Succeeds beyond all expectation in making poignant the incredible marvels and mysteries of life."—JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

Strongly recommended to you by such men as:
Dr. George A. Dorsey
Vernon Kellogg
Dr. Logan Clendening
Kirtley F. Mather
Edward L. Thorndike

Praised by twenty-five of today's great leaders in thought and achievement—selected by the Scientific Book Club for February and March — recommended by the Book-of-the-Month Club—a fascinating summary of all the living sciences in a single dramatic story. Essential to any intelligent modern philosophy of life. Just out! Order it from your bookstore now!

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE

337 illustrations—1,514 pages—600,000 words—two handsome volumes $10.

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

The Gentle Libertine. By Colette. Translated by R. C. B Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

The sexual dissatisfaction of a female, bourgeois, French moron is described in this novel by Colette. Some of it seems a bit thin—though Minne's childhood moods and vagrancies are, certainly, delicately written of—and nothing seems precisely actual about any of the characters save the libertine herself. The tone of the amours is, too, vaguely reminiscent of the Anatole France of "The Red Lily." What is most admirable in the novel as a novel is the plan whereby the adolescent status of Minne's emotions is maintained in maturity—or, at least, in adult circles—by omitting, suddenly, any account of a considerable passage of time. Since the omitted interval might well have been the crucial time in Minne's girlhood, it might have been difficult to sustain Minne's adolescent attitude. The method is a trick, but like most of Colette's sly tricks of style, a good one. And the end of Minne's nymphic career in her husband's arms is as impressive as was the end of "Chéri."

The Goblin Woman. By Rose O'Neill. With Drawings by the Author. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

An elegant lady of obscure origins descends in a thickness of prose upon a New England town and causes much elaborate talk about herself and others. Eventually she goes off to Italy with the very handsomest gentleman in the place, his marriage is annulled, and the book ends cloudily. But some of the characters intervening are amusing, the events of sufficient complexity, and, occasionally, a pleasant sentence slips through the heavy prose.

Art

A Painter of the Machine Age

THE role of the painter, under the modern American economy, has been on the whole an unhappy and marginal one, largely dependent upon the supply and the demands of retired business dynasts or their snobbish wives. As to the young contemporary painter, it has seemed at times as if the "system" required that he be dead—dead as Romney or Gainsborough, so that one of his pictures could be sold, "together with an appropriate chair," by some forehanded merchant of Fifth Avenue.

These conditions still prevail, I say; and despite the promising changes in the exterior aspect of our cities, the recent upheavals in architecture, the public congestion in the rooms of the Modern Museum, the dead hand of the past still lies with surprising weight upon everything here that pertains to the life of art. Knowing the strategic, vital role that great artists have played in past civilization—Egyptian, Grecian, or Florentine—by giving expression to the religion or lore of peoples, who could be more aware of missed opportunity and immense intangible loss than the modern painter; above all, as he stares at the confusion, the planlessness, with which the industrial city of today has casually flung itself up, grandiose from the distant view, bitterly disappointing to the close scrutiny? Business has been rich for a period, and so business architecture and decoration have made notable gains. But aside from the thrilling line which engineering boldness contributes, how often the substance and surface is wanting in all meaning, or reflects the most negligible taste or fashion? How many proud skyscrapers, severely cubist in soul, are clad in medieval costumes, or ornamented with sculptured replicas of rococo German Rhine maidens?

Faced with this confusion of values and purposes, reflecting he deeper confusion and, almost, cowardice at bottom, the young American painter Henry Billings has sought to evolve a solution, logical and intelligent, out of the various schemes of art that fill the air. He has attacked the dual problem of the function of the artist and of the proper realm of his effort in the mechanized society which is the present environment. First, he has essayed the medium of mural painting, adapted to the structural-steel and stone architecture which is the order of the day. Since "easel painting" has nothing to say, apparently, to the walls, rooms, cities we now live in, he bids this medium farewell, consigning it to the lifeless halls of museums. (Most of us may cling to "easel painting," as to chamber music or violin sonatas, saying that great art obliterates walls; Billings, in his interesting evolution, abandons it.) Second, he has with great adventurousness managed to plant himself and his huge murals in the upper reaches of a modern skyscraper, towering over the very heart of the geometrical city, as if to say: "This is where we belong! Here is our field of operation!"

The gigantic pictures on view in the Squibb building, twenty-sixth story, during the weeks of February and early March, 1931, are memorable things and offer a significant contrast to the style of murals given by Benton and Orozco, further downtown, at the New School for Social Research. They are all faithful variations on the theme of the great machinery which rules our world, and soberly entitled: Corliss Steam Engine, Generator, Locomotive, Tools of Precision, etc. The treatment is "flat" and in deliberately subdued color values for the sake of not breaking up walls. Despite certain perceptible deficiencies or lacunae in several of the pictures, which may be summed up as the want of enough plastic interest, variety, intensity—deficiencies which the talents of the painter promise to remedy as he develops and adjusts himself to the new medium—the degree of success in the whole experiment is formidable. Tools of Precision, a triangular design in tones of gray and overlaid gold leaf, is the lovely interplay of forms; while Stamping-Press and Locomotive accumulate a colossal effect of energy through brilliant organization. But there is another aspect of these pictures which is of immense importance.

Painting in this century, notably French painting, had felt the new need of abstraction, of the geometrical and the primitive. But its adventure had terminated in what Valéry calls the "too pure zones"; and it retraced its steps, as from a blind alley. Billings, with geometrical and primitive feeling, goes to the fountainhead of allegory and attaches his painting to a symbolism—machinery, in itself abstract and geometrical.

Henry Billings is ostensibly no Bolshevist; but his brush has been terribly truthful and speaks to us without romanticism of the new Frankensteins which are the strange culmination of some two centuries of industrialism. These monsters have no human values in their eye; they stand there, automatic, implacable, omnipotent, in their actual relation to our own smallness and timidity. We, who peer at them, are but quantities, while they, with their inscrutable ends, are the moving force of the mechanized world which the Henry Fords have attempted to order for us. Nevertheless, this world of which Henry Billings has painted the essential symbols is one which the Fords would reject with instant horror in favor of the gentler one of the aforementioned Romneys. It is a wonder that all the big and little Squibbs do not rise up in anger to throw out Billings and his damning murals.

Paintings of machines are usually oppressive; but these at times seem neat, perfect, almost wistful. It is as if they say: We have no evil intentions; we wish only to work, to go round and round, or up and down. Now at the present moment of history the world of mechanism staggers a little; so that to be told yet of man's struggles amid his own monstrous although Billings has spoken eloquently, perhaps there is much devices.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

The CHALLENGE OF RUSSIA
By
SHERWOOD EDDY

"In order to get a just opinion of a situation like that in Russia you usually have to buy two books, for and against. Mr. Eddy gives you two in one."—Max Eastman in The Post.

Farrar & Rinehart
$2.50

NEW BOOKS OF SPECIAL INTEREST

GARDENER OF EVIL
A Portrait of Baudelaire and His Times
By PIERRE LOVING. The mad Paris of La Boheme, of gas lamps and hansom cabs; that is the setting for this extraordinary novel-biography of Baudelaire, the erotic genius of many loves and immortal poetry. Acclaimed in England "—an amazing, living book." $2.50

FOUR CENTS AN ACRE
The Story of Louisiana Under the French
By GEORGES OUDARD. The author of Peter the Great and The Amazing Life of John Law tells the thrilling and important story of the gallant Louisiana colony, sold out by Napoleon for four cents an acre. Here is history, drama and tragedy. $3.50

ST. LOE STRACHEY
His Life and His Paper
By AMY STRACHEY. The famous editor and owner of the London Spectator from 1898 to 1925 was one of the most dynamic and interesting men of his time. This vivid biography by his wife is a colorful picture of famous men and famous times. $5.00

Brewer and Warren, Inc.
6 East 53rd Street :: :: New York

MEMORIES OF LENIN
by Nadezhda K. Krupkya
[Lenin's Wife]
$1.50

By G. T. Grinko
THE 5-YEAR PLAN of the SOVIET UNION
The only complete story, with a political interpretation, by the Soviet Commissar of Finance. $3.50 Illustrated

LABOR AND COAL
by Anna Rochester $2.00
LABOR AND TEXTILES
by Robert W. Dunn and Jack Hardy $2.00
LABOR AND LUMBER
by Charlotte Todes $2.00

Complete Catalogue from INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS
381 FOURTH AVENUE - NEW YORK

Russia's Challenge to American Business

The Economic Life of Soviet Russia

By CALVIN B. HOOVER

The significance to the capitalistic world of development in the Soviet Union cannot be exaggerated. Whatever your station in life, you are being affected every day by what the communist régime in Russia is doing. What is it doing? Inform yourself now through Dr. Hoover's illuminating chapters on every phase of Soviet economic activity: Organization of Industry, Capital Investment, Agriculture, Internal Trade, Foreign Trade, the Banking System, Money, the Co-operatives, Labor, Communism and Human Welfare. There is no other current picture of Russian activities so complete, or so stimulating to thought.

At all bookstores—$3.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY · · NEW YORK

Drama

The Theater of Phrases

PIRANDELLO'S new play, "As You Desire Me" (Maxine Elliott's Theater), might be and has indeed been hailed as another contribution by this Italian intellectua to what we call our theater of ideas. For one who like myself found the piece merely pretentious and tiresome, nothing could be a more forcible reminder of the difficulties we get into when we use the word "idea" in connection with the drama. I found no ideas in it at all—or rather, I found a very rudimentary idea strutting around in fine clothes. The clothes could easily be identified as coming from the shop of a fashionable phrase-maker. Here was a drama of phrases all right. But hardly a drama of ideas.

Ideas are of immense importance in the theater. I can imagine no good play being without many of them—more of them, perhaps, than the author ever knew he put into it. Shakespeare, in spite of Shaw, is crammed with ideas; and so is any playwright who has the power of interesting us and moving us. Curiously enough, the sign that a play contains ideas is that it moves us. The ideas may be great or small, old or new, but it is certainly they that produce our excitement. Not that we could go away and say just what the ideas were—put them, I mean, into prose. They have not the quality of epigrams. They are the sort of ideas, in short, which can exist only in dialogue. They are capable of being translated into the mysterious language of action and feeling. A character is an idea, a conflict is an idea. A moral never is.

Pirandello's play is stuck with a big and obvious moral—one large, abnormal clove. Pull that out and the meat must lose its savor, since there are no further ideas inside to season it as it might be seasoned. The moral is put into words—oh, many times—and runs somewhat to this effect: that if you can only believe me to be what I think I am, then I am what I think. The heroine is a woman with two pasts, one bad and one good. The good one came first, naturally enough; the bad one came after an invasion of her Italian home during the war, when she was violated by the invaders and suffered the loss of her reason, or at any rate of her memory. Now, after ten dissolute years in Germany, she is recognized for the person she used to be—the virtuous wife of a citizen of Milan—and is taken back to her husband. But the husband can never quite be sure that she is she. An insane woman has been found who meets the tests of identity much better; and then there are just plain doubts. Well, perhaps she is not the woman in question. We are permitted to doubt it ourselves, or even to be certain on the negative side. But the point of the play is that if the husband would only believe in her—which it happens that he cannot—she in her soul would be giving him what he had lost ten years ago. He might possess the body of a strange woman, but, given time, her soul by study and contemplation might verily become the substance of her who is gone.

The failure of the play is the failure to make all this doctrine either credible or palatable. It is so obviously a truth that is being thrust at us that with our customary perversity we refuse to accept it. And the reason for our refusal, I think, is that the truth has been put into words. Had it come in the form of action, in the form of feeling, we should have accepted it without knowing that we did so, and waited for some commentator to tell us what we had accepted. Pirandello is his own commentator; so we resist him. I did so at any rate, being entirely unmoved by the performance. The fact that audiences continue to come away from the theater as they came away that night, charged with emotion, can mean therefore only two things: either that I was wrong in being unmoved, or that they thought they ought to be moved by the great Pirandello and consequently were. The acting of Judith Anderson as The Unknown One (the capitals are Pirandello's) was accomplished but cold.

The acting of Eva Le Gallienne as Marguerite in the Civic Repertory Theater's revival of "Camille" is certainly accomplished, and is as certainly not cold. Neither does any warmth seem to have gone out of the body of this play, which, preposterous enough at certain points, was written by Dumas so directly, so honestly, so simply, and so wholly with the emotions of Marguerite and Armand in mind that it survives in spite of everything. Believe as you will that there was never any need for the sacrifice which Marguerite made of her lover, the consequences of that sacrifice remain as pitiful as ever they were. I have not seen Miss Le Gallienne do better work, nor have I seen her better supported by her company. Week in and week out, New York's best acting is to be seen on Fourteenth Street.

"In the Best of Families," a farce by Anita Hart and Maurice Braddell (Bijou Theater), is a mystery play, the question being which of five possible men is the father of an illegitimate child. The only one of the five who is never suspected turns out, of course, to be guilty. I have seldom heard so much vulgarity in two hours.

MARK VAN DOREN

Films

Glories of the "Epic"

SPEAKING by and large, it is a good thing for the movies that now and again a Hollywood company turns to a historical subject and produces an "epic." The triteness of so many film comedies and dramas, though inherent in their stories, would have bulked less prominently if their main characters had been shown against a background of active humanity. At least, the advantage of the "epic" method has been demonstrated in a number of films in which the employment of large masses of people shifted the interest from the central figures to the mass action that surged around them.

It is true, when Hollywood turns to the masses it never does so for their own sake, never treats them as a compact organism welded together by common interests and sentiments. Pictures like "Potemkin," "Grass," or even "The Silent Enemy" are not made in Hollywood. The Hollywood practice is to keep the masses on the fringes of the plot, using them only for spectacular effects or merely as a background for the principal characters. Even so the employment of large numbers of people actively participating in the progress of the story is a cinematic virtue. It creates opportunities for sweeping movement, adds swing and intensity to the action, and at the same time avoids the pitfalls of the cheap psychology that usually distinguishes the central characters.

"Cimarron" (Globe), the latest "epic" on Broadway, is a case in point. Like its numerous predecessors in this genre, it takes for its subject the thrills and turmoils of the pioneering era. It departs, however, from the type of story made almost traditional by "The Covered Wagon" in that instead of a single episode such as a trek across the country with all the hardships and adventures involved, it depicts the rise of a modern community out of the wilderness of an Indian territory. The scenes describing the life in the new settlement form the best

The Twilight of Christianity

By HARRY ELMER BARNES

"The orthodox religious complex is the most active and pervasive menace to civilization today." That is the thesis of this book.

"It is a Gotterdammerung indeed."—Rupert Hughes.

"Two hundred years ago both the author and the publisher would have gone to the stake." —Clarence Darrow.

"Prepares the way for the new humanistic religion."—Dr. Charles Francis Potter.

At all booksellers, $3.00

RICHARD R. SMITH, INC. -:- NEW YORK

THE NATION AND ATHENAEUM

If you wish to know what London thinks you should read
THE NATION AND ATHENAEUM
Notable contributors to recent issues include:

ECONOMICS AND POLITICS—Sir William Beveridge, J. A. Hobson, J. M. Keynes, Sir Herbert Samuel, André Siegfried, Sir Josiah Stamp, Leonard Woolf.
INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS—C. F. Andrews, Norman Angell, P. J. Noel Baker, Lord Cecil, Walter Lippmann, C. K. Webster.
ART AND DRAMA—Gordon Craig, Roger Fry, Lydia Lopokova, George Rylands.
MUSIC—Constant Lambert.
POETRY—Wilfrid Gibson, R. H. Mottram, Siegfried Sassoon, W. J. Turner, Dorothy Wellesley.
LITERATURE AND CRITICISM—Stella Benson, Augustine Birrell, Edmund Blunden, G. Lowes Dickinson, E. M. Forster, J. L. Hammond, G. M. Trevelyan, Virginia Woolf.

Subscription $7.50. Postage paid.
Send for a specimen copy to the Business Manager
THE NATION & ATHENAEUM
38 Great James Street London, England

"The Biggest Human Experiment Being Made!"

THE SOVIET CHALLENGE TO AMERICA

By GEORGE S. COUNTS

The avowed goal of the Soviets is "to overtake and surpass America." The Five-Year Plan is of vast and direct importance to all Americans concerned with economic or social upheaval. Dr. Counts' detailed and authoritative study is up-to-the-minute, expertly handled and fascinating reading.

$4.00 The John Day Company 386 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

LECTURES

WEST SIDE FORUM
West Side Meeting House, 550 West 110th St., New York, N. Y.
TUESDAY EVE., FEB 17, at 8:15
LOUIS FISCHER
European Correspondent for The Nation
will speak on
"THE SOVIETS IN WORLD AFFAIRS"

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th Street Algonquin 4-3094

GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY Sat., Feb. 14, 2 P. M.
"Crime and the American Scene" Adm. 25c.

HARRY F. WARD Mon., Feb. 16, 8:30 P. M.
"Ethical Ideals in an Industrial Age" Adm. 50c.

RESORT

An ideal place for winter vacations. ¶WESTERN VIEW FARM, New Milford, Conn., 83 miles from Columbus Circle, elevation 1000 feet. ¶Hospitality that is unique. It brings back friends year after year. Eleventh season. ¶Riding, mountain climbing, winter sports, or rest and quiet if you want it. ¶Interesting people. ¶Rates $8 a day, $49 a week. Telephone New Milford 440.

MISCELLANEOUS

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Samples free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. JAMES ST. TWEED DEPOT, 150 Stornoway, Scotland.

43,000 Nation Readers look through these columns each week for information on the unusual

If you have the unusual to offer—write us for our rates

THE NATION - - - 20 Vesey Street

part of the picture and are both exciting and informative. Here we get not only the familiar trimmings of the romance of the Wild West with its gun play and lawlessness, but also an insight into the life of a bustling, go-getting community that is highly typical of the American scene and has the quality of national uniqueness. The episode of a church service in a gambling hall, the setting up of a newspaper to defend and promote civic righteousness, the trial of a prostitute whose presence in the settlement rouses the ire of respectable wives provide a vivid illustration of the characteristic methods of grappling with these problems of communal life which belong exclusively to this country. But just as the picture of the growing community with its variety of types and swift action is rich in human interest and captivating in panoramic imagery, the story of the principal character around which the film is built seems by comparison lacking in substance and at times even crudely conventional. The heroic exploits of Yancey Cravat, the public-spirited lawyer with the steady hand of a crack shot and the crusader's urge for "empire-building," belong more properly to the traditional romance of the Western film and seem out of place in this sober and realistic setting. But for these heroics and the disappointingly flat ending, "Cimarron" might have been a truly remarkable picture. As it is, it is only interesting.

Of "The Fighting Caravans" (Rialto) one cannot say even this. The mysteries of the Hollywood mind are beyond human probing. But there is something baffling in the misuse of opportunities that is exemplified in this picture. With all the money spent on this film one might have expected at least a touch of originality in its story and treatment. It does no more, however, than rehash an old theme, almost repeating the recent "epic" "The Big Trail," in comparison with which it is much less competent and infinitely more inept.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

GEORGE SLOCOMBE is on the Paris staff of the London Daily Herald.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a writer on educational and other subjects for current periodicals.

VIRGINIA MOORE is the author of a book of poems, "Sweet Water and Bitter."

LAWRENCE M. HUGHES is a newspaperman of wide experience in the study and reporting of important business developments.

CONRAD AIKEN was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1930 for his "Selected Poems."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

GRANVILLE HICKS is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

PETER H. ODEGARD is the author of "Pressure Politics; the Story of the Anti-Saloon League."

FREDA KIRCHWEY is a contributing editor of The Nation.

SCOTT BUCHANAN, author of "Poetry and Mathematics," is associate professor of philosophy at the University of Virginia.

GERALD SYKES is a writer of fiction.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON is the author of "Portrait of the Artist as American."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1931 No. 3425

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 201
EDITORIALS:
The Country Needs Congress ... 204
Not a Dollar ... 205
The Mask Is Off ... 205
Heard Across the World ... 206
YOUNG FOR PRESIDENT? By Paul Y. Anderson ... 207
SOUP LINE IN SEATTLE. By Garland O. Ethel ... 208
PORTRAIT OF A CHANCELLOR. By Oswald Garrison Villard ... 211
I BECAME A LIBRARIAN. By Constance Auer ... 213
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 215
CORRESPONDENCE ... 215
BOOKS, ARCHITECTURE, MUSIC, DRAMA:
After a Mozart Quartet. By Irwin Edman ... 217
The Stream of Life. By Henry Hazlitt ... 217
Black, Alas, No More! By Dorothy Van Doren ... 218
Australia's Dilemma. By C. Hartley Grattan ... 219
A Record of Illusion. By Morton Dauwen Zabel ... 220
More Studies in Keats. By Eda Lou Walton ... 220
Books in Brief ... 221
Architecture: The New School. By Douglas Haskell ... 221
Music: Orchestras Without Conductors. By Arthur Mendel ... 223
Drama: Early Victorian Father. By Mark Van Doren ... 224
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Civil Government for Samoa. By Margaret Mead ... 226
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE ... 228

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

---

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising. Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

DESPITE THE SENATE'S abject surrender to the White House on the question of relief for the drought victims, it is not yet certain that the present session of Congress will adjourn with all the essential supply bills adopted. Should one or more of these measures be held up, an early session of the Seventy-second Congress will be unavoidable. The bonus bill, already passed by 363 votes to 39 in the House, is scheduled for quick action in the Senate, and friends of the measure believe that they have votes enough to override a veto if the President should return the bill without approval. Proponents of Congressional aid for the unemployed are said to be planning another drive, this time to vote a fund for emergency use during the recess in the event private agencies fail to provide adequate relief. They may have better luck than they did with the original $25,000,000 relief measure, but it is probable that they cannot win without a struggle that will last days, if not weeks. The Hoover victory over the Senate in the battle over relief legislation ought not to be passed by without mentioning the fact that the Hoover supporters included such occasional Progressives as Senators Howell, McMaster, Black, and McKellar. The fifteen Senators who fought the one-sided Hoover compromise to the end were Borah, Couzens, Cutting, Frazier, Johnson, La Follette, Norris, Schall, Barkley, Bulkley, Connally, Glass, Thomas of Oklahoma, Wheeler, and Shipstead.

MR. HOOVER appears to have acquired a new and more skilful political adviser. This adviser, mindful of the difficulties the President would encounter in seeking reelection upon his own record, seems to have persuaded Mr. Hoover to make a bid for popular support on the strength of Abraham Lincoln's accomplishments. No other rational explanation can be advanced for the tone of the President's Lincoln Day radio talk. Broadcasting from the Lincoln room in the Executive Mansion, Mr. Hoover said:

> It is appropriate that I should speak from this room in the White House where Lincoln strived and accomplished his great service to our country. His invisible presence dominates these halls. . . . From these windows he looked out. . . . Here are the very chairs in which he meditated upon his problems. . . . It was here that he toiled by day and by night that the Union created by the Fathers might be preserved. . . . Lincoln led in founding the Republican Party and he gloried in his party. His tradition has dominated it to this day. It was and is a party of responsibility.

Here am I, Mr. Hoover might more honestly have said, working where Lincoln worked and as he worked; I am wrestling with similar problems and (presumably) achieving the same glorious results; I am the leader of the party he founded and loved; Abraham Lincoln was a great man and therefore I should be kept in office.

PASSING OVER Mr. Hoover's identification of himself with Lincoln on the questions of a protective tariff, transportation development, nullification, and "obedience to law as the very foundation of our Republic," we find the President using Lincoln as an excuse for his own neglect of the social and economic well-being of the country. In his speech Mr. Hoover returned to his old refrain that the government must not help the people because the people cannot achieve "victory over this depression and over our other difficulties" unless they "learn to fight their own battles." The helpless victims of the drought and the economic crisis must not look to the government for aid, he suggested, lest such relief measures—Mr. Hoover called them "opiates of government charity"—should lead to "the stifling of our national spirit of mutual self-help." The jobless and the hungry should learn to depend upon "the American social ideal," which is "equality of opportunity and individual initiative." We need only look about us to see how many mouths are being fed by "individual initiative" and "mutual self-help." While admitting that "this is not the easy way," Mr. Hoover contends that "it is the American way. And it was Lincoln's way." We can hardly conceive of that President ever telling six or seven million unemployed workers and a million or more hungry farmers that the government owes them nothing.

WASHINGTON AT LAST has awakened to the futility and irrationality of keeping the marines in Nicaragua. Secretary Stimson has announced that they are to be gradually withdrawn, the last unit of 500 men leaving Managua after the 1932 elections. His action comes four years late. It cannot restore to life the several hundred Nicaraguan peasants who died under the fire of American machine-guns, nor can it bring back the forty-odd marines killed in action in the mountain wilderness of Nueva Segovia and adjacent provinces. It will not wipe out the shame of the massacre at Ocotal of July 16, 1927, nor will it make the absurd and foolhardy Peace of Tipitapa, which led to the slaughter, appear any more sensible or logical when the history of this episode of American imperialism is written. Nevertheless we can be grateful for Mr. Stimson's action, which will help to win back at least some of the respect of Latin America and the rest of the world that Washington has been alienating through its interventionist activities in Central America and the Caribbean. It is not clear just what prompted the decision to withdraw the marines. But in any case full credit should be given to the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, and particularly to its executive secretary, Dorothy Detzer, who has been most active among that small group of citizens in Washington that has been working for the withdrawal of the American armed forces.

COMPLETE RECONSTRUCTION of British industry is proposed in a striking plan just published as a supplement to the Week End Review, according to a special dispatch to the New York Times. The plan, which is understood to be the work of experts in many fields, is apparently not dissimilar to the proposals put forward by the guild socialists a dozen years ago, and follows syndicalist rather than political socialist lines. It contemplates the organization of industry, commerce, and transportation into a series of great self-governing units with limited profits. Consumers and workers will be represented in the government of each unit, and internal competition will be strictly limited or entirely eliminated. The exact relation of these great trusts or guilds to the political state is not made clear in the cabled summary. The plan is said to have the support of a wide variety of business and professional men, and affords fresh evidence of the increasing realization that anything short of comprehensive planning is inadequate to meet the imperative needs of industry. The "collapse of economic isolation and high protection in America" is noted, and large-scale buying in Great Britain is urged as the necessary means of meeting large-scale selling in other countries. A dynamic peace policy, which would take active measures for disarmament and cultivation of friendship with other countries, is recognized as essential to the success of any plan. Great Britain's position illustrates with special clearness the necessity under which all countries labor for a comprehensively organized economic life, worked out in friendly international cooperation, and both the general principles and the details of this plan will be eagerly examined.

THE COMPLETE COLLAPSE of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company is a reminder that American financial geniuses are not alone in building up by merger huge financial skyscrapers without any adequate steel skeleton of earning power. In the years after the war England was dazzled by the brilliant financial operations through which Lord Kylsant (Owen Cosby Philipps) built up this, the world's largest shipping group. It was a house of cards, and recently Royal Mail shares have sold for less than nothing, shareholders actually paying transfer tax in order to get rid of them. The disaster now revealed, due to reckless financing and shipping depression, is unparalleled in British maritime history, and it is estimated that total losses to investors will be nearly $100,000,000. In wrecking the Royal Mail, Lord Kylsant has also dragged down its constituent companies. The ordinary share capital of the White Star Line is wiped out, and all its assets are pledged to creditors. The losses of the Royal Mail itself have swallowed up reserves of $14,000,000, together with all the value of the preferred and common shares, originally issued at $44,000,000. It is now disclosed that from 1926 to 1929, when the Royal Mail was announcing profits and was paying generous dividends, it was actually losing money, and dividends were coming out of reserves. It is not strange that Lord Kylsant is in Madeira for his wife's health. The whole affair is another startling illustration of what the ordinary investor sometimes pays for the benefits of private business enterprise, and what kind of business enterprise he too often pays for.

SILVER HAS SOLD recently in London for a shilling an ounce, much the lowest price in history and less than half the value prevailing in January, 1929, when the present disastrous drop began. A subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in a unanimous report just submitted recommends the calling of an international conference to consider the status of silver as money. The drop in price, it declares, was not due to overproduction but was caused partly by the debasement of silver coins in certain countries and the consequent selling of surplus silver, but especially by the melting down of silver coin in India and the throwing of this silver on the market as a consequence of the gold-exchange policy adopted for India in 1926. In the opinion of the committee it will be impossible to prevent a continued decrease in the purchasing power of silver "unless and until the British Government for India announces a determination to suspend its policy." The disastrous results of the crash in silver for China, India, Mexico, Central and South America, and other silver-using countries are plain enough. They have seen the value of their money cut in two in two years. Consequently their imported cotton goods, to take a single example, cost twice as much as they did, and exporters of cotton cloth in this country and England have seen their profitable Asiatic markets almost wiped out. The same thing is true to a certain extent, the committee points out, in the case of wheat, lumber, automobiles, radios, electric appliances, and machinery. It is no simple consideration of the well-being of China that has led to the suggestion of a great silver loan from this country.

REVOLUTION IN SPAIN has been long preparing, but the agitation has been singularly lacking in organization and aim. When, on February 8, a royal decree ordered elections for the Congress (the lower house of the Cortes) on March 1 and for the Senate on March 15, and convoked the new Cortes for March 25, it seemed as though the friends of constitutional government, who for seven years had more or less actively opposed the dictatorship which Primo de Rivera began, were about to be rewarded. The decree had hardly been posted and the censorship lifted, however, when it appeared that the country did not know what it wanted. The monarchists divided, some opposing the elections, others demanding a constituent assembly to revise the constitution before the elections were held. Several political parties announced that they would boycott the elections, the Communists decided to run candidates for both houses, and the attitude of the Socialists was in doubt. The only general line of division appeared to be between those who wanted to continue the constitutional monarchy and those who wanted a republic. Dissension in the monarchist ranks appears to have been chiefly responsible for the sudden resignation of the Berenguer Government and the withdrawal of the elections decree. Word now comes that the king has asked José Sanchez Guerra, leader of the Constitutionalist Party, to form a Cabinet. Only two years ago Guerra was arrested at Valencia for leading an abortive revolutionary movement against the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, a fact which gives weight to the suggestion that his selection presages limitation of the Spanish monarchy.

THE ZIONISTS WIN in Prime Minister MacDonald's letter to Dr. Chaim Weizmann, which, Mr. MacDonald declares, is to be read as the authoritative interpretation of Lord Passfield's bitterly criticized White Paper of October last, and is to be communicated as an official document to the League of Nations. Its tone, so friendly to Zionist wishes, contrasts sharply with the rather dour aspect of the White Paper. Specifically, Jewish immigration is to be allowed according to the "absorptive capacity" of the country instead of being barred when there is unemployment among the Arabs, which was the apparent policy of the White Paper. Limitations on Jewish acquisition of land suggested in the White Paper are largely removed, and the purpose of facilitating Jewish settlement on the land is reaffirmed. The claim of the Jews to employment on public works in proportion to payment of taxes, not population, is to be "taken into consideration" (that is, allowed?). The right of the Jewish Agency to employ only Jewish labor is conceded. By these agile "interpretations" the Prime Minister has in fact effected a démarche from the position taken by the Colonial Secretary in the White Paper. The new proposals have already come in for sharp criticism and it remains to be seen whether the Jews, the Arabs, and the government will now come together and work out a constructive policy for Palestine, as Dr. Weizmann hopes.

CHANCELLOR BRUNING appears at the moment to have won a decisive victory in preserving the parliamentary form of government in Germany. On the one hand, he has repelled the noisy opposition of the National Socialists, and on the other he has succeeded in avoiding the necessity of setting up a dictatorship under Article 48 of the German constitution by keeping together the heterogeneous factions making up the present government. Thus, if there are no unforeseen accidents and if the economic situation improves with the approach of spring, Brüning would seem to have weathered Germany's most difficult crisis since the 1918 revolution. It is questionable that he could have done so had the National Socialists been blessed with more skilful leadership. They had the backing of a number of extremely wealthy industrialists, and their popular support was undeniably growing. However, they bungled their advantageous position in the Reichstag by using obstructionist tactics that played directly into the hands of the expert parliamentarians of the government parties, and they lost what little sympathy they had among the moderate Centrists, of which group Brüning is the leader, by adding the Roman Catholics to the list of their "enemies." Their withdrawal en bloc from the Reichstag was apparently designed as a play to the galleries, but the gesture somehow fell flat. For the time being the "Nazis" undoubtedly are losing favor, but so long as the severe economic depression and its consequent unrest continue, the capacity of these fascists to make trouble must not be underestimated.

ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, who died in New York on February 12, was one of the outstanding women of a generation that today has largely passed away. As a journalist, a clergyman, a social scientist, a teacher, an indefatigable worker in behalf of woman suffrage and world peace, she was always intensely alive, and keenly interested in every movement that held promise of social betterment. It has become fashionable to sneer at reformers, but the United States owes a great debt to the men and women who in the latter part of the nineteenth century awakened the country to the need for social endeavor in behalf of the less fortunate classes of society. Among that group Mrs. Spencer held an honorable place, and she brought to the more complex problems of the past decade the same human interest, the same zeal, and the same quick and sympathetic intelligence that marked her earlier years.

LILLIAN LEITZEL was the diminutive young person for whom the three-ring, splendiferous, and indescribable circus of Ringling and Barnum and Bailey stopped in its tracks. Nothing else happened in the ring—in the three rings—while Miss Leitzel's act went on. The "giant half flange" it was called, that incredible feat of hanging by her right wrist from a trapeze ring fifty feet in the air, while she literally threw herself over her own shoulder, to a record once of 249 times! The great circus floor was still, the thousands of spectators were mute with terror and amazement, not a sound came from anywhere to break the even, rhythmic swing and back swing of that small body so perilously far away. She was the star of the circus without question or dispute. Now she is dead. The ring broke in her hand while she was performing her act in Copenhagen; she fell to the floor, fracturing her skull and injuring her spine. She is described as a true child of the circus, the daughter and granddaughter of performers, beginning her circus career when she was three years old. Her success was due not only to her unique feat of strength—which she learned from her mother and which the two of them alone were able to do—but to the fact that she was small, pretty, graceful, even while she did what far more muscular acrobats could not do. No single performer of the circus will be more sorely missed or more sincerely mourned.

IN OUR ISSUE of February 11 the earnings of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation were given as $42,242,980 in 1930 and $23,843,406 in 1929. The figures should have been reversed. Along with the other steel companies, Bethlehem experienced a great reduction in earnings last year.

The Country Needs Congress

THE country ought to have some assurance before March 4 that President Hoover will call the Seventy-second Congress to meet soon after the present session closes. The unprecedented economic situation demands an early session. The legislative jam makes one imperative. Mr. Hoover himself has admitted that there is much legislation pending which requires immediate attention. That there is widespread opposition to the calling of an extraordinary session cannot be denied, but this opposition has been created primarily by propaganda emanating from politicians, who fear that they may make costly blunders in a year preceding a Presidential campaign, and from the reactionary press and business interests, who are constantly fighting democratic government.

Congress is swamped with work that cannot be put off except at the expense of the country as a whole. Nothing of consequence has been done to relieve the present economic situation, and this is a task that certainly cannot wait until December. An adequate public-works construction program has still to be adopted. The problem of stabilizing employment has barely been touched upon; the question of establishing a satisfactory system of employment exchanges and of working out an unemployment-insurance scheme has received little or no attention. It is by no means certain that private charity will be found equal to the task of providing relief for the millions of jobless workers and their dependents, and with Congress in recess the government could not supply the necessary relief (which it ought to be doing now) should private charity fall down on the job. Furthermore, the millions voted for rehabilitation of the drought areas may not prove sufficient; it has already been suggested that these funds are not being efficiently administered; and any breakdown will leave Washington with another serious situation on its hands. These tasks and many like them cannot be postponed the better part of a year. The exigencies of an economic crisis will not wait nine months.

There are other legislative matters which have been held up from one to three years because of the long-protracted tariff fight, among other reasons. These ought to be disposed of at once and not dumped upon the December session, which will have plenty of problems of its own. Among these matters may be included the Muscle Shoals bill, the anti-injunction resolution, the anti-lame-duck amendment, bus regulation, railway consolidation, revision of the anti-trust laws, banking and credit reforms, and the World Court. In his message to Congress last December Mr. Hoover declared that "it was desirable" that certain of "these measures should be completed." He also urged Congress to begin work on many other legislative proposals. Little has been accomplished in this direction. Mr. Hoover may now be content to let his program of December, 1930, rest until December, 1931, but neither Congress nor the people ought to be satisfied with such procrastinatory tactics, or with any policy under which the pressing tasks and duties of the government will be evaded for a period of nine months. In ordinary times such a delay would be illogical and perhaps costly, but in the present period of depression any shirking of governmental responsibilities must be considered little short of a crime against the people.

In the face of a clear and unquestionable need for an early session the country has been deluged with propaganda directed against the reconvening of Congress before December. It is asserted, though no proof is offered, that business would suffer with Congress in session, and, conversely, that business would improve if the Senate and the House were to take a long vacation. If it is true that business would improve with Congress out of the way, why did this not happen in the last half of 1930, when, except for the month of December, Congress was in recess? The answer is that the real reason for business depression must be sought elsewhere than on Capitol Hill. Nevertheless, the propaganda continues to be poured out upon us. Some days ago the Chamber of Commerce of the United States published a number of letters from commercial organizations with a view to showing how widely and doggedly the business interests are opposed to an early session. Unfortunately, almost all the letters dealt in vague generalities, advancing no tangible or coherent reasons for this opposition, while a few of the letter-writers, notably the oil people, went so far as to admit they might favor an extra session should it appear that they stood a fair chance of getting special legislation favoring their industry. Finally, the Bristol, Connecticut, Chamber of Commerce gave the show away by confessing that an early session was opposed, "not because Congress would not help in fact, but because too many people think it would not help." In other words, the business community has hurt itself by creating the myth that an early session of Congress would be a dangerous thing.

However, the newspapers and the business men are not alone in their opposition to an early session. The politicians stand with the business interests in this matter because they are afraid of having the spotlight of publicity played upon their many shortcomings too strongly at this time. Mr. Hoover, for example, would enjoy an extended rest from the searching questions and embarrassing speeches of Senator La Follette and others, who in the last few months have been doing notable work in exposing the President's complete lack of understanding of the grave economic and social problems facing the country. Most of the Republicans want a long recess to cover up their domestic quarrels as well as to disguise their lack of leadership and a program. The same is true of the Democrats, who, though they could force an extra session, do not want to reveal too soon to the people who voted Democratic in 1930 that they have no program and have not the slightest idea as to how they might improve upon the work of the Republicans who were repudiated at the polls last November. Only the insurgents of the two parties are desirous of having an early session, and it is after all to these Progressives, or to at least a few of them, that we must look for the energy and leadership necessary to make an extra session or any other session of Congress worth while.

Not a Dollar

IF the American people have any sense about their navy, they will not allow a dollar to be spent on building it up to the limit allowed by the London naval treaty. Undersecretary of the Treasury Mills now estimates the deficit for the year at not less than $500,000,000, as against Secretary Mellon's earlier estimate of $375,000,000, and declares that the year is going to show an actual increase of the public debt. Everyone agrees on the need for the wisest economy in public expenditures. Yet a bill appropriating $30,000,000 to modernize the three old battleships New Mexico, Mississippi, and Idaho was passed by the Senate on January 16 with only thirteen opposing votes. A navy building bill calling for $74,000,000 during the coming year as one step toward building up to the London-treaty standard has been reported in both houses, and the big-navy advocates are trying to get action despite their fear that such an attempt may cause a legislative jam and help bring on the dreaded extra session. This modernizing and building expenditure of $104,000,000, it is to be noted, is in addition to the regular naval-supply bill, which, as passed by the House, still calls for $349,000,000 despite cuts of $31,000,000 effected by the friends of common sense in part as a result of actual reductions in the fighting establishment.

In his letter to the House Committee on Naval Affairs in December, Admiral Pratt, chief of naval operations, estimated the cost of building up to the treaty limit at $1,100,000,000, or $1,250,000,000 if the air service be included. As Representative French, chairman of the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee, pointed out in a notable speech opening the debate on the naval bill, such an undertaking would mean an annual appropriation for fighting craft of $125,000,000 to $150,000,000, and would raise the total annual burden of naval appropriations from its eight-year average of about $350,000,000 to something between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000.

> Do the gentlemen hail the London conference a success [demanded the Idaho representative] who see only that it means multiplying in this enormous fashion the cost of naval armaments? It would be a perversion of the magnificent work of President Hoover and Prime Minister MacDonald and the able delegates to the London conference to transform a limitations agreement into a mandate for expansion programs.

Well spoken! Yet men like Senator Goff and Representative Britten have the effrontery to suggest that failure to build up to the allowed limit is in some way a breach of the obligation of the treaty.

Not one good reason can be given for spending a single dollar in building up to that limit. To spend public money building useless and injurious fighting enginery in order to give employment to labor is a very bad reason. Nobody imagines that we are now in imminent danger of naval attack. The one substantial result of the Washington and London conferences and the visit of Prime Minister MacDonald was to wipe out the unreasoning distrust and fear of Japan and Great Britain that had been so sedulously worked up; and unless we have someone to be afraid of, the great reason for increasing naval strength is gone. To think that we must have a navy as big as Great Britain's just because we are rich and powerful is simply childish. The notion of building up so that we may have a club to bluff other less righteous nations into reducing has no warrant in either reason or experience.

The reasons against such a course, on the other hand, are overwhelming. We pass over the tax burden and the economic cost to touch on a more important consideration. After a succession of fruitless international conferences, in spite of peace pacts, the nations still pile up armaments and train fighting men. In a recent notable address Foreign Secretary Arthur Henderson declared: "If the peoples want disarmament they can have it." If they do not take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the world disarmament conference a year hence, he goes on, it may never return. But we have a chance, here and now, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation, to do something tangible and prove our faith (if so be we have faith) by our works. For us to say roundly that we refuse to build up to the treaty limit, and instead for us to push just as far and as fast as we can in reducing fighting personnel and material without timorous reference to what other nations do, would give to the peace forces of Europe a support worth a dozen naval conferences with their endless bargaining and intrigue. Now is the time to give hearty popular backing to Chairman French in his opposition to an unnecessary building program and his practical measures of naval reduction, however small. The time has come to do something for peace, if we care for peace.

The Mask Is Off

IT is hard to imagine anyone so stupid as not to be able to see clean through the latest attempt at Washington to fend off the Russian menace. Commissioner Eble, head of the customs service, announces that he has found, "upon the basis of evidence which has been presented" to him but which is carefully withheld because it may have to be submitted to the courts, that "convict labor is used in the production of lumber and pulpwood" in certain designated districts of Russia; and he accordingly proposes to put into effect at once, with Secretary Mellon's approval, a Treasury regulation of last November forbidding the importation of any kind of merchandise mined, produced, or manufactured by convict labor "unless the importer establishes by a preponderance of evidence" that such labor was not used in the case of the particular merchandise he wishes to bring in. Actually, the regulation will not become operative until sometime in the spring or early summer, since the Russian districts specified are at present icebound and no shipments, it is said, are in transit.

The commissioner's dictum is not the whole story, however. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has just reported a bill (quite an unusual proceeding, it may be pointed out in passing, since important legislation is rarely brought forward so near the end of a session) amending the tariff act so as to prohibit the importation of "all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mined, produced, manufactured, transported, handled, loaded, or unloaded wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor or/and forced labor or/and indentured labor." The term "forced labor," as used in the bill, "shall mean all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty for its non-performance and for which the worker does not offer himself voluntarily." The prohibition is to go into effect on April 1, but the bill hastens to add the proviso, glowing with exalted patriotism and fairly sweating with high morality, that "in no case shall such provision be applicable to goods, wares, articles, or merchandise so mined, produced, manufactured, transported, handled, loaded, or unloaded which are not mined, produced, or manufactured in such quantities in the United States as to meet the consumptive demands of the United States."

The regulation and the bill are a worthy pair. Until Mr. Eble discovered his "evidence," the Treasury Department did not know, and was admittedly unable to find out, whether Russian lumber and pulpwood are or are not produced by convict labor. It did know, however, that labor in Russia, while certainly not voluntary, was able to produce lumber and pulpwood that could be laid down in the United States at lower prices than were asked for the same commodities imported from Canada or elsewhere, and that the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association and affiliated industries have been moving heaven and earth to have the Russian products kept out. It accordingly decides, upon evidence which it withholds, that convict labor is used in producing those articles, and throws upon the importer the burden of proving the contrary. As for the House bill, it is an international affront and a brazen political subterfuge. Congress is to rise in its might and debar from the country any article which the hands of an involuntary worker have touched, unless the article is needed to piece out a deficient domestic supply; then labor may lay its involuntary hands all over the article, mine or fashion it, mark and transport it, and it will be welcomed as an altogether decent thing for Americans to have. Keep out Russian goods when we don't need them, let them in when we do: such is the new trade morality, Washington style.

If Mr. Eble's order stands and the House bill becomes law, there ought to be some interesting news before long. We ought to know whether an administrative official has a right to affirm as a fact what is not assuredly known by others to be such, keep his evidence to himself until the courts drag it out of him, and in the meantime put all the burden of proof on the importer and arbitrarily exclude his shipments. Somebody, we hope, will hasten to bring Mr. Eble into court and try to find out where the public stands. We ought to know whether Mr. Hoover thinks that business recovery will be hastened by stirring up a first-class row between the protected lumber manufacturers and concerns like the International Paper and Power Company which would like to use Russian pulpwood, or by jeopardizing a Russo-American trade said to have been worth last year about $150,000,000. We certainly ought to know whether Congress proposes to get after the Sumatra tobacco people, as it is being urged to do, and others whose imported products smell more or less of involuntary labor, or whether it means merely to strike a blow at Russia and throws in the rest of its rhetoric as a blind. We strongly suspect that this latter is exactly what is intended. A good deal of pretty straightforward evidence, at least, will be required to prove that it is not.

Heard Across the World

OF the eighteen and a half million Roman Catholics in the United States it is safe to say that every one who could get near a radio on February 12 listened with devotion to the address of His Holiness sent over the air. This is as it should be. What is more interesting is that a goodly number of the remaining 100,000,000 non-Catholics listened also; so that 150 radio stations transmitted not only the address itself in the original Latin but the various translations, which altogether took several hours of valuable radio time and space. The world listened to this one man—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, South America, India, Russia, England, France, the remnants of the Austrian empire, the devout countries of Southern Europe—they all listened in with varying degrees of success. Senator Marconi, introducing the Pope, said: "Holy Father, I consign to Your Holiness the work intrusted to me. Be pleased, I pray you, to let your voice be heard across the world."

What was it that they heard? They heard an apostrophe to all the creatures of the earth, to God on High, to believers, to the Catholic hierarchy, to missionaries, to rich and poor, to employer and employed, to the afflicted, and to those outside the true faith. God was praised; the others were urged to believe in Him and His holy Agent, to do good to one another, to be just, obedient, humble, forbearing, to pray for righteousness. A message, in short, from another world to this one. A message that ignored the business depression, the "jazz" age, the spread of agnosticism, the temporal values that intrude so constantly on a troubled earth, and instead addressed itself purely to the things of the spirit. It is the strength of the Catholic church that it has the authority and the power to make such an address sublime rather than ridiculous.

It is plain that the Pope chose things to discuss that would be acceptable to most persons, whatever their station or belief. Listening Communists, if any listened, would doubtless have taken sharp issue with him. Others, whether Catholic or not, would be respectful, would agree that peace and justice and prayer were on the whole good things, no matter where they came from. Even agnostics, interpreting the address in their own way, could approve of the spirit if not the letter. The radio address comes on the heels of the Pope's encyclical. It is evident that the Pope is using his new freedom from the Vatican, his new dignity as sovereign of a state, to extend his power, to widen his influence. There will be plenty of persons who will watch with alarm any attempt to augment the enormous authority of the Catholic church. And in an age when Protestantism is at its weakest and wateriest, there may be cause for their fears. It is evident that when the Pope, from his high place, speaks as grandly as twice lately he has spoken, when sentences roll from him so much more lofty than the sentences of any other public man, his words must carry weight. There is no reason to believe that His Holiness does not himself write his addresses; but whoever writes them is a fine phrase-maker, an able rhetorician, a master-player on the attentions of a large audience. Shall we have a Catholic revival therefore? We can only wait and see.

Young for President?

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 14

EVERYONE who understands Presidential politics has known for some time that Owen D. Young is a candidate for the Democratic nomination. His candidacy now stands fairly revealed. Mr. Young himself revealed it a few days ago in the traditional manner—by declaring that he was not a candidate, and proceeding at once to deliver campaign speeches on the soldier bonus, stock speculation, and bank regulation. For more than a year it has been obvious that the Republican Party is rapidly falling to pieces. It has undergone vicissitudes before, as in 1912, but this is different. Its Eastern and Western branches are divided by a conflict of economic interests which cannot be reconciled. Its machinery is in the hands of fourth-raters—men whom Boies Penrose, Murray Crane, or Mark Hanna would hardly have trusted to carry a ward. To the business interests which always have been the backbone of its support it is now plain that the party has ceased to function and can no longer deliver. Hence they are ready to jump to one that can, provided they are assured it will deliver for them. The nomination of Mr. Young would furnish that assurance. It is true that some of the older industrial cutthroats feel that his views on such subjects as labor and utility valuation are a trifle unorthodox, and by the same token the usual quota of dilettante liberals are ready to discover messianic traits in him. Both groups do him injustice. If anyone can find in the history of Standard Oil or steel more ruthless examples of buccaneering than attended the rise of the Radio Corporation under Mr. Young's enlightened guidance, I should like to hear of them. Let no one underestimate his capacity. A smoother piece of high-powered machinery has seldom been seen in action. He has brains, nerve, and presence, and he is one of the best showmen since Barnum. If he can get the Democratic nomination there is every reason to expect that he will wipe up the earth with poor Herbert. I am aware that I have heretofore expressed a contrary opinion, and I hereby retract it unqualifiedly. The political acumen which pervades the Hoover camp is fairly measured by the fact that Bob Lucas and Walter Newton, two of its giant strategists, are firmly convinced that Al Smith will be the Democratic nominee and are making their plans accordingly. By the end of the year they should have enough anti-Catholic literature stored up to heat the offices of the Republican National Committee until 1940. Until recently it seemed unlikely that Young could get the Democratic nomination, but the present demeanor of Joe Robinson and Pat Harrison indicates that the Southerners are being rounded up. Governor Roosevelt remains in the way, but the combined artillery of Raskob, Baruch, and Tammany may account for him. With the Democratic Party going Republican and the Republican Party going to the dogs, God only knows where honest men may turn. But it is a comfort to reflect that out of just such situations come new party alignments. Possibly such a development may not be so far off as we have believed.

THE cat-and-dog fight over relief for hungry drought victims has ended, and scores of newspapers with their usual candor and discernment are describing the outcome as "a victory for the President." Let us see. The battle started when President Hoover, Secretary Hyde, and the Republican leaders in the House flatly rejected the Senate proposal to appropriate $15,000,000 for food loans, Secretary Hyde and Majority Leader Tilson denouncing it as a "dole" and President Hoover assailing its sponsors for "playing politics with human misery." The fight ended with the President and his supporters "compromising" with the Senate on an appropriation of $20,000,000 for the same purpose. Nevertheless, although the Senate Democrats obtained $5,000,000 more than they asked originally, it was a sorry victory. They could have got much more, not only for drought sufferers but also for the hungry millions in the cities. They had the Administration licked to a frazzle, its shoulders on the ground, its tongue hanging out and its breath coming in short gasps, when someone arrived and pulled them off. That someone was Harvey Crowley Couch. Who is Mr. Couch? Well, he is a number of things, some of which prompted him to help the Administration and some of which enabled him to do so. First, he is a personal friend of Mr. Hoover. Second, he is president of the Arkansas Power and Light Company and the Louisiana and Arkansas Railway, and a director in two Arkansas banks. Third, he is perhaps the most important client of the law firm of Robinson, House, and Moses, whose senior partner is Senator Joe Robinson of Arkansas, the minority leader in the Senate. The combination was enough. Overnight the lion of the Senate became the lamb of Little Rock. After storming around the Senate floor for days and leading his followers out to the extreme tip of the longest limb, he scuttled back and sawed it off under them. Poor Senator Caraway, whose earnestness no one could doubt, found himself "on the spot" for fair. He had to go with Robinson or be blamed in Arkansas for opposing relief. Thereafter the Old Guard sat and chuckled while the Democratic leader assumed the burden of defending the Administration. Of course, it is entitled to some defense in the Senate, and there are times when even Jim Watson or George Moses is unwilling to undertake the task.

* * * * *

THAT is saying much, especially where Moses is concerned. As a rule the New Hampshire wisecracker is not squeamish. He proved that again by inserting in the Congressional Record a misleading expense account of Senator Nye and his committee on campaign expenditures. Senator Nye as chairman naturally paid most of the committee's bills and the bills of its employees. The account, inserted into the Record, supplied a basis for whispered stories that Nye had lived sumptuously at public expense while conducting the investigation. Within less than a week that insinuation was publicly made on the floor of the House by the publicity-seeking Underhill of Massachusetts. It is possible that Moses also hoped to discourage Nye from going to Montana, a State which Moses visited during the last campaign and from which he departed under circumstances that the Nye committee has been urged to investigate. If so, he made a mistake. Nye is going to Montana. Then perhaps we shall learn how sumptuously Moses lives while on campaign tours—and at whose expense. Senator Nye is a young man, and inexperience sometimes has led him into errors of judgment, but he has kept his head remarkably well considering the systematic campaign of lying and abuse to which he and his assistants have been subjected. I am puzzled by the venom and persistence of this campaign. Much of it undoubtedly has resulted from the McCormick influence, but I suspect something more is behind it. Somebody is out to "get" Nye in North Dakota.

* * * * *

THE capital buzzes with news, not all of it reassuring to those who love good government or even common decency, but most of it exciting. The report that Vice-President Curtis will retire voluntarily at the end of his term and seek reelection to the Senate appears more plausible every day. He can be virtually certain of returning to the Senate, and "Egg Charlie" knows his politics too well to think that Mr. Hoover's running mate in 1932 will have any such chance. The post-office-lease scandal has boiled over at last, involving the names of former Postmaster General New and the late Secretary of War Good in the charge of "chloroforming" a grand-jury investigation that might have interfered seriously with the Republican Presidential campaign in the Northwest in 1928. Postmaster General Brown has refused to give the Blaine committee information which he got through a survey of post-office leases, on the ground that it might tip off the owners that the government considered purchasing the property, although much of the information was obtained from the owners, and probably they would learn of the government's intentions when it opened negotiations with them. Mr. Brown is exhibiting all the truculence of a man who wishes to conceal anxiety. Joe Tumulty is having a lot of fun by putting on a grave face when he meets admirers of Dwight Morrow and asking them when Morrow's term in the Senate begins. Most of them start to explain that he has been in the Senate since December before they realize that Joe is a practical joker. I can testify that Senator Morrow is on the job sufficiently to vote. He voted against recalling confirmation of the power commissioners; he voted against the original food-relief appropriation for drought victims, and he voted to confirm "Beet Sugar" Brossard for the Tariff Commission. His voting record would indicate that he is slightly less liberal than Bingham of Connecticut or Kean of New Jersey, and slightly more effective than Patterson of Missouri or Glenn of Illinois. But give the little man a chance. It takes a new Senator a few months to learn right from wrong.

Soup Line in Seattle

By GARLAND O. ETHEL

Seattle, February 6

> Prosperity is coming to us precisely because our ideals are not materialistic. It is coming to us because we are pursuing the exalted ideal of equality under liberty, as it must of necessity come to any nation that pursues that ideal whole-heartedly and enthusiastically. . . . All these things are being added to us precisely because we are seeking the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, as they are always added, and must of logical necessity always be added, unto any nation that seeks those ideals of justice which are the very essence of the Kingdom of God.*

THE afternoon of the twenty-sixth was less cloudy than the usual December day in Seattle. With a hoarded growth of whiskers, the worst clothes available, my glasses in an inside coat pocket, and with an extinct cigarette on my lip, I shuffled down Yesler Way.

Just across from the old Seattle Hotel and a block from the L. C. Smith building, at the dividing line between the haunts of the homeless and the respectables, stood a tall, pale blond girl of about twenty, offering papers for sale. She never spoke to anyone. She merely made a weak gesture of offering and then drew back. I leaned against a building and pretended to watch some pigeons on the street. Twenty minutes passed and not a paper was sold. The girl wore loggers' high boots with the calks removed and heavy gray men's socks. Her short skirt was cheap, old, and hard-worn but thick. The upper part of her body was covered with a man's heavy blue coat sweater, out at the elbows. She wore no hat, and the cold wind sweeping up from the sound sent her faded bobbed hair flying about her face. Pale blue eyes seemed even paler in an ashen face, against which a nose purpled by cold stood out in painfully ludicrous prominence. I noticed that she wore a wedding ring. A young married woman selling papers below the line is something new.

A well-fed Salvation Army man waddled by with a few remaining copies of the War Cry. He had been peddling them uptown. I followed him to the next corner where I stopped to inspect a group of men outside an employment agency. No one was paying any attention to the blackboard upon which were chalked notices of two jobs—one for a girl as general housemaid, the other for a combination meat cutter and clerk in a country store. There had been no erasures and no deletions; there were just two jobs. On that corner stood or leaned thirty-seven men. They moved only to shift weight from one foot to the other, and no one talked except a German and a Swede who were discussing German reparations. After a time my eye fell upon a big, green, wooden sidewalk sign upon which in gray letters was stenciled an invitation for men between eighteen and thirty-five to join the army. A list of camps and forts, chiefly in warm places, was followed by the assurance that soldiers get regular pay, plus free meals, clothes, housing, and medical attention.

---

* "The Present Economic Revolution." By Professor Thomas Nixon Carver, of Harvard University.

Inside the agency 150 men or more stood about. There were no chairs except at the card tables. Apart from the players discussing the game there was but one conversation in the whole place. A foreigner, possibly a Finn, was talking about Russia to a big fellow who only listened. The speaker was not certain of what was happening in Russia, but he expressed the hope that a good society was being created.

After a while I left and went into the public latrine at Pioneer Square to write up a few notes. When I had finished, a rather well-dressed and freshly shaved man came in. I decided to question him to get a sample of the business man's attitude toward a stiff hunting work. With the directness that prevails on the Skid Road I asked: "Do you know of a loose job anywhere?" I had expected at most gruffness and a "No." But the man smiled in a friendly enough way, though wistfully, and answered: "No, brother, jobs are pretty scarce I guess." "I'd like to find one," I said. "So would I," he replied. "I've been hunting one for six months."

What mutual aid the unemployed offer is not great, but a simple sympathy prevails among them. They are all in the same boat whether they wear white collars or not. This I confirmed repeatedly as I made the rounds of the single-counter employment agencies, always to be found in a combination cardroom and eating place. It was in such places that I found for the first time white-collar men and working stiffs associating as equals. On the job there is always a barrier between them. The time-keeper and clerk, though perhaps drawing smaller wages, regard themselves as superiors, as embryonic captains, or at least corporals, of industry. The real worker who lives by his hands may be no social revolutionary, but a white collar is emblematic of the boss and the boss class. Consequently the starveling clerk with soft hands is at once looked down upon as being no man and as belonging to the enemy group. But misery has amalgamated these hitherto separate elements. A man who hangs out at one of the Skid Road dumps, even though his collar is or once was white, stamps himself as out of a job. There is a brusqueness in the parsimonious speech among the unemployed but few harsh words. It is among employed workers that one finds brawling.

There is very little drinking among the unemployed. Bootlegging, apparently, is a poor racket below the line these days. Out of hundreds of men I saw only one drunk. The lunch-counter man treated the fellow as an old-timer. The bona fide jobless aren't boozing. They have a hard enough time getting something to eat.

Seattle, whose newspapers brag daily of the least unemployment of any city on the coast, takes a proper civic pride in her soup lines. The biggest and best is the one sponsored by the Scripps paper, the Star, which boasts that any hungry man can get one "square meal" a day. This philanthropic enterprise is housed in the National Guard Armory, a block north of the famed Pike Place Market, where hundreds of stalls display food so attractive that a man who has just eaten will grow hungry from looking. It is past this that two thousand or more go daily on the trudge to the soup line from the Skid Road district approximately a mile south of the armory. At 3:45 I joined the thin stream of men going northward for the daily feed at 4:30. I had already noticed how the South End pawnshops bulged with suits and overcoats. Of those men moving toward the armory not many wore overcoats. The pawnshops had them.

I arrived at the armory at 4:10 and took my place in one of the roped-off lanes. This soup-line standing was the most interesting of all, because the men talked. I could hear the comments of about two dozen men. Their talk was mostly of food and a flop. Five of those I could hear discussed our social order. Of them the most interesting was a husky Negro Communist about forty years old. When I appeared the debate was already on. Two white-collar men, one of whom wore an overcoat, were the Negro's opponents. One fellow of about twenty-five was saying: "I'll tell you what's wrong with this country. There's too many millionaires. There ought to be a law to keep a man from gettin' more'n half a million. Them millionaires gits all the money and locks it up in banks, and keep it from circulatin'. That's what makes hard times. There ought to be a law against it." The other white-collar objected: "That'ud help maybe, but that's socialism. We don't want to go dividin' up. What a man gits he wants to keep. No, socialism won't work, it ain't human nature."

The Negro broke in scornfully: "Yes, you guys knows a lot, you does. What has you-all got to divide up? Standin' room in a soup line. Say, boy, long as folks talks that way, th' workin'man won't git nothin' bettern' a soup line. That's the way ya' bin talkin' evah sence ya' was bohn, an what'a ya' got now? A soup line!" The anti-socialist answered him: "You'd better keep your mouth shut or you won't be in a soup line, you'll be in jail." "Jail?" came back the Negro, "jail? Say, boy, dat doan skeer me a bit, Ah's bin in jail befoh. Ah's bin beat ovah th' haid with a policeman's club, Ah's bin kicked in the ribs an' beat up when Ah went demonstratin'. Ah's bin a-talkin' like dis foh a long time, an' Ah ain't a-goin' to do no shuttin' up now. No siree!" Then the prohibitor of millionaires spoke up. He began with the comic-strip expression: "Oh, yeah? You I. W. W.'s make me sick. What good can you do marchin' to the City Hall? Why ya' didn't even git there. I seen ya' last May, th' cops took care of ya' all right. Ya' failed, didn't ya'?" He turned and grinned at me, as much as to say, "I told him a few things, didn't I?" But the Negro was not downed. He laughed and answered: "So you says we failed, does you? Well, if you calls standin' up and fightin' like a man an' gittin' yo' haid broke in th' class wah failin', then we failed, but Ah doan call it no failin'. In de next place it wasn't de I. W. W.'s dat de police done beat up. Th' wobblies ain't no fightin' organization now, the fights all outen'em." Then he bristled up as he remembered the taunt about failure. "So you-all says we failed? Ah'll tell ya' why. We failed 'cause you was agin us. Wasn't ya'? Ya' was agin us, wasn't ya'? Tell me." And the other proudly answered: "Sure I was against you. Do you think I want people goin' around tearin' down th' government?" This is what the Negro expected and wanted. "Sure you was aginst us. Doan Ah know it? You're aginst us when we's fightin' yo' battle foh you, cause ya' ain't got th' sense to fight it foh yo'sef. Ah's a carpenter, an Ah could git good wages a-scabbin' on th' white men, but Ah ain't done it. We's bin fightin' foh ya, an say listen, boy, if ya had a dollah foh ev'y man that's been shot an' put in jail, beat up and deported fightin' yo' battle foh ya' in th' past thirty yeahs, you wouldn't be standin' in no soup line, you-all would be a-ridin' in a big limousine, a-smokin' big seegars an' a-wantin' t' spit on de people on de street corners."

The white men apparently decided to ignore the Negro. After a moment's silence I spoke to him to inquire if there was a Salvation Army bread line in town. "Yes," he said, "they's got some kind o' outfit but Ah doan have nothin' t' do with dem drum-beatin' Jesus-jazzers. Does you-all think Ah wants t' go t' heaven, with folks dat supports dem dat beat ya, tars an' feathers ya, shoots ya, burns ya at de stake, does ever thing to ya but eat ya? Dey's just de capitalists' hallelujah gang dat preaches salvation so's you'll forgit de empty stomach. Does dey tells ya about science an' brains curin' de world so's any man can live decent? No, dey tells ya to repent foh bein' a sinnah—foh bein' hungry, Ah guess. Dat's de' wors' sinnin' Ah done seen foh a long time."

A man on the other side of the rope gave me some information. Both the Salvation Army and the Volunteers of America had soup lines, but you had to attend the preaching and hymn-singing before you could eat. "And the grub's rotten, a lot worse than this." Another man spoke up, and tilted his head toward the Negro. "I feel just like him about them religious birds. They git the right to fill city jobs, that the law says must pay four-fifty a day. They give the jobs to stiffs for six days, but the stiff gits a dollar a day, and th' organization pockets three-fifty." "Same graft in Spokane, I had one of th' jobs," another man chimed in. "Where does the money go? Not in the soup, just try to taste it there." At least a dozen men heard these remarks without dissent, and a good many took the trouble to curse and rail at the religious crowd.

I turned to a man just behind me and asked: "Do you think these soup lines will last all winter? They're goin' to cost a lotta dough." "Oh, yes, they'll last," he solemnly assured me, "they gotta last. Why all us stiffs would go t' breakin' windows for grub, if they didn't." A fellow next him confirmed the statement. "Sure, we ain't gonna start sompin' as long as the slum's dished out each day. But I ain't gonna starve, an' the rest of us bums ain't." By this time the line had moved up to the great basins into which the food was poured from twenty-gallon milk cans. As each man filed by he was handed a tin pie pan and warned not to spill his portion, which at this point was poured in the pie tin, army fashion. One ladle, filling the pan about three-fourths full, was dished out to each man. He was herded quickly to a high table where he ate standing up. At each plate were three slices of bread, a cup of water sufficiently colored to taste bad, and a piece of pumpkin pie, evidently a restaurant left-over from Christmas. The pie was good but the slum was as vile as the word sounds. The mess was grayish-brown, of gravy-like consistency. In my plate I counted exactly seven brown beans, one slice of carrot, and a layer of onion. There was one piece of ham about the size of a marble. Occasionally I found soft lumps of something genuinely sickening when tasted. These seemed to be mushy remnants of overboiled potatoes that had begun to rot. The coffee was undrinkable, yet everybody except me drank it. I watched the men at my table. They ate hungrily and without making faces over the evil-tasting lumps. What spoons would not collect from the pans, pieces of bread absorbed. When those men finished, one could hardly tell that the pans had ever contained food. I picked up my plate and cup to deposit them in the big receiving cans. Two pieces of bread were remaining where I stood. Across the boards from me stood a grizzled man of sixty. He asked in an astonished voice, "Don't you want that bread?" "No," I replied, "take it." He reached a knotted and warped hand eagerly across the table, seized the bread, and slipped it in his coat pocket. "Thanks, I'll be able to sleep better with that to eat at night. I get right smart empty an' it's hard to sleep when you're hungry."

I dropped my plate and cup in the proper receptacles and passed out of the building to the parapet where those who had eaten stood about for a few moments lighting cigarette butts before departing to hunt a place to sleep. I slipped about and inquired of men what their experience with the religious organizations had been. Without exception they were bitter against those who dealt in salvation at a profit. Again and again the story of the city jobs and the religious crowd's rake-off of $3.50 on each day's work came up.

Of others I asked where they slept. There were several places where a stiff could flop on the floor, and one place had beds, but I was warned to go there early if I expected to get a bunk. I offered Bull Durham to one broad-shouldered man not yet thirty. "Thanks," he said, "but I never learned to roll 'em. I spill the tobacco." I reached in my coat pocket and fished out a loose Camel, and offered it. "Oh, no, really, I can't take your tailor-made." I urged him, saying, "Go ahead, the Bull does me fine." He took the cigarette, lit it from mine, inhaled deeply, and then broke into the blandest smile. "God, but that tastes good!" He shook his head in appreciation. "It's days since I've had a smoke." We started talking. He had formerly tempered axles in the Oldsmobile plant, but had been out of a job since March. Bit by bit he had moved toward the Pacific Coast, and once in California got a solid four days' work in an orange grove. That had been his longest job in ten months. I asked what he planned to do. He shrugged his shoulders and said, "Just try to keep from starving to death and wait for the breaks."

After checking up on the alleged repeaters I started home. At Third and Union, across from the Post Office, a gaunt unshaven man in a dyed army overcoat was selling apples at the entrance of an empty shop. I approached him with a "Say, brother, gim'me a tip on this apple racket. I'm out of a job." "Shore, I'll tell ya', but there hain't much in it. Ya' gits th' apples from th' commission houses on Western near th' waterfront. They cost a dollar an' a half a box. I been here sence eight o'clock this mornin', an' I've just sold enough t' pay for th' box." It was then six o'clock. But it was a bad day, he assured me, as it was just after Christmas. "On good days," he said, "I gen-er'ly clear a dollar." I asked if he were married. "Shore enough! got three nice smart kids, too. Oldest 'un's eight. Th' missus an' them's livin' with her folks in Hillyard. There's no cookin' job around there—that's what I am, first cook—can do pastry, too. I send th' missus what I make. Livin's pretty cheap fer me. I batch in a little room, an' they gives me most of my grub at the commission house, stuff they can't sell, but it's nice of 'em anyway."

Portrait of a Chancellor

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FROM the grave Prince von Bülow has struck a deadly blow at his own reputation through the posthumous publication of his autobiography, the first two volumes of which have now appeared.* Written during the years from 1921 to 1926, in return for a yearly income guaranteed by the great Ullstein publishing house as long as he might live, Prince von Bülow stipulated only that they should not appear until a decent time after his death. It would have been infinitely better for his own reputation had he chosen instead to live in poverty and suppress any desire to record for publication his observations of men and affairs, for what is now published has deeply shocked even his greatest admirers and warmest friends. This self-portrayal is even more devastating than our own Colonel House's revelation (with the aid of Professor Seymour) of the utter threadbareness of his own self-assumed statesmanship and his lack, at times, even of sincerity. But von Bülow's revelations have, of course, far greater importance, not because he played a large role during the World War—which he did not—but because he was one of the most important actors in the pre-war drama. Under him Germany finally broke with the Bismarckian policies and, turning her back upon England and Russia, embarked upon the course which led to the destruction of the empire and the greatest disaster which has overtaken a proud people in modern times—unless that of Russia was greater.

Von Bülow himself was a man of great charm and most attractive personality. There is no doubt that when he entered a room he became truly "the life of the party." No one else had more attractive manners. No one else was a more delightful conversationalist. No one else could garnish his utterances with so many anecdotes of the great or so many apropos quotations. He was the man of the world, the courtier par excellence, and there is no doubt that his tact and savoir faire stood his emperor and country in good stead on many occasions. But in these volumes that charm is much attenuated. It is true that "I remember" and "I recollect" appear frequently to usher in interesting quotations and gossip, but often they lack their old authority, and always the Prince's personal magnetism is sorely lacking. Frequently his stories are weakened by "if I remember correctly," "if my memory has not played me false," "I think it was Metternich who said." The gossip is often profoundly interesting, as are also his characterizations of the public personages of all nations with whom he came into contact. Some of these, notably his bitter judgments of the leaders of the revolution of 1918, his publishers, in their foreword, tell us he revised radically in the third volume which is still to appear.

Thus, when von Bülow began to write, Ebert, the harness-maker who succeeded the divinely inspired Kaiser—as perfect a bit of historical juxtaposition and satire as history records—was a dreadful person fit only to be utterly scorned. Later the Prince came to a juster view. Ebert became for him a man of "natural dignity and sound sense"—even "proof" that "in our, oh, so unpolitical Germany, the working class can supply strong political talents, characters worthy of all respect, and distinguished party leaders." How different would have been the history and fate of Germany if Bismarck, as well as the Kaiser and von Bülow, could have realized this truth in his time of power! But von Bülow at the helm was the aristocrat who knew only how to play the old diplomatic game with most delightful manners, but without wisdom, without force, without the divination and strategy in foreign affairs of Bismarck. Von Bülow, it now clearly appears, was outmaneuvered and out-trumped and was even unaware of much that was going on which was of vital importance. All of this he is unable to conceal, although these volumes are meant, like Bismarck's recollections and self-defense, to prove that he was always right and everybody else wrong; the book teems with bitter attacks upon men living and dead, some of whom, like the distinguished Professor Adolf von Harnack, he lays out cold and beyond all human aid.

Without doubt von Bülow's most serious dereliction was in permitting the English to ally themselves with the French by his failure to react to Chamberlain's and Lansdowne's proposals from 1899 on for an Anglo-German alliance. Theodor Wolff, who was for years in von Bülow's confidence and published immediately after the Prince's death a long letter to himself from von Bülow on this question, declares that the chapter which von Bülow devotes to the subject is "much more full of holes, much weaker, and certainly less interesting" than his previous defenses. Wolff declares, of his own knowledge, that von Bülow's statement that he was aware of the British double-dealing in the matter of the Portuguese colonies when making treaties with Germany and Portugal is false. Von Bülow did not hear of it until long afterwards; hence he could not truthfully explain his rejection of the British offers of a hard and fast alliance by declaring, as he does, that he had lost faith in English sincerity and integrity. Of course, if he had accepted the British offers, there would have been no World War; or, if there had been, England would have fought beside Germany. The terrible fact—terrible from the point of view of the German people—is that under the Kaiser and his chancellors the alliances with Russia and England collapsed, and the German fleet-maniacs, with their anti-English slant, separated farther the two great countries which should always have been the warmest friends.

Von Bülow's admission that "English opinion was much less anti-German than German opinion was anti-English" speaks for itself. He and the Kaiser could have stopped that had they wished to do so. But, as von Bülow shows, the Kaiser more and more alienated his royal English relatives while von Bülow was messing things diplomatically. Finally, as this princely autobiographer also admits: "We [the Germans] gradually got on the nerves of the world, and we ourselves did not even notice this until the end of the war." It is impossible to read these memoirs without realizing that much as von Bülow may lay the blame for this upon others, he must bear his share of the responsibility. Indeed, no honest German who peruses these books can fail to hold von Bülow in large measure to blame for Germany's disaster. This is the brand he has now definitively put upon himself. He paved the way! How far his Italian wife and associations were responsible for this grasping at the shadow of the Triple Alliance and losing the substance of an English and Russian entente, it is not easy to say. Of course, in the memoirs, he sought to make it appear that he knew well what kind of a damosel the Italian beauty was, and how she could play fast and loose. However, he thought her worth the courting for all her frailty, and plainly preferred her to the virtuous and cold and calculating British matron whose advances he scorned. This whole additional picture of what European politics were like before the catastrophe, and of the kind of men who carried the fates of nations in their hands and played with them, portrays anew the inefficiency and criminal irresponsibility of the old statesmanship, which future generations will surely find impossible to understand or believe.

---

* "Denkwürdigkeiten von Bernhard, Fürst von Bülow." Berlin: Verlag Ullstein. The English translation is announced for publication on May 1 by Little, Brown and Company.

As for the Kaiser, these reminiscences have struck him another deadly blow. They more than confirm the portrait of him painted by Emil Ludwig. At the same time, what von Bülow wrote about his former sovereign has done the dead Prince more harm than anything else in these self-damning volumes—even in the eyes of the great multitude of Germans who have no use whatever for the Kaiser. For here was a man who toadied incessantly to his liege lord—even to the kissing of his hand. The days when the Kaiser distinguished von Bülow in one way or another are written down here as among the greatest in the latter's life; as when the Kaiser graciously allowed him to ride with him past the front of von Bülow's old regiment, the Königshusaren, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its being stationed at Bonn. The Kaiser then made von Bülow, to his joy, an honorary colonel with the right to wear the uniform of his former regiment.

I find it impossible not to see a distinct strain of hypocrisy in von Bülow's discussions of the Kaiser, for frequently after writing fearful things about him he adds phrases like "but he was such a charming man"; or, "his abilities were so distinguished"; or, "he was often so remarkable." It is right to admit that the Kaiser was a fascinating, a gracious, sometimes a generous person, but the way this bootlicking courtier turns first bitter critic and then apologist, or lauder, raises one's gorge. I am not of the many, however, who feel that von Bülow should not have discussed him at all. It was a duty to posterity for him to paint a true portrait of the man he at once loathed and admired, if he wrote about him at all. But in view of the manner in which he did it, it is not surprising that Berlin is full of rumors that the Kaiser will shortly retaliate by publishing some of the sycophantic and bootlicking letters of adulation which von Bülow wrote to him; or that the condemnation of the Prince is so universal.

As for the picture which von Bülow draws of the Kaiser, one wonders at times why he did not seek to have his monarch locked up. Especially does the Prince dwell on the Kaiser's mad desire to talk, saying that he had the disease which the Italians call parlantina, as well as the ancients' cacoethes scribendi. To anybody who came along the Kaiser might, and constantly did, tell everything he had in his mind. For example, the Kaiser was once heard to let out one state and family secret after another to a person with whom he walked the decks of the royal yacht Hohenzollern. When inquiry was made as to who this confidant was, it turned out that he was the pilot who was taking the ship from Bari to Corfu! To his brother, Prince Henry, the Kaiser did not hesitate to denounce the Czar, although he knew full well that Prince Henry was devoted to the Czar, whose wife was the Prince's sister-in-law. Pages and pages von Bülow gives to such cases of tactlessness, always putting himself in the role of the man who covered the Kaiser's breaks and said just the right word to smooth things over so far as that was possible. An instance of this is the famous case when the Kaiser dubbed himself the "Admiral of the Atlantic" and the Czar, who was dining with him on the Hohenzollern, the "Admiral of the Pacific." The Czar was mute and painfully embarrassed, and von Bülow stepped in at once to smooth matters over. But later, when the two imperial ships parted company, the Kaiser signaled that the Admiral of the Atlantic bade farewell to the Admiral of the Pacific. After an interval the Czar's ship responded with one word: "Goodby." The captain of the Hohenzollern at once issued an order forbidding every officer and bluejacket on the ship to mention this episode. A few weeks later, however, the whole story appeared in a leading English daily with an effect upon British naval men and jingoes that can be imagined.

Sometimes the Kaiser openly revolted against the effort to muzzle him, saying that he was the only person who had to wear one. Anybody could call him a fool or anything else without anything happening, but he was asked to keep his feelings to himself even before his own brother. As one reads these pages the only wonder is that the Kaiser did not do infinitely more mischief than he actually created. Despite his promises never to write a letter to another sovereign without first submitting it to von Bülow, he constantly wrote or telegraphed without letting anyone know—often with great consequent humiliation.

Much that is new and intimate appears about the friction between the Kaiser and the Kaiserin, which constantly led to "dreadful scenes" and made the Kaiser fear that she would end her days in a sanitarium. Both were highly nervous. Far too much was plainly expected of one who was incapable of being at the same time "a bourgeois mother, a tender wife, and a reigning Kaiserin." Von Bülow prints many letters he received from her begging his help, his advice, in her efforts to control or direct the energies of her husband. It cannot be denied that she understood the weaknesses of her lord, master, and sovereign, with whom, von Bülow in passing remarks, "the dear 'I' pushed everything else into the background." This man's dagger is ever ready to be slipped under the fifth rib of the one who gave him the chance that he muffed and raised him to the same exalted rank as that held by the Iron Chancellor himself!

While much of the court gossip repels because of its pettiness, there can be no doubt that these books are of extraordinary historical value—if one makes the necessary discounts. Theodor Wolff says that the familiar German sign Vorsicht ought to be attached to them, that the reader may be on his guard and realize that besides writing an apologia pro vita sua the writer romanced a good deal; that even his anecdotes have been polished in the retelling. Yet a hundred years from now Germans will eagerly read this work, not only because its author in a sense turned state's evidence, but because the correctness of the whole picture of the pre-war official Germany cannot be denied, whatever the individual coloring, however obvious the personal motives. As one lays the volumes down, it is with a feeling that the Prussia of the Kaiser was, after all, in most ways not much different from that of the previous century save for a modern dress, and that it was surely destined to end in complete disaster of one kind or another.

I Became a Librarian

By CONSTANCE AUER

WHEN I had finished school and was casting about rather aimlessly for a career, my friends were helpful with advice. "You like books. You've always been a bookworm. Why not be a librarian?" Why not, indeed. As well say: You like to eat, therefore become a waitress. In my enjoyment of literary delicacies I lacked all desire to dish them up to others. But I had no counter-resources to fall back on, and such fine discriminations were in vain. The great oak doors swung slowly but surely open to receive me. I became a librarian. And here let me interpolate that if I occasionally use the title "librarian" with the loose inaccuracy with which a "public," that is, a borrower, invariably uses it, it is because I cannot help it. For if the librarian be only chief, head, or, as Webster puts it, "one who is in charge," how are those others who work in libraries to be designated? Business-office titles resound with a brisk, pleasing clarity—file clerk, typist, stenographer, secretary. But she who cancels your charge in a library is an "assistant," she who finds your book for you is an "assistant," she who searches indexes for you is an "assistant." Surely those who may never be "in charge" deserve distinction other than the label "assistant."

The dusk I found within the solid, institutional walls of libraries was not entirely obliterating. Light penetrated with certain borrowers who came, inquiring, and gleamed from certain books which even shelf numbers failed to reduce to a commodity. Light radiated most of all from certain of my fellow-workers. In the dim light I learned to distinguish contrasting tones in that subdued entity the library "girl" (for "girl" she remains to her sisters of the staff, be she sixteen or sixty).

Only the length of the years which lie between the library and myself gives me the temerity to speak of the librarian, who by reason of what she is will never speak of herself. As soon expect a nun to rise and tell of convent life. I know little of convents; but I see the library always as a sisterhood of dedicated lives.

The assembly at a teachers' convention is shrill, formidable, however bright and pleasing this or that teacher may be. Stenographers gathered in lunch- or tea-room I have found irritatingly silly. Library women as a group seem rather drab, a little dull. They are subdued, toned down. In their gentleness there is no jar; in their service to their cause, no noisy cant. The more quiet the personality, the better the librarian.

My training was an apprenticeship, my apprenticeship a novitiate. I was instructed at the knee of a mother superior—the Librarian herself. From her I learned the Dewey System of Classification, that paternoster of the library cult. By her I was catechized, trained into the routine of the order. I never attended library school. Library school was a new-fangled notion. I have often wondered if it could ever have proved as inspirational as those heart-to-heart talks in the dim twilight of the office of the mother superior.

I remember this woman for her gray hair, her dignity, and for one incident. We were gathered in staff meeting one morning, and she spoke somewhat sternly. "There has been some discontent with salaries of late," she said, "and of course I could take the matter up with the board." She paused for a measurable moment as we waited. "But I feel, and I know you all feel, that we have more than a commercial return for our work here. To work for the love of work is our privilege. For the present I shall not consult the board."

As nearly as I have been able to discover, loving her work has continued to be the outstanding privilege of the library employee. And she has remained among the most poorly paid of professional women mainly by virtue of her temperament, by virtue of that within her which made her choose her career in the first place. The librarian is a gentlewoman born and bred. She is timid, and library atmosphere is that of "culture," of quiet and refinement. She would like to do something for people, to educate them, perhaps. She recoils from the teaching rostrum as being too bold, too public. She prefers not to be stared at, listened to. She withdraws, with Victorian distaste, from the physical implications of nursing. She would serve without being noticed; invisibly she wants to help. Service is not a blatant slogan in the library. It is an inner and spiritual grace—more often than not quite genuine.

Quiet, quiescence, acquiescence. These were the three Q's of library training, the triune principle of the library order.

To tread quietly, to speak quietly, to work quietly. To pass through a room unobtrusively, as a thought might pass. To become as one of the books on the shelves, informative but silent. In the far reaches of the library, in the catalogue, order, and bindery departments, beyond the public ken, the same soundlessness prevailed. Even in their meetings librarians have no tongues. I recall one assembly of the staff where, after a discourse on Books of the Day, the visiting speaker asked for questions. After a pause the girl sitting next to me made an inquiry concerning book-review magazines. Faces registered surprise that she dared to do this. The head of one of the departments, leaning toward her, whispered, "I am so glad you asked that. I wanted to hear his comments." It was a feat of sheer courage, her tone implied. There were no further remarks that afternoon, nor on any similar occasions that I remember.

To be of quiescent mind—to plod, to be methodical. The work of a library is largely of a routine nature; the pace is slow, very slow. The detail is exacting—there are fifty-odd rules (does my memory hold?) to be observed in the typing of a catalogue card. These rules, framed by the Library of Congress to take care of minute classifications in a mammoth collection, are worshipfully observed by every cataloguer, be her collection of 50,000 or 500,000 volumes. Once the rules are mastered, one still works slowly; office pace would be considered irrelevant in a library. It is part of library discipline to remain unharassed by monotony, to be immune to boredom. Clerical work in a library is commendable in its accuracy; library system leaves no loophole either for temperamental adaptation or temperamental error.

To be of acquiescent spirit—to be obedient to tradition, respectful of established methods. To agree with the public across the desk, with the head of the department, and, above all, with accepted library opinion. To read the reviews of books, rather than the books themselves. The librarian looks to others for judgments as to what she and her public should or should not like. It saves having to read and decide for herself; and it is safer. Of all professional groups I have known, library people read, I believe, the least. Indexes and book journals serve instead.

Subservience to rules is, as everyone knows, the sine qua non of libraries and librarians alike. If a reader rails at a summary demand that he, willy-nilly, return to the library a volume which he and he only at the moment needs, he fails to understand the inflexible democracy of the institution which is serving him. Though that same book stand unread on the public shelves for five years, yet once every fortnight it must be placed for twenty-four hours at the command of his fellow-citizens. If this reader has at the time a problem or a thesis under consideration, such lack of leniency seems pointless and narrow; and the library assistant who timidly but firmly enforces the rule must take the brunt of his intellectual frown.

She has no choice. The rule governs her, as it governs the book and the borrower. Her position is as unequivocal as that of a nurse with charted orders for the day. Yet even more rigid are the orders which bind her, for they are never altered by a superior, they never swerve in the direction of a need. Of all professional women I have known, the public-library assistant is the least often allowed the responsibility of "using her judgment." The borrower, whether he desires a light novel or a statistical tome, is in the vernacular a "public," a mentally unclassed entity. The woman behind the desk may offer sympathy, a smile, an apology; but a rule she may neither give nor take away.

I have already indicated that the library employee is among the most poorly paid of professional women. In only one library of my experience, and I have applied for work in many, was the wage scale equal to that of the intelligent office girl. Rarely did it reach that level. One chief of a large public-library system, under whom I was fortunate enough at one time to work, had obtained from his city respectable salaries for the women in his employ. He was an exception.

The school librarian who is a member of the school staff, as she is, for instance, in California, is more fortunate. She is paid a teacher's salary, and that, in California, is fair enough. But the public libraries lag behind. Through the many library applications which I made at that time I came to understand that $100 a month was a respectable honorarium for an experienced library assistant in the West.

The endowed institutions bring up the rear of the salary ranks. For nearly a year I worked in a renowned private library in Chicago on an income of $19 a week. During that time I received an offer of an equal amount from the university library there. And when I offered myself to a large private library in San Francisco I was informed that they had at the time only a junior position for which their budget provided $60 to $65 per month. I will leave it to the American Library Association to amend the statistics, and to prove that library economics have changed since then.

I have intimated that the responsibility for her low wages lies largely with the temperament of the library employee herself, but it would not be fair to ignore entirely certain economic factors that have tended to keep her underpaid. Educational qualifications for the library worker have not, in the past, been high. Apprenticeship once served as training; then one year, then two years of library school. Now a college degree is often requested, and in a few libraries it is required. The salaries have not, however, kept pace with the training demands. Libraries remain filled because library positions are very few in number in comparison with office jobs or teaching jobs.

The industrial-library field is opening up; and I understand that the industrial or commercial librarian is frequently well compensated for her work. Only once did I make inquiry in this direction, and the prospect was encouraging, although I was not sufficiently interested at the time to follow it through. This development will eventually help the regular library employee, though the special library is as yet a disowned and unrecognized offspring of its conservative parents, the public and private "literary" libraries. I remember an interview with an alert young industrial librarian who revealed to me the chasm existing between her and her traditional colleague. "We are not literary," she said, "and therefore we must shift for ourselves. We have recently formed our own Special Library Association here in the city. The Public Library is not interested."

As a seeker, no longer a dispenser, of volumes, I have myself in recent years noticed in a few libraries some revolutionary indications. Along with an astounding display of posters and Better Book Weeks have come also extended renewal privileges, the disappearance of morally "restricted shelves," the opening of the gates into closed cubicles, and in a few libraries the generous allowance of as many books as the reader may care to carry away. I judge that the more one takes away, the more remain, for it is in these libraries that one finds most frequently what one desires.

In such libraries, also, I have noticed an awakening vivacity on the part of the assistants, have even heard upon occasion, not the whispered, nervous giggle that I remember, but the welcome sound of a low, merry laugh.

In the Driftway

"CREATED for the most particular age in history." So runs an advertisement for a brand of coffee which shall be nameless since the Drifter wants to attack not the coffee but what he considers an extremely undiscriminating remark about the age we live in. The present age has, or at least exercises, less discrimination than any age before it that the Drifter has ever heard about. That would be bad enough, but it is doubly damning in view of the fact that the capacity of this age for getting what it wants and the mechanical possibility of satisfying its desires speedily and efficiently are superior beyond measure to anything the past has ever imagined. The Drifter has no sentimental nostalgia for the past. He knows that the most beautiful of Gobelin tapestries was pretty inadequate defense against the freezing drafts that blew through castle halls. He knows that the great demand for spices—and that well-known passage to India—stemmed from a desire to disguise the medieval and assuredly picturesque aroma of venison too long off the hoof. The Drifter prefers a warm living-room and an icebox. What pains him is the great disparity between the shining perfection of our modern method and the inexcusable inferiority of the products it brings forth. And it pains him, first, because it exists and, second, because he thinks something could be done about it. Here is one of the few crusades in which he himself might enlist.

* * * * *

ONE might draw the first fine flower of crusading zeal merely from a few minutes' quiet reflection on the number of gallons of bad coffee one has consumed within the year just ended in restaurants fairly topheavy with modern metal conveniences. For a symbol there could be found no more eloquent incitement to battle than a loaf of the bread which most of us—not including the Drifter—continue to eat. The spotless bakeries of America with their miles of windows and their neat ovens would, if piled one upon another, stack up a gleaming skyscraper beyond imagination. Beside it might rise still another spire, less gleaming but no less high, of the advertising copy that is written in praise of bread. But there would sit, perforce, between these two tall towers a loaf whose like for tastelessness and vapidity the world has never seen. Safety-razor blades used to be made of steel. Now, especially since the last great price-cutting fight, they are made of something worse than tin. What is more, it is probably impossible to obtain a steel safety-razor blade in this country except perhaps from some benighted firm which still spends its money on steel instead of newspaper advertising and premiums—a firm whose name, therefore, is unknown to anyone so unscholarly as a Drifter.

* * * * *

HERE are two sorry examples—two among many—of a tendency that has gone so far that even the names of things have lost their meanings. "Bread" once carried a heartening sound. It has become a term of reproach. A "steel blade" of old, in Toledo or the shaving box, conjured a shining and dependable sword. It has become a flabby fighter that nicks and crumples at the first tough whisker. Wool used to wear a warm and genuine air. Silk had a definite rich significance. Now it is "loaded." One must ask for "real" silk. Words—good words—have been thrown about so recklessly that their ancient and precious texture and sound have disappeared. The advertising pages of the world are filled with the ghosts of words that once had value. So are the literary pages—but the Drifter has not time to go into that.

* * * * *

AS for weapons in his crusade, the Drifter knows of only one effective blade—discrimination. Unfortunately, it has been so deeply buried in this democracy of ours under the weight of snob advertising that it will need to be first rescued and then tenderly nurtured for any fight. But it is time we rescued discrimination—now known as sales resistance and considered subtly unpatriotic—and set it to work. The Drifter dares to hope that in time we might have bread instead of paper pulp; that we might eventually have steel instead of advertising copy in our razor blades.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Billie Hard and Mr. Hoover

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a recent issue of your always stimulating weekly Mr. Paul Anderson refers to Billie Hard's former "profitable connection" with Mr. Hoover.

Billie Hard is a sweet-tempered person who permits everyone to say what he pleases without personal emotion on his own part. I do not resemble him in that respect.

I very much resent the implication which must be apparent to the casual reader. The only "profit" Billie Hard has ever had from his acquaintance with Mr. Hoover has been one which he still continues to enjoy. That "profit" is one which exists in any friendship with a man of splendid character and noble purpose.

Washington, February 4 ANNE HARD

The Indian Struggle

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The British leaders say, and the British people seem to believe, that the Round Table Conference proposals represent an advance in self-government for India. But as the consent of the governed is the prime essential, the opinion of India is more important than the opinion of Britain. And as the Indian Congress is by far the most powerful political group in India, it is desirable to understand their attitude.

Mr. Gandhi stated on February 5 that the proposals must be considered in the light of his "eleven points." These were eleven reforms propounded in a sort of open letter to the Viceroy in Mr. Gandhi's paper Young India a year ago. They are substantially as follows:

1. Total prohibition.
2. Reduction of the foreign-exchange ratio of the rupee from its present fixed point of 1s. 6d. to 1s. 4d.
3. Reduction of the land revenue by at least 50 per cent and making it subject to legislative control.

4. Abolition of the salt tax.

5. Reduction of military expenditure by at least half to begin with.

6. Reduction of the salaries of the higher-grade government services so as to suit the reduced revenue.

7. Protective tariff on foreign cloth.

8. Passage of the Coastal Traffic Reservation Bill. (This would break up the present monopoly of British shipping and give Indian ship companies a chance.)

9. Discharge of all political prisoners except those condemned for murder or attempted murder, withdrawal of all political prosecutions and of several repressive statutes specified.

10. Abolition of the secret police.

11. Issue of licenses to the people to use firearms for self-defense, subject to popular control.

None of these points is included or even remotely implied in the British proposals.

To other Indian Congressmen there would seem to be at least five reasons for rejecting the British proposals.

1. Under the new "federal" scheme about one-third of the members of the central legislature would be appointed by the princes and would be, therefore, exceedingly conservative. These, together with the representatives of landlords and wealthy classes in British India, would be a very effective brake upon any advance of popular control.

2. The proposed financial "safeguards" would seem to give control to Britain of about 85 per cent of the total central-government expenditure.

3. The Viceroy's veto power and power to supersede the law whenever he thinks that disorder is threatened.

4. No time limit is set on "safeguards" or reservations.

5. Control of the army remains entirely with Britain.

Finally, we should realize that the British proposals are not what business men would call a "firm offer" but are only recommendations to Parliament.

The press dispatches say that Sir T. B. Sapru was himself skeptical of convincing Mr. Gandhi. It is possible that their return to India has strongly reminded the Indian Round Table delegates of realities which had been obscured by the excitements of London. Mr. Gandhi really means what he has been saying for the past ten years.

Britain is in a quandary. This is illustrated by Mr. Gandhi's request to the Viceroy to investigate six cases of police use of excessive force. If the Viceroy had promised to do this, it would have greatly lowered the morale of the police; yet his refusal to do so will make hundreds of thousands of Indians who have seen the police in action still more deeply convinced that the British use of the words "justice" and "peace" is wholly hypocritical in reference to India. The nature and depth of the British dilemma were indicated in the debate on the conference when Prime Minister MacDonald told Parliament in effect that Britain does not dare to go on indefinitely with repression in India. His statement was widely quoted in the American press. Mr. Baldwin's repudiation of Churchill and the diehards indicates that a great body of the Conservatives also agree with Mr. MacDonald in regard to the danger to Britain of continued repression in India. Nevertheless, repression will go on because Britain is not yet ready to agree to the Congress demands, and to stop the repression would break down the morale of the police.

Mr. Gandhi does not expect to remain out of jail for long. But during the brief period of his freedom he will give skilled guidance to the future tactics of the Congress, will make all Indians realize more deeply and clearly the immense implications of the fight for freedom, will make them understand still more strongly the efficiency, power, and necessity of non-violence in their struggle. It seems likely that the boycott, picketing, and refusal to pay taxes will be intensified, and the unification of different groups and parties of Indians will go on. The pace of so vast a movement cannot be foretold, but one is reminded of a sentence in Mr. Gandhi's letter to the Viceroy last March, just before civil disobedience began: "If the people join me as I expect they will, the sufferings they will undergo, unless the British nation sooner retraces its steps, will be enough to melt the stoniest hearts."

Boston, February 9 RICHARD B. GREGG

Verbatim et Literatim

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I call your attention to the slight but extraordinary slip by which in your issue of February 4 you refer to the great editor of the (London) Nation during its years of liberal preeminence as H. J. instead of H. W. Massingham?

London, February 11 GERTRUDE M. CROSS

Victor L. Berger Foundation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It may interest your readers, and particularly those who reside in or near Washington, D. C., to know that on Sunday evening, March 1, a dinner will be held at the National Press Club to launch the Victor L. Berger National Foundation. The purpose of the foundation, which has been incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, is to honor the memory of the late Victor L. Berger and to perpetuate, through the establishment of a permanent fund which will be applied to help in the building of a liberal press, the service he rendered the nation. Besides helping in the building of a press which will be devoted to cultivating an intelligent understanding of the problems of peace, industrial democracy, and the labor movement, the fund will seek to render permanent benefits to all minority groups by providing effective resistance to all attempts to impose restrictions on the press.

Reservations for the dinner and requests for literature concerning the foundation may be addressed to me at the Insurance Building, Washington. Mayor Hoan, Morris Hillquit, possibly Mr. Darrow, and Mr. Maurer will be among the speakers.

Washington, February 20 MARX LEWIS

In Honor of A. J. Muste

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Ten years of selfless devotion to an idea—the idea of workers' education—have gone into the building of Brookwood Labor College. Today Brookwood stands more secure than ever, and it stands as a monument to one outstanding figure, A. J. Muste. None can realize so fully as the men and women who have spent some time at the college as students what A. J. Muste means to Brookwood. To give expression to this realization the Brookwood graduates of New York City are holding a dinner in his honor.

The dinner will be held on the tenth anniversary of the founding of Brookwood, Friday, March 6, at the Woodstock Hotel, 127 West Forty-third Street, at 6:30 p.m. The price per plate is $2. There will be no collections. Reservations should be sent to the Testimonial Dinner Committee, Room 2004, 104 Fifth Avenue.

New York, February 20 ISRAEL MUFSON

Books, Music, Drama

After a Mozart Quartet

By IRWIN EDMAN

Only another music could translate
This music, and that melody were this;
As well seek language that could utter fate,
As well find metaphors for speaking bliss.
Rather be silent that the themes may flow,
Rivers of liquid and insouciant joy,
Here rushing into rapids, here a slow
Lyric without repining or alloy.
Rather for once be one with perfect things,
All earth's poor infelicities forgotten,
Fly in this laughing heaven with borrowed wings,
Immortal once before your body's rotten,
While briefly yet the living mind can hear
This paradise so gay, abstract, and clear.

The Stream of Life

The Science of Life. By H. G. Wells, Julian S. Huxley, and G. P. Wells. Doubleday, Doran and Company. Two volumes. $10.

IN a book published in the fall of 1928, called "The Open Conspiracy," Mr. Wells announced his plan for the present two volumes. He considered that what he was writing was "a sort of provisional 'Bible,' so to speak," for the modern world. The first third of this Bible was "The Outline of History." The present two volumes, written in collaboration with the eminent biologist, Julian S. Huxley, grandson of the famous Thomas H., and with Mr. Wells's own son, comprise the second third. The final third, to treat of economic and social organization, is still to come.

"The Open Conspiracy" was a book as bad as only Mr. Wells can write. It was stuffed with stale platitudes, put forward with a pounding emphasis and the air of a discoverer and prophet. I am afraid that in reviewing the book I made ironic references to its shallow cocksureness, its evidences of megalomania. But the present magnificent work compels a radical alteration of those earlier conclusions. It is now clear to me that Wells's worst vices are also his highest virtues. Only a man with delusions of grandeur would announce that he himself (with a little outside help) was writing the Bible of our time; but only a man with such delusions, perhaps, would have the ambition, the daring, and the confidence to carry through a work of such panoramic sweep and genuine majesty as "The Science of Life" actually turns out to be.

In saying this I do not mean to give too large a share of credit for the work to Mr. Wells. He is extremely fortunate in such a collaborator as Mr. Huxley, who not only is a thorough biologist but possesses an imagination and literary gifts that, for this type of expository writing, are certainly not inferior to Mr. Wells's own. The reader cannot help speculating, from time to time, on the probable author of particular passages. Mr. Wells is called "the senior partner," but also "the least well-equipped scientifically." "His share," we are told, "has been mainly literary and editorial." Yet one is willing to wager heavy odds that he wrote most of the last chapter, on traditionalism, education, the supersession of war, and "the possibility of one collective human mind and will." The passage on page 940 describing the inconveniences that bacteria might suffer from bombardment by molecules, on the other hand, was almost certainly written by Mr. Huxley, for he has elaborated this same idea in his "Essays of a Biologist." Occasionally there are passages which in substance were written by other writers who do not get the full credit to which they are entitled. Thus the statement on page 938 that an angel is a biological impossibility, because his breast would have to project about four feet to house the muscles necessary to work his wings for flight, is taken from J. B. S. Haldane's essay On Being the Right Size, in "Possible Worlds"; as is also the illustration on page 942 to the effect that if you drop a mouse down a mine shaft, he can get up and walk away, while a rat is killed, a man broken, and a horse splashes. Somewhere in this section Mr. Haldane gets credit for a single remark, but not for these illustrations, which one is led to suppose are those of one of the three authors. But assignment of credit seems for the most part to be reasonably generous; a work of popularization of this amazing scope must necessarily make many borrowings, and perhaps would lose much in readability and pace if it attempted to be too punctilious in citing its sources.

The work is built on an imposing scale. In its 1,500 pages it runs to some 750,000 words, the physical equivalent of ten or twelve novels of ordinary length. It is divided into nine "books," each covering some important department of biological knowledge. The first book discusses the human body, covering much the same field as Dr. Logan Clendening's recent volume. The second book covers the whole living world, from the vertebrates down through the crabs, insects, worms, sponges, microbes, and the full range of vegetable life. The third book presents the manifold evidences for evolution; the fourth, theories of evolution, the mechanism of inheritance, and the A B C of genetics. The fifth gives a history of the forms of earthly life, and includes a section on early man. The sixth describes how various animals get their livings. The seventh is given over to Health and Disease, including bacteriology, nutrition, and vital statistics. Book Eight discusses behavior, feeling, and thought, from that observable in the amoeba up through that of ant and bee colonies to man, and there is a comprehensive section on behaviorism and psychoanalysis, as well as on such "borderland sciences" as telepathy and spiritualism. The final book considers man in his collective rather than his individual aspect—his history and forms of associations.

It is not possible to indicate more than sketchily the attitude and conclusions of the work. It holds evolution to be an incontrovertible fact, "proven up to the hilt," acceptable on the strength of the fossil record alone. Its point of view is neo-Darwinian; it does not accept the alleged evidence for the inheritance of acquired characters; it dismisses all theological, mystical, and teleological theories of evolution, including Bergson's élan vital, which it regards as a vivid but scientifically valueless metaphor, and Mr. Shaw's Life Force, which it derides as "Lamarckism in caricature." "It pleases Mr. Shaw," remark the authors, "to tell the world at regular intervals that Natural Selection has been 'exploded,' and it does not hamper the operation of Natural Selection in the very least that he should do this." But though the authors accept Natural Selection, they have no emotional attachment to it:

> The biologist can also point out that Evolution, whether looked at as a whole or in detail, is very far from coming up to what we might expect if it were in truth the realization of some exterior cosmic purpose. Firstly, it is extremely slow. Then the method of selection is not only slow but wasteful and, in higher animals at least, involves > great suffering. Worst of all, it has achieved much that seems definitely bad. Evolution has deprived barnacles and oysters of movement and brain; it has produced the female mantis, who begins eating her mate during the act of pairing; it has generated the bloodthirsty land-leeches and mosquitoes, and fitted the ichneumon-fly grub to devour its living caterpillar prey slowly, from the inside; it has brought into being not only strong, intelligent, and beautiful creatures, but also degenerate parasites and loathsome diseases. In brief, we are confronted with the gravest theological difficulties if we too light-heartedly set out to see purpose in Evolution. The wiser and saner course is to acknowledge our ignorance of ultimate causes and designs.

This view carries of course its implications for human conduct and aims. After pointing to man's utter insignificance in time and in space, the authors conclude:

> Human dignity rests upon nothing but itself, and man's activities must have value in themselves and for their own sake if they are to have value at all. That is the outcome of modern astronomy's impact upon the complacency of ordinary thought.

Like most modern biologists and psychologists, the authors find themselves obliged to reject not only the extreme dualism between Mind and Body preached by Descartes, almost ineradicably imbedded in language itself, and hence accepted by the man in the street and pontifically defended by a few literary gentlemen, but they reject any notion that Mind and Body are separated or separable in fact. They are obliged to adopt the hypothesis that man is not Mind plus Body, but a Mind-Body; that Mind and Body are merely two aspects of one unity. (There is an interesting analogy here with the recent physical concept of a space-time continuum.) The authors therefore accept behaviorism as a fruitful scientific method. They dismiss it, however, as a philosophy, both because of its astounding rejection of subjective evidence and its equally astounding rejection of all that science and common sense know of heredity. They criticize Freud's work freely, but still maintain that "Freud's name is as cardinal in the history of human thought as Charles Darwin's." They hold out no hope for personal immortality, and even hint that it is better that the individual, with all his bad habits, ineradicable memories, mutilations, distortions, prejudices, and decays, should be erased at last and forgotten.

With the immense new fields of knowledge that have been opened up in the last generation, the revolutionary theories and discoveries, the appalling accumulation of verified facts of the highest importance, we should all be lost if a great literature of popularization were not arising to disseminate this knowledge. There is a type of intellectual snob who professes to hold this literature of popularization in contempt; who maintains that through it knowledge is diluted, cheapened, and distorted. Popularizations differ in quality like every other type of book; and that such charges are true of many popularizations I should be the last to deny. But the man who takes at best a condescending attitude to every book on science not written for an expert audience is either stupid or a pretty transparent pretender. Today we are all "laymen" outside of our own narrow specialties; even the astronomer and the biologist may read each other's popularizations with profit. As the need for such books grows yearly, it is no accident that their quantity not only increases, but that their quality is higher than in any previous period of the world's cultural history. The popularizer of former times was likely to be a mere second-hand man in ideas; his tone was almost always condescending, and his audience in consequence got even less than whatever filtered through his own mediocre brain. Today the popularizers are among the finest minds of our time: J. B. S. Haldane, Bertrand Russell, Eddington, Jeans, H. S. Jennings. And the trinity that have composed this "Bible" belong in their company. In their work they have profited from their predecessors. They have learned that the popularization of knowledge is essentially no more than its humanization; that while a few abstruse aspects of a subject are better left to specialists, it is on the whole not necessary to dilute or to "write down." (There is a certain patronizing air in the present book in its somewhat tiresome use of "Mr. Everyman" where "man" would have been much better; but this is a very minor blemish.) Popularization, they have learned, means sometimes no more than merely getting rid of pedantry and pompousness. But its real secret, which this trinity have mastered to an astonishing degree, is the imaginative and dramatic presentation of a subject; the revelation of its connections, implications, and broader meanings; the ability to place the reader "in relation to the whole scheme of things." Their work, in consequence, is the most absorbing I have encountered in months. I shall not commit the banality of calling it as absorbing as a novel. But if, sometime during the present year, an extraordinarily fine novel comes my way, and I want to say something very complimentary about it, I may say that it is nearly as absorbing as "The Science of Life."

HENRY HAZLITT

Black, Alas, No More!

Black No More. By George S. Schuyler. The Macaulay Company. $2.

MR. SCHUYLER is, so far, the only Negro who has employed satire as a weapon with any measure of success. If for no other reason, therefore, his book deserves mention. The fable is a simple one. A Negro doctor discovers a method of turning black people white in a few hours and for the modest sum of $50. Millions of Negroes flock to take his treatment, from which they emerge not only white-skinned but with Anglo-Saxon features. There is only one rub: Negroes, though white, are still liable to become the parents of brown babies, but the resourceful doctor is able to turn a dark infant white in twenty-four hours. The results, of course, are various and chaotic. Complete disintegration of Negro enterprise, terror on the part of the whites, who see white supremacy threatened in a new way, a new political party, which under the guidance of one of the new un-Negroes seems about to elect a president, and the denouement—the discovery, by one of the most furious of the anti-white-Negroites, that about 50 per cent of the inhabitants of the United States must own to Negro ancestry, in however remote form.

Like all good fables, this one has a moral, unmistakable, pointed, and, one fears, all too justified. The Negro, says Mr. Schuyler, has denied his birthright, has betrayed his race. He is engaged whole-heartedly in an attempt to be as much like the white man as possible. He will be whiter than white; he will, without a thought for the virtues of his own kind, embrace the white man's virtues, although they are foreign to his nature and beyond his comprehension. This is the new slavery. When he was a slave the Negro lived in his own world; he loved, laughed, bore pain, and died in it. He entered the white man's world only as a child enters the world of his parents, without understanding it, suffering what he must suffer, enjoying what he is permitted to enjoy. But like a child he could withdraw to his own kind, who were so full of grace, and kindness, and gaiety. What a sad irony that he was freed from the bondage that kept him in his world only to enter upon another slavery, the seemingly irresistible necessity to ape his former masters.

This, of course, is one way of saying that the Negro will never write great literature while he tries to write white literature. It may be that he can express himself only by music and rhythm, and not by words. Mr. Schuyler has written white satire. He has spared neither race in his sharp criticism and neither is likely to love him for it. His book has many faults, the most glaring being its vulgarity. But if it is not great literature, or perhaps literature at all, it is a very pointed barb in the side of white and black alike. And on the whole the whites come off a little better, for they at least are trying to keep what they think they have, their racial integrity. The Negro might well take a lesson from this obstinate and unreasoning pride of race. DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Australia's Dilemma

Australia. By W. K. Hancock. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.
An Economic History of Australia. By Edward Shann. The Macmillan Company. $6.

THESE two books offer the most comprehensive picture of Australia available to the American reader. Professor Shann's volume is a detailed study of the economic evolution of the country from the settlement in 1788 to the year 1928, while Professor Hancock's book is a portrait of the Australian people as they exhibit themselves today to a native trained abroad for critical observation. The latter cites the former as a principal source. No doubt the Hancock volume is the one I should indicate as most suitable for the general reader. It is much cleverer, if less substantial, than J. B. Condliffe's treatise on New Zealand and much solider than Sarah Gertrude Millin's essay on South Africa.

Both authors dissipate many myths and both emphasize aspects of the Australian situation which will give anguish to the "dinkum Aussies." One truth which both writers emphasize is that Australia is controlled economically by the world prices of primary products. Another and complementary truth is that in ignoring this factor Australian politicians and their constituents have brought the country to its present pass. They have sought to erect an Australian system of economics on a continent which in the very nature of things cannot stand the gaff. When world prices are high and it is easy to borrow abroad, everything goes swimmingly. When prices fall, then times are doubly hard. In fact, one may generalize that the Australian question is humanitarianism versus world prices.

The Australian humanitarians get precious little sympathy from either of our authors; not that they are American humanists, but because they feel that ignorance of economics has been made a virtue by Australian politicians. I may select the question of wages as an example of how humanitarian considerations have affected the total situation. The familiar Australian boast is that the living standard of the country is the highest in the world, a dogma contradicted by statistics and by an observational survey of the condition of the Australian workingman. This standard of living is based upon a legally regulated wage and is determined by factors other than supply and demand—by world prices, for example. It is based on the study of the index numbers of Australian prices and upon the "fair and reasonable" requirements of a family of five in the satisfaction of their "normal needs." Australian wages are a basic charge against an industry, and theoretically the industry which cannot meet them and survive should perish. Practically, the industry is taken care of by the tariff. The effort is to have protection for all as the safeguard of the Australian standard, itself an artificially created charge upon industry. An illustration of how this works is the dried-fruit industry. It is based upon irrigation, and the costs, including wages, make it impossible for the Australian dried fruits to compete in the world market except at a loss. Consequently the Australian market is segregated for the local dried fruits by a tariff wall and the surplus is dumped abroad. Thus is the Australian standard maintained. Naturally such a system sets up a vicious circle from which there is no easy escape.

It is possible to admire this Australian blindness to the Tibetan nature of their economy and to applaud the stiff-necked quality which leads them to seek a high minimum standard of prosperity. It is possible, also, to find excellent excuses for their wonderful ability for acquiring debts in the operation of their railways as instruments for developing the country, in the various expedients for getting population on the land, and in all their other projects for making the government an instrument for social service rather than a defense for privilege. Most of the troubles which have resulted, both authors emphasize, arise from the apparent impossibility of harmonizing lofty aims which can only be gained by careful planning by trained economists and technicians with the necessity for democratic control of those charged with operating responsibilities. Neither writer says much about graft in Australia, though probably it is a factor, but both harp on the conclusion that mass thinking can never solve technical problems. In the last analysis, then, is Australia victimized by the democratic dogma?

Whatever the flaw in the Australian ideology, the accomplishments of the people are amazing. From a straggling convict settlement founded in 1788 with no welcome for the free settler, there has evolved the present social structure. With a perspicuity not characteristic of American historians, Messrs. Hancock and Shann give great credit, not to the governing officials, but to those who laid the true foundations of the national life. They single out John Macarthur, who first realized the importance of sheep raising (still the basic industry) for wool; William Farrer, who experimented in a Luther Burbank fashion with wheat and evolved the varieties which will resist drought and rust and so stabilized the wheat industry; Mrs. Caroline Chisholm, who put the family on a solid basis at a time when there was considerable danger that practical men would try to keep the country a pastoral community with few women; Professor Custance, who solved the problem of soil exhaustion by "dressing the land with soluble superphosphate"; the various inventors of labor-saving devices adapted to local needs, and similar heroes. It is men and women of this type who made Australia, in company with the nameless heroes who have fought and died in the war with the capricious soil and climate. "The progressive settlement of the continent depends primarily on the progress of its people in mastering the problems of its soil and climate," says Hancock.

In one of his penetrating generalizations Professor Hancock remarks that the whole of Australian history lies "within the period which succeeded the French Revolution and the Industrial Revolution . . ." It has both profited and suffered from this fact. It has suffered because the emphasis on the rights of man and the duties of the state (leading to state socialism) has led to the ignoring of any larger aspect of the problem than the immediate welfare of the individual citizen. It has profited because the development of Australia has been accelerated to an extent unknown before in the history of new countries, a development so impressively set forth by Dr. Shann. The result is that Australia stands today as one of three most interesting and prophetic countries, the other two being Russia and the United States. In its present form it is a precarious compromise between the two. The slightest tip of the scales will send it one way or the other. Both of these professors are in favor of a retreat from the present humanitarian ideology, Professor Hancock being decidedly ironic and deprecatory in his clever summary of the Australian outlook, and Professor Shann openly favoring the return to power of the most conservative element in the commonwealth, the sheep-raising squatters.

The squatters would undoubtedly tip the balance toward a conservative paternal capitalism, but there is small chance of their getting a foothold in politics in spite of the fact that their industry is basic in the national prosperity. The farmers tried to assert their case against the dominant ideology, but suffered a defeat only tempered by an appropriation of some of its alleged benefits. The conservative forces in Australian life seem politically impotent. In the great difficulties at the close of the last century labor lost ground heavily, but today it is in control. If in guiding the country through its present crisis the labor leaders learn how to strike a balance between hard-boiled economics (or, in Hancock's phraseology, learn what economic disciplines are) and humanitarian paternalism, they may evolve a system which will appeal to the world as the logical compromise between Russian communism and American capitalism.

C. Hartley Grattan

A Record of Illusion

Eva. By Jacques Chardonne. Simon and Schuster. $2.

THE technical interest of this short novel lies in its use of indirection. The hero, Bernard, whose diary we are reading, loves his wife, Eva, with so complete a devotion that he is ignorant of her estrangement and unhappiness. To his limited and trusting intelligence their marriage is a true and fertile union; to her it has become a dry and barren pretense, the fulfilment only of her skepticism in love and her natural indifference to her husband. Bernard's happiness is an expression not only of his innocence and physical satisfaction, but of an untested literary idealism. His distress on gradually sensing Eva's tragedy, his recognition of disaster, his scorn of his wife's treachery, and his submission to the collapse of their household enter the reader's consciousness with the same sense of bewilderment that accompanied their entry into his. Bernard is the credulous domestic type who has already been treated by several of Chardonne's contemporaries—Du Gard, Duhamel, and Gide—but Chardonne has adapted from Flaubert the domestic atmosphere, the quiet, unreal world of literary and philosophical things that fills Bernard's mind, and the dispassionate sobriety which lends an unpretentious distinction to his narrative. The entire novel is told by the husband by means of a fragmentary diary which begins with husband and wife in mid-channel and ends on the eve of his wife's marriage to her lover. She has slowly become transformed from the object of his adoration into a "creature of lies and folly." In order to sustain this scheme of revealing a slowly unfolding consciousness an accurate sensibility is required. The novel must be poised safely between the author's omniscience and the diarist's ignorance of his predicament. The imaginary graph on which the course of the action is traced must carry two lines: one tracing the course of the husband's perceptions; the other, counterpoised and slowly converging, defining the actual course of events. On both scores Chardonne has handled his materials skilfully: his command of sensibility gives us a plausible Bernard; his control of mechanism keeps the two planes of fact, imagined and real, constantly present in the mind of the reader. The mechanism is a kind of counterpoint.

Structurally and conceptually this is a distinguished example of the secondary kind of current French fiction. It stands far below the works of Gide and Du Gard, but easily wins over the customary tours de force which carry off the Goncourt and similar prizes. Its defect is slightness. Except for Bernard the characters remain too nebulous, and even after their real natures assert themselves in his consciousness they fail to achieve their own life. The imagined fact outweighs the real, and a sketch of life rather than a three-dimensioned presentation results. But like Chardonne's earlier studies of marriage, "L'épithalame" and "Les Varais," the present book is consistently sure in its intuition. Poignancy is enhanced by brevity, and pathos by the contrast between realism and illusion. The obvious conventionality of the materials has been offset by oblique treatment and candor, and inevitably Chardonne's novel reveals its fundamental distinction.

Morton Dauwen Zabel

More Studies in Keats

Studies in Keats. By J. Middleton Murry. Oxford University Press. $2.75.

THESE studies in Keats are designed, as the author tells us, to fill gaps in his book "Keats and Shakespeare," and in them the same subjective method of criticism and analysis is employed as in the preceding volume. Here is criticism really at the opposite pole from I. A. Richards's type of analysis, yet certainly as valuable and perhaps much more so. Such criticism as Middleton Murry's is based on a very minute examination of the texts of the Keats poems and letters, and of the states of consciousness described in those documents; but it is something more: it is an identification, emotional and intellectual, of critic with poet, the most delicate possible adjustment to achieve. Just the slightest tipping of the scales one way and the critic reads his own emotional reactions into those of the poet; just the slightest the other and the contact is broken—reason has interposed coldly! Generally speaking, only poets have been able to write this particular type of criticism, but Mr. Murry has the necessary penetration and patience.

His results are very interesting. The most important chapters of his book are those analyzing the involved meaning of "Endymion," and those studying the state of mind necessary to the composition of such a poem as the "Ode on a Grecian Urn." The last lines of this ode have troubled critics and have seemed to them a blot on an otherwise perfect work of art. To explain them Mr. Murry must recreate for his readers the psychological state in which Keats's creative imagination functioned best. In doing so he clarifies the whole of Keats's writings—letters and poems both. He sums up the difficulty as follows:

> The direct and enigmatic proposition disturbs the poem because it does not belong to the same kind of utterance. The poem, as a whole, advances on strong and delicate waves of the pure sensuous imagination. It ends dissonantly with a stark enunciation which to that part of the human mind which is aroused by stark enunciation must be a baffling paradox.

How did Keats happen to close his poem with his statement: "Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty," and so on? Mr. Murry believes this to be no accidental effect, but rather an attempt to express vision, the essential matter of vision for which there are no words, although Keats declared it boldly in the form Beauty is Truth. Anyone who does not see Keats's vision is incapable therefore of understanding its "stark enunciation." Had Blake, for example, written the lines in some simple poem of vision, they would have afforded less difficulty of interpretation; but in the Ode, the mind must suddenly escape its superinduced sensuous quietude and leap to this statement of vision, or make nothing of the last lines. Usually the latter happens, and the lines seem wrong.

Mr. Murry's thesis that Keats, more than most poets, was prey to all experience, and aware, nevertheless, constantly of the need of equipoise, that state of consciousness in which "the fibers of the brain are relaxed; the conscious mind has yielded to that which is far older, far deeper, and far richer than itself," and that only in that peculiarly aware and yet drowsy state could he compose, seems explanation enough for much of what we see as struggle in the poet's life, for his integrity, not intellectual but imaginative, and for his certainty that no truth is true save that we love it.

One finishes these essays of Mr. Murry's with the feeling of having undergone an experience which has somehow illuminated the more obscure tracts of the creative imagination, of having dwelt briefly in the creative experience itself.

Eda Lou Walton

Notes on Fiction

Two Thieves. By Manuel Komroff. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

The author of "Coronet" tells a lengthy tale of the two thieves who hung finally from two of the three crosses on Calvary. And there is this much to be said for Mr. Komroff—he does not strain after Biblical effects or offer any fictive interpretation of the life of Jesus. In fact, Jesus does not appear in the novel at all. But for all these virtues of omission, the events leading up to the crucifixion of the two thieves are repetitious and only halfway exciting. The plan of the elder thief, once a wealthy merchant's son and now an Arab of considerable rank, for taking Jerusalem away from the Romans is obscure in the extreme, and involves principally a great dashing hither and yon among the cities of Palestine and a number of well-described fights. But on the whole the author's attempt to spin out a tale which has a coincidental end with a famous historical event is lame and the tale is scarcely expansible beyond the limits of a short story.

Midsummernight. By Carl Wilhelmson. With Woodcuts by Lynd Ward. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

"Midsummernight" deals with a locality rather similar to that of Knut Hamsun's "Growth of the Soil" and, more remotely, Thames Williamson's "The Earth Told Me," though it is not so good as either of these novels. For in Hamsun's and Williamson's books the locality is but a necessary frame inclosing the action, and the major attention is focused on the characters and the conflicts between them. In Carl Wilhelmson's novel the locality is the chief interest, whether the author wished it so or not, and the characters are endowed with no distinctive qualities. They are, however, not particularly obtrusive and their actions lead the reader pleasantly enough through the intricacies of primitive Finnish manners. The wedding, the funeral, a bathing contest, and other quaint customs make the novel readable, particularly since the author adopts a simple and straightforward manner in describing them and leaves aside the beautiful writing which renders other portions of the narrative tedious. "Midsummernight" is little more than another novel about far lands and strange people, but as such it is not without brightness.

Unweave a Rainbow. By Edgar Johnson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

This, Mr. Johnson's first novel, is very correctly entitled a "sentimental fantasy." The author's achievement is a perfect artificiality of plot, of scene, of character—that type of artificiality which is so well substantiated by selection of details that it is capable of arousing a very real emotion. The lady loved may be a mere dream—is, in fact, just this—but she is so perfect that she fulfils our insatiable desire for the sentimental; the scenes, moreover, are so elaborately laid out that they become real; the characters are so witty, so bookish, so urban, so modern that they seem more probable than most New Yorkers. It is always, then, by heightening and lingering over the exquisite and subtle and extremely precious in description, conversation, action, that Mr. Johnson arouses the reader to belief. Tactile, auditory, visual excitement are so constant with this author that he communicates them directly. It remains to be seen, of course, whether Mr. Johnson can go on being exquisite. If he simplifies himself, it will be almost beyond recognition, but perhaps he will always depend on artifice. One quality his sentimental fantasies lack which the great sentimental novels have had—a kind of masculine zest, not only for a fingering of the exquisite, but for every type of experience, palms down on the sharp gravel, and now and then a good, old-fashioned interest in vulgarity.

Architecture

The New School

It must be that the New School for Social Research was designed for the up-to-date woman. It is bold just where she is bold. The flat painted walls inside, with their simple and assured tones of red, blue, and yellow, are hers, in strong contrast to the interiors of buildings done for her husband, which are either plain tame or else vulgar-gaudy like the lobby of the Daily News. The whole picture, outside as well as in, is uncompromisingly "new school," where the man would have inclined to tone it down or fudge it up.

Consider, for a moment, how "modernism" entered the United States. It was certainly through the woman. First she bought smart new gowns from Poiret or Chanel, or at least the very best copies; then her couturiers over here began dressing their windows with cork and with bright new chromium furniture; eventually she herself risked a bar, and then a dining room, and finally a whole large building in the new mode.

"Function" is the name of this new Plain Richard at the court of fashion. It is a new manner of simplicity that has taken our up-to-date woman's fancy. And in certain parts of the building Mr. Urban, the architect, has done simplicity for her with quite unusual skill. The entrance, for example. A flat black marble wall outside, a flat gray painted wall inside. No "decoration" anywhere. Straight metal bars to protect the glass in the door, alike on both sides for the same utilitarian purpose, yet spaced so carefully as to become decorative in themselves, harmonizing with other lines in the building, and letting the thought flow through. Since nothing is extraneous, there is nothing to mislead, and a great advantage of such a foyer is that the arrangement is comprehensible at a glance, or, as architects say, it is easily "read."

Throughout the building the color in particular is handled with a similar directness. Instead of different colors for separate rooms, there are different colors for the separate walls in the same room; and four primary tones well keyed serve in this fashion for the entire building. Thus the interiors become less like a series of boxes than interweaving spaces bounded by variously colored planes; sometimes, too, separate areas of the same wall receive different colors to demark separate areas of use—the yellow end of the room will be the lounge, and with the blue begin the picture galleries.

Yet how simple, really, is the up-to-date woman? How natural was Marie Antoinette? Perhaps the processes of fitness that had shaped the entrance and the décor so well began to seem too slow. Or perhaps when she said "simple" what the lady really meant was "novel," and when she said "func-

YOUR JOB AND YOUR PAY
by Katherine H. Pollak and
Tom Tippett

First of the Brookwood Labor Series

A simple, informative exposition of economics for, and from the point of view of, the man who works for his living.

$2.00 VANGUARD All bookstores

VISITS · TO
SOVIET · RUSSIA

TRAVELING individually or in groups, the inquiring American is welcome in Soviet Russia. The Open Road, now in its fifth season, renders them a specialist's service based on a specialist's knowledge and facilities.

- In Moscow and Leningrad resident Open Road representatives facilitate access to key institutions and personages.
- Travelers who follow the Volga or visit the Crimea, the Caucasus Mountains and the Ukraine are provided with interpreters through whom contacts are made with moujiks, collective farm officials, industrial workers, red soldiers, officials of local Soviets, et cetera.

Booklets available on Russian or European Travel

The Open Road
11 West 42nd St., New York City

tional" she was thinking "European." At any rate, before the building was finished it had acquired some quite exotic features: among them a front like nothing so much as a free transcription of the Van Nelle tobacco factory at Rotterdam, and an auditorium inside that was advertised forthwith as the architect's "dream of a perfect oval."

How to incorporate these features, and still appear to be working straight from conditions, must have put a considerable tax on even a stage designer's ingenuity. That labor will never be appreciated by the ladies. What is stunning about the Van Nelle façade is an apparent trick with gravity. At each of seven stories it is slashed straight through by a continuous ribbon window, uninterrupted by a single column, in spite of which it manages to stand up: the secret is that the columns are really there, behind the wall. Now this is a device for flooding a large space with uninterrupted light. It originated in a place where that problem had to be met—in the American mill. If the floor and wall cannot be pushed at least eight feet beyond the last supporting column—well, then you are likely to get the result that can be seen on Twelfth Street. You come inside, and there, a scant two feet behind the wall, is the column, standing in the way and actually casting more shadow than it would have cast from an orthodox position within the wall itself. . . . There was nothing to be done but to paint it white. . . . Again, the inside space is not, as in the mill, a single room; and how are you to run a masonry partition wall up to a glass window? . . . It is done by inserting another little inside window between the column and the outer window frame, and in the process creating a little glass cupboard with a cute Victorian flavor. . . . And so it all has to go, all sixes and sevens. The outside windows pivot horizontally, yet inside there is a second set, in vertical frames this time, swinging into the room, and spoiling still more space. The climax of all this arrives in the large classrooms, where you find the lecturer placed directly in front of the window: at any time when the light can come through the curtains have to be drawn, so that on this floor the windows with all their fuss and façade would have been better out of the way entirely and their place taken by blank wall, artificial ventilation, and electric light. Lady, Lady! Did you ever tease an architect into a paradox more astonishing than that of a "functional" false front?

So, too, with the quaint auditorium. They will tell you when you enter that it makes for such marvelous acoustics. Well, in a hall accommodating no more than five hundred people tolerable acoustics ought to go with almost any shape. Any shape, that is, except an oval. Acoustically the oval per se is one of the worst conformations known. It is liable to dead spots, and it throws echoes right back at the speaker and the audience. Not the oval shape is what does the work in the New School auditorium—where the acoustics are actually very good—but the fact that the ceiling is a pierced plaster shell. It is a blanket, hung from the structural ceiling above it by means of iron straps; and its virtue is in the holes. Their duty is to break up all the sound they can, a duty which is the exact opposite of reflecting it. They would break it up with almost any shape of screen. They break it up even with an oval one. . . . Then after all the oval shape is all right? Of course it would be all right were the screen held separate for what it is, a screen, and not confused everywhere with the structure. How naturally this can be done you can observe in the auditoriums of numbers of popular theaters, including the Paramount, in which, although the decoration is garish to a degree, the architecture is consistent, clear, and unambiguous. I believe it has not one plaster shell but three, and yet not the most ignorant truck-driver patron would take them for anything else than what they are.

What difference does it make? Simply this: that archicture is a language, in which plan, structure, and form are s thought, sentence, and sound. If words are used for what ey do not mean, and syntax is all at odds, there can be no ery deep significance to the rhyme. In architecture the conitions are almost intolerably complex. All the more honor their master. The rarest achievement is that parable-like implicity which is true at every level of understanding. And certain passages in this building Mr. Urban, as I have said, as worked for just that, and has achieved a splendid fitness robably beyond the capacity of our typical architects such as orbett and Hood, who are opportunists at heart and players ith mere effect. Too bad that in so many essential points he purpose has been perverted, so that the New School can tand only as a gesture.

But I am talking into the wind. How could I have made uch a mistake? The ladies do not really care to study syntax nd philology. Look at the floor plans. Only one floor among even contains classrooms proper; among these, four out of ix have quite gratuitously impossible shapes. No, it is on the lubrooms that the main effort has been concentrated. In the brary, which in the ordinary school would be quietly segregated, here is a grand double stairway. The people go up and lown, up and down. It leads to the salon. They say, "Don't ou think it's pretty good, for America?"

DOUGLAS HASKELL

Music

Orchestras Without Conductors

THE economic depression, in depriving us of the Conductorless Orchestra, has removed the best possible antidote to the conductor-worship in which we are all too apt to indulge. At the same time, it has opened the door to those professional skeptics whose favorite topic is the complete uselessness of conductors. As long as we had the Conductorless it was not hard to see just what the functions of a conductor are. But now that all our orchestras are conducted again, we have been robbed of that criterion; especially since we do not tolerate mild and self-effacing conductors, but insist on much conducting or none. In a city visited annually by Coates, Gabrilowitsch, Kleiber, Koussevitzky, Molinari, Sokoloff, Stokowski, and Toscanini, it may not be amiss to recall how an orchestra recently got along without any of them, and thus to remind ourselves of just what it is that they contribute to orchestral performance.

What virtues did the Conductorless lack? What advantages did it offer over conducted orchestras, and at what price were they bought?

Its most persistent shortcomings were a lack of rhythmic precision and faults in tonal balance. These mechanical defects would seem inevitable in an orchestra of the size required to play modern works and in modern halls. The eighteenth-century orchestra, conducted from the harpsichord, was in our terms a chamber orchestra. The players were not prevented by the tonal volume, the size of the hall, or the distance that separated different sections of the orchestra from listening to one another. But how is the trumpeter, sitting far over at the right of a large stage, with three trombones and a whole percussion section, perhaps, playing just behind him, to hear the first violins ten or twelve yards away? In a conductorless orchestra, sitting on a stage designed to project both his and their tone out into a large hall, he is at a loss for indications of tempo and dynamics. He must guess at what is happening

VISIT
THE SOVIET UNION

SEE MAY DAY IN MOSCOW

Sailings, April 8—Mauretania
April 16—Europa

Tour includes 12 days in the U. S. S. R. for only $275.

Other cultural and sightseeing tours $385 and up.

WORLD TOURISTS, INC.

First American travel organization to conduct tours to the U. S. S. R.

175 Fifth Avenue Alg. 4-6657 New York

COVICI• FRIEDE

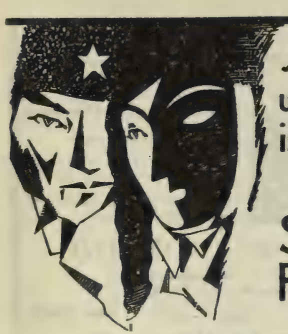
"Belongs to the honorable company of novels of pathology . . . it is powerful because it is frank, open and unashamed."
—Harry Hansen.

●

$2.50 At All Bookstores
COVICI • FRIEDE • PUBLISHERS

A JEW IN LOVE

BY BEN HECHT



for unforgettable impressions VISIT SOVIET RUSSIA

WORLD'S ENIGMA! THE FIVE YEAR PLAN!

Individually arranged tours or in small groups at as low as $255.—including return Steamship fare. Interesting itineraries. Frequent sailing dates.
Write for Booklet "N"

AMALGAMATED BANK TRAVEL DEPT.

11-15 Union Square, New York City
and 111 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

HOW LONG WOULD IT TAKE a line of 20,000 people to pass in and out of your shop? There are in and about New York, 20,000 readers of The Nation, all of whom have the means and taste, to purchase in your shop if you have something unusual and of value to offer.

Shopper's Corner

THE NATION - 20 Vesey Street, New York

SOCIAL ENGINEERING

To the trained social worker, social engineering is not a phrase, but a daily opportunity and inspiration. The social worker whose work is with the Jews of America must be trained to grapple successfully with the peculiar problems that spring from the distinctive character of the Jewish individual and community in relation to the American environment.

College graduates and those about to be graduated should look carefully into the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified candidates.

For full information write to
M J. Karpf, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)
71 W. 47th St., New York City

in the rest of the orchestra, and those who can hear him must adjust their playing to his. The tempo difficulty can be partially overcome by an agreement beforehand to preserve an even, metronomic pace. But the problem of balance in color and volume can never be completely solved, under these conditions, without a conductor.

The Conductorless, however, according to its apologists, turned these very difficulties into means of discipline: owing to them, it was said, greater self-effacement and concentration and more thorough musicianship were required of the musicians than in a conducted orchestra. Unfortunately the venture did not last long enough to prove this alleged advantage, for it would have been apparent only after several years' work. In its behalf the further claim was made that its interpretations, guided by a committee, were sure to be freer of the capricious and the affected than those of many conductors. But even an affected interpretation is likely to have some consistency in its affectation, whereas a committee interpretation is too apt to consist of a series of conflicting concessions.

It may be granted that the interpretations of the self-conducted orchestra were less objectionable than those of many popular conductors. At the same time, even making every allowance for the fact that it is easier to be enthusiastic in praise or dispraise of an individual than of an organization, it can hardly be claimed that they ever equaled those of the greatest. And unfortunately, to achieve results comparable to those effected by a conductor, a conductorless orchestra needs many times as much rehearsing. Its repertoire is thus necessarily very much restricted, particularly as regards modern and difficult works.

Entirely apart, then, from the exceptional understanding and power of re-creation that we ascribe to men like Toscanini (and these things cannot be demolished in a sentence) the conductor has a definite practical value. The notion frequently expressed that "they could get along just as well if he stayed home" is baseless. But the Conductorless was the best possible reminder of all this, and in a city where one orchestra has five conductors in a season, and another (the Roxy) recently had four on one program, there was room for that reminder.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Drama

Early Victorian Father

"THE BARRETTS OF WIMPOLE STREET," a new but already famous play by Rudolf Besier which Katherine Cornell has brought from London to the Empire Theater, shows every sign of being a success. Miss Cornell not only plays the principal part in it; she is the producer as well, and in that role she seems to have demanded, and got, a practically perfect performance. The piece is interesting and clear; its theme is familiar enough not to strain the capacity of any reasonably well-educated audience to understand it; and it is acted in the best taste throughout. What more could be asked?

Perhaps the way to answer that question is to say that most of the pleasure I derived from the spectacle was of a negative sort. It was very nice indeed not to have certain mistakes made by Mr. Besier; it was comfortable to sit there and have all of my expectations so gracefully, so precisely, so tactfully met. For instance, since I had been informed that the play, although it dealt with the courtship of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett, did not try to make these persons talk like poets, I expected to get a special pleasure out of hearing them talk like human beings. And they did. Mr. Besier had the almost unique inspiration to make his famous hero and heroine behave as if they did not know they were famous. He actually seemed to believe that the way to show an artist on the stage is to show him exactly like any other sort of creature. This was delightful. Miss Cornell as the ailing Elizabeth played with a restraint for which one felt like thanking her, line by line. Confined to her couch at first, then electrified into life by the breeze of Browning blowing through her door, and at last transformed by him into a woman with will enough to run away from her father—Miss Cornell in all of these phases was utterly right. She has never appeared to better advantage. One reason for this is undoubtedly the fact that she has at last a meritorious play in which to appear; another reason, perhaps, is that at last she is free from the necessity of giving up a lover—renouncing him, the phrase is—at the close. It had begun to look as if she were never going to be seen doing anything else, as if renunciation were to be her manner.

Such weakness as the present play has may be hinted at by saying that its central theme, which concerns not Elizabeth Barrett but her father, is precisely what one was prepared for. The elder Barrett is here, as apparently he was in life, one of those Victorian fathers which our latter-day literature has talked so much about. We were prepared for him by "The Way of All Flesh," to name only one of hundreds of books by hundreds of enlightened authors. A dash of psychology also is necessary to understand him; but we have that, of course. My point is that we possess in Mr. Besier's Mr. Barrett a perfect specimen of the monster in question; no less than that, and no more. The resolution of this widower not to permit any of his numerous children to marry is explained by showing that he is a hideously repressed person. Now that is probably a good explanation. But there is almost too much neatness in the exposition. We see Mr. Barrett performing the symptomatic rites somewhat too regularly, somewhat too patently after the pattern. The entrances of Charles Waldron, who plays the part, are magnificent; but they are the entrances of a tall, pale, powerful, and evil man into a pitiless laboratory where he will take certain tests and prove himself such and such a kind of case. The whole thing is elaborately and intelligently done. But one is permitted to wonder if it is true—not of the actual Edward Barrett, for that would scarcely matter, but of this man. He is almost too good to be true.

I must put in a word for "Rock Me, Julie" (Royale Theater), a play by Kenneth Raisbeck which lasted only one week but which I liked very much. So far as I know I represent a minority of one in thinking that Mr. Raisbeck succeeded here at a difficult and complicated task. He took an Illinois family most of whose members were failures of one kind or another; he brought them together at a reunion; and he anatomized each one of them not only in himself but in his relation to the rest. He was charged by the reviewers with imitating Chekhov. I would say first that Chekhov is a good man to imitate, and second that Mr. Raisbeck has assimilated him rather than imitated him. "Rock Me, Julie" is perfectly native in all its materials and in every accent of its method; and it is in many places profoundly true and moving. Mr. Raisbeck was also charged with being incomprehensible. The charge itself is to me incomprehensible. These people felt things which were difficult to express. They expressed them, however; and expressed the difficulty. The only confusion there was in the piece resulted from the fact that Mr. Raisbeck had too much to say. His play was too rich. But that is a fine fault, and I imagine we can look forward to excellent work by him in the future. Helen Menken and Paul Muni in the leading roles were highly forceful and convincing.

MARK VAN DOREN

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

†Anatol—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
*As You Desire Me—Maxine Elliott's—39 St. E. of B'way.
*Dr. X.—Hudson—44 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. E. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
*Green Grow the Lilacs—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
*On the Spot—Forrest—W. 49 St.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Petticoat Influence—Lyceum—45 St. E. of B'way.
†Private Lives—Times Square—W. 42 St.
*The Barretts of Wimpole St.—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
†The Man in Possession—Booth—45 St. W. of B'way.
*The Man with the Portfolio—Yiddish Art—2 Ave. and 2 St.
‡The New Yorkers—Broadway—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—Miller—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Topaze—(French)—49 St.—W. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Cimarron—Globe—B'way and 46 St.
City Lights—Geo. M. Cohan—B'way and 43 St.
La Nuit Est a Nous—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
"Pagliacci"—The Park Central—59 St. and 7 Ave.
Shepper Newfounder, beginning Sat. Feb., 21; Whoopee, beginning Mon., Feb. 23; Passion Flower, beginning Wed., Feb. 25;—The Plaza—58 St. E. of Madison Ave.
Comrades of 1918—Cameo—42 St. and B'way.

MUSIC

John McCormack, tenor—Carnegie Hall—Sun. eve., Feb. 22.
Philadelphia Orchestra—Carnegie Hall—Tues. eve., Feb. 24.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie Hall—Thurs. eve., Feb., 19; Fri. aft., Feb. 20; Sat. eve., Feb. 21; Thurs. eve., Feb. 26; Fri. aft., Feb. 27; Sat. eve., Feb. 28.
Robert Goldsand, pianist—Carnegie Hall—Sun. aft., Feb. 22.
Guy Maier & Lee Pattison, 2 piano (farewell recital)—Town Hall—Sat. aft., Feb. 21.
Sergei Radamsky, tenor—New School Auditorium—Tues. eve., Feb. 24.
Nathan Milstein, violinist—Carnegie Hall—Fri. eve., Feb. 27.
Elshuco Trio—Engineering Societies Hall—Tues. eve., Mar. 3. Bridge Quintet, d'Indy Sextet
Lily Pons—Town Hall—Wed. eve., Mar. 4.

LECTURES

"The Truth about Woman" by Irma Kraft; "The Truth about Man" by Dr. Heinrich Wolf, Auditorium, 150 W. 85 St.—Tues. eve., Feb. 24.
"The Actor: The Theatre: and Censorship" by Basil Rathbone—Auditorium, 150 W. 85 St.—Sun. aft., Feb. 22.

SERGEI
RADAMSKY — TENOR — IN A
Tuesday, Feb. 24, 8:30 P. M.
RECITAL OF SONGS OF
SOVIET RUSSIA
Admission $1.50
The NEW SCHOOL AUDITORIUM
66 West 12th Street - New York

Civil Government for Samoa

By MARGARET MEAD

WHEN Senator Hiram Bingham was appointed to head the American Samoan Commission, the Samoans, whom a series of lucky accidents have so far preserved from extinction, were again fortunate. For Senator Bingham, himself a student of the anthropology of the Inca civilization, was alive to the importance of preserving the cultural identity of the Samoans. The bill which was framed as a result of the commission's report has skilfully met the various criticisms and objections to the past status of American Samoa, and at the same time has kept the gains of thirty years of singularly intelligent administration as embodied in the "Codification of the Regulations and Orders for the Governor of American Samoa," prepared for the information of the commission.

During the past decade there has been a discontinuous, not very voluble, but persistent series of protests in the liberal press against conditions in Samoa. Examination of these protests shows that they fall under two main heads—formal objections by sticklers for correct form in international and internal relations, and individual protests from half-castes and their friends and sympathizers. The first set of objectors inveighed against the anomalous position of American Samoa, an American possession by treaty and implication but not by any formal act of the Senate; less importantly they objected to the arbitrary power of the naval governor, declaring that the existence of such autocratic government was un-American. The second group of grievances were motivated by the virtual expatriation of the small group of half-castes, who under the existing regime, which was overzealous to preserve Samoa for the Samoans, were permitted no political and but a slight economic role in the island of their birth. (According to the census of 1920, there was a Samoan population of 8,050 and a total half-caste population of 480.) Both sets of critics, possessed of the reformer's usual belief in sweeping measures and the tendency of the man with a grievance to pin his troubles upon a tangible opponent, accused the naval government and demanded a civil government instead.

Meanwhile, students of Pacific problems realized certain relevant facts: In Tahiti and the Marquesas the Polynesian race was dying out; in Hawaii it was vanishing by race mixture; in New Zealand the remnants of the Maoris were being completely absorbed culturally. In American Samoa, under the arbitrary rule of a series of naval governors without financial axes to grind, the population had increased, in 1927, 52.8 per cent. Tuberculosis, that special enemy of the Polynesian, had made small inroads into the health of the natives. Their indigenous diseases, yaws and a serious eye trouble, "Samoan conjunctivitis," had been brought under control. Infant mortality had been tremendously reduced. Because of the wise provisions against immigration of any sort and the prohibition of all alienation of land, the Samoans were still prosperous, economically self-sufficient, well nourished. Even the great increase in population had wrought no hardship, as it would certainly have done, for instance, had large areas of land been alienated for foreign-owned copra plantations. The Samoans had not been debauched by drink, nor had prostitution fastened itself upon the interracial situation. British mission and American government had cooperated sufficiently peaceably so that the mission teaching of reading and writing in the Samoan language had resulted in a high standard of literacy. The Samoans had changed their ancient ways of life very little. They still built their cool, perfectly adapted houses of native materials; they retained their native costume, only substituting cloth for the less serviceable and laboriously made bark cloth. Above all, the spirit of the people—their pride, their sense of cultural identity—had not been broken. The navy government had accorded a wise and discriminating recognition to the Samoan ideas of rank and precedence.

A careful comparison of the changes which the new act has made in the old body of laws, which had been empirically come by, shows that the commission dealt with the two groups of critics and yet preserved the regulations necessary to the continuance of Samoa's present peaceful prosperity. The advocates of greater constitutionality with regard both to Samoa's status and to Samoan administration have won the following points: recognition of our annexation of Samoa by the Senate; territorial status for Samoa; an appointive governor who may be a civilian or a member of the army or navy—thus formally taking the absolute control out of naval hands; a lengthening of the governor's term so that it may be indefinitely extended at the pleasure of the President—this is an attempt to deal with too-rapid shifts in policy and the criticism that no governor remained long enough to understand the people; regularization of court procedure, including an extension of the functions of the appointed chief judge and the creation of the office of attorney general, a federal appointment; arrangement for appeals to the District Court of the United States for the District of Hawaii and the provision that cases so appealed shall be heard in Samoa; the removal of all the explicit arbitrary and legislative powers of the governor and the increase of the powers of the native assembly. The half-caste minority were primarily interested in two points: better economic and political status in American Samoa and a more explicit definition of their status in the United States. Both of these have been covered. They may now become citizens, or claim citizenship through past residence in American Samoa; they may own land, and they may participate in local politics. The term "native" has been stricken from the codification of laws and the term "person of Polynesian blood" substituted, and all American Samoans have been made citizens of the United States, a matter chiefly of interest at present to the half-caste group.

Meanwhile, the regulations which have been responsible for the continued well-being of the Samoan people do not lie in such formal civic matters as these. Instead, they are the provisions against the alienation of land; the limitation of terms of leasehold—wisely shortened by the commission from

□ RESORTS □

Washington Birthday Weekend

February 21st to 23rd. Three Gala Days of wholesome fun, in youthful company. Skating, sledding and other winter sports. No advance in rates.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

Furnace Dock Rd., Peekskill, N. Y.
Phone Peekskill 1403

ZINDOREST PARK

Monroe, N. Y. Phone: 122 F 3

A most gorgeous mansion situated [redacted] beautiful 150 acres estate, surrounded by brooks, ponds, lake and forests. The ideal place for a good rest or short week-end. Jewish Cuisine. All outdoor sports [redacted] premises. 1½ hours [redacted] Erie R. R. or Route 17. Greyhound Busses (Capitol Bus Station) stop at ZINDOREST.

OPEN ALL YEAR

Re~~~~ST / CUPERATION / CREATION

RECUPERATION / REST / RECREATION

at THE CRYSTAL VILLA

Woodcliff Lake, N. J.
23 miles from N. Y. - Fare 90c.

Combines country pleasures with city conveniences. Ideal for convalescents. Cater to diets. Ice skating, bracing walks, wholesome Jewish-American table. Refinement. Congeniality. Write or phone, Park Ridge 404.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR HYATT MORSE offer English hospitality at their 100-acre farm "EREWHON" in Orange County. $5 daily; $30 weekly. Will meet trains (Erie) or buses (Greyhound). Monroe, N. Y. Telephone 13 F 3.

□ OPEN SHELF □

Henry George's Books

Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men —sent free.

None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

ATHEISM

Book catalog FREE. Tracts, 10c.
Am. Assn. for Adv. of Atheism.
307 E. 14th St., New York, N. Y.

CURIOUS BOOKS

Privately printed limited editions. Unexpurgated translations. Esoterica.
Send for Catalogue

The Falstaff Press
Dept.N., [redacted] Fifth Ave.,NewYork

THAT BOOK YOU WANT! We hold 2,000,000 of the best books—new, secondhand, out-of-print, rare — all subjects. Also Sets of Authors. Catalogues free (30 issues). Outline requirements and interests. Books sent on approval. FOYLES, Charing Cross Road, London, Eng.

□ RESORTS □

THE LAKE VIEW

Rebecca Silver
Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine
Moderate Rates
59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

SONAQUA CLUB

Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

SPORTS	Special Feature
Skating, Hiking,	Program Washington
Skiing, Tobagganing.	Birthday Weekend

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

FOR delightful winter outings, TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and supply expert instruction. Address: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone: Ridgefield 648.

GARDNER FARM

Ancramdale, N. Y. Columbia County

Modern home of graduate nurse; at the foothills of the Berkshires; ideal for convalescents. N. Y. City phone: Berkshire 7-0437.

For relaxation, beautiful country. Pleasant companionship and wholesome food. Winter sports.

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE

Lake Mahopac, New York
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 353

NATURE PATH

Watchung Mountains. Vegetarian. Modern.
Holidays — special $3 a day
Mount Bethel Road, Plainfield, N. J.
Phone: Plainfifield 6-1474 J-1

POSITIONS WANTED

DARTMOUTH student, graduate of well-known New England preparatory school, desires position as companion or tutor to one or two young boys, for July and August. Has traveled extensively and independently in Europe, rides, swims, plays tennis. Best references. Reply to William M. Sheffeld, Room 207, Fayerweather Hall, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H.

AUTHOR, widely experienced in magazine, newspaper, advertising and dramatic writing; international traveler; cultured, cosmopolitan interests; stable character; seeks position, preferably in country near New York, allowing time and opportunity for literary work. Best references. Box 283, c/o The Nation.

EXPERT stenographer, typist, dictating machine transcriber, college graduate, desires work at home or outside; available Saturdays and after 4:00 weekdays. Bensonhurst 6-0539 or Box 284, c/o The Nation.

MAN, 53, graduate of Universities of Paris and Budapest, versed in German, Hungary, French, Spanish, Italian; translator, teacher of literature and languages in European and American schools, seeks any kind of work. Limited by deafness. Box 285, c/o The Nation.

WELL known Little Theatre director (woman) available for summer camp proposition in dramatics, either adult or girls camp. Write Box 286, c/o The Nation.

STORY CRITICISM

SHORT STORY Teacher-Critic will undertake constructive criticism of your written work on a basis of percentage of your sales. For further information and references address Lock Box 116, Substation O, N. Y. C.

□ EDUCATIONAL □

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

At COOPER UNION
8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock
Admission Free

Friday, Feb. 20
DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN
"The Humanization of Education."

Sunday, Feb. 22
PROFESSOR STRINGFELLOW BARR
"Mazzini and the Democratic Dogma."

Tuesday, Feb. 24
PROFESSOR KARL N. LLEWELLYN
"What is Society?"

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd Street, at 8:30 o'clock

Monday, Feb. 23
DR. E. BOYD BARRETT
Modern Thinkers and Religion.
"Inge, Fosdick, Knox."

Wednesday, Feb. 25
MR. CLIFTON P. FADIMAN
Shifts in the American Novel.
"On and Off Main Street: Lewis, Cabell."

Thursday, Feb. 26
PROFESSOR E. G. SPAULDING
Problems in Systematic Philosophy.
What is "nothing"? Can "something" come out of nothing?

Saturday, Feb. 28
DR. V. J. McGILL
Contemporary Philosophers and Their Doctrines.
"G. E. Moore."

THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB

2 West 64th St.
A HOUR OF MUSIC
Sunday Afternoon, Feb. 22nd, at 4:30
Ethyl Oughton-Clarke, Coloratura Soprano
Assisted by Andrades Lindsay

Note:—Monday, Feb. 23, Theatre Party, Martin Beck Theatre, "Elizabeth The Queen,"

Tickets, $1.50. Remit before Friday, Feb. 20.
Admission 50c. Tea Served

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN

GERMAN. Private lessons 75c. (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th years. Also neglected English education.

UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Victor records used. M. Jerlitzyn. 3 W. 122nd St. Tel. Harlem 7 - 5368.

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN RUSSIAN

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons. 75c short courses, 9 to 9 daily. 22nd year.

FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th St.

FREE language course to anyone who [redacted] a pupil for old established language school. Write W., 1517 3rd Ave., New York.

The Time To Find THAT SUMMER HOME IS

Get Results in The Nation's Real Estate columns. For rates call Fitz Roy 8-9074

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York

forty years to twenty years; the power given to the governor to prevent undesirable characters, whether citizens of the United States or not, from landing or remaining in Samoa; the prohibition against the extension of credit in excess of $25 to Samoans not engaged in licensed business pursuits; the preservation of the aboriginal form of family administration in which land is held in common by a kinship group and administered for them by a headman (matai) who is responsible for all those under his care; and, finally, the preservation of a form of local government under which the governor appoints as district chiefs hereditary chiefs of the Samoans, so that American administration and time-honored ideas of rank are combined without friction.

Every year in the United States thousands of dollars are spent upon museum collections of memorials of the vanished cultures of primitive peoples. We house within glass cases the weapons of people who will never fight again, the ornaments of savages who have given up their native handicrafts for the products of the Woolworth stores. The culture of the Samoans in its outward and visible forms fills very few glass cases. They have developed but a meager art, emphasizing in all their material ways of life economy, adaptation, simplicity. Were Samoan culture destroyed, the material records of Samoan achievements would give no hint of the vanished civilization. For the Samoan contribution to the world gallery of human experiment is primarily a point of view, an attitude of mind, a grace of living, impossible to impale upon the iron pin of the collector, almost impossible to preserve in films and records. Yet it is an attitude of mind so flexible, so essentially adaptable that it has survived the introduction of Christianity and a century of white contact. Given a minimum of interference, left to their firm economic base and their own pattern of social relations, there is every reason to believe that this unique spirit of living—the most important achievement of that vanishing race, the Polynesians—may be preserved in Samoa, a vivid monument to the variety of cultural solutions of which the human race is capable.

Contributors to This Issue

Paul Y. Anderson is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Garland O. Ethel was formerly a member of the department of English at the University of Washington.

Constance Auer is a former librarian of long and varied experience.

Irwin Edman is assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University.

C. Hartley Grattan lived for some time in Australia and is the author of "Australian Literature."

Morton Dauwen Zabel is professor of English literature in Loyola University and one of the editors of Poetry: A Magazine of Verse.

Eda Lou Walton is assistant professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

Douglas Haskell has contributed articles on architecture to the Studio, Creative Art, the New Republic, and other publications.

Arthur Mendel studied music at Harvard University and has written on music for various periodicals.

Margaret Mead is the author of "Coming of Age in Samoa" and "Growing Up in New Guinea."

SUMMER CONFERENCE CENTER

SUMMER CONFERENCE CENTER

At non-profit rates, Putnam County center available for small conferences and seminars. Details and reservations, apply J. Count, 285 Madison Avenue, New York.

OFFICE ACCOMMODATIONS

WOULD it not be to your advantage to have a permanent business address? We will receive your mail, manuscripts and telephone calls for $1.50 monthly. Kuhn, Room 610, 7 E. 42nd Street.

HOME FOR CHILD

WILL board child, 8-10-12, intellectual Jewish family. Real mother's care and home life offered. Tel. Far Rockaway 7-8842.

The office of THE NATION will be closed Monday, February 23rd. Get your classified ad to us by Friday, in order to catch the issue appearing February 26th (dated March 4).

☐ RENTALS ☐

APARTMENTS

APARTMENT Riverdale, overlooking beautiful scenery, near buses and stations. One large bed-sitting room, one bedroom. Suit two professional people. Share kitchen and bath. $65 monthly. Kingsbridge 6-7701.

HARVARD Graduate would rent for studio use several days a week, or share with congenial man, very charming pent house studio apartment. E. 53rd St. Open fireplace, grand piano, etc. Box 286, or Phone evenings 6-7, Plaza 3-6679.

ATTIC, unfurnished, 3 rooms and foyer, including kitchen. 69 West 10th St. Inquire in basement. Reasonable rent.

REAL ESTATE

IN ADIRONDACKS, 5-room real Log Cabin, modern, 18 ft. x 24 ft. living room, field-stone fireplace. Price $2,100. Cash $500. 6 years on balance. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. Commodious 8-room cottage completely furnished, electric light, running water, 3 acres woodland, shore. Will rent for season. James T. Kemp, Orange, Conn.

ROOMS

ATTENTION—Mrs. Walters, Russian refined woman, can offer you the comforts of a real home in her modern apartment. Home cooking. Single or double rooms. $7 or $11. Good location. 230 W. 107th St. Clarkson 2-0822.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

If you would be sure of carefully selected
GENUINE NAVAJO RUGS
buy them direct from the
U. S. LICENSED INDIAN TRADER
and Save Middleman's price
New York outlet for goods bought direct from the Indians at our licensed posts on Navajo Reservation of Arizona. Eighteen tribes represented in baskets, pottery, jewelry and bead work.
The Native American
510 Madison Avenue - New York

The Press Today
by
Oswald Garrison Villard
A limited supply of this eye-widening little book about our newspapers is available at
75c. a Copy

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, 1931 No. 3426

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 229
EDITORIALS:
- More Taxes, Not More Debt 232
- America's Follies 233
- Farm Board Failure 233
- Generalities 234

YOUNG BOB LA FOLLETTE. By Mauritz A. Hallgren 235
UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF IN GERMANY. By Otto Brok 237
TRUE STORIES DE LUXE. By Milton St. John 239
HER PAIN. By Louise Townsend Nicholl 240
A DIRT FARMER WONDERS. By Glenn W. Birkett 241
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 242
CORRESPONDENCE 243
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 244
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
- Hunt. By Kay Boyle 245
- Edmund Wilson. By Henry Hazlitt 245
- Find Lincoln. By William MacDonald 246
- The Russian Experiment. By Abram L. Harris 247
- Lord Nelson. By Henry Bamford Parkes 248
- A Jazz Rhapsody. By David Ewen 248
- Books in Brief 249
- Films: Charlie Chaplin Falters. By Alexander Bakshy 250
- Drama: True to Tripe. By Mark Van Doren 251

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- "Free" Slaves in West Africa. By Genevieve W. Mason 254

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

* Absent in Europe.

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

CONGRESS MOVES ON toward adjournment with every prospect that the Administration will get its heart's desire of avoiding an extra session. As we write, the bonus-loan bill, passed by enormous majorities in both houses, only awaits a veto to be promptly repassed by more than the required two-thirds vote. Nobody knows within some hundreds of millions what its immediate cost will be, because nobody knows what proportion of the veterans will apply for the enlarged loans made possible by the measure. It is to be financed, apparently, up to the amount of $735,000,000, if necessary, by the sale of government securities now held by the Veterans Bureau. This new bonus legislation is indefensible. The government ought to give the most generous care to every veteran who suffered disabilities as the result of war service. But to give all veterans special privileges just because they were in the army is a vicious principle, and we wish that public men had the courage to face the issue squarely. This bill simply carries that wrong principle a little farther, and we believe that the President will do right in vetoing it, though we scarcely expect him to put forward the right reason for his veto. We do believe that if he had earlier offered any kind of leadership in unemployment relief, he might have done much to forestall this unwise measure, pushed through under guise of such relief.

THE PASSAGE BY BOTH HOUSES of the compromise Muscle Shoals bill is generally regarded as another substantial victory for Senator Norris in his tireless fight for public power systems. Plainly it was so considered by those Administration supporters who characterized the bill as "socialistic legislation, tending to sovietize the government and communize the people." For ourselves, we had not thought it quite so bad as that. While the bill provides for the lease of the nitrate plant to private industry, the conditions are such as to render it unlikely, in the opinion of many observers, that a lessee can be found within a year, in which case the government itself is to operate. The real issue, of course, is power, and the bill opens the way to public transmission as well as generation—the principle for which Senator Norris has contended. If the President decides to kill the measure, as is expected, we hope that he will not resort to a pocket veto, but will state clearly the reasons for his disapproval. His stand on public operation is well known, and for the sake of clear economic and political thinking we should like to see the issue clearly drawn in this test case if the country is for a further period to be deprived of the benefits of its great investment at Muscle Shoals.

SECRETARY DOAK'S PROPOSAL of an Administration substitute for the Wagner employment-exchanges bill came so late in the Congressional session that its only immediate result seemed likely to be the prevention of any action at all on this important question. Senator Wagner's bill, it will be remembered, contemplates federal aid to State employment exchanges, with the idea of building up a national system by this means. The Doak proposal, on the other hand, was for an enlargement of the existing employment service of the Department of Labor, with such cooperation as the Secretary of Labor may deem advisable with existing State agencies. We have repeatedly expressed the conviction that an effective system of employment exchanges must operate on a national scale; all available information indicates that the Wagner bill offers more promise than the Doak measure of bringing such a system into existence. Senator Wagner's bill has the support of nearly all competent students of the question, and in essentially its present form has been before the country for no less than three years. For two years it has been open to the present Administration to propose a substitute, yet instead of coming forward with any plan of its own, it sat silent until the Wagner bill had passed the Senate, had been favorably reported by the House Judiciary Committee, had been placed on the calendar, and was scheduled for action by the House. The overwhelming rejection of the Doak substitute and the passage of the Wagner bill without a roll call was a well-deserved defeat for the Administration.

TWO IMPORTANT MEASURES affecting the railroads were brought before Congress on February 21. Chairman Parker, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, introduced a resolution for an amendment to bring railroad holding companies under control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senate Interstate Commerce Committee reported favorably a joint resolution for an investigation of the competition of other forms of transportation with the railroads. The Parker resolution is the outcome of an extensive investigation of railroad ownership just completed under the direction of Dr. Walter W. M. Splawn. It indicates that thirty-two railroads, with 47,000 miles operated, are held in large part by one or two interests, while sixty-two roads, operating 146,000 miles, show no marked concentration of ownership. Fifteen major groups control 210,000 miles, or about 85 per cent of the entire railway mileage. Family and individual holdings are much smaller than had been supposed, but those expert real-estate railroad men the Van Sweringens control 28,411 miles. Two hundred nineteen individuals hold 2,298 directorships, not including those of subsidiary companies, Charles Hayden heading the list with no less than sixty-four positions. The necessity of commission control of holding companies, if regulation is to be effective, is perfectly clear; scarcely less clear is the cumbersome ineffectiveness of our method of trying to build up an economical transportation system by regulation of private profit-seeking financial groups.

FIVE STATES have joined with the Appalachian Electric Power Company in the latter's fight to prevent the Federal Power Commission from exercising jurisdiction over the power plant the company contemplates building on the New River near Radford, Virginia. It is contended that the New River is non-navigable and therefore subject to State, and not to federal, authority; but should the federal government decide that it has this authority, then the States and the company want the government's powers limited to the issuing of a restricted or "minor-part" license for the sole purpose of protecting navigation on the Kanawha River, of which the New River is a non-navigable branch. Why these five States—Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Arkansas—have lined up with the power trust instead of on the side of the electric-power consumers is a question that need not be discussed here. Whatever be the talk of State's rights in this discussion, the battle centers about the power trust's efforts to avoid regulation of any kind, and in supporting the power combination in this fight the State governments are all too obviously betraying their constituents into the hands of the trust.

VIOLATIONS OF CIVIL LIBERTY, according to a report of the American Civil Liberties Union, were more numerous in 1930 than in any other year since 1921, owing largely to unemployment and consequent fear of trouble from radicals. Such violations are likely to be excused when committed in what is supposed to be a good cause. The ordinary citizen was little concerned at the overriding of the rights of conscientious objectors and hyphenates in war time, or of suspected aliens and Communists in the post-war years. We denounced those violations then, and we denounce no less heartily the dangerous violations that are occurring today in other fields. We give two recent instances in New York. In the celebrated Bank of United States failure, investigators have been allowed to commandeer the letters, records, checks, and other papers of individuals, banks, and business concerns connected with the failure, on the mere chance of discovering something incriminating. On January 18 the special counsel in the Appellate Division's inquiry into the magistrates' courts was reported as having sent subpoenas to 600 banks requiring them to submit the accounts of some fifty-seven policemen suspected of graft, together with all deposit or withdrawal slips, checks cashed, drafts, signature cards, contracts for safe-deposit boxes, and records of visits to such boxes. Similar subpoenas were to be sent to all brokerage houses in the Stock Exchange. We have no desire to shelter criminals, but we should like to see a legal test of the validity of action of this kind.

THE MACDONALD GOVERNMENT continues to swing back and forth between victories and reverses, escaping defeats serious enough to turn it out of office and winning victories that give no clear assurance that it can long go on. It has lost its education bill in the House of Lords, and while the defeat does not necessarily mean that the bill will have to be abandoned, it is nevertheless quite likely to be quietly dropped. On the same day that the Lords threw out the measure, the bill to increase by about $100,000,000 the borrowing power of the unemployment-insurance fund was advanced to second reading in the Commons by a substantial majority of sixty-one, notwithstanding that only three days before a Conservative amendment reducing to $50,000,000 the proposed increase had been defeated by no more than thirty-one votes. The trade-disputes bill and the electoral-reform bill, the latter of special interest to the Liberals, are contentious measures and their progress in the Commons is slow. Of the four items of the Labor program just mentioned, then, the unemployment-insurance-fund bill is the only one with which the Government has been able to have its way, and the privilege of adding another $100,000,000 to the $300,000,000 already voted (and nearly spent) for unemployment relief is hardly a thing to be cheerful about.

AMERICANS WHO THINK that the dole is ruining England would do well to listen to Philip Snowden. The doughty Chancellor of the Exchequer more than once has made a sensation by looking disagreeable facts in the face and telling his countrymen just what he saw. Yet so far from holding the system of unemployment relief responsible for Great Britain's present troubles, he declares: "I say with full conviction that our social services in the last two years have been the salvation of our country." Chiefly because of these social services, Mr. Snowden asserts, Britain is standing the strain of the present crisis better than the United States, Germany, or any other industrial country. To our shame he cites the United States as an example of suffering comparable to that existing in England when the unemployed had no recourse "apart from the tender mercies of a heartless poor-law relief." Philip Snowden deals in facts, not words. We can well afford to see how our situation looks to him.

FRENCH OFFICIALDOM, it now appears, has as little regard for accuracy in its publication of unemployment figures as some members of Mr. Hoover's Administration have shown. We were for many months led to believe that there was little or no unemployment in France. In its issue of February 4 The Nation stated that the number of unemployed workers in that country had "increased in the last three months of the year (1930) from 988 to 11,952, a gain of 1,000 per cent." These figures were based upon an official government report on the economic situation in France. In truth, however, at the very time this report was issued the number of unemployed totaled 350,000, with an additional 1,000,000 persons only partly employed, according to M. Piquenard, French delegate to the Conference on Unemployment, which met under the auspices of the League of Nations in Geneva late in January. In a formal statement he declared that the official figures were based only upon the number of workers applying for relief, but that as a matter of fact there were 250,000 persons more or less permanently unemployed, while 100,000 others were out of jobs as a result of the growing depression. The London Times comments that his "statement was wholly ignored by the Paris press, and was not generally reported to the foreign press." It must have gained some currency, however; for on February 12 Minister of Labor Landry revised the official figures sharply upward, reporting that on that day there were 90,000 persons wholly unemployed and 200,000 more only partly employed.

THE POLITICAL MANEUVERS of the last few weeks have all too plainly revealed that absolutism in Spain is a lost cause. Alfonso may still preserve the glory of the monarchy if he can come to terms with the moderate constitutional monarchists, who would strip him of his authority but retain him as king. However, by throwing in his lot with the absolutists and militarists, whose number is daily dwindling, and by making one of them, Juan Bautista Aznar, his new prime minister, he has made a last desperate play to keep both the power and the glory of the throne. Should he lose, he doubtless would lose both. The absolutists alone cannot keep Alfonso securely on his throne; they must be supported by the army, which up to this time has remained fairly faithful. On the other hand, the large majority of the political leaders, from the constitutionalists of Sanchez Guerra's stripe to the Socialists, Syndicalists, and Communists of the left, are opposed to absolutism, and these leaders are working day and night to overthrow Alfonso. The moderates who wish to retain a nominal monarchy appear to have the bulk of public opinion with them, and this gives them a weapon of considerable strength; the frankly republican left, representing the working classes, has what might prove to be a more effective weapon in its plans for a general strike. The monarchy could not for long withstand a determined assault from these two groups, and it may be doubted whether the army would hold firm against such an offensive.

GENERAL JUAN VICENTE GOMEZ, dictator of Venezuela, is building a "modern Babylon" at Maracay, according to a special correspondent for the New York Times who has visited this hitherto unreported wonder city. Gomez hopes by means of this development, the correspondent writes, "to attract visitors from all the Americas to see the fruit of his labors in the cause of progress and reconciliation." Sixty millions of dollars are being spent on public works; a chain of big hotels at key points has been planned; a vast port is being constructed at Furiamo. The writer tells further of "tinkling fountains," of "tables laid with flowers and silver," of "a Lucullan dinner with rare wines," and of "acres of empty public gardens ablaze with lights." Work is "proceeding night and day," he continues, "and when it is ready there will be docks and piers large enough to accommodate the world's biggest liners, boulevards lined with glittering department stores designed according to the latest Paris and New York ideas and filled with goods from the East and West." The other side of this amazing picture is described in a letter from Roger Baldwin which appears elsewhere in this issue of The Nation. The letter tells of cruelty and tyranny in Venezuela which are perhaps unparalleled in modern history.

ON A SMALLER SCALE than that of the Gomez dictatorship in Venezuela, but nevertheless equally vicious and despotic, the Trujillo dictatorship in Santo Domingo has been riding roughshod over the Dominican people. The excesses of President Trujillo's rule have been revealed in an able series of articles written for the Baltimore Sun by Drew Pearson, one of the foremost Washington correspondents. At least eleven of the opposition leaders have been assassinated, according to Mr. Pearson, and many others have been imprisoned or forced into exile. News of the Trujillo tyranny has been suppressed, and when an Associated Press reporter was sent to the Dominican Republic to report the recent presidential election he was, Mr. Pearson said, "brought before the court of the first instance in Santo Domingo City and an attempt was made to intimidate him." Trujillo has closed "270 primary schools, using the money thereby saved to increase the size of his army." He has removed members of Congress at will, and he has devoted foreign loans to military purposes. Doubtless aware of this situation, Secretary Stimson thus far has refused to approve a projected $5,000,000 loan to Trujillo. However, because of Washington's special relationship with Santo Domingo, which is virtually an American protectorate, this country's responsibility extends far beyond mere supervision of loans. Armed intervention is not necessary; a sharp and sincere protest from the State Department at Washington should suffice.

THE COWS OF NEW ENGLAND had better look to their butter fat. It is reported that Calvin Coolidge, no less, sometime President of the United States, now better known as a columnist of parts, may be asked by the milk producers of New England to be czar of the dairy industry in that section. Mr. Coolidge, the report goes on to say, would be offered a five-year contract carrying a salary of—$1,000,000! His job would be to stabilize the industry by forming a cooperative-marketing system which would "take in the farmers as well as the sellers" and stop cutthroat competition. Mr. Coolidge, when he was asked if he would accept such an offer, said with his usual restraint that he could make no reply until the offer was put before him by those concerned. As always, we wish Mr. Coolidge the best of luck. But we have certain fundamental doubts which may seem at first to be unrelated to the subject in hand. We doubt, for instance, that cows will ever learn to blow their horns. And when the farmers of New England pay some other New Englander $1,000,000 on a five-year contract for the stabilization, sight unseen, of anything, we shall begin designing props for Plymouth Rock.

More Taxes, Not More Debt

THE ease with which the Treasury has been able during the past few months to float successive issues of short-term securities at low rates of interest has undoubtedly helped to confirm a great many people in the comforting belief that the finances of the government, notwithstanding the business depression, are in an entirely healthy state. On February 13, for example, the Treasury sold $150,000,000 of 91-day bills maturing later in the year. The advance subscriptions aggregated $347,532,000, and the amount actually allotted was $154,218,400. The heavy oversubscription would seem to indicate not merely that the credit of the government is good and that its securities are eagerly sought, but that the operation of borrowing money at low rates can go on indefinitely without occasioning any serious concern.

As a matter of fact, however, the Treasury situation is far from healthy. For the first time in years the Treasury is facing a deficit. On January 28 Secretary Mellon told the Senate Finance Committee that he looked for a deficit at the end of the present fiscal year (June 30) of $375,000,000, and that no debt reduction would be possible. On February 11 Undersecretary Ogden L. Mills predicted a deficit of "not less than" $500,000,000. Secretary Mellon may well feel anxious as he contemplates the huge volume of financing that will have to be managed in the near future. On March 15 the Treasury will have to be prepared to redeem $1,109,372,550 of 3½ per cent notes of the 1930-32 series, and while there has been some talk of a bond issue, no definite plans for redeeming these notes have yet been made public. On June 15 two large issues of Treasury certificates, one of $429,373,000 at 2⅞ per cent, and another of $159,941,000 at 1¾ per cent, mature. Within three years, Secretary Mellon informed Senator Hawley on January 16, some $8,000,000,000 in bonds, most of them bearing 4¼ per cent interest, become callable. Between July 1, 1930, and February 5 of the present year the Treasury put out $2,458,827,186 of new issues and retired $2,419,222,635, leaving a net addition to the debt of $39,600,551. The public debt, which stood at $16,163,268,237 on January 31, showed an increase of approximately $137,000,000 during that month.

What the issuance of short-term securities every few weeks, such as the $150,000,000 sold on February 13, amounts to is that the Treasury is borrowing to pay back what it has already borrowed, all the while falling a little behind. It will be, apparently, in one way or another, some $500,000,000 behind on June 30 next. For the redemption of the huge volume of bonds maturing in the course of the next three years it has no other resource save to replace the old issues with new ones, possibly at lower rates of interest, but without cutting down the principal of the debt. It is exactly this operation that is contemplated by the bill which Secretary Mellon submitted on January 5, and which was acted on favorably by the House on February 20, raising from $20,000,000,000 to $28,000,000,000 the amount of bonds that may be issued under the Second Liberty Loan Act.

Meantime Congress, apparently expecting that there would always be a surplus and that, even if there wasn't, things could be managed somehow, has gone on appropriating money with a lavish hand. It has just completed the sinking of $500,000,000 in a scheme of farm relief without giving the farmers any relief. It is committed to an indefinitely large outlay for Mississippi flood control, and has scattered millions right and left to relieve unemployment by means of road construction and public building. With the same gay confidence in the future it patted the country on the back with a 1 per cent reduction in the 1930 income taxes. Now, with business scraping bottom and struggling hard to rise, a persistent volume of not less than 5,000,000 unemployed, foreign trade declining, railway revenues heavily cut, a glutted world market for wheat, less and less demand for cotton, and an alarming record of bank and business failures, the Treasury faces a deficit of half a billion and a huge program of debt refunding.

In almost any other country in the world a financial predicament such as this would have been met not only by reduction of expenditure wherever such reduction was possible, but by a frank increase of taxation. Unfortunately, a tax increase has always been about the last thing to which Congress or the Administration has been willing to resort. Until the federal income tax was established, the United States relied upon tariff duties and excise taxes on liquors, tobacco, and a few other articles for all but an unimportant part of its revenue. The tariff, of course, was supposed to pluck the foreigner; liquor and tobacco taxes were all right because those articles were more or less wicked luxuries. Since 1911, however, internal-revenue receipts have run ahead of customs receipts, and since 1918 have been counted in billions where customs receipts reached only millions. As things stand, if the $9,000,000,000 that has been lopped off the debt since the peak of 1919 is not to go back again through recurring deficits, the country will have to go into its pockets and pay more taxes.

It is to this necessary increase in taxation that the new Congress should without hesitation address itself. There is no virtue whatever in carrying a national debt a day longer than the time needed to pay it, none whatever in saddling upon a distant future the indebtedness incurred by the present generation. With all allowance for the practical usefulness of credit or long-term financing, the generation that goes in for expenditure should pay for it. There is not only no reason why federal taxes should not be substantially increased, there is every reason why they should be and why the increase should be made at once. Barring the unavoidable hardships of exceptional situations, the rates of the federal income tax, from the lower to the higher brackets, are extremely low, and Congress should lose no time in raising them. There should certainly be no tolerance for the surtax exemption which Secretary Mellon wishes to have extended to the proposed new issue of eight billions of Second Liberty bonds; the exemption from normal tax is quite enough. The duty of the new Congress in this whole matter is clear.

America's Follies

WHAT are the social and economic follies of America? Samuel Untermyer listed a number of them recently in addressing the University Club of Los Angeles. He declared that the country's meek toleration of the power trust, the money trust, and other widespread monopolies, its carelessness in handling its natural resources, and the blind trust it puts in government by ignorant and incompetent men must be considered as among its more serious errors. They are errors which The Nation has been criticizing editorially and otherwise for many years, and Mr. Untermyer has performed a service in warning the country against their continuance.

> Our standards of public service [Mr. Untermyer declares] are so perverted that true statesmanship rarely dares assert itself if it runs counter to the public delusion of the moment. It is because we are not sufficiently interested in the affairs of government and do not realize the very direct and often devastating effect upon our own individual fortunes of the ignorance of our representatives. Our form of government is neither democratic nor highly progressive. The truth is that it is not responsive to the will of the people.

Turning to the banking and credit situation, Mr. Untermyer says:

> As long ago as 1912, when I was acting as counsel for the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, which was then engaged in an investigation of whether there was in existence a money trust that controlled the money and credits of the United States, only a few of the great banks had these affiliated companies that were exploiting financial ventures in which the banks were prohibited from themselves engaging. Since then there have been hundreds of like perilous appendages to national and State banks that are using in speculative enterprises the funds of the banks of which they are in effect an integral part. Unless these subtle evasions of our banking system are prohibited, eventual major disaster is inevitable.

Despite this danger, we are still "allowing the American and State banking associations and their member banks to dictate and write the laws that govern them."

Mr. Untermyer was no less vigorous in attacking the weaknesses of the anti-trust laws, notably the Sherman Act.

> Spasmodic and unequal efforts at enforcement in isolated cases have served only to demonstrate that the powerful offenders against the law are stronger than the courts or the government, and so for every violator who has been prosecuted hundreds, perhaps thousands, have cropped up and are now operating and growing stronger and stronger in open defiance of the law. The only serious attempts at enforcement have been in the assaults on organized labor, to which the law was never intended to apply. . . . The trusts are now subject to no effective regulation.

It was for the power companies, however, that he reserved his most eloquent and most stinging criticism.

> The greed of the power trusts [he contended] is shaking the very foundations of government. We have the most striking example of this desperate, unequal struggle at the moment in my own State of New York between Governor Roosevelt and the most formidable power trust on earth. The much-coveted prize is the control of the vast American-owned lower Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River water power.

Mr. Untermyer pointed out that ownership and control of the transmission lines supplied "the key to the situation." The trust, he said, was willing to have the State build the dams and converters, "which would relieve the trust of the burden of furnishing the bulk of the capital," but was determined to keep its own hands on the transmission lines, thus enabling it to "retain the control and profits of the enterprise by fixing the rates to its own distributors and their rates to the consumers."

Concluding, Mr. Untermyer declared:

> A struggle is raging in Congress and all over the country between government and these fabulous and perilous power combinations that are spreading their poisonous tentacles all over the land, undermining and shaking the very foundations of government. The evils of the industrial trusts that have conquered us as compared with the operations and effects of this form of legalized banditry are "as moonlight unto sunlight and as water unto wine." Is their conquest to be added to the long list of America's follies? We shall see.

This appeal for better and more honest government and for protection against the "legalized banditry" of the power trust and big business comes from no young and hot-headed radical. It comes from an experienced lawyer who for fifty years has played an active and leading part in the development of this country. Will the people listen?

Farm Board Failure

CHAIRMAN LEGGE is leaving the Federal Farm Board, and it is reported that Messrs. McKelvie and Teague are shortly to follow him. Does the retirement of the fighting chairman mean that the board is perhaps to be eased gently out of the public view and that we are to be allowed to forget as fast as possible our great experiment in farm relief? At any rate, we shall not forget too promptly the half-billion dollars that we have tied up in the undertaking; and we ought not to forget that the Farm Board was the answer of President Hoover to the puzzling question of what could be done to end the distress of American agriculture.

When Mr. Hoover, following in the footsteps of his predecessor, rejected the export-debenture scheme, his feet were on solid ground. From that point forward, his agricultural policy has rested on thin air. In the days of piping prosperity culminating in 1929, the harassed farmers, rightly feeling the contrast of their own position with that of the industrial population of the country, exercised tremendous political pressure to get some kind of government help. Any comprehensive plan of agricultural development would have involved far-reaching economic changes, which the President and his supporters, as the party of big business, could not make. Instead, the President put forward the Farm Board scheme. Agriculture, we were told, was to be placed on a basis of "economic equality"—how? By promoting the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities, and by protecting, controlling, and stabilizing the currents of commerce in the marketing of such products. The idea was not bad as far as it went, but it did not and could not go very far. The board was to prevent wasteful methods of distribution, to minimize speculation, to encourage cooperative marketing by farmers, and to aid in preventing and controlling agricultural surpluses. It was essentially a commercial program for agricultural salvation. To carry it out the board was given wide powers, and the disposal of a revolving fund of half a billion dollars.

The board has devoted its efforts largely to the encouragement of cooperative-marketing schemes of every sort. In its first year it made loans to cooperatives handling no less than nineteen different products, and it aided in setting up national cooperative sales agencies for grain, wool, cotton, live stock, beans, pecans, and beets—in doing so taking measures that in some cases deranged the existing marketing machinery seriously, even disastrously. Furthermore, acting through the grain and cotton stabilization corporations, it actively entered the wheat and cotton markets in a fatal effort to "stabilize"—in fact, to keep up—prices. With the vast funds at its disposal it acquired in its first year more than 60,000,000 bushels of wheat, and since November it has again been in the market, pegging the American price for the time being, with the aid of the tariff, at a point far above the world level. A statement from Chairman Legge would seem to indicate that the board's present holdings are nearly 200,000,000 bushels. On this wheat and on the 1,300,000 bales of cotton that it also holds it faces heavy losses. Despite its operations agricultural prices today are at the lowest point known since 1912—a condition for which the board, of course, is not to blame—and its report submitted in December expresses the judgment that the world trend of wheat prices is going to be downward for half a dozen years to come.

Cooperative marketing, however desirable it may be, is no specific for agricultural distress. The trouble goes deeper. The American farmer in every period of agricultural prosperity has loaded up with high-priced land which broke his back when prices swung down. Besides, there are burdens laid on him by obsolete tax systems for whose continuance he himself is largely responsible, by protection, by monopoly prices for many of the things he has to buy. The removal of such handicaps is a part of any adequate farm program, but beyond this the farmer has got to adapt his crops, his methods, his whole farm economy to the changing conditions of world life—to the rise of new wheat-growing areas, for example. The process is painful but unavoidable, and government efforts ought not to be devoted to vain schemes of price maintenance which take no account of such changes. Adjustment to the new conditions may well require cooperation and collective action going far beyond anything that we have yet contemplated. The progress of collectivized farming in Russia and of cooperative agriculture in other countries is raising serious questions regarding the successful continuance of any purely individualistic agriculture such as we have known in the past. If the Farm Board's efforts to encourage cooperative marketing can be used as a basis for building up an intelligently organized agricultural industry, we may yet save something out of the wreck of this experiment.

Generalities

POOR Mr. J. B. Priestley, visiting British author, got off to a bad start. Graciously answering every question put to him by the reporters on the day of his arrival, whether he knew anything of the subject of the inquiry or not, he remarked:

> I think the American people buy books when they are in fashion, but they do not read them so much. I remember when Sinclair Lewis's "Main Street" was selling at 20,000 copies a week here, a literary friend of mine was in New York and told me that he saw the book at every house he visited. By accident he opened a copy at one house in Fifth Avenue and found the leaves had not been cut. After that he tried every copy that he saw in private homes, and found the majority of them had not been read. In a few copies he found the first dozen pages had been cut.

Now before we accept Mr. Priestley's generalization about Americans we must point out one or two slight qualifications, and perhaps ask a question or two. To begin with, "Main Street" never had any pages to cut. In every edition the pages were machine-trimmed, top, bottom, and front. Mr. Priestley does not say whether his "literary friend" was an Englishman or an American, but in any case it seems to us that a man who will systematically snoop into one of his host's books, just for the purpose of informing other persons that his host did not read it, is something less than a perfect gentleman—and also something less than a perfect reasoner. For if the pages of "Main Street" had needed to be cut, and one found a copy in a private home in which the pages had not been cut, would that mean that the owner was never going to get around to reading the book at all, or simply that he had not yet got around to reading it?

But let us waive these perhaps hair-splitting quibbles, and assume that when Mr. Priestley's literary friend made it his business to repay his hosts' hospitality by assuring himself that none of them had read "Main Street," he always made a correct deduction. Let us be liberal and assume that he had drawn his conclusions from twenty-five separate homes (though it was more probably just one home). The original publishers sold 350,000 copies of "Main Street." Of these Mr. Priestley's literary friend had seen not 10 per cent, not even 1 per cent, but something less than one one-thousandth of 1 per cent. On the basis of this sample he drew his confident generalization. Mr. Priestley and his literary friend would not be very greatly harmed if they cut the pages of one or two good books on logic or scientific method.

There is no reason, however, why we should judge Mr. Priestley harshly. After all, he is only doing what nearly all of us do when we visit foreign countries and conclude after a week's stay that Frenchmen are this, Englishmen that, and so on. Count Keyserling illustrates the process ad nauseam. To contradict these generalizations is often as dubious logically and scientifically as to make them, for there are so many Frenchmen and so many Americans that any generalization that is true of human beings at all is almost certain to be true of some Frenchmen and some Americans. But when it comes to books one can almost afford to be dogmatic. There were no uncut copies of "Main Street."

Young Bob La Follette

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

WHEN Robert Marion La Follette died a few years ago, reactionaries everywhere offered up a sincere though perhaps silent prayer of thanksgiving to their special bourbon heaven. At last they were delivered from this nonconformist who had had such queer ideas about the functions and responsibilities of government. Why, the man had actually believed that the government was the servant of the people, of all the people, rather than the other way around. Believing this, and aided by his remarkable political skill, he had annoyed and harassed the tories and their backsliding liberal friends for many a year. It is true that the reactionaries had in the end to accept many of his principles, but they did so grudgingly, unwillingly, giving the man little or no credit for his victories. They yielded inch by inch solely because they were compelled to, because Senator La Follette's philosophy and ideas were basically sound, and because he was a master of parliamentary strategy. Yet though they swallowed a large part of his program, they never overcame their fear of the man. When he died they were relieved. Other rebels might arise, would arise, but the reactionaries and the conservatives were reasonably certain that none would for many years to come cross their path who had the sincerity, forthrightness, ability, and political skill of "Fighting Bob" La Follette. As for the old Senator's sons, Young Bob and Phil—well, after all they were nice boys, but neither would ever fill his father's shoes.

Even among some of the progressives and liberals of the country with whom I discussed the matter in 1926 and 1927 there was nursed a sneaking suspicion that the La Follette boys would never quite measure up to the high standards set by their father. The less cautious among these persons whispered that the two sons were tied to their mother's apron strings. And they added, as though they had no doubt on this score, that the old, hard-hitting La Follette spirit had most assuredly died with "Fighting Bob."

Meanwhile Young Bob was working away patiently, earnestly, and quietly in the Senate at Washington. His progress at the start was slow, and there was nothing about it of the spectacular or sensational. His critics (among them outstanding progressives who now would be ashamed to admit it) pointed to the fact that whereas his father's untiring struggle in behalf of the popular causes in which he so deeply believed had gripped the imagination of ever-larger sections of the population, Young Bob was getting relatively little attention; certainly he was getting no newspaper publicity. This feeling, whether genuine or not, receded very slowly. The recession began with his presentation to the Republican convention at Kansas City of a most vigorous and uncompromising minority resolutions report. But it was not until December of last year that the whispering critics, not to mention the reactionaries and conservatives, were completely swept off their feet by Young Bob in a manner so typical of his father that a stranger in Washington might readily have believed the elder La Follette had returned to life to harass another Republican President who had dared ignore the public interest.

His critics had forgotten that Young Bob's political experience did not begin with his election to the Senate. It began when he was still a trifle damp behind the ears, toddling about Madison, sitting in as a member in his own right at the famous La Follette family discussions, listening to political wisdom from the lips of his father, his mother, and the several other persons who were privileged to join this circle. His education, with his father as tutor and mentor, continued throughout his boyhood and youth in Madison and Washington. During the four years before his father's death, Young Bob was his father's secretary, and in this capacity acted virtually as co-Senator when his father was absent or ill. In this manner he became an expert in the tactics of minority leadership. When, barely over thirty, he returned to Washington to carry on his father's work in the Senate, he was already thoroughly grounded in the La Follette principles, philosophy, and technique, he was already possessed of political training of a quality far superior to that of the average man entering Congress for the first time. Hence his striking success in the present session cannot be said to have been based on accident or good fortune; it was but the logical outcome of years of careful preparation.

In an earlier paragraph I suggested that Young Bob's manner was typical of the elder La Follette. But the parallel is not so simple and precise as that. Young Bob is not merely the son of his father. He has the older man's sincerity and directness; he has proved himself as able a political strategist; but he also has something his father lacked, and that is a fundamentally sound sense of economics. It is this attribute, in addition to his other qualities, that has made of Young Bob one of the few really important and influential members of the Senate today. In a few brief years he has become that dangerous opponent from whom the reactionaries and conservatives thought they had escaped when his father died.

It is true that the full measure of Senator La Follette's ability did not become generally known until the opportunity came to expose the hollowness and sham of Mr. Hoover's attitude toward the suffering workers and farmers of the country. Nevertheless, his quiet earlier years in the Senate were by no means fruitless or wasted, despite those loose-tongued persons who sought to ignore him or belittle his work. While it was being whispered in Washington that "Young Bob is simply drifting along on his father's reputation," he was in fact toiling unobtrusively but effectively, not in the political smoke of the Congressional cloakrooms, but in the committee rooms, where progressive measures were at stake, and on the floor of the Senate. There stand to his credit in the Congressional Record his speeches and votes against the power trust, against the improper use of injunctions in labor cases, against the Mellon campaign to abolish the federal estate tax and to undermine the income tax, against certain secret practices of the Executive, against secret consideration of Presidential nominations by the Senate (a successful fight which he led), against secret hearings on the tariff, and against the Federal Farm Board bill (which he opposed on the ground, borne out most convincingly by subsequent developments, that the bill did not represent an adequate agricultural program). He voted for the Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam bills, for the Walsh resolution to investigate the public utilities, and for the motion to have the Senate rather than the Federal Trade Commission conduct this investigation. He worked actively in behalf of the Wheeler resolution for an investigation of labor conditions in the textile mills, and he was one of the leaders in the move to have the entire 1930 census organization placed under civil service, a move that was designed primarily to guarantee a greater measure of accuracy in the collection of employment and other labor statistics than could have been possible under a census taken by political appointees. He was a member of the Reed committee whose investigations resulted in the barring of Smith and Vare from Senate seats, and he was also a member of the committee that from 1926 to 1928 investigated the Tariff Commission. He exposed the gigantic combination of baking interests, turning up facts that compelled the dissolution of the Ward Food Products Corporation. He was one of the two or three leaders in the Senate who not only fought the extortionate rates of the Grundy tariff grab, but who also revealed the fallacy of giving a Presidentially controlled tariff commission the wide and perhaps largely unconstitutional powers with which it was clothed under the flexible provision of the new tariff act.

The foregoing activities might be said to constitute Senator La Follette's incidental record, but incidental only in the sense that his participation in the fight against the power trust, the bread trust, the tariff robbery, the injunction evil, corruption in government, and the Mellon campaign to relieve our wealthier citizens of their proper share of the tax burden might be considered of less importance than his independent and difficult battle against the Administration's cowardly attitude toward the country's economic and social problems. Young Bob launched his offensive against the Hoover ostrich policy, not after the country had been plunged into the present depression, but back in 1928 when prosperity was still with us and we were being led by the White House and the Treasury into believing that the boom would go on forever. Senator La Follette stood almost alone in attacking these optimistic but deceptive statements from the Administration. In 1928 he sought to induce the Senate to take the position that the Federal Reserve Board should curb speculative loans; in other words, while Calvin Coolidge was giving aid and comfort to the stock gamblers, Robert La Follette was giving repeated warnings of the disaster which was even then in sight. In December, 1929, after the crash had come, but while Herbert Hoover and his friends were still whooping it for prosperity and the good old days of the New Economic Era, Senator La Follette hammered away in opposition to the Hoover plan to put through an emergency tax reduction. Slashing taxes was no way, as he saw it and as the following twelve months pointedly demonstrated, to prevent depression or to bring about any improvement in the then uncertain business situation. In the face of expert advice to the contrary from the Treasury, he declared that the Hoover scheme did not represent sound fiscal policy. Secretary Mellon a week or two ago admitted as much himself in confessing that "the present condition of the public finances is far from being satisfactory."

Again, on the unemployment problem Senator La Follette went into action, not weeks or months, but at least two years ahead of the rest of official Washington. It was in the spring of 1928, a year and a half before the stock-market collapse, that he introduced and obtained passage of a resolution directing the Senate Committee on Education and Labor to inquire into various measures for the prevention of unemployment. Largely as a result of the committee's findings, which were reported in March, 1929, a majority of the Senate was convinced that constructive action was essential. The report finally paved the way for Senate passage of the Wagner bills in the spring of 1930. Throughout 1929, the last year of the bull market, and 1930, the first year of Hooverized depression, Young Bob kept up a running fire of speeches on the unemployment problem, coupling this with his campaign for more comprehensive and more accurate employment statistics. Finally, in December of last year, he launched his now famous drive against the Administration's cowardly disregard of the gravity of the unemployment and drought situations, a drive that compelled Mr. Hoover to admit by inference that he had been blocking relief for the jobless workers and the drought victims, and that brought to the attention of hundreds of thousands of grateful citizens the name of Robert M. La Follette, Jr., as one person in Washington who believes that the government has certain definite responsibilities to the people.

Senator La Follette took the initiative in demanding that a much larger and more adequate unemployment program be adopted than was envisaged by the few feeble measures put forward by the White House. Inasmuch as corrective and preventive measures, having been so long delayed, could be of little use in the pressing emergency of the moment, he insisted that large appropriations for direct relief were imperative. He collected statements as to conditions in many localities from the American Federation of Labor, and to obtain fuller information he joined with Senator Walsh of Massachusetts in circularizing the mayors of hundreds of cities to get first-hand data. This information, in the form of several hundred replies from municipal and other local officials, was presented to the Senate and published in the Congressional Record for December 15, December 20, and January 9. Young Bob used the letters to drive home his point that there was in fact, and not merely in his imagination, widespread suffering among large sections of the country's population. He proved that local relief funds could not meet the emergency. He challenged the White House and its apologists to show that the Hoover program was adequate to meet the needs of this situation.

However, the apologists arose to defend the President. Senator Goff of West Virginia contended that Congressional relief would impinge upon the sovereignty of the several States; Senator Hastings of Delaware questioned the authority of the Senate to buy food for the idle; Senator Watson asserted that the Red Cross was amply equipped to care for all the poor, hungry people in the country throughout the winter. Young Bob took up the objections one by one and disposed of them as only one other man, his father, could have done. He ended, to quote Elliott Thurston of the New York World, by forcing these apologists and Mr.

Hoover "into the incredible position of seeming to object to feeding the hungry and clothing the needy lest the funds required for these worthy purposes be forced from the pockets of the nation's small and relatively rich taxpaying class, already the favorites of much Republican legislative solicitude."

Jim Watson's contention that the Red Cross was equal, both in spirit and in funds, to the great scope of the emergency brought from Young Bob the demand that Judge John Barton Payne, Colonel Arthur Woods, and certain government officials be called upon to demonstrate the effectiveness and adequacy of the Red Cross and Administration programs for relief. They were invited to appear before a Senate committee, but the evidence they presented was so weak that the Senate, without further persuasion, became convinced that Congressional action was necessary. Then, when it became apparent that the Senate would act, but not until then, Mr. Hoover and the Red Cross finally admitted that they were not doing a good job, and so was issued the appeal for a $10,000,000 fund—a confession, though a pitifully meager one, that Senator La Follette was right early in December when the Goffs and the Watsons attempted to cry down his demands for relief.

"The leadership in Congress, if any exists, should devote itself to the development of a program," Senator La Follette declared in addressing the Senate on January 9, "which will adequately meet" the unemployment and drought situations. There should be four points to this program, he asserted: first, "we should see that food and clothing are provided for the drought sufferers"; second, "prompt action should be taken upon some measure to give direct relief to the unemployed and their dependents"; third, "our public-works program for the next fiscal year should be expanded; let us not be caught again next winter in the situation in which we now find ourselves." The fourth point had to do with the need for a planned economy. Developing this fourth point, Young Bob said:

> Some attempt should be made on the part of Congress to afford the means for the mobilization of the intelligence of industry and finance in order that it may be brought to bear upon the problem of solving the question of distribution, as it has been brought to bear during the last ten years upon the problem of increasing the productivity of our present industrial organization. Unless we do that, economic conditions may be infinitely worse twelve months from now than today. . . . The Administration having failed to meet this crisis, Congress should devote its energies during the coming weeks to the enactment of a relief program and to the passage of constructive measures for the prevention of unemployment in the future. The time has come for Congress to assert its leadership.

This brief paragraph furnishes some measure of the economic statesmanship of Young Bob La Follette. He has dared to venture into a field which Mr. Hoover, after a few half-hearted sallies in that direction himself, declared to be closed to the government. Knowing the master political strategist that Senator La Follette is, and having observed the skill with which he operates in the Senate, one may hope that he will succeed in maneuvering the government into accepting fully the responsibilities which clearly belong to it in the matter of solving the economic problems touching all the people of the country. Senator La Follette has left his impress on the Congress just closing, and he will be on hand in the next session, and it is to be hoped for many more sessions to come, to supply the leadership necessary to carry his campaign through to successful completion. The tories of the Old Guard know this; they have come to fear him as much as they ever did his father.

Unemployment Relief in Germany

By OTTO BROK

Berlin, February 1

THE rising demand in the United States for a plan of caring for the unemployed directs attention to systems in other countries. A description of the German system may be of interest. There are at present about 4,765,000 unemployed in Germany. All but 800,000 receive assistance in some form at an annual cost of $630,000,000. A large proportion of this expense is borne by the taxpayers, the rest by the workers and employers. At present 2,400,000 unemployed receive insurance (the insurance is paid for only a limited time after employment ends), 700,000 live on the emergency fund provided for in the federal budget, and 630,000 are supported by the welfare departments of the cities. It is probable that the villages extend financial help to about 150,000 unemployed; the remaining 900,000 (nearly) do not receive any doles. So far the majority of the unemployed have been supported by insurance, but the percentage of the recipients of emergency and welfare doles is continually increasing. By the end of April about 2,000,000 will probably be existing on emergency and welfare doles.

Underlying this protection of the unemployed is undoubtedly the idea that a civilized state in the last analysis is responsible for the existence, if not for the prosperity, of each of its citizens. Yet when the idea first took shape, it was supposed that it would be not a form of organized and obligatory charity, but a strict insurance under state control. Today the protection of the unemployed is intrusted to three separate units, of which two are financed entirely by taxes and the third, the insurance proper, has been kept going only by state loans which have been transformed into gifts and by direct subvention. In other words, the insurance system, confronted with an unheard-of crisis, has proved unequal to its task, despite repeated modifications. By reason of recent reforms, however, it is now expected that in the coming fiscal year the system will begin to function as a self-supporting institution.

Unemployment insurance was instituted in Germany in October, 1927. A great desire of the Socialist Party had been fulfilled; unemployment seemed to have lost much of its horror. The new service was closely modeled after the public illness insurance—it was made compulsory for all workmen and employees earning less than a fixed maximum ($2,000) a year, and it bound the employer to pay part of the insurance fee (one-half in the case of unemployment insurance as against one-third for illness insurance). At the beginning the premium was fixed at 3½ per cent of the nominal weekly wage. That is, the workman had to pay 1.75 per cent of his wage and the employer had to contribute the same amount. Since then the premium has been raised to 6½ per cent, or 3.25 per cent for each. The weekly dole to which the jobless worker has a legal claim is normally 30 to 50 per cent of his former wage, though it may vary even more than that. An unmarried worker under fifty-two whose weekly wage was $10, for example, gets a benefit of $3.40, while a married man over fifty-two with a large family, if his weekly wage was as much as $14.35, receives a benefit of $8.90, the maximum provided.

This dole, small as it may appear to Americans, was nevertheless quite out of proportion to the revenue available. In fact, the legal and financial basis of the system has been unsound from the outset. The first serious wave of unemployment in the fall of 1928, exactly one year after its foundation, would have wrecked it had not the federal Treasury granted considerable loans. By April of last year the insurance fund was indebted to the Reich to the amount of $150,000,000 and was in a state of chronic deficit. In order to extricate the insurance system from its financial muddle, the federal Cabinet resolved not only to renounce the Reich's claim but also to grant a subvention of $80,000,000 for the fiscal year ending April 1, 1931. A few weeks later another $40,000,000 was given à fond perdu. For a time it looked as if the growing unemployment deficits must wreck the federal finances.

As I have already pointed out, there was an enormous disproportion between expenditure and revenue. A total of $450,000,000 was spent in 1930, of which $430,000,000 was paid out in doles—roughly $20,000,000, or less than 5 per cent of the expenditure, went to administration costs, a record which compares favorably with other public insurance. But the revenue was only $250,000,000, that is, $200,000,000 less than the expenditure. The ultimate result of such a development could be easily foreseen, but as long as the Reichstag was the only authority dealing with insurance affairs, nothing was done to avert a breakdown. It was impossible to find a majority for reform. The Socialists wanted an increase in insurance rates, the bourgeois members voted against it; the right wanted to cut down the doles, the left opposed. Not until the present Chancellor, Heinrich Brüning, initiated his dictatorial regime under Article 48 of the constitution was a serious attack on the problem undertaken. By his first emergency decree in July last year, the Chancellor raised the insurance rate from 3½ to 4½ per cent and also made minor cuts in benefits. In October he again raised the rate from 4½ to 6½ per cent. At the same time it was decided that the system should be put on a self-supporting basis. Accordingly, after April 1, 1931, no further loans or subventions will be granted.

A period free of deficits therefore seems assured. With the premium rate at 6½ per cent of the nominal weekly wage and with about 15,000,000 wage-earners contributing, revenue to the amount of about $430,000,000 per annum is assured, which will be sufficient to pay doles to about 2,000,000. And since there is only a small chance that the average number of claims over a period of years will ever reach 2,000,000, the insurance fund may be able to accumulate modest reserves. Or it may be possible to cut the rate, which is generally considered too high.

With this provisional reorganization of unemployment insurance the danger spot of the German system has shifted to the emergency assistance and municipal welfare. In 1930 the emergency assistance paid out about $80,000,000, appropriated for the purpose in the federal budget, for the maintenance of those unemployed whose claim to insurance had run out. The emergency dole paid to the individual normally amounts to about 75 per cent of his former insurance dole, but he has a legal claim to emergency assistance only if he has no private means. Strictly speaking, therefore, emergency doles are, like welfare contributions, charity doles. Originally designed as a temporary help in times of bad business, they have become a permanent institution. In the federal budget an appropriation of $100,000,000 is provided for the emergency fund. But unless business looks up considerably, the number of unemployed having a claim on emergency doles will continue to increase so that the average of 1931 will be at least double that of 1930.

Even more precarious is the situation of the municipal welfare service, owing to the critical financial state of most large German cities and to the constantly increasing number of unemployed demanding help. The peculiar coordination of insurance, emergency fund, and welfare services implies a constant shifting from the first to the second to the third. When some time in March this year unemployment in Germany will have reached its climax and either becomes stationary or, what is more likely, recedes, this recession will help only the insurance service; it will not relieve the emergency fund or lessen the burden of the municipal welfare departments. Those who receive unemployment-insurance doles, that is, those who have been out of a job only for a short while, will be the first to find new employment, since they normally form the elite of the unemployed. Furthermore, a steadily growing percentage of the jobless workers, having exhausted their claim on insurance and emergency doles, will be dependent on the municipal-welfare contribution, which, though it varies from city to city, normally amounts to about 50 per cent of the insurance dole. An idea of this shifting is given in the following table, which shows the number, in thousands, now being supported by the three services:

	Insurance	Emergency Assistance	Municipal Welfare (Including Villages)
January, 1930	2,063	230	280
November, 1930	1,787	566	510
January, 1931	2,400	700	780

It is obvious that the reorganization of unemployment insurance must be followed by reform of the municipal welfare service. And this reform cannot be put off for long, for a great number of cities are already on the verge of bankruptcy, and the breakdown of city finances would have serious consequences. If a number of large cities are unable to care for their unemployed this spring, law and order will be maintained only with difficulty. In the face of this danger the municipal authorities are pressing for a reform.

They rightly contend that the present system not only is bound to crash very soon, but that it is a source of social injustice as it puts the heaviest burden on those cities which suffer most from unemployment. The central organization of the German cities, the Städtetag, has recently proposed to do away with all municipal unemployment contributions and to pay all those unemployed who no longer have a claim on insurance doles out of the emergency fund. Such a solution may be sound but it would mean fresh burdens on the Treasury.

The Cabinet has not yet disclosed its plans and seems in no hurry to do so. There is method in its tactics. A certain antagonism exists between the Reich and the cities. For instance, one of the principal functions of the Brüning Cabinet so far has been the liquidation of a number of costly Socialist reforms. Meanwhile the cities, most of which are under Socialist control, cling to their policy of expanding municipal activity. Influential persons in the federal Cabinet want to bring about radical curtailment of municipal expenditure. Some even aspire to dictatorship over the cities. The Reich, by withholding help for a time in the present crisis, may be able to exercise more power over the cities. But in any case new federal funds will eventually have to be provided for unemployment relief.

True Stories de Luxe

By MILTON ST. JOHN

It was late in 1928, as I remember, when Time announced for publication early in 1930 a new monthly magazine to be called Fortune. Fortune was to be a new departure. Let me quote from the descriptive announcement:

> Fortune's purpose is to reflect Industrial Life in ink and paper and word and picture as the finest skyscraper reflects it in steel and stone and architecture.
>
> Business takes Fortune to the tip of the wing of the airplane and through the depths of the ocean along bebarnacled cables. It forces Fortune to peer into dazzling furnaces and into the faces of bankers. Fortune must follow the chemist to the brink of worlds newer than Columbus found and it must jog with freight cars across Nevada's desert. Fortune is involved in the fashions of flappers and in glass made from sand. It is packed in millions of cans and saluted by boards of directors on the pinnacles of skyscrapers. Mountains diminish, rivers change their course, and thirty million people assemble nightly at the cinema.
>
> Into all these matters Fortune will inquire with unbridled curiosity. And, above all, Fortune will make its discoveries clear, coherent, vivid, so that the reading of it may be one of the keenest pleasures in the life of every subscriber.

This unique publication was not designed for newsstand sale. Its price was a dollar a copy—by subscription ten dollars a year. Advertising was solicited in advance on the basis of a guaranteed circulation of 30,000 copies for the first issue. In other words, the publishers assured themselves of a gross revenue of $300,000 from subscriptions alone before going to press. And since subscriptions were solicited primarily if not entirely by mail, it was unnecessary to pay high commissions for them. Add to this about 120 pages of advertising in the first issue, at an average net of about $1,000 per page, and this publishing venture itself became, indeed, something to be "saluted by boards of directors."

And what did the subscribers get for their money?

They got a magazine whose format was almost as amazing as its contents. Even the page size, 11¼ by 14 inches, was an innovation. The reading matter was set in two or three columns, and illustrated with square-finish photographs—the MacFadden True Story method—in intaglio. The net effect was that of rotogravure on an antique-finish paper, with occasional colorgravures. At first glance this format was startling; at second glance, vaguely annoying; at third, irritating. Irritating because of its mechanistic squareness, its spurious and synthesized color effects, its monotonous and inflexible rigidity of layout, its cruelty to optic nerves. But at first glance it was undeniably and emphatically startling. Callers and employees would be properly impressed, would look in childish amazement at the pictures. It was a fairly safe bet also that few would read it.

Yet unquestionably the editorial content of Fortune is its outstanding point of interest, of significance, and of amazement. Let us examine a few issues.

The opening article of the first issue bears the following subtitle: "The packer does more for less money than any other industrialist. Herein his business is described with special reference to pigs and to Swift and Company, which has just entered the billion-dollar class."

The next article deals with group and branch banking. It is indorsed by Andy Mellon. And why not? Did not Mr. Hoover donate his own services and have special two-cent stamps issued for the Golden Jubilee of Light, a grand piece of advertising for General Electric? Did he not, on November 8, 1930, broadcast a speech dedicating an employees' recreation building to the greater glory of H. J. Heinz and Company?

To proceed: it seems, according to Fortune, that big business has its lighter moments, too. It can relax and have its share of fun in privately owned island retreats far from the mockery of its wage slaves. Island Kingdoms tells of some thirty such privately owned islands, many of which, it hastens to add, yield profit as well as pleasure. The pleasure is well summed up by the appraisal of Mouse Island, off the coast of Maine, given by its part-owner, the Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick: "It is far enough from the mainland so that we can live an entirely unsophisticated life; that is to say, a man can put on a flannel shirt in the morning and go to bed in it at night if he feels like it."

An article discussing the revenues, disbursements, and profits of the Biltmore Hotel in New York yields in interest to the story of how big business has transformed an idler's hobby and a debutante's luxury—the orchid—into a thriving industry with a cool profit of nearly a million a year. The title is most apropos: When Wall Street Buys Orchids, Wall Street Makes Money.

An article on the Rothschild family points out that while "nobody sneers at them because they are Jews," they were really not very clever, since they never invested a penny in America. It continues: "Society may rejoice in the increase of a tribe so consistently intelligent and colorful; but, so far as the fortune is concerned, there are, at last, too many Rothschilds."

Finally, we are shown in a graphic and moving document the impossibility, for a young married couple, of living in Chicago society on $25,000 a year. In a subsequent issue was printed a reply to this article from an expatriated American connected with the commercial end of the diplomatic service in Athens. This enterprising individual countered the Chicago budget with a set of figures showing that a family of five could do very nicely in Athens and take occasional vacations in other parts of Europe on a mere $17,000 a year. I know of no ambassador, let alone a commercial attaché, who gets anything like $17,000 per annum from our government, but that is beside the point. Let us go on to another issue in which a New Yorker complains that he has to spend all of his $50,000 income and cannot save a cent.

> . . . $40,000 very nicely takes care of our actual New York necessities. . . . The rest must do . . . for our necessary niceties. We buy no pearls when we cannot afford them, and there are other coats than mink. But the incidentals always claim virtually the entire amount above $40,000. There is little reason, unless sumptuously we build a yacht, why incidentals should ever cost more than $10,000 or $15,000. When and if I make $75,000, I shall, therefore, save. If I make $300,000—why, I shall yacht.

The value of these three case histories to sociologists and economists interested in standards of living need hardly be pointed out.

Fortune, like Time, refers habitually to "tycoons." What are they anyhow? My "Oxford Dictionary" says that the term "tycoon" was a title applied by foreigners to the shogun of Japan in 1854-68; it is an Anglicization of the Japanese word taikun, meaning great prince. Fortune and its parent, Time, have apparently redefined it as applying to the millionaires of commerce. The inference seems to be that these are our great princes, and that no others count.

Fortune says, Long live the tycoon! He it is whose financial tiddledywinks insures an active stock market and the consequent prosperity of American industry, which insures the happiness of labor by gambling away its profits. He it is whose foibles and fortune make and unmake nations. He it is whose bigger and better mergers send stock-market prices skyward by reducing costs—and the armies of labor. May his race increase, for he alone is the American man of destiny! And Fortune does its bit by heaping encomiums upon them. Major Atterbury, A. R. Erskine, Baron Mitsui, M. Coty, the Behn brothers, the Guggenheims, the Mellons, Albert Wiggin, F. L. Carlisle, John Henry Patterson, Elisha Walker, Owen D. Young—all have their place, along with statements of the profits that accrue from salt mining (Morton's Salt), sporting goods (Spalding), the manufacture of Pullman cars, soap (Proctor and Gamble, Lever Brothers, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet), cosmetics (Coty, Helena Rubinstein), aluminum (Aluminum Company of America).

In edifying and informative photographs we may see ex-Governor Alfred E. Smith eating "boloney"; Lydia Pinkham and her great-granddaughter; the shoulders and arms of Primo Carnera, which earned him $103,991 in less than four months; a procession of hogs across the slaughtering floor of the stockyards; or the Homesburg County Prison Band, with instruments, be it noted and underscored, donated by a tycoon.

Fortune has its cultural side, too. The talkie version of "All Quiet on the Western Front" recently "grossed $22,800 in a Manhattan theater" in a single week; "Toscanini leads an American enterprise [the New York Philharmonic] to triumph and a deficit"; the decrepit American back yards immortalized in the water colors of Charles Burchfield can yield, in Manhattan alone, "rubbish, garbage, ashes, and dead animals" convertible into a neat $5,000,000 by proper garbage reduction; had the first buyer of Rembrandt's Toilet of Bathsheba "kept his $106 banked at 4 per cent interest compounded semiannually, his estate could now withdraw $242,428.89. Had he kept Bathsheba, his estate could probably realize a great deal more. For . . . there is no telling what sum she might now command."

It would be unfair, no doubt, to suggest that glorified success stories about tycoons and their profit-producing enterprises are consciously designed to encourage the purchase of securities in these undertakings. But let us look at Fortune for November, 1930. A full-page advertisement for Stone and Webster and Blodget, the financing end of Stone and Webster, Inc., appears on page 16; an illustrated article on Stone and Webster on pages 97 to 98 is continued on page 121. In getting there, the reader can hardly overlook an advertisement of the Stone and Webster Engineering Corporation which appears on page 115.

Finally, Fortune, realizing that its readers are not so deeply interested in the workings of a business or in the alleged idiosyncracies of its directors as they are in the behavior of its securities on the stock market, publishes in its latter pages a supplement analyzing the earnings, structures, and speculative possibilities of these securities.

The circle is complete. Not even a St. Anthony could resist this elephantine innuendo. And while it is not yet "packed in millions of cans"—the circulation guaranty for 1931 is 40,000 average net paid per month—it is already something to be "saluted by boards of directors."

Her Pain

By LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL

Her pain became the pressure of a lover
Without whose weight she would have been too light,
A hand laid on her that her hand could cover,
A voice speaking to her in the night.
Her pain would strongly cling to her forever,
Moving in her body like a child
That only Death had courage to deliver.
So life and she were mutely reconciled
Since this imperious, dependent guest
Came home to her, so welcome, strange, and late,
By whom she was recurringly possessed,
To whom she was a mother and a mate.
Now she was bound forever to her friend,
Her very bones a house built to that end.

A Dirt Farmer Wonders

By GLENN W. BIRKETT

I

ON December 27, 1929, Mr. Alexander Legge of the Federal Farm Board gave an address before the American Farm Economics Association at Washington, D. C. From this address it appears that the practical problem of the Farm Board is to restrict production of farm products. Mr. Legge states:

> You will find the argument for curtailment of production very unpopular with the farmer as a rule. But it is reasonable to suppose that in time he may grasp the simple problem that if he can get more money for four bushels of wheat than he can get for five bushels, perhaps he will raise four bushels of wheat instead of five. That is a typical illustration of where we stand today. A 20 per cent reduction, on an average, of what the farmer produces would make the tariff on grain effective, and give him a higher level of prices. I think it is conservative to say that 20 per cent less production would bring 20 per cent more money than he is now getting for what he produces.

Mr. Legge is a representative of the federal government. He and his board have, by act of Congress, large powers and $500,000,000 to raise the prices of farm products, that is, to decrease production. About the time of Mr. Legge's speech in Washington, Professor James E. Boyle of Cornell, in one of the quality magazines, was portraying vividly the danger of starvation because of the destruction by insects of a part of our food supply. To illustrate our appalling nearness to defeat in our race with the insects, Professor Boyle quotes Professor Glenn Herrick, an agricultural "if" statistician, who finds that a single mother cabbage aphid in a single short season in the somewhat unfavorable climate of New York State ought to be, if all her descendants lived, and if all could be fed, the ancestress of so many hundred quadrillion aphids that by the middle of August the weight of the generation or generations then alive would be eight times the weight of all the human inhabitants of the globe. In a warmer region, such as Texas, where the climate allows thirty generations instead of twelve as in New York, the resulting total would stagger even an "if" statistician.

One reads on to learn that the farmer is being aided by government appropriations in his fight against the insects. Obviously this work is designed to increase production. In other words, the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture, with 545 entomologists, and with the prestige and taxes of the federal government behind it, is determined to prevent the insects from doing, in part at least, the very thing that Mr. Legge, backed by the taxes and prestige of the same government, is attempting to do. Penelope, knitting by day and raveling by night, had nothing on the government at Washington.

One of the reasons given for building Boulder Dam with federal taxes is that it would make possible a large reclamation project and an increase of agricultural production. I have scores of pamphlets from my State experiment station, from other States, and from Washington all urging increased production. These are paid for out of taxes. Professors of agricultural colleges everywhere are lecturing and broadcasting on the necessity for increasing the yield per man, per acre, per cow, per hen.

As a farmer, I am confused. I cannot reconcile the use of tax millions to stimulate production and the use of other millions at the same time to educate the farmer to produce less. I am not considering whether the stimulators actually increase production, or whether Mr. Legge's millions can check production, but I do ask which of these two—if either—is farm relief? If either one constitutes farm relief, why would not additional relief be secured by the withdrawal of tax money from the other? If the professors who insist upon more per man, per acre, per cow, per hen are right, then the $500,000,000 of Mr. Legge are worse than wasted; whereas if Mr. Legge is right, then the taxes spent by the government to reclaim land, prod the farmer, and fill the ether with fairy tales about scientific production are merely an additional handicap which Mr. Legge and the Farm Board must overcome—at government expense. At present the Department of Agriculture and the Farm Board seem to be equal in authority. Each is a legally established department of the federal government. One prods, the other restrains. The theory of one is the exact opposite of the other. Millions for one must be counterbalanced by millions for the other. The two sets of relievers relieve us of billions.

II

At the close of Mr. Legge's address a number of questions were asked:

> DR. H. C. TAYLOR. What is the plan for limiting the production? How could you go about that, say, in wheat and corn?
>
> MR. LEGGE. That is up to the gentlemen in the agricultural colleges of the country. It calls for a campaign and it can never be done except as the farmers become organized and where the story can go back home to the farmer. There is no way you can do it by legislation under the Constitution of this country, and I doubt if it can be done anywhere. You cannot compel the farmer but perhaps you can convince him. If he gets more money for producing a little less it may have an argument that will reach him in the course of time but it cannot be done in a hurry.
>
> DR. B. H. HUBBARD. Is there any hope of doing that while the farmers are unorganized, if you had even half of them, as they have in Canada, educated to produce less?
>
> MR. LEGGE. Well, that reaches almost any limit, you know the possibilities. I remember a number of years ago out in San Joaquin Valley in California, at the time they were reorganizing the grape industry, that problem existed, and the persuasive action of these organized farmers perhaps was not in strict accord with the laws of the country, but they were very effective. In other words, a producer either joined it or moved out.

Here is a simple direct idea proffered by a great industrialist. The implication seems vicious but possibly the idea is good. Racketeering seems to work in urban industry, particularly in Chicago, although Mr. John Gunther pointed out more than a year ago that the ultimate cost to the community is high. But now that an official of the government has indorsed this modern business practice, which, as Mr. Gunther indicated, is racketeering or "high finance" according to the social and financial standing of the indorsers, we may expect some action from farmers. Heretofore we have been handicapped by respect for law and have been slow to realize the efficacy of strikes, lock-outs, bombings, and other concomitants of efficient businesses. Still we have made some progress. Two summers ago, during a milk strike in this, the Chicago dairy region, armed farmers halted trucks and dumped out the milk. Several years ago near Belvidere the "persuasive action" of dairymen in restricting output resulted in one killing. The farmer is copying urban efficiency but possibly too slowly. Mr. Legge's left-handed federal support to extra-constitutional, extralegal methods may have an accelerating effect.

But many of us farmers are puzzled. According to the President of the United States, obedience to all the laws is particularly necessary just now if we are to maintain our civilization. The Wickersham Commission is appointed to study crime and offer remedies. Then the head of the Farm Board, who is just as officially the government as is the head of the commission to study lawlessness, suggests that "persuasive action . . . not in strict accord with the laws of the country" be adopted. It is interesting and possibly enlightening as the solution of a great industrialist. Remember that Mr. Gunther wrote that "racketeering exists because people, prominent people, want it to exist."

It opens possibilities. Most farmers I know disbelieve in all efforts of government artificially to stimulate or restrict. (And I have the opinions of many farmers, not only from this section but from other States from Massachusetts to California.) If it is right to use force against a fellow-farmer to restrain his productive effort, then it must be right to use force against those government employees or representatives whose efforts are designed to stimulate his productive effort. For instance, would not a farmer be justified and could he not plead page 13 of Mr. Legge if he, the farmer, attacked a government entomologist, or a barberry-bush destroyer? We ought to have an opinion on that. But it will have to come from somebody higher up than either Secretary Hyde or Chairman Legge. They would obviously disagree, since their objectives are opposite.

We farmers have a solution of the farm problem. It consists of recognizing that any form of farm aid is harmful, and it therefore asks the complete withdrawal of all units of government from all phases of farming, from all stimulation and from all restriction. Our solution is absurd. It gives no one a government job. It assumes that ordinary citizens have rights as opposed to bureaucrats.

But whether or not we who are farmers are right in our plea for no more government aid or relief of any kind, this query remains: How can the government logically appropriate hundreds of millions with the ostensible purpose of increasing production and at the same time hundreds of other millions to decrease production? And how can the government logically preach through one commission the vital need for respect and obedience to all statute laws, while through another board it recommends group or class advancement to be attained through disregard of the most fundamental laws?

In the Driftway

MARIE ANTOINETTE'S cake-eating formula has always been popular with those who have sufficient bread. The Drifter recalls, for instance, that public-spirited Bostonian who long ago founded a Union at Harvard "where the poorest student could get a good luncheon for seventy-five cents." There was also the altruistic lady who, wishing to experience for herself "how the other half lives," invited herself to visit in the home of an unsuspecting college professor. For ten days the household put its best foot forward, striving to maintain its maximum of hospitality—only to be thanked by the lady for letting her "share in the simple life." It is not only the Drifter who remembers, in the First Hoover Epoch, the smartly dressed women who went about among the poor telling them how to conserve food in war time by preparing dishes from bread crumbs—to meet the invariable question, "Yes, lady, and where do we get the bread crumbs?" No less a person than good George the Fifth was acclaimed for his discovery that left-over bread could be toasted—thereby proving his royal descent from good King Arthur and his queen: "And what they could not eat that night, the queen next morning fried."

* * * * *

AESOP'S Fox—offering the Stork food on a flat plate—was probably the first incarnation of this generous spirit which a sadder world has seen transformed through Lady Bountiful to Social Service and finally to Research Bureau. But Aesop at least let the Stork get back at the Fox, a wholesome balance which has not survived to our day. (Can it be that the Fox finally ate the Stork?) The Drifter is quite sure he knows how the Stork felt, for once when he had been tramping over the Yorkshire moors he stopped to rest at a holiday house maintained by one of the city settlements. A resident had invited him to spend the night. There was no other shelter for miles, so the invitation was happily accepted. The sight of the table spread for supper was good to a dinnerless man. The hospitable resident withdrew to break the news to the housekeeper, who came in looking as if something else had been broken as well. She looked the Drifter down and up, or rather down than up, and said sternly, "You'll have to go on—there's a farm a few miles on." Perhaps she noticed the pathetic droop the Drifter was trying to produce, for she continued, "You may sit and rest half an hour but don't touch any of the food on the table!"

* * * * *

THE Fox spread only one unattainable dish before the hungry Stork. In our splurging days we multiply both the dish and the unattainability. The Drifter, with one eye on the weary bread line shivering on the sidewalk, reads what a beneficent government (of the Second Hoover Epoch) suggests as a low-cost menu for "Minimum Standard Diet for Lower Incomes": "The list demands milk for the children and bread for all at every meal; cereal, potatoes, a green or yellow vegetable, and some additional fruit or vegetable for all, and for children, tomatoes or oranges every day; with tomatoes, dried beans or peas or peanuts, lean meat, fish, or poultry, or cheese, and eggs, from two to four times a week." The Drifter concludes that it is not only in the Arabian Nights that the Barmecide spreads an imaginary feast for the hungry to sharpen their teeth on. But Shacabac in the immortal tale had a come-back at the Barmecide. What come-back, or what deferred meal, is coming to those who dine on the paper menu "issued by the Home Economics Bureau of the Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with the Emergency Committee for Employment"? Gesegnete Mahlzeit.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Terror Still Reigns in Venezuela

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For almost thirty years Juan Vicente Gomez has succeeded in maintaining a brutal dictatorship in Venezuela. He has been materially assisted by Dutch, British, and American warships which patrol the coast of the second largest oil-producing country in the world. All political opponents of the dictatorship have either fled the country, or been exiled, killed off, or sent to prison. It has been estimated that upwards of 5,000 political prisoners crowd the filthy Venezuelan jails today, 100,000 are in exile, and 15,000 have been killed, not for acts of violence but for political activities against the dictatorship.

Horrible tortures are inflicted on the inmates of the ancient Venezuelan prisons. The following statement made by four escaped political prisoners appeared in the San Juan, Porto Rico, Times, on August 1, 1930:

> By orders of Juan Vicente Gomez, one, two, three sets of irons . . . weighing from 30 to 100 pounds are riveted on to a human being without so much as a trial or defense. The physical resistance of [many of these] men cannot withstand these for more than a few days . . . gangrene sets in, and suffering indescribable pain and torture, the prisoner passes from the jail to the cemetery. . . . Many times there have been riveted into a single set of irons two people; night and day, year after year, they have remained bound together by that infernal chain. Death only will free them from that odious enforced association. . . . The students of the University of Caracas—about five hundred in number—have been condemned by Gomez to hard labor on the highways without clothing, hungry, maltreated by the lash of the hangman, weighted with chains.

Evidence indicating that American oil interests have secured for Gomez the support of the Department of State was produced before both houses of Congress, and resolutions calling for an investigation of our relations with Venezuela were introduced last year. There is a way to help end this infamous political persecution. Write to Henry W. Temple, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, asking that Resolution No. 269 be reported out of committee. There is a good chance that something can be accomplished. Hearings will determine whether the charge that oil companies have secured the support of our government are true. Citizens who feel that the United States has no business supporting dictatorships, and presenting their governments with statues of Henry Clay (ironically placed near the Rotunda prison), ought to protest in the interests of a people submerged for almost thirty years under oil and a tyrant.

New York, February 18 ROGER BALDWIN

The Making of a Pacifist

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: William Lloyd Garrison's far-reaching influence is illustrated by an incident of my school days. More than fifty years ago the Japanese government sent a number of boys to be educated in the United States. One of them was my classmate at the Chauncy Hall school in Boston. His name was Taykichi Tanaka, which means, in Japanese, Sublime Virtue. He was a very fine young fellow. He came of an old and warlike noble family and was destined for a responsible post in Japan's war navy.

He wanted to meet William Lloyd Garrison. My parents gave him a letter of introduction, and I took him to Mr. Garrison's house. Mr. Garrison talked to him against war, and lent him Dymond's "Essays on Morality." I can recall the worshipful expression on his face as he stood on the doorstep taking leave, and looking up at Mr. Garrison, who stood in the doorway above him.

On his return to Japan he refused the post in the war navy to which he was assigned. He was put in prison for his contumacy, but he stood firm. Finally he was released and was given some small post of a peaceful kind, with a salary that would barely keep him from starving.

He died many years ago; but my early friendship with him and esteem for him gave me a respect for the Japanese that has lasted all my life.

Boston, February 20 ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

Mr. Rosoff Was Not a Director

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my article The Banks of New York, which appeared in The Nation on February 11, I stated that Mr. Samuel Rosoff was a director of the Bank of United States. Mr. Rosoff informs me that he at no time was a director of the bank although a very heavy stockholder. I should greatly appreciate it if you would print this correction.

New York, February 16 NORMAN THOMAS

The Case of Guido Serio

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As the attorney for Guido Serio, I take serious exception to the suggestion in Mr. John Beardsley's letter in your issue of February 4 that the courts are powerless to secure Serio the voluntary departure which the Labor Department has refused. Mr. Beardsley is apparently convinced that everyone "after further inquiry" must agree with his conclusion that the Labor Department has the last say as to where a deportable alien must be sent.

The Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, dealing with the case of another anti-Fascist, Mario Giletti, expressed grave doubt on this very question. Judge Learned Hand gave serious attention to the argument advanced by the alien—that if he left at his own expense for some other country, the deportation warrant should remain unexecuted. Judge Hand said that the statute fixing the place to which the alien was deportable

> . . . may then be understood as meaning only that, when deported in invitum, the alien must go to one of the prescribed countries but it need not be executed when the same result is accomplished by his going elsewhere.

AT LAST:

The buried TRUTH of
The Man JESUS
Brought to life in Peter Fireman's
GREAT EPIC

CHRISTIANITY

Here, in fierce burning frankness, are discussed the life and teachings of the man who for 19 centuries has been the center of the greatest controversy the world has ever known.

Christian, Jew, Agnostic — none can afford to miss this completely original comment on an age-old story.

Well printed and bound in substantial cloth at a price within the reach of all — $1.00.

CHRISTIANITY, 200 W. 70th St., New York

Send me ...... copies of CHRISTIANITY at $1.00 each. ☐ I enclose check. ☐ I enclose money order. ☐ Send C. O. D.

Name ....

Street ....

City ....

This appears to us certainly a humane construction to put upon the statute, and we will not say that it is too much of a strain upon its language.

The question was not settled in the Giletti case. It is being put up squarely to the same court in the Serio case. Until a decision is reached, we shall not believe that there is no power anywhere to question the Labor Department's arbitrary right to grant or refuse voluntary departures, a right, moreover, which is nowhere granted it in any statute. While his case is pending, the Labor Department has no jurisdiction. If Serio loses in court, it will be time enough to ask for favors from the Department of Labor.

New York, February 6 CAROL WEISS KING

The Life of Emily Howland

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If any readers of The Nation have letters or other data concerning Miss Emily Howland of Sherwood, New York, I should be grateful for the loan of such material. I am preparing a record of the long life of this friend of humanity, and I need all possible aid in my work. My address is 1074 West Genesee Street, Syracuse, New York.

Syracuse, February 20 HARRIET MAY MILLS

Contributors to This Issue

OTTO BROK is on the Berlin staff of the Chicago Daily News.

MILTON ST. JOHN is the pen name of a Chicago writer whose work has appeared in the leading American reviews.

LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL contributes verse to various periodicals.

GLENN W. BIRKETT is a dirt farmer who has occasionally written for publication.

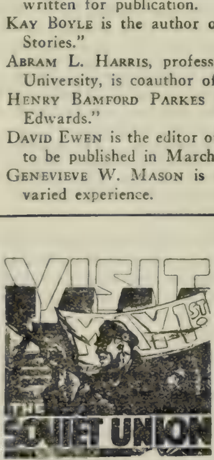
KAY BOYLE is the author of "Wedding Day and Other Stories."

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is coauthor of "The Black Worker."

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES is the author of "Jonathan Edwards."

DAVID EWEN is the editor of "From Bach to Stravinsky," to be published in March.

GENEVIEVE W. MASON is a social worker of long and varied experience.



SEE MAY DAY IN MOSCOW

Sailings, April 8—Mauretania
April 16—Europa

Tour includes 12 days in the U. S. S. R. for only $275.
Other cultural and sightseeing tours $385 and up.

WORLD TOURISTS, INC.

First American travel organization to conduct tours to the U. S. S. R.

175 Fifth Avenue Alg. 4 - 6656 New York

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Books, Drama, Films

Hunt

By KAY BOYLE

the buckhounds went on under the rain with the wet fern swinging lace over their eyes and their skins hanging like crumpled velvet

the bucks shod with leaves like silk sandals danced on chopsticks over the suey of red lizards white stalks and caterpillars

the gentlemen slapped with their crop-butts at their clean leather

Now the gentlemen turn back out of the high dripping world to fires that repeat themselves in the copper of andirons and whiskey glasses with the throats of the buckhounds sunk over their insteps and the hound teats bruised blue on the fine floor

Edmund Wilson

Axel's Castle. By Edmund Wilson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THIS study of the imaginative literature of 1870 to 1930 seems to me destined to exercise a deeper influence on American criticism than any volume since "A Book of Prefaces," which appeared in 1917. The wide differences in temper and fundamental preoccupations between the two books reflect not only the differences between two personalities, but between two periods. Mr. Mencken was interested chiefly in American and English writers, and he made it his chief business to dynamite gentility and puritanism; Mr. Wilson's writers are cosmopolitan, and what he strives for is chiefly psychological and philosophic interpretation. An immediate key to their differences is to be found in their styles: if Mr. Wilson's prose lacks the vigor and pungency of Mr. Mencken's it lacks also its occasional monotony of rhythm and tone, and it is a more efficient and sensitive instrument for presenting subtleties of thought and for a sympathetic conveyance of a given author's vision or mood. Mr. Wilson's criticism, in fact, is an ideal example of precisely that "catalysis"—that chemical task of provoking a reaction between the work of art and the reader—which Mr. Mencken years ago declared to be the primary function of criticism.

This type of critical task was perhaps never more necessary than now, above all for the group of writers which Mr. Wilson discusses—W. B. Yeats, Paul Valéry, T. S. Eliot, Marcel Proust, James Joyce, Gertrude Stein, Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, and Rimbaud. All of these, he finds, stem more or less directly from one literary school, the symbolists. One of the principal aims of this school is to employ words, sounds, and arrangements rather for their suggestive qualities, their penumbras, so to speak, than for their central, immediate, or conventional meanings. The symbolists wish, in other words, to approximate in literature the indefiniteness of music. And this ideal derives from a wider ideal, that of retreat from the external world, the world of action, industrialism, and democratic communication, to a world of pure introspection and passivity, or at best of an esoteric communication motivated sometimes by mere snobbery and sometimes by a profound conviction either that the individual's experience and moods are so unique that nothing more than fragmentary communication is really possible, or at least that our experiences consist of such fine gradations and subtle and shifting intricacies that conventional language is too inadequate and clumsy a tool for conveying them.

Mr. Wilson begins his discussion of these "symbolist" writers in a modest, almost an elementary, manner. He conceives it to be his first duty to narrate, to explain, to interpret. Unlike most critics who have written about such writers as Eliot, Proust, and Joyce, Mr. Wilson proceeds almost as if his reader had no previous acquaintance with their work: he not only gives us a brief biographical sketch, but he tells the entire story, for example, both of "Ulysses" and of "A la recherche du temps perdu." It is usually not wise for a critic to tell us so much of the story, but in these two instances there exists unusual justification. In "Ulysses" the simple story is often buried under obscurities, digressions, and ellipses, and Proust's many-volumed novel is so huge that it does one little harm to have a map. Mr. Wilson, at all events, has worked on the sensible assumption that it is better that his reader should be told too much than too little. On the same assumption, he has written with remarkable lucidity. He is not among those critics who believe that lyric poetry should be criticized in lyrical prose, or that the way to prove one's critical appreciation of an esoteric or partly unintelligible book is to write about it even more unintelligibly. As a result of this unpretentiousness and completeness, "Axel's Castle" becomes valuable sheerly for the information it contains.

But Mr. Wilson is by no means content to stay within this modest beginning. In a dedicatory paragraph he states his idea of what literary criticism ought to be—"a history of man's ideas and imaginings in the setting of the conditions which have shaped them." His own work is an admirable embodiment of that aim. Not only does it realize Croce's critical ideal of describing the author's intent and his degree of success in achieving that intent, but it goes on to examine how far the author's intent itself is valid or important, and even how this intent came into being psychologically and historically. Thus not only are Mr. Wilson's individual essays on Joyce, Proust, Eliot, Valéry, and the rest little masterpieces of analysis and portraiture, distinguished by a rare combination of subtlety and strong common sense, but, not content with showing us the writers as individuals, they reveal the relation of these writers to their physical and cultural environment. In this respect, as well as in its vivid biographical sketches, Mr. Wilson's criticism sometimes recalls that of Taine, whose "environmental" method it applies without its originator's sometimes misguided dogmatism.

I hope I have by this time indicated plainly enough that I consider Mr. Wilson a very fine critic. He seems to me, for example, to have a much sharper and profounder mind than the late Stuart Sherman, about whose work so much strange fuss has been made. Sherman, after facing the entire new American literature with a mind closed by neophobia and moral squeamishness, suddenly opened it too wide and threw his standards overboard, but Mr. Wilson has kept a balanced course, bringing an always patient but never too credulous scrutiny to bear on writers who at first reading may have seemed unintelligible or even insane. But though in his criticism of contemporaries he begins, as Jules Lemaitre so sanely advised, by looking for their possible merits rather than for their often more easily discovered faults, he never allows himself to be completely carried away. He feels that the writers with whom he is here concerned have given us works of literature which,

> . . . for intensity, brilliance, and boldness as well as for an architectural genius, an intellectual mastery of their materials . . . are probably comparable to the work of any time. . . . They have revealed to the imagination a new flexibility and freedom. . . . They break down the walls of the present and wake us to the hope and exaltation of the untried, unsuspected possibilities of human thought and art.

None the less, even in the masterpieces of this new literature Mr. Wilson is > . . . oppressed by a sullenness, a lethargy, a sense of energies ingrown and sometimes festering . . . a leaden acquiescence in defeat. . . . I believe therefore that the time is at hand when these writers, who have largely dominated the literary world of the decade 1920-30, though we shall continue to admire them as masters, will no longer serve us as guides.

HENRY HAZLITT

Find Lincoln

Lincoln the Man. By Edgar Lee Masters. Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

Lincoln the Politician. How the Rail-Splitter and Flat-Boatman Played the Great American Game. By Don C. Seitz. Coward-McCann. $4.

Lincoln and His Cabinet. By Clarence Edward Macartney. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

MR. MASTERS has set out to dissipate the Lincoln myth. Given a few books and a moderate amount of industry, the task should not have been difficult. We knew, long before Mr. Masters entered the lists, that Lincoln was not the great man he has commonly been represented as being: that his education was negligible and his reading narrow, that he was a moderately successful but rather unscrupulous lawyer, that he hungered for political office and steered his course in Illinois with an eye to the main chance, that he had upheld the right of secession as a Congressman only to oppose its application later as President, that he backed and filled before the slavery issue in the fifties and straddled it with some high moral gestures in his debate with Douglas, that his nomination in 1860 was carefully planned and suitably bargained for, that the outbreak of the Civil War found him in a daze, and that he was long in arriving at any but vague notions of how the breach was to be healed after victory and a place found for the freed Negroes. We knew also that as President he rode roughshod over the Constitution which he was sworn to uphold, that he was a poor judge of men, chose a mediocre and inharmonious Cabinet, and seemed often not to know good generals from bad ones, that he was a minority choice in 1860 and a Hobson's choice in 1864, and that only a martyr's crown, pressed upon him in a tragic moment when the North was rejoicing in victory, transformed him into a national idol and enthroned him among the immortals. There was no need of Mr. Masters's five hundred pages to tell us any of these things. All that was needed was that some one should tell them more fully, frankly, and convincingly than they had been told before, and exactly as they were and are.

Mr. Masters has not been content, however, to attack the Lincoln of myth and tell the uncomfortable truth about him. He has felt called upon to go farther, and not only to throw into prominence whatever of Lincoln could be made petty, repulsive, or unscrupulous, but also to indict the American people and their government all along the line. If his studies have not made him hate and despise the Lincoln whom he has discovered, he has been singularly inept in concealing whatever admiration he may have. The moving picture which he unreels shows a Lincoln ignorant, lazy, "grotesquely dressed," undersexed, cold, superstitious, a palterer if not a worker of duplicity in the Illinois legislature, dragging religion into politics and exhibiting a "Jehoviac diabolism" in his second inaugural, a political trimmer, and so on. As for the country and the government, both went wrong before and during his time and have continued to go wrong at an increasingly rapid pace ever since. According to Mr. Masters, State rights and strict construction embodied the true theory of the Constitution and should never have been departed from, the Missouri Compromise was a mischievous outrage, abolition and anti-slavery had not a leg to stand upon in opposition to the clear rights of the South, and the Civil War opened the way to chaos. In the final chapter, with Lincoln dead, Mr. Masters lets himself go in a prolonged wail over the whole array of national evils that followed the war: reconstruction, the Republican Party, "the feculence of the Credit Mobilier" and "the cloacas of the political rings in the cities," "the spawn of lowest hell," monopoly, tariffs, banks, franchises, "a new set of thieves in the public Treasury" let in "under the guise of piety and humanitarianism," the unholy procession of Presidents from Hayes to Taft, the churches that "rule the country," prohibition, a dead literature, materialism. The only wonder is that a republic so debased should have survived.

"Lincoln the Man," in short, is a political diatribe such as might have come out of the remotest quarters of the antebellum South, carried forward into the years of political and social confusion after the Civil War. That it is not a more worthy performance is sincerely to be regretted, for Mr. Masters had an inviting opportunity. The two volumes of Beveridge's unfinished biography of Lincoln come down only to 1859, and there was a place for a book which, building upon the foundations which Beveridge laid, should continue the critical evaluation of Lincoln's career into and through its Presidential phase. There was certainly no need to recount again in detail the events of Lincoln's earlier life. Mr. Masters, who has nothing of particular importance to add about this early period, takes fourteen of his eighteen chapters to get Lincoln into the White House, and merely skims the great political and social issues and the military events of the war period. The truth which he presents could hardly at best be anything but unpalatable to hero-worshipers and patriots, for myths go far to make history as history is commonly believed, but the violent language, the intense prejudice, and the bitter feeling that characterize the book are likely to make less hostile readers suspect that there must be, after all is said and done, another and more favorable side.

Mr. Seitz has no idol to topple and no acid gibes and sneers to throw about, but he, too, offers a conception of Lincoln which is not the whole story. To him, Lincoln is the masterful politician, consummate in his ability to handle men, whether of his own party or of the opposition, plainly not lacking in guile or inattentive to his personal chances, but making his way in a troubled period shrewdly, patiently, good-naturedly, with humor and homely wisdom. Even on the political side, however, much is left out of the narrative or so lightly touched as to make the book, as a political study, superficial. It has, on the other hand, a lively style, it abounds in anecdotes and local or personal digressions, and its general tone is assuring. One gathers that while Mr. Seitz does not think too highly of American politicians, he is ready to accept them as a necessary evil and discovers in Lincoln one of the best of the lot.

Mr. Macartney concedes the existence of a Lincoln legend, but it seems to him to be beneficent and not baleful, and one best dealt with by observing Lincoln through "those great intellects and noble patriots" who formed his Cabinet. The book is a collection of eight biographical sketches, pleasantly written and sensibly patriotic, but without essential novelty either in matter or in point of view. Since the real Lincoln is still a subject of debate, the book may be commended to those who prefer to have him and his associates presented in a friendly light. WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Russian Experiment

The Economic Life of Russia. By Calvin B. Hoover. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Russia's Productive System. By Emile Burns. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

The Russian Experiment. By Arthur Feiler. Translated from the German by H. J. Stenning. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

TRADITIONAL Marxian theory has long taught that the "organization of the proletariat as a revolutionary class," the necessary first step toward socialism, presupposes "the finished existence of all the productive forces which can develop in the bosom of the old society." This denial of the possibility of socialism in industrially backward countries, implicit in the policies of the Second International, shaped the course of world socialism as long as the International remained the undisputed oracle of Marxian prophecy. But when the Russian Bolshevists were ensconced in power by the October revolution of 1917, Nickolai Lenin reasoned:

> How utterly mechanical is that idea learned by heart during the development of Western European social democracy, that we in Russia have not yet grown up to socialism, that we lack . . . the objective economic premises for socialism. . . . Why can we not begin by winning with a revolution the premises for that definite level of culture and then afterward, on the basis of the workers' and peasants' power and the soviet structure, set out to catch up with other peoples?

This determination expressed by Lenin to socialize an essentially agrarian country repudiated both the orthodox Socialist theory and the revolutionary tactics of the Second International. Yet the mere reformulation of Marxian ideology, however necessary as a justification of "proletarian dictatorship in a land of peasants," did not guarantee communism. Because modern industrialism was foreign to Russian soil, its technique and the economic discipline and social habits which it engenders were almost alien characteristics. Successful socialization, then, required more than a program of rapid mechanization. It demanded the integration of this with a planned non-competitive economy for which human history offered neither model nor guiding experience, and the reconditioning of human nature as it had hitherto been known to Russian life. And now, thirteen years after the October revolution, the fate of communism is still unpredictable. Although unable to forecast the future, Calvin Hoover, Emile Burns, and Arthur Feiler, in three works, greatly increase our understanding of the present Communist state and the vicissitudes through which it is passing. All three authors conclude that the achievements of the new regime are exceptionally gratifying, though in many quarters contradictory and beset with recurring probability of disaster.

The productive mechanism of the new economy, described in detail by Dr. Hoover and Mr. Burns, and more critically by Dr. Feiler, is beginning to run with efficiency and smoothness. Decentralization and coordination are making rapid headway upon bureaucracy. The coordination and direction of industry are vested in the Supreme Economic Council with its provincial councils and Department of Technical Economic Planning. That body supervises the distribution of the profits and losses and the appointment of the technical staff of the various industries, but does not meddle with the operation and management of them. Each industry is autonomous. Large-scale industry was formerly organized into "trusts," which set up "syndicates" for marketing purposes. The syndicate is now being scrapped for the "combine" (obedinenie). When this transformation is complete, the combine in a given industry will not only possess the commercial features of the syndicate, but will also form the connecting link between factories and the trusts in that industry and the rest of the industrial, commercial, banking, and agricultural life of the country.

Even in small-scale industry, trade, and handicrafts, collectivization is pushed relentlessly by the Communist Party, the real power behind the scene. Agriculture must also yield. The large estates of the old aristocracy are being turned into state farms (sovkhoz), in reality grain factories which use much machinery and little man power. The peasantry is being pushed into one of the three types of agricultural collectives (kolkhoz)—namely, the commune, the highest type constituting pure communism; the simple collective, "in which land is cultivated in common but work animals and other inventory are private property"; or the artel, in which not only is land tilled in common but all work animals and animals whose products are sold on the market are socialized. The artel is the most common type of kolkhoz.

The success that has followed socialistic adaptation of American mass production under the aegis of the Five-Year Plan, or Piatiletka, has been remarkable. During the first year of the plan the productivity of large-scale industry increased 23.4 per cent over that of 1927-28, although an increase of only 21.4 per cent was called for. The production of consumption goods, which according to the plan was to increase 18.6 per cent over 1927-28, actually increased 21 per cent. The results in some lines, especially in small industry and agriculture, were not so favorable. The urban proletariat is being spurred by socialist emulation and rivalry to greater efficiency. But production costs are still relatively high, and industrial products still crude. In spite of increased productivity of labor, wages still lag behind prices, which are about 25 per cent higher than in the United Kingdom. While a wage of $36 a month was considered high in 1929, the material well-being of labor is augmented by benefits derived from an elaborate scheme of social insurance.

Describing the plan as a whole, Dr. Feiler observes that it means that a capital investment of 92,700,000,000 rubles, or approximately $44,000,000,000 calculated at 1926-27 prices, must be squeezed out of the lives of poor people for five years. For the plan to succeed, the Russian workers and peasants "must accumulate capital by saving whilst increasing the output of their . . . labor and restricting their . . . immediate consumption."

The plan is now in its third year. The results of the second year were not available when these books were written. According to an abridged version of the results appearing in the London Economist in November, 1930, and recently summarized by George Soule in the New Republic, the accomplishment in the second year was almost unbelievable. And the second year is to be surpassed by the third. This requires a quickening of the already nerve-racking tempo of industrialization of farm and factory, and forcing the acceptance of socialized farming upon a recalcitrant peasantry.

Agriculture is the Communist dictatorship's greatest problem. Although the state controls banking, credit, and prices, it lacks foreign credit and must pay for the mounting industrial imports necessitated by the Five-Year Plan with increasingly heavy agricultural exports. If socialism is to be achieved, agriculture must be made to yield larger surpluses by means of industrialization and collectivization. This process will reduce the peasant to a proletarian, thus bringing about Lenin's much desired union (smychka) of urban proletariat and peasantry. But the movement has met the resistance of both the rich peasants (kulaki) and the middle peasants (ceredniki). At times it has been resisted by the poorest peasants (bedniki). Peasant uprisings and disaffection encountered the armed forces of the government. "Liquidation of the kulak" became so much of a bloody witch hunt that Stalin himself halted the excesses by his famous Pravda article, Dizziness from Success. In 1929 only about half of the peasant farms were in collectives. According to Dr. Hoover, the plan for the total sown area was fulfilled only to the extent of 97.4 per cent in 1928-29. The amount of bread grain collected from the 1929 harvest was 103 per cent of the plan, but was attained at the point of bayonets. Today the burden of agricultural socialization is placed upon the state farms. As these farms are highly industrialized, they constantly displace labor, swelling the float of agricultural workers to the city. Unless this float is quickly cared for, the Communists' neatly balanced economy will find itself distressingly upset.

Will this heroically ambitious plan succeed? Can communism succeed in Russia? The plan still entails incalculable human costs in nervous strain, physical sacrifice, and bloodshed. It demands conformity, intellectual monotony, and the suppression of individual freedom. But Dr. Feiler thinks that the willingness of the great majority of the people to bear material privation with calm indifference is greatly to the advantage of the dictatorship. Moreover:

> The great bulk of the population can form no conception of the old way of living . . . To them it seems soft, senseless, and unreal. They have no longer any attachment to the old life. And the West—even the Russian emigration in the West—is so alien to their lives and even to their wishes that they regard a return thereto as something to be rejected as inconceivable. And in this change of heart consists . . . the chance of this revolution.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Lord Nelson

Nelson. By George Edinger and E. J. C. Neep. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

IMAGINE a man devoured by passion for glory and for beautiful women. Through reckless courage and persistent disobedience to his superiors he becomes prominent in naval victories; he makes himself a popular idol by having letters printed in the newspapers in which his achievements are magnified and his colleagues are belittled. He is captivated by the wife of a British ambassador, herself formerly a blacksmith's daughter, a painter's model, and the mistress of half a dozen lovers; he deserts his own wife and lives with her in a relationship which only her husband imagines to be platonic; his vanity and immorality make his position impossible in English society. Finally he deliberately seeks death in battle, in the hope that a grateful country may forgive and reward his mistress and daughter. He becomes the national hero of the most puritanical country in the world; but his mistress is left to starve, and his vices are concealed by pious biographers.

Such is the theme of this book. Its style is vivid and amusing; the background is suggested by a few picturesque anecdotes; there is never a superfluous word; no recent biography has imitated so successfully the methods of Mr. Lytton Strachey. Unfortunately, nobody who knows anything about Nelson will accept this presentation for a moment.

There is ample evidence that Nelson was loved by all who knew him, especially by those colleagues who ought, according to this biography, to have been most offended by his greed for fame. As a naval commander he was distinguished by a most careful attention to detail, and by a vitality which could inspire his subordinates. Off his quarterdeck he was a child, and his vices were those of one without experience of the world, not of a deliberate adventurer. At Cape St. Vincent he did not prevent Jervis from rounding up five Spanish ships; but for his disobedience to orders the two divisions of the Spanish fleet would have united, and the battle would have been indecisive. At the Nile the decisive movement was made by Captain Foley, but only in obedience to plans often discussed in Nelson's cabin during the voyage from Sicily. At Copenhagen withdrawal in obedience to Parker would have meant the destruction of the British fleet; and if the request for a truce was a virtual confession of defeat, it is strange that the ships aground were not immediately floated off. Lady Hamilton was not left to starve; her resources would have been ample but for her own extravagance. These are merely a few of the misrepresentations made by these clever and unscrupulous advocati diaboli. It is strange that they have not succeeded in giving the credit for Trafalgar to somebody else.

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES

A Jazz Rhapsody

Tin Pan Alley. By Isaac Goldberg. The John Day Company. $3.50.

TIN PAN ALLEY has for these many years been crying for a historian. For Tin Pan Alley is a name heavy with glamor. From a most humble and pitiable origin down at the dim gas-lit Fourteenth Street which stretched from Union Square to Second Avenue—where, in this Mecca of burlesque houses, bawdy places, and cheap dance-halls the first of America's popular songs were created—it rose in forty years to be one of America's greatest industries. During these years reputations have been swept from the obscurest corners of the Alley unto the uppermost stars; and reputations have here been just as securely buried. During these years the silhouettes of glamorous figures have passed across the graphic background: illiterate composers who hoped to de-de-de-dum their way into immortality—and did; "personality boys," as song-pluggers, on whom the fate of many a song rested; hard-boiled publishers who looked upon this composing racket as a high-powered business which must be run with precision and accuracy; vaudeville actors who swarmed in the Alley, each hoping to be the fortunate one to be the first to put that song sensation of the year across. . . . During these years an aboriginal, naive, and utterly artless music grew into real musical significance. This, then, is a story—vivid with coruscant colors, pulsing with real drama. This is a story that has been begging for treatment between two book-covers for ever so long. How is it that Tin Pan Alley has had to wait so long for its saga?

But if it has waited an unduly long time for its history, it has not waited in vain. In Isaac Goldberg the Alley has found a sympathetic historian whose racy pen has succeeded with remarkable felicity in transferring to paper something of the spirit of the Alley. There is élan and vitality in his story of the Alley's rise and growth, from the prehistoric Harrigan and Hart days until our own time of Gershwinian jazz-sophistication. Now he writes with tongue in cheek—for, after all, that is the only way in which an intelligent man can hope to speak about so much of the simplicities which characterize so many of the Alley's effusions; now he is truly critical—his essay, Before the Flood, on the background of American music is always sane and often penetrating; now he is remarkably informative—one learns here for the first time the entire subtle mechanism of Tin Pan Alley which produces the song hits and then launches them forth upon the world; now he is analytical—his analysis of the structure of jazz and his criticism of its strength and weakness are intelligent and farsighted; and now he merely rambles aimlessly along, speaking amusing things about famous song-pluggers and their methods, about some of the phenomenal song sales, about the influence of the talking picture on the song racket.

George Gershwin, to whom the book is dedicated, has written a pleasing introduction. One might question Mr. Gershwin's enthusiasm in calling this work "a valuable addition to our archives of Americana." Notwithstanding Mr. Goldberg's insistence, we fail to be convinced that Tin Pan Alley is half so important historically, or as a phase of the American mind or culture, as it is colorful and interesting.

DAVID EWEN

Books in Brief

Novels and Novelists. By Katherine Mansfield. Edited by J. Middleton Murry. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Katherine Mansfield's loyal followers will be pleased with these literary essays, a series of book reviews written for the Athenaeum of 1919 and 1920. In a clear, penetrating, and sometimes mocking style, she exposes the occasional novels of Somerset Maugham, Virginia Woolf, Joseph Hergesheimer, John Galsworthy, and others less illustrious to a deft and witty analysis. But the significance of this publication does not lie in her verdicts on her contemporaries or in the accuracy of her literary prophecies. It is valuable as an additional chapter in the record of her brief career. These reviews, joined to her letters, her journal, and her stories build up a lifelike picture of a compelling and sympathetic personality.

In Defence of Sensuality. By John Cowper Powys. Simon and Schuster. $3.

Here is an elaboration of the "mythology" that underlies "Wolf Solent." With the postulate that "the gregarious instincts of humanity have ruined the happiness of the individual," Mr. Powys proposes a mystical hedonism as the way of salvation. He pictures the lonely human personality as a lambent spear-point of consciousness piercing the cosmic darkness—an image that inevitably recalls Pater's "hard and gemlike flame." But the genteel aestheticism of Pater is far from the hearty sensuousness of Mr. Powys, who brings together in the ego intimations of our subhuman ancestors and adumbrations of the "divine-devilish First Cause." Each of us is a potential demon-saint, and the core of our being is an "ichthyosaurus-ego." True happiness is to be found only in the recognition of our absolute loneliness, abandonment of "the preposterous claims of a life of action," and ecstatic awareness of our essential kinship to earth, air, fire, and water—the fourfold aspect of eternal energy.

Makers of Modern Europe. By Count Carlo Sforza. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

A collection of personality sketches of the men who are popularly supposed to have made modern Europe. It includes such men as Aehrenthal, Tisza, and Pachich, in addition to some of the more obvious personalities, but it omits Holstein, Isvolsky, Dmowski, Lords Grey and Carnock, and a number Must labor resort to violence?

In this startling history of gunshot and dynamite, Louis Adamic follows the war between capital and labor down to its latest phase in the racketeering of today. The Haymarket riot, the Debs Rebellion, the case of "Big Bill" Haywood, the Centralia affair, the Mooney case—these are a few of the high spots in a highly explosive book, which ends with a compelling forecast of labor's next ten years.

DYNAMITE

The Story of Class Violence in America

By Louis Adamic

"It is a great book, an extremely timely book. But it is much more than that: it is the only history of the rise and development of violence and sabotage on the part of both capital and labor, and later among the racketeers themselves."—BURTON RASCOE.

"The whole pageant of class violence moves across the American scene in sharp-edged silhouette . . . No one who hopes to arrive at an intelligent realization of the possibilities inherent in the present condition of labor unemployment can afford not to read it."—MARY AUSTIN.

"A rousing record of facts. A thrilling and terrible story."—JAMES STEVENS.

"A unique combination of astute skepticism with clear understanding of industrial realities. I highly commend it to everyone interested in the politics of violence."—CAREY McWILLIAMS.

Fully illustrated, $3.50

ANDRÉE'S STORY

The Complete Record of His Polar Flight

The diaries and photographs found in the ice after 33 years tell an unsurpassed story of adventure. "Tremendously interesting."—New Yorker. $5.00

THE LIVES of a BENGAL LANCER

By Francis Yeats-Brown

"The best book of 1930."—ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT. $2.75

EDUCATION of a PRINCESS

By Marie, Grand Duchess of Russia

"Nothing could be conjured up out of the imagination half so full of romance and excitement and wild, fantastic improbability as this true story of one woman's life. . . . Listen intently, and in the short span of her life you will hear the turning of a page of history."—ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT. $3.50

THE VIKING PRESS
18 East 48th Street, New York

By the author of
"HEAVENLY DISCOURSE"

TOO MUCH GOVERNMENT

by Charles Erskine Scott Wood

The author of the inimitable "Heavenly Discourse"* here sums up his theories of life and society.

$2.00 VANGUARD At Bookstores

Over 50,000 copies have been sold to date*

Building for Happiness

The common impression that social work is primarily concerned with salvaging unfortunates is only partly correct. Social work is concerned not only with normalizing the socially maladjusted individual but also with building up a happier and culturally richer community life. In Jewish social work the opportunities for constructive work are especially numerous and promising.

Have you chosen your career? If not, you should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified candidates. The spring quarter begins March 30, 1931.

For full information write to
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A Graduate School)
71 W. 47th St., New York

of other men who had more to do with the job than did th Bonar Laws, Pilsudskis, and Vanderveldes that Count Sfor includes. There is in the work nothing of considerable or pe manent consequence.

Mr. Currier and Mr. Ives. A Note on Their Lives and Time By Russel Crouse. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $

This collection of Currier and Ives prints, many of the beautifully reproduced in color, is amply worth its cost. Exce to those connoisseurs who demand the bona fide article an will have none other, the reproductions are amusing to loo at and (let it be whispered) charming when framed and hun on the wall. Sleighing in Central Park, the Chicago Fire, an the Lightning Express are among the gems of the collectio and one may be pardoned the sacrilege of tearing them ou of the book partly because Mr. Crouse's text, patronizing an heavily humorous in tone, is not worthy of them. The tru history of America for fifty years or so probably lies in thes drawings—color, caption, and all. But they need a commentato who will realize their worth without feeling it necessary t get a laugh on every page.

Gulab Singh, Founder of Kashmir. By K. M. Panikkar. London: Martin Hopkinson. 7s. 6d.

Gulab Singh, capable organizer, wise politician, stern conqueror and ruler, who made the present state of Jammu an Kashmir about eighty years ago, is an unusual subject for biography. He is here treated to a whitewash. He was strong enough character for his ruthlessness to need no suppression, and historic details of importance should not have bee omitted. The book is amazingly dull.

Films

Charlie Chaplin Falters

CHAPLIN'S latest picture, "City Lights" (Cohan), ha been greeted with the general acclaim of the press, an acclaim so fervent that it surpasses even the unmeasured enthusiasm over his performances in the past. The three years of publicity (largely gratuitous, no doubt) that preceded the showing of the picture possibly have had something to do with this. Likewise, the impressive fact of a silent picture coming out of dialogue-ridden Hollywood. But the magic of Charlie Chaplin's name must have been the strongest factor. Only this can account for the acclamation of "City Lights" as the crowning achievement of Chaplin's art. The truth is, it is the feeblest of his longer pictures. "The Kid," "The Gold Rush," "The Circus" (I am one of the unfortunate few who missed seeing "The Pilgrim") gave us the mature Chaplin, less spontaneous, perhaps, than in his still earlier "A Dog's Life" or "Shoulder Arms," but just as subtle in his whimsicalities and a little more wistful. In "City Lights" there are few whimsicalities, while what was intended to be wistfulness has clearly degenerated into something decidedly maudlin.

One has feared for some time that this was going to happen. There were alarming signs of it in "The Circus," although they were heavily outweighed by the amazing ingenuity of the episodes which revealed the fantastic naturalness of the little tramp. In "City Lights" the only scenes that have this fantastic quality are those depicting the desperate venture of our hero into the business of prize fighting. There we get our old Chaplin, the personification of a helpless and guileless soul who resorts to grotesquely fantastic, though essentially natural, devices to get himself out of a tight corner. In Chaplin's art what he does has always been as important as how he does it. His little tricks and unexpected twists of action may be described as "gags," but there is a world of difference between them and, for instance, such gags as are used by Harold Lloyd. Lloyd's gags are merely external situations in no way connected with his screen personality, which, by the way, is little more than a void. Chaplin's gags, on the contrary, spring from the very nature of the character he has created and are the principal means of revealing that character. It is because of his ingenious reactions to the situations in which he finds himself that we have come to love the absurd little fellow; we would fain imitate him if we could only divest ourselves of our respectable habits. To be sure, we laugh at his droll ways, but we also pity him for being always at odds with the world, a round peg in a square hole. There is pathos enough in the character himself not to need any stressing by means of a sentimental plot. Chaplin's growing seriousness, his desire to be more than a mere comedian have deceived him into holding sentiment more precious than fun. He has paid dearly for this error of judgment by producing a picture of which less than a quarter does credit to his genius.

If I ask for more fantasy in Chaplin's pictures, I should be content, not to say pleased, with much less of it in such a picture as "Trader Horn" (Astor). Somehow the fantasy there fails to blend with the realistic background. The blame for this must be laid largely at the feet of that entertaining spinner of yarns, Mr. Aloysius Horn, though the director, too, is guilty of some quite uncalled-for crudities. Apart from this, the picture is a magnificent record of wild life in Central Africa, abounding in thrilling episodes and in scenic splendors. The natives who play a prominent part in the story prove to be excellent actors and are approached in this among the white members of the cast only by Mr. Carey in his fine characterization of Trader Horn.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

True to Tripe

SINCE last week I have seen no play which seems to me worth discussing at length. But I have seen three plays which might be considered together as examples of the imitative art. I do not use the word imitation here in any of its better senses. For it has its better senses. When art, for instance, imitates life—and it has never been decided just how it does that, if it does it at all—when art, shall we say instead, produces the conviction that it has imitated life, something of undoubted value has been done. The result may also be fine when one good artist imitates another—the two of them collaborating, so to speak, in the expression of some sort of truth which has an existence independent of either of them. I use the word in neither of those senses, but rather in the worst sense of all, the sense which reminds us that there are imitations of bad imitations. I saw three plays which any observer with presence of mind could have detected—not as imitations, perhaps, for he may never have seen other plays of the types to which they belong, but as pieces of untruth. A good imitation can be a good thing in itself. A bad imitation not only may be a bad thing in itself; it may derive from something just as bad, something which has been bad from the beginning of time.

"Doctor X," a "mystery melodrama" by Howard Warren Comstock and Allen C. Miller (Hudson Theater), depends

Wordsworth
by HERBERT READ

No one is better qualified to write the life of the great English poet than Herbert Read. The scope of the book is primarily biographical, but Wordsworth's poetry is treated as part of his life. $3.00

But It Still Goes On
by ROBERT GRAVES

"It's a fit appendix to Good-bye to All That, nor is there higher praise available for any book."—Phila. Ledger. $3.00

Yehuda
by MEYER LEVIN

Author of Reporter and Frankie and Johnnie. The first American presentation, in a fictional setting, of the Zionist movement. $2.50

The Soviets in World Affairs
by LOUIS FISCHER

"Without doubt the most comprehensive and most trustworthy history of Soviet foreign relations in print."—American Mercury. 2 vols. $10.00

Horatio Nelson
by GEORGE EDINGER and E. J. C. NEEP

"Provocative and intensely readable."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. Illustrated, $3.00

Brother and Sister
by LEONHARD FRANK

A beautifully written novel which treats a delicate subject in masterly fashion. $2.50

JONATHAN CAPE & HARRISON SMITH
139 East Forty-sixth Street : : New York

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

*As You Desire Me—Maxine Elliott's—39 St. E. of B'way.
*Dr. X.—Hudson—44 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of 8 Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. e. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
*Green Grow the Lilacs—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
*On the Spot—Forrest—W. 49 St.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Petticoat Influence—Lyceum—45 St. E. of B'way.
†Private Lives—Times Square—W. 42 St.
*The Barretts of Wimpole St.—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 St. W. of B'Way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
*The Man with the Portfolio—Yidish Art—2 Ave. and 2 St.
‡The New Yorkers—Broadway—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's a Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—Miller—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

FILMS

Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Cimarron—Globe—B'way and 46 St.
City Lights—Geo. M. Cohan—B'way and 43 St.
La Nuit Est a Nous—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
"Pagliacci"—The Park Central—59 St. and 7 Ave.
Comrades of 1918—Cameo—42 St. and B'way.

LECTURES

The Great Classics of the World Literature by Dr. G. F. Beck every Sunday evening, at the Labor Temple, 2 Ave. and 14 St.
From Stardust to Civilization by Dr. G. F. Beck every Wednesday evening, at the Labor Temple, 2 Ave. and 14 St.
Modern Tendencies in Philosophy by Prof. H. A. Overstreet—Institute of Arts and Sciences, Columbia University.—See advertisement.
How To Be Happy Though Human by Dr. W. Beran Wolfe, Tuesday evening, March 3, Auditorium, 150 W. 85 St.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL—2nd Ave. and 14th St.
LECTURES
By Dr. G. F. Beck
THE GREAT CLASSICS OF WORLD LITERATURE
Every Sunday at 5:00 P. M.

"FROM STARDUST TO CIVILIZATION"
The Rise of Man from Barbarism
(with Lantern Slides)
Every Wednesday at 8:30 P. M.

FIVE CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS
Fridays, 8:30 P. M. Feb. 27th to March 27th
Feb. 27th, Recital by COMPINSKY TRIO

ADMISSION: 25c to any single lecture—$1.00 to concert series.

Institute
of Arts and Sciences, Columbia University
McMILLIN ACADEMIC THEATER
N. E. Corner Broadway and 116th St.
MODERN TENDENCIES IN PHILOSOPHY
Four Lectures by
Prof. H. A. OVERSTREET
Mar. 4: "From the Machine to Life"
Mar. 11: "Philosophies of Evolution"
Mar. 18: "From Absolutism to Statistics"
Mar. 25: "From Reason to Will"
Members Ticket Admits to All
Fee for the series, $4 -:- Lectures at 8:15 P.M.
Monthly Bulletin Sent on Request

for its success upon our believing that ordinary citizens lik ourselves can remain two minutes in a dark room full c daggers and shadows without dying of fright. The author of this piece prepared the room for us with a good deal c ingenuity. The laboratory of Dr. Xavier is really a terribl place. But they did not take the precaution to people it wit men and women of iron, persons of some other blood tha ours, demons of courage and unimagination. They introduce instead a band of simple souls as capable of panic as we ar We can't believe they will survive a minute. When they d as of course is necessary if the play is to last two hours, w decide that we can too; and sit back in comparative comfor while three murders take place and two more are attempted If the heroine can walk right through that paneled door o the left where both we and she knew that the Killer ha of late been lurking, then we know there is nothing back o it but an actor. Now there have been mystery plays whic actually scared us. We have the right therefore to resen one which asks us to be afraid of a property cap and cloak

"Hobo," a piece of good-hearted roughness by Fran Merlin (Morosco Theater), is much better than that. It scenes are varied and interesting, it has some human lines, an its leading personage, a hobo named St. Louis Blackie, who i very well played by Paul Kelly, emerges to a kind of patheti isolation both from the rest of the people whom he meet in the story and from the world in general. St. Louis Blacki has all the makings of a character. But Mr. Merlin ha weakened him by making him ashamed of the ideas and emotions which define that character. He is not an ordinary hobo He is distinguished by a set of principles which he call "rules." But he is always checking himself as he announce these principles and saying: "Gee, I'm gettin' mushy." Mr. Merlin, in other words, wanted to put something into hi play besides the talk of tramps but thought he needed to apologize for doing so. It would have been better eithe to be content with regular tramps, in which case he might have given us a nice touch of local color, or to have the courage of his thought and endow a hero with the same courage. The result of his calling his ideas mush is, curiously enough, that we take them as mush. This picture of a strong man who blushes whenever he feels himself being himself is not merely a picture that has been too often painted; it is untrue to what we expect in the theater; and for all I know it is untrue to the world of hobos, or for that matter to any world.

"Heat Wave," by Roland Pertwee (Fulton Theater), is all about British ladies and gentlemen in India who drink whiskey and soda, get fanned by the natives on hot days, say "cheerio," "righto," and "quite!" and argue over-long about very obvious points of honor, both feminine and masculine. The hero, who is played by Basil Rathbone as well as he could ever be played, appears to be some sort of saint who by his alacrity in saving distressed ladies from their stupid husbands or brothers has earned the reputation of being a sinner. It all comes out right in the end, of course, and the husband who will not trust his wife with such a saint is duly confounded. Love and honor. An old theme, and still a powerful one. But not in this atmosphere of "By Jove," "Have a drink?" and "Yes, sahib."

MARK VAN DOREN

"America's Sweetheart" (Broadhurst) is a pleasant musical comedy which follows the lead of "Once in a Lifetime" in spoofing Hollywood. Its humor is often bawdy but is well sustained; the music by Richard Rodgers is reasonably tuneful and the lyrics by Lorenz Hart are considerably above the average. The performance is helped a great deal by the voice and vivacious presence of the imported Jean Aubert.

H. H.

☐ FILMS ☐ LECTURES ☐ CONCERT ☐ PLAYS ☐

EMBASSY

THE NEWS REEL THEATRE

B'way and 46th Street
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A. M. to Midnight

Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Saturday

---

THE FIRST GRAND OPERA IN FILM
Fortune Gallo's production of Leoncavallo's
"PAGLIACCI"
LEO BRECHER'S
New PARK CENTRAL THEA., (formerly Jolson's) Seventh Ave. at 59th St.

At LITTLE CARNEGIE PLAYHOUSE
57th Street East of Seventh Avenue
"LA NUIT EST à NOUS"
(The Night is Ours)
All-talking French Success with Marie Bell of the Comedie Francaise

---

COPLAND - SESSIONS - CONCERTS - FOURTH SEASON

MUSIC and FILMS

by McPhee - [illegible]
Blitzstein
Copland - Sessions

by Steiner
Cavalcanti

Broadhurst Theatre, March 15, 8.30 P.M.
235 West 44th St.

THIS IS WAR!

Terror striking, dramatic, real! A German production dwarfing everything that has gone before. . . .

COMRADES of 1918

"Never were we more stirred by a war film." — Der Berliner Western.

"Excells all of its predecessors."—B. Z. [illegible] Mittag.

American Premiere
Thursday, Feb. 20th
at 9 P. M.

R K O CAMEO 42nd St. and B'way

George Jean Nathan writes in JUDGE about—

Zwei Herzen im ¾ Takt

(TWO HEARTS IN WALTZ TIME)

¶ "The talkie in question . . . is called 'Two Hearts in Waltz Time,' [illegible] from Germany, and is better than most of the musical comedies that have been put on around here lately. It has some excellent melodies by Robert Stolz, including THE BEST WALTZ HEARD BY THESE EARS IN SEVERAL SEASONS; it has considerable imagination, notably in its opening passages. What is more, it leaves [illegible] with a pleasantly lingering mood. Take a look at it when it comes your way and [illegible] if you don't agree with me!"

Seats now available for ALL Performances

55th ST. PLAYHOUSE E. of 7th Ave. CIrcle 7-0129. Con. 12 Noon to Midnight. Popular Prices.

AS YOU DESIRE ME
LUIGI PIRANDELLO'S NEW PLAY
With JUDITH ANDERSON

"No student [illegible] modern drama [illegible] afford [illegible] miss this electric presentation of the theatre of ideas."—MARC CONNELLY.
(Author and director of "The Green Pastures")

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE, 39th St. E. of Bway. Eves. 8:50. Mats. Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

The Theatre Guild Presents

Green Grow The Lilacs

GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

LAST TWO WEEKS

ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN

Martin Beck Thea. 45th Street, West of Eighth Avenue. Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

GILBERT MILLER presents

TOMORROW and TOMORROW

A NEW PLAY BY PHILIP BARRY
with ZITA JOHANN & HERBERT MARSHALL

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd St. Eves., 8:40 Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:30.

HELEN HAYES
in PETTICOAT INFLUENCE with Henry STEPHENSON

"A witty and altogether delightful satirical comedy."—Herald Tribune

LYCEUM Theatre 45th St. E. [illegible] Broadway. Eves., 8:50. Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:30.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents

MARY BOLAND in her gayest Comedy Hit

VINEGAR TREE

PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - 2628

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40

THE GROUP
A Clearing House of Opinion

Meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 3RD, AT 8:30 P. M.
DR. W. BERAN WOLFE
(Eminent Psychiatrist, Writer and Lecturer)
will speak on:
"How To Be Happy Though Human"
(Subscription to all 50c)

THIS SUNDAY AFTERNOON, (MARCH 1ST), AT 4:30 P. M.
DR. FRITZ WITTELS
(Distinguished Psycho-Analyst, Associate of Freud)
will speak on:
"Goethe and Freud"
—— The Artist Faces The Psychologist ——
(Weekly notices mailed on request)

“Free” Slaves in West Africa

By GENEVIEVE W. MASON.

WE have been hearing of late about slavery in Liberia. To some of us it seems impossible, to some absurd, that slavery should still exist. That it does exist, though not under that name, in West Africa and North Africa the writer, at least, can attest.

In 1927-28 my daughter and I were the only women passengers after the third port of call on a freight ship delivering freight to West Africa. We touched at twenty-four different ports in all, and at some of them twice; going out, we carried flour in 100-pound sacks, gasoline in cases containing two five-gallon cans, mixed goods in grocery boxes, Chevrolet trucks in packing cases, and structural steel on deck; returning, we loaded palm oil, cocoa, and mahogany.

At Freetown, Sierre Leone, we picked up a crew of sixty-odd natives, “Kroo boys,” so-called because most of them belong to that tribe, which is considered commercially more dependable than others. The tribe itself consists of scattered bands in different parts of Sierre Leone, speaking different dialects. Men from other tribes are used to fill in. They are in charge of a headman chosen by the central chief who lets out the help to the shipping companies. The Kroo boys receive from three shillings as laborers to six as donkeyman. They pay the headman, and he pays the chief. They work ten hours every day, almost always at heavy work, usually six or eight hours on Sundays and holidays, and frequently until ten o’clock, sometimes all night long, when in port. They go with the ship from Freetown or another port of Sierre Leone, working cargo all the way down the coast and back to their home port.

As we had no one aboard our ship qualified to handle illness or injury, I volunteered to take charge of the ship’s company for the voyage, and left her when the Kroo boys did. Generally speaking, the West African natives are clean and dirty, kind and cruel, ambitious and lazy, superstitious and suspicious, tolerant and revengeful. In these opposite traits lies the secret of their failure to succeed as blacks and the secret of their submission to white domination. Slavery originated among the natives of Africa. The early white traders found tribe after tribe of blacks who practiced slavery among themselves and were prepared to betray their enemies and sell their own undesirables for a song. Intertribal wars were ceaselessly waged, and foreign slave-traders easily got the pick of the captures.

This kind of slavery still exists in northern Africa. Slaves are bought, through the itinerant and resident Arabs of the lower part of the continent, by men of consequence, who use them for the most part as bodyguards. These slaves have personal liberty but no rights of marriage or property. As far as one can learn they are usually well dressed, well treated, and well fed.

But not the so-called free men of the West Coast. In the English colonies servants are paid a maximum of three shillings a day (two is more frequent) and must board themselves. They have to keep their white clothes spotlessly clean and themselves ready to do any kind of work for any number of hours a day. Their women must prepared to obey the master and his friends, even to be him children and keep quiet about it. If a “boy” displeas his boss he is discharged and given a recommendation, call a “book,” so worded that no one else will hire him. O such was one of many who applied to me. His “book written in polite English, informed me that anyone hirin him did so at his own risk. The boy was hungry; he ha had no work for weeks.

An American who lived in Nigeria told me that came home at half-past one in the morning and found h boy waiting for him for the single purpose of taking off h boots. The boy was asleep. He kicked him down the ste and out of his service.

At another place my daughter and I purchased six sma wine glasses. One native was sent to some distance to ge another native to carry our package a few yards for us t our boat. In Nigeria I saw two Englishmen with limbe swagger sticks switching and cutting the legs of native boy and girls from eight to sixteen years old, to make the hasten their work of carrying on their head two five-gallo cans of gasoline in one box the three hundred yards o more to the warehouse. I mentioned this to an older man “Nearly all the young ones behave that way when the first come out here,” he said; “we older men don’t bothe to. Of course it is unfortunate at a time of unrest suc as the present.” The natives were in more or less ope rebellion at the time against insufferable taxation, whic they claimed was mostly beneficial to British commerce “But you know that is the reason we can endure condition of residence here. It is the power we have over the natives If we lifted our hand to do anything they’d simply have n respect for us.” That is the attitude in the British colonies. Give the native enough education, civil and political, to mak a British subject of him, let him handle property that is no otherwise wanted, tax him all he will stand, send him t hospitals to keep the country fairly healthy, give him a whistle to his policeman’s uniform, but let him know fo all time who is master.

In the French colonies conditions are worse. Education is neglected, the native has little civic opportunity, and there is lacking even that palliative care which the British have provided. On the Gold Coast we saw forty men from the hills, forced labor, taken from their homes and occupations by contract with their chief. They were hitched by long chains to a mahogany log sixteen feet long and five feet thick and compelled by an overseer with an old-fashioned blacksnake whip in his hand to haul that log from where it had been tumbled off a railroad flat-car over sand and underbrush a good thousand feet to the sea, where it was finally launched, chained to nine or ten others dragged down the same way by the same gang. Some of the men were emaciated, some had legs covered with ulcers, some stumbled and fell, rising again and struggling forward as the attentive overseer drew near. We did not see him beat

☐ RESORTS ☐

THE LAKE VIEW

Rebecca Silver

Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine
Moderate Rates
59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

SONAQUA CLUB

Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

SPORTS	Special Feature
Skating, Hiking,	Program Washington
Skiing, Tobagganing.	Birthday Weekend

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

FOR delightful winter outings, TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and supply expert instruction. Address: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone: Ridgefield 648.

ZINDOREST PARK

Monroe, N. Y. Phone: 122 F 3

A most gorgeous mansion situated on a beautiful 150 acres estate, surrounded by brooks, ponds, lake and forests. The ideal place for a good rest or short week-end. Jewish Cuisine. All outdoor sports on premises. 1½ hours on Erie R. R. or Route 17. Greyhound Busses (Capitol Bus Station) stop [illegible] ZINDOREST.

OPEN ALL YEAR

Re ST / CUPERATION / CREATION at THE CRYSTAL VILLA

Woodcliff Lake, N. J.
23 miles from N. Y. - Fare 90c.

Combines country pleasures with city conveniences. Ideal for convalescents. Cater to diets. Ice skating, bracing walks, wholesome Jewish-American table. Refinement. Congeniality. Write or phone, Park Ridge 404.

☐ TRAVEL ☐

EUROPE 33 days $255

ALL EXPENSES

20,000 satisfied members. Small parties. First class hotels. More motor travel. 250 tours, 26 days $235 to 104 days $890. Seven-country tour $345. Send for booklet.

COLLEGE TRAVEL CLUB
154 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

FOREMOST STUDENT TOURS

SHOPPERS' CORNER

If you would be sure of carefully selected

GENUINE NAVAJO RUGS

buy them direct from the

U. S. LICENSED INDIAN TRADER

and Save Middleman's price

New York outlet for goods bought direct from the Indians at our licensed posts on Navajo Reservation of Arizona. Eighteen tribes represented in baskets, pottery, jewelry and bead work.

The Native American
510 Madison Avenue - New York

MISCELLANEOUS

A POOR, but not proud American couple, responsible for a modern educational enterprise in India, invite information from unselfish owners of volumes of biography, travel, sociology, psychology, science, poetry and the type of fiction readers of The Nation enjoy. Must be tempting bargains or outright donations. Write Box 288, c/o The Nation.

☐ EDUCATIONAL ☐

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

At COOPER UNION
8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock
Admission Free

Friday, Feb. 27
DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN
"The Humanization of Industry."
Sunday, March 1
PROFESSOR WM. P. MONTAGUE
"Morality without Law."
Tuesday, March [illegible]
PROFESSOR FREDERICK BARRY
"The History of Scientific Ideas: Basic Concepts."

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd Street, at 8:30 o'clock

Monday, March 2
DR. E. BOYD BARRETT
Modern Thinkers and Religion.
"Mumford, Krutch, Dreiser."
Wednesday, March [illegible]
MR. CLIFTON P. FADIMAN
Shifts in the American Novel.
"Three Farewells to Rebellion: Heminway, Roberts, Westcott."
Thursday, March [illegible]
PROFESSOR E. G. SPAULDING
Problems in Systematic Philosophy.
"What is Psychology? Does Consciousness exist?"
Saturday, March 7
DR. V. J. McGILL
Contemporary Philisophers and Their Doctrines.
"L. Wittgenstein."

THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB

2 West 64th St.
Sunday, March 1, 1931, at 4:30 P. M.
MIRZO AHMAD SOHRAB
Persia's Lecturer, Author, Poet, former Secretary of the Persian Legation, Washington, D. C.
Will talk on Story of "The Land of the Nightingale and the Roses"
(Persia's Past and Present, Customs and Manners, Etc.)
Tea Served Questions Fee to Non-Members 50c

FRENCH-SPANISH-ITALIAN

GERMAN. Private lessons 75c. (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Interesting conversational method. 19th years. Also neglected English education.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Victor records used. M. Jerlitzyn. 3 W. 122nd St. Tel. Harlem 7 - 5368.

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN GERMAN RUSSIAN

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons. 75c short courses, 9 to 9 daily. 22nd year.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th St.

FREE language course to anyone who secures a pupil for old established language school. Write W., 1517 3rd Ave., New York.

RUSSIAN, easy practical method by an experienced Russian gentleman, a graduate from the University of Chicago. Paul Haber, 39a Gramercy Park, N. Y. C.

RUSSIAN AMERICAN SCHOOL
(Russian language for Americans.)
Group and private lessons. Very reasonable.
CIVIC CLUB.
18 E. 10 St. Dayton 9 - 5191 or Jamaica 4993.

☐ REAL ESTATE ☐

IN ADIRONDACKS, 5-room real Log Cabin, modern, 18 ft. x 24 ft. living room, field-stone fireplace. Price $2,100. Cash $500. 6 years on balance. Earl Woodward, Luzerne, N. Y.

LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. Commodious 8-room cottage completely furnished, electric light, running water, 3 acres woodland, shore. Will rent for season. James T. Kemp, Orange, Conn.

CAMP for sale or lease; bungalows to hire; fully equipped for all sports; mile lake; near Woodstock Art Colony; sacrifice; consider suitable terms; artists, authors, etc. Box 289, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT, summer of 1931, well-equipped camp in the lake district of northern Jersey, suitable for adults or children. Accommodates 30. Hudson Guild, 436 West 27th Street. Chickering 4 - 8754.

APARTMENTS

FURNISHED APARTMENT: entire floor, three rooms, complete kitchenette, refrigeration, roof playground, privileges of cooperative garden in small group of artists and writers' homes; Greenwich Village, $125. Chelsea 3 - 7970, or Box 290 c/o The Nation.

ROOMS

CHARMING room in private family for refined business couple. Away from hustle and noise of New York. Environment conducive to relaxation. Adjacent to Weequahic Park, Newark. Convenient commuting. Waverly 2 - 8870.

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY-STENOGRAPHER, extensive experience with prominent writers, part-time preferred. Manuscripts typed, careful, accurate work. German translations. Highest references. Riverside 8966. Box 275, c/o The Nation.

WELL known Little Theatre director (woman) available for summer camp proposition in dramatics, either adult or girls camp. Write Box 286, c/o The Nation.

EMPLOYMENT desired at or near New York or Philadelphia. Mere existing wage will be a favor. I [illegible] a writer (free thinker) who desires to wage the battle for recognition on the immediate field—Eastern Publications. I write short stories, which I have not heretofore tried to market. Box 287, c/o The Nation.

?

A Summer House?
A Place for the Children?
Sublet Your City Apartment?

State your wants in a small classified advertisement in The Nation. (Get results.)

Minimum 30 words, $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents.

"I believe you would like to know, and I am happy to tell you, that through a classified advertisement in THE NATION I rented my furnished apartment for the summer to most reliable people. Moreover, my tenant is one of a number of eligible persons who called in answer to my notice.

It is a great satisfaction to use a medium which eliminates a large class of undesirables and focuses the attention of the NATION-reader type."

THE NATION
20 Vesey St. Fitz Roy 8-9074

them, but the whip cracked accompaniment to his loud language. Those men were paid one to four francs a day (the franc was then worth four cents) at the end of some months of labor. They were housed in filthy quarters, and fed dried fish and rice once, sometimes twice, a day. Dried fish and rice! The white man's alibi. Diseases of malnutrition, tuberculosis, unhealed wounds. Unspeakable wretchedness. Fearful neglect in the native hospitals, especially the French, where white doctors experiment or ignore and the sometimes uncannily skilled native doctor is debarred.

Dried fish and rice again on the ships, where overcrowding and overwork are incessant, where even the steam to cook the food is often turned on too late, and sometimes not at all, and the chief engineer cuts down the fresh water to save that much expense. That happened on our ship. Our chief was a Greek and violently hated all black men. Native West Africans, who are very clean, require and are allowed daily fresh water for drinking and bathing. It amounts to about five quarts a day. In the hottest weather, when they were working between-decks twelve to sixteen hours a day on palm oil, they were refused this ludicrously small amount of water because the chief had not bought water enough at Lagos and would not run the condenser. He ran among them swearing like a madman, and had to be pulled off the deck by the chief mate, who, with the captain, happened to be humane.

Everything depends upon the ship's officers, for the men work every hatch, and consequently under many masters. Many officers approve of or condone slavery, and here is their chance to demonstrate. And a whining native or a persistent or rebellious one simply loses his job for all time.

Some German ships give their men medical attention; they say it pays. Yet when one native on our ship had his entire leg split open and his toe crushed by a defective link from a hoisting chain, it was only through personal influence that I was able even to get two weeks' hospital expenses from the company, and two weeks' pay out of three months' time lost. Had he died, of course, it would have been that much saved.

The West African, as I have said, is clean and dirty. His experience with animal parasites in the jungle and his water life make him clean. Deny him the facilities and he at once becomes filthy. Naturally he is a simple, childish creature. Give him an example of drunkenness, licentiousness, and cruelty, and with his inborn dramatic sense he will out-Caesar Caesar and become insufferable.

He is superstitious and suspicious, but nevertheless tolerant, owing perhaps to his ignorance, perhaps to that native grace and dignity which so often puts to shame the red-faced white man bawling epithets. He is revengeful, and here he is foolish too, for his scheming is not clever enough to redress his wrongs, and his spite is vented too often upon his own race, preventing that cohesion among tribes which is so vitally necessary to freedom.

All this being true—and let us even suppose that it is only partially true—it is obvious that a mere Anglo-American protectorate to restrain slavery in Liberia offers no solution. Belgium has by no means turned over a new leaf in the Congo. In Portuguese Angola there is complete neglect. Germany, the least tarred, should have a voice. Why not once and for all hand over the matter to the League of Nations?

REAL HARRIS TWEED Direct from the Makers. Suit-lengths by Mail. Postage Paid. Samples free on stating shades desired, and if for Gents or Ladies wear. JAMES ST. TWEED DEPOT, 150 Stornoway, Scotland.

An ideal place for winter vacations. ¶WESTERN VIEW FARM, New Milford, Conn., 83 miles from Columbus Circle, elevation 1000 feet. ¶Hospitality that is unique. It brings back friends year after year. Eleventh season. ¶Riding, mountain climbing, winter sports, or rest and quiet if you want it. ¶Interesting people. ¶Rates $8 a day, $49 a week. Telephone New Milford 440.

□ OPEN SHELF □

Millie Bruhl Fredrick
Writes an absorbing
NOVEL of Love
ON CONTRACT
The STRATFORD CO. BOSTON $2.00
On Sale at leading Book Stores

THE BOOKS YOU CAN'T GET ELSEWHERE

may be rented for a nominal fee. Members throughout the United States have access to a large collection of rare, scarce, out-of-print, strange and curious books; limited, privately-printed editions, unabridged translations and extraordinary new books. Please state occupation or profession when writing for information and lists.

Esoterika Biblion Society
45 West 45th Street, Dep't N-6 New York City

FREUD

"Modern Sexual Morality and Modern Nervousness" by Dr. Sigmund Freud, the discoverer of the science of psychoanalysis; reveals the deep, penetrating power of psychoanalysis and the complete revolution necessary in dealing with modern sexual morality.

This important book, finely printed and handsomely bound, will be sent prepaid, to adults only, upon receipt of only $1.00. Every serious-minded man and woman should have a copy.

Eugenics Pub. Co., 250 W. 54th St., Dept. F7, N. Y.

ATHEISM

Book catalog FREE. Tracts, 10c.
Am. Assn. for Adv. of Atheism.
[redacted] E. 14th St., New York, N. Y.

SAVE ON BOOKS
RENT OR BUY!

Latest books delivered to your door by messenger in MANHATTAN. Out-of-town by parcel post (transit time allowed). 20% membership discount on purchases. Weekly or semi-monthly service . . . Start and stop when you choose . . . Send for FREE current list of 350 new titles, fiction and non-fiction, and monthly bargain list.

The BOOK-A-WEEK SERVICE
(Dept. 71) 45 W. 45th St., N.Y.C.

25c Per Week RENTAL

CURIOUS BOOKS

Privately printed limited editions. Unexpurgated translations. Esoterica.
Send for Catalogue
The Falstaff Press
Dept. N., [redacted] Fifth Ave., New York

VITAL, FASCINATING, AUTHENTIC!
Avoid a Life of Misery! read
LOVE, MARRIAGE and DIVORCE
By JUDGE LOUIS HARRIS
$2.50 at Bookstores, or direct from
THE STRATFORD CO., Publishers
289 Congress St., Boston, Mass.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1931 No. 3427

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 257
EDITORIALS:
  Congress Adjourns 260
  The End of the World 261
  A Living Judge 262
ENGLAND FIGHTS ON. By Oswald Garrison Villard 263
HARD TIMES AND HARD FACTS. By Mauritz A. Hallgren 266
HOOVER SUFFERS IN THE HOUSE. By Paul Y. Anderson 268
THE CHICAGO CIRCUS. By W. A. S. Douglas 269
NEGRO CHAIN STORES. By H. M. Foster 271
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 272
CORRESPONDENCE 273
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 274
BOOKS, ART, MUSIC, DRAMA:
  Praise. By Mark Van Doren 275
  Counterblast. By Josephine Herbst 275
  Men in Ships. By Eugene Löhrke 276
  Exploiting the Indian. By John Collier 277
  Lafcadio Hearn. By Matthew Josephson 277
  Notes on Fiction 278
  Music: Stravinsky. By Arthur Mendel 279
  Art: Collectivistic Images. By Paul Rosenfeld 280
  Drama: Rosalba and Virginio. By Mark Van Doren 282

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

* Absent in Europe.

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

CONGRESS, as we go to press, is within a few hours of adjournment, with a veto of the Muscle Shoals bill momentarily expected, and with the fate of the Wagner employment-exchange bill at the President's hands in doubt. With all routine legislation out of the way, and with the veterans'-loan measure overwhelmingly passed over the President's veto, the Vestal copyright bill, pending in the Senate, and the lame-duck Congress measure, deadlocked between House and Senate, are among the measures of importance likely to be lost in the last-hour jam. Senator Norris, not without humor, sent the President word that he would resign if the President would sign the Muscle Shoals bill, induce his House followers to yield on the lame-duck measure, and appoint the Nebraskan chairman of the Muscle Shoals board with power to choose his colleagues. The President's veto of the Senator's offer will doubtless be tinged with regret. A hope for better things in the new Congress may be seen in the conference of Progressives summoned for March 11-12 to consider a legislative program. The subjects specified are unemployment and industrial stabilization, public utilities, agriculture, the tariff, and the return to representative government. The call is signed by Senators Norris, Cutting, La Follette, and Wheeler, and Senator-elect Costigan, and Governors Roosevelt, Pinchot, La Follette, Olson, and Meier are among those invited. If the progressives can agree on a well-considered legislative program, they may make the new Congress a notable one.

THE REAL PURPOSE of the European grain conferences held at Paris, according to the semi-official Temps, was to extend a larger measure of political stability to the Eastern European states. Called nominally to consider disposal of the 1930 surplus and future surpluses of the so-called Danubian grain-producing countries — Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Jugoslavia — the conferences actually faced the economic danger of agricultural bankruptcy in those states, which among them are reported to be carrying a farm debt of nearly $1,200,000,000, and the political danger that the countries may fall into the lap of Russia. The proposals put forward were for some kind of European agreement to absorb the grain surplus of the Danubian states, and the establishment of an agricultural loan bank under the auspices of the League of Nations for the purpose of fortifying their agriculture and at the same time "strengthening their military position so as to be better able to overcome communistic tendencies," according to a frank dispatch in the New York Times. With none of the leading exporters—Russia, Canada, the United States, and Argentina—represented at these conferences, and with Great Britain and even France itself professing inability for special reasons to bind themselves to take any of the current year's Danubian surplus, it is not strange that the practical economic results were rather less than negligible.

THE ECONOMIC POSITION of the Danubian wheat-growers is impossible. According to figures presented at Paris, world wheat shipments to Europe from August 1 to February 19 last reached the large total of 354,000,000 bushels, of which Russia furnished nearly 86,000,000, and it is estimated that Russia's exports may reach double that amount in 1931-32. In addition, Canada, the United States, and Argentina, always heavy exporters, have unusually large stocks on hand, the greater part of which is ultimately destined for the European market. The Federal Farm Board, to the dismay and, it is reported, the anger of the Paris delegates, has announced its purpose to sell abroad during the next four months up to 35,000,000 bushels of the huge stocks that it holds—which plan the Europeans unkindly compare with Russian "dumping." The board's action may well be only the first step in getting out of the impossible situation in which its disastrous efforts to keep up prices have placed it, and no disclaimers can prevent the inevitable effect on prices if the board does decide actually to liquidate its holdings. Add to all these difficulties the fact that Danubian wheat is of lower milling quality than the best of the Russian and overseas supplies, and the further fact that the European importers, whatever their political sympathies, are ultimately going to buy wheat where they can get it best and cheapest, and it is plain that no conference is going to be able to keep up prices for the wheat-growers of France's East European allies and satellites. International economic organization is becoming as necessary as it has hitherto been impossible. That lesson ought not to be forgotten when the world grain conference opens at Rome on March 26.

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE blocked an eleventh-hour effort of big-navy advocates to get additional building appropriations by declaring flatly that he would support no such expenditures until the navy had made its building program clear. The bill authorizing modernization of the battleships Idaho, New Mexico, and Mississippi at a cost of $30,000,000 was signed by the President on Saturday, and an item of $10,000,000 for beginning the work was inserted by the conferees in the second deficiency bill. With its carry-over from last year the navy is estimated to have available for construction, including modernization work, a total of $68,000,000—which is $68,000,000 too much, but is distinctly better than what was threatened a short time since. The big-navy propaganda of the past few weeks has largely failed of its purpose. While the modernization of the three battleships will waste $30,000,000 and will make so much the harder the abolition of the battleship at the conference of 1935, we may at least be grateful that Congress has thus far resisted the temptation to build up to the treaty limit.

DETAILS OF THE PLOT to defeat Senator Norris for reelection in Nebraska have now been made public in a report by the Nye investigating committee. The report refers to "the obstacles of evasion and perjury encountered by the committee," declares that practices were disclosed "which appear to be as reprehensible as any of the better-known forms of fraud and corruption," and finally suggests that the committee was able "to establish the principal facts and identify many of the principal actors, even if the 'master minds' which conceived and directed [the plot] have not yet been fully revealed." One of these principal actors, the report states, was Robert H. Lucas, executive director of the Republican National Committee, who is said to have spent $4,000 secretly last year in the fight against Senator Norris. By this action, the committee asserts, Lucas is "chargeable with wilful violation of the Corrupt Practices Act." This is a serious charge. The Senate has the power, and it should press this accusation in the courts. Lucas, too, cannot afford to let the allegation go by unchallenged. It is not sufficient for him to announce through the Republican National Committee that he has reported all his expenditures in Nebraska in accordance with the law. If he is innocent of any wrongdoing he ought to insist that all the records be made public.

THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT a few days ago ordered an embargo on Russian coal, wood pulp, pulpwood, lumber and timber of all kinds, furs, and asbestos. Although there has been considerable agitation for a similar embargo by the United States, the campaign has so far been unsuccessful. The Kendall bill, which was designed primarily to keep out almost all Russian goods, has been killed by a Senate committee, and it may be presumed that no further action in this direction will be taken until Congress reconvenes in December. The reasons for this action are not, of course, to be found in any political friendship for Soviet Russia that may exist here, nor can the committee's action be wholly explained by the fact that certain powerful American corporations stood in danger of having valuable contracts for the sale of machinery and other goods to Moscow canceled were the embargo to be laid down. The truth is that many business interests, because they themselves profit greatly by the importation of products from other countries where convict or forced labor is employed, are opposed to restricting trade with Russia on the ground that Russian labor might not be entirely free. It was the cigar manufacturers whose influence really killed the Kendall bill. Sumatra tobacco is used as a wrapper for at least half the cigars made in this country, and it is a notorious fact that the labor used in the Sumatra tobacco fields is anything but "free." Many other American business interests are in a similar position.

THE SENATE in a sharply worded resolution has by unanimous consent expressed disapproval of the State Department practice, in effect since 1922, of passing on foreign loans offered by bankers in this country, and of the department's action in forbidding Federal Reserve officials to serve on the international bank. The resolution reads:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Department of State, having no legal sanction for the action mentioned in S. Res. 293 with respect to investment securities offered in the money markets of the United States by foreign governments, corporations, or individuals, should desist from the dangerous practice of involving the United States government in any responsibility of whatever nature, either by approval or disapproval, for foreign investment loans floated in this country; and should refrain from assuming authority over the Federal Reserve Board and banks or officials thereof with respect to matters which, by express authority of law, are confided to them and not to the Department of State.

The State Department thus far has given no indication of any intention to change its practice, and Senator Glass, introducer of the original resolution, threatens legislation to "penalize any governmental officials thus undertaking a lawless defiance of the Congress." State Department action on foreign loans privately offered here has been the object of continued criticism during the past ten years, and recent revelations of commissions (not to call them bribes) paid to officials of foreign governments in connection with recent loans in Peru, Italy, and Panama have increased public sensitiveness in this regard.

SIR OSWALD MOSLEY is persistent if not yet statistically influential, and his call for the formation of a new British political party makes it clear that he does not propose, if he can help it, to allow his earlier manifesto to pass as a mere flash in the pan or to abandon his efforts to pull British politics and industry out of the ruts. There is something of rhetoric, no doubt, in his assertion that "the nation drifts, in hopelessness and despair, to industrial failure and unemployment, followed by wage cuts and an all-round reduction in the standard of life which the government, without a policy, is unable to prevent," but his critics will be hard put to it to show that his diagnosis is not substantially correct. The MacDonald Government, certainly, has little to its credit as far as its treatment of the economic situation is concerned, and its reported intention to drop the trade-disputes bill in the face of a Liberal amendment which might make any strike illegal does not show much of the old Labor fighting disposition. Sir Oswald is less convincing in his proposal of a super-Cabinet and a comprehensive scheme of national economic planning, and although he denounces both protectionism and free trade he does not point out exactly what he would put in their place. His call for a new party, however, comes at a time when national dissatisfaction with existing parties is increasingly marked, when the domestic policies of the Labor Government are spelled only in terms of drift, and when the youth movement, to whose support Sir Oswald particularly appeals, is openly critical of parliamentary institutions. There is material here for revolutionary change, even though Sir Oswald should not succeed in mobilizing it.

"ACCORD IN PRINCIPLE" is one of those diplomatic phrases which may mean much or little, and until the details of the naval agreement which has been reached by France and Italy are made public we shall not know in what way the differences which have kept those Powers from accepting the limitations of the London naval treaty have been reconciled. The speculations of newspaper correspondents, doubtless based in part upon hints let drop by some of the negotiators, suggest that the two countries may not continue their competitive naval building after this year, that France is prepared to accept a material reduction in the tonnage figures which it put forward at the London conference, and that the fundamental issue of parity is to be allowed to rest until 1936, when the London treaty comes up for reconsideration. If these results turn out to have been attained, the cause of naval reduction and limitation will have been advanced and an irritating political situation in Europe will have been adjusted. The American and Japanese governments, of course, are also to be heard from, since their assent would be necessary if the adhesion of France and Italy to the London treaty is to be in any way qualified. Mr. Arthur Henderson's unexpected intervention in the Franco-Italian controversy suggests that something pretty serious had developed. His success, if the agreement goes through, will still further enhance his reputation as an able and high-minded diplomatist.

IN INDIA, Lord Irwin, representing the British Empire, and Gandhi, speaking for Indian independence, have been trying for many days to find a basis for compromise and peace. They have divided so far on at least three questions. Gandhi demands an outside inquiry into police excesses in the present civil-disobedience campaign; Lord Irwin offers a departmental inquiry into any specific charges. The Nationalist leader asks the right to continue the boycott campaign against British goods; the Empire replies that it would be unthinkable to permit the Congress Party or any other group to tear down the British commercial trade which has been 150 years in building. Gandhi asks that Indians be permitted to make their own salt; the Viceroy replies that the salt-revenue law can be changed only by the legislature. Perhaps the deficit of almost $55,000,000 in the Indian budget now before the legislative assembly has some bearing also on this matter of the salt tax, which yields about 7 per cent of the Indian revenues. The issue between independence and empire could not be more clearly drawn than it is in these three questions. The Nationalists, with their avowed aim of sovereignty, can scarcely withdraw their demands. The Empire, being an empire, can scarcely grant them. The conversations had not ended at this writing, although there are reports that an agreement on the salt tax has actually been reached. One can only hope that good-will and patience, of which Lord Irwin and Gandhi have a remarkable share, may be able to accomplish what cold logic seems to make impossible.

NEVADA is having to look to its laurels in the matter of easy divorce. Arkansas and Idaho, enticed by the business that would-be divorcés brought to Reno, have recently enacted or have pending divorce laws substantially identical with those of Nevada. Under these laws a ninety-day residence is all that will be necessary in those States before divorce proceedings may be brought, on fairly liberal grounds. But Nevada is not going to give in without a struggle; a bill has been introduced in the legislature reducing the necessary residence period to six weeks; and State Senator Bush, probably in one of his lighter moments, has proposed that divorces in Nevada be granted by mail, with no residence required at all. This would certainly simplify matters very nicely and is worth the attention of States which want to capture the divorce business. In Nevada in 1928 there were more than ten times as many divorces per 1,000 of the population as in any other State in the union; and at that, the total was only 2,595 divorces, half as many as in New York State for the same year, and only 1.2 per cent of the total for the United States. It is evident that a ninety-day residence period is not easy enough to capture the bulk of the industry. But after all, it is not residence but climate that really matters. We suggest that all American divorces be granted at Miami Beach, time of residence immaterial except that a good coat of tan be prerequisite to a final decree. The Swedish system of merely registering intention to terminate a marriage is a little too honest and simple for American taste. But if we must be intricate, let us be comfortable as well.

BEFORE A PACKED AUDIENCE of the American Union of Decorative Artists and Craftsmen in New York City, Lewis Mumford openly challenged the disinterestedness of the architectural committee of the 1933 World's Fair in Chicago for omitting Frank Lloyd Wright. The effort at a "modern" fair without Wright, the veteran leader of modernism, Mumford compared to "Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark." We have no desire to go into the details of the other speeches of a warm evening, since the subject was first opened in these pages in an article in the issue of December 3, 1930, by Douglas Haskell. Of immediate interest, however, was Raymond Hood's reply as a member of the committee. He offered the observation that genius is hard to work with; and then he mentioned with some disdain that Wright's advocates seemed to be writing men. Might this not rather indicate a good case for Wright? The architects of the committee are presumably honest, but what with their triple interests as business men, professional men, and artists, the addition of the new role of critic might conceivably put a strain upon their vision. In disinterested and permanent reference works such men as Fiske Kimball, Dean Edgell, Henry-Russell Hitchcock, not to mention the foreign authorities, have all—whether they liked his work or not—devoted lengthy discussions to Wright, pioneer and leader in the modern movement. The committee's reasoning under the circumstances seems trivial and irrelevant.

PUBLIC

Congress Adjourns

WE hope we shall never tire of defending Congress, not this or that particular Congress, but rather our representative national legislature as an idea and an ideal, for to this body we must look for genuine progress in our national affairs. Nevertheless, we feel that we cannot stretch our sympathy in this respect to cover the lame-duck session just closing; we view the passing of this session with small regret. It accomplished little of permanent value; it left much undone that needed its attention; it lost itself in the political strategy incidental to the 1932 Presidential campaign; it lacked the moral courage to overcome the opposition of a reactionary President, and it found itself unable to move forward in the face of the campaign of vilification conducted against it by big business and the daily press. Had it been spared the abuse heaped upon it by the newspapers, the White House, and some of its own members, and had it taken its responsibilities to the country as seriously as it did the commands of the political managers who are forever engaged in the game of President-making, a more encouraging report of its activities might have been written, for there is no denying that in this session there were plenty of opportunities for constructive achievement, and not a few men who were honestly anxious to get something done.

It was apparent from the start, however, that the short session would not get very far. In the Republican ranks there was no disposition at any time to get down to work. Hostility to Mr. Hoover and a fear that positive legislation might hurt them in 1932 were among the reasons why the majority adopted a do-nothing policy. The Democrats followed like tactics in their overwhelming desire to convince the conservatives of the country that the government would be safe in their hands. These minority members renounced their alliance with the insurgent group in order to make the Democratic Party appear as acceptable as may be humanly possible to the industrial and financial interests which heretofore have been content to rule with Republican help. The Progressives, without leadership or program to begin with, suffered heavily from this desertion. They could not even keep their own following together, splitting on every important vote, save one, that was taken in the short session.

The net results of the lame-duck session may be put into three categories. First, two more or less progressive measures were adopted: the Muscle Shoals bill, which could not have gone through had Senator Norris's great faith wavered for a moment; and the Wagner employment-exchange bill, which was fathered not by an insurgent, but by a Tammany Democrat. Second, the necessary supply bills, all that Mr. Hoover really wanted out of this session, were approved without difficulty. Third, the veterans'-loan measure was twice railroaded through both houses, the second time over Mr. Hoover's veto. There was also some minor legislation, such as the $115,000,000 public-works appropriation and the several millions voted for loans to drought-stricken farmers, but the importance of these measures was inflated by White House ballyhoo far beyond their real significance. Legislation that fell by the wayside included proposals to abolish the lame-duck session of Congress, to curb the injunction evil, to remedy defects in the anti-trust laws, to regulate motor-bus transportation, to reconsider railroad consolidation, to provide for banking and credit reforms, and to approve membership in the World Court. Moreover, and of greater significance, the short session failed to adopt any worth-while legislation bearing upon the economic depression, and it almost completely ignored the needs of the six or seven million jobless workers and their dependents. Except for the Wagner bill and the meager sums voted at Mr. Hoover's request, Congress seems not to have recognized that we are in the throes of a severe economic depression, that our economic system is on trial, and that our business and financial leaders have shown neither willingness nor ability to remedy the all-too-glaring defects in this system. It must be said to the credit of a few men like Senator La Follette, however, that all through the session they battled valiantly to have the government assume its full share of responsibility in the economic crisis.

All the Presidential nominations were approved by the Senate, although its confirmation of the three federal power commissioners was later recalled. The appointment of one of these men, George Otis Smith, is now hanging fire. Following its custom, the Senate accepted the several nominations with almost no effort to determine whether the men were in every way qualified to administer the offices to which they were appointed. In each case the Senate seemed content to vote its approval when it could find no scandal in the man's record. Only to this extent could there be said to have been anything resembling harmony between the Senate and the White House. In the lower branch Mr. Hoover fared much better until the last fortnight of the session. His three lieutenants, Longworth, Tilson, and Snell, kept the House submissive until the veterans'-loan bill came to a vote, and then the Hoover control fell to pieces. The effect of this collapse was seen a few days later when the House refused to accept the Doak substitute for the Wagner bill, which the Administration attempted to force upon Congress at the last moment in the hope of killing the latter measure.

The record of this session offers a sound argument for the abolition of lame-duck Congresses. The biggest problem before it was that presented by the economic depression; yet its achievements in this field are hardly worth noting. It virtually wasted three months while the new Congress, elected last November when the voters suffering from the hard times registered a marked desire for a change in the Washington government, was kept cooling its heels on the doorstep of the Capitol. There is little likelihood that the President will call this new Congress into session before December. Meanwhile the politicians will be grooming their candidates for the 1932 campaign, and our national welfare, because of the lack of foresight upon the part of Congress, will be left largely in the hands of a President who has revealed that he lacks understanding of our economic and social problems.

The End of the World

BY midnight on February 26 the devoted staff of the New York World had written their last copy, had read their last proof; the presses were thundering for the last time so that some 300,000 readers might, on the morning of Friday, February 27, hold in their hands the last edition of what had been one of the great American newspapers. And although two decades of persistent newspaper consolidation and elimination should have prepared us for the merger of the World and the Telegram, the swallowing up of the morning World has generated a profound sadness, a keen sense of loss, as when an old and close friend departs forever from his former associates and environs.

The World will be missed. Not the Evening World, which, despite its comfortable advertising revenue and its increasingly intelligent and liberal editorial page, has never shared in the fame of its namesake in the morning field; surely not the Sunday World, with its cheap features, crude cartoons, "comics," and want of genuine news. But the familiar head, the familiar front page, the familiar contributors of the morning edition—their loss will be as deeply felt as would the loss of any single newspaper in the country. This is not to say that the World was a perfect newspaper, a completely noble and successful exemplar of the liberal journalistic tradition. It fell many times from grace—through inconsistency, through lack of force and emphasis, through bad judgment or a failure to get or recognize the news. But now that it is gone, these faults somehow seem less important than they did; and by contrast the World's many virtues shine out.

For forty-eight years the World has been a force to reckon with in New York and in national politics. Joseph Pulitzer, when he bought it in 1883, made many compromises with yellow journalism in order to obtain the gains in circulation and revenue that he needed. But in spite of the sensationalism that colored the World's first years, and that never entirely left it, it emerged more and more as a crusader in the battle against privilege and on the side of those who wished to see ancient American liberties preserved. Moreover, it did not hesitate to introduce the personal note in its pages, to write not only "human-interest" stories—too many of them sometimes—but to attach to its staff columnists and contributors who established themselves firmly as personalities with ideas that became a literary necessity to many thousands of daily readers. Why then has the World failed? Why were not the high principles of its founder and the efforts of his successors sufficient to keep the wolf from the door and the consolidator from the parlor?

The reason lies partly in an adherence to the same principles which Joseph Pulitzer, while he lived, carried on so effectively. In the twenty years since his death, journalism, like every other profession and industry, has undergone various and violent changes. Owning and managing a newspaper in these days is big business. A metropolitan daily today requires a capital of millions of dollars, a staff of thousands of men and women; and properly to manage this great business takes vision, strength, courage, and brains. Ralph Pulitzer, in his statement before Surrogate Foley on February 24, said with some justice that the World had fallen between two stools—the "quality" papers like the Times and the Herald Tribune, and the tabloids. Although he did not say so, it is evident that the insistence of Joseph Pulitzer on a "highbrow" editorial page and "lowbrow" news pages was a limitation on the recent managers of the World. This is an example both of the weight of the "dead hand" on an enterprise and of the unfortunate results of lack of force and foresight. For, given the brutal competition and increased size of the newspapers of today, nobody would have been more shrewd to modify a policy than Joseph Pulitzer. His successors did not have the courage and acumen to proceed as it was imperative for them to proceed if the World was to be a success.

During the years when the morning World was losing circulation and advertising, other papers were steadily gaining. Mr. Ochs had made his Times indispensable for those whose business or interest it was to keep abreast of the news. The Herald Tribune forged steadily ahead—in the main by making itself a better and fuller newspaper. The World made the fatal mistake of trying to recoup its losses by unwise economies. Less news rather than more appeared in its pages; less rather than more competent persons were chosen for its staff—because they cost less. The inevitable result was more losses instead of fewer. The World was visibly declining, it weighed less, both in avoirdupois and in intellectual content. More than that, its editorial policy became more uncertain. One could never be quite sure just how long it would maintain any given position, what hurdle in the race it would finally fail to take. Some of this sad decline may have been due to the infinite difficulties of publishing a newspaper in a large city amid fierce competition; much of it must have been due to ineptitude, bad judgment, bad management. The chief trouble lies probably in the fact that Joseph Pulitzer was an inspired journalist with a consuming passion for his newspapers, and that his sons who succeeded him were something less.

Two things offer themselves as partial consolation for the loss of the World. One is that the Scripps-Howard organization, which has taken over the New York Pulitzer holdings, is admirably fitted to carry on the liberal tradition which the World stood for. The other heartening fact is the distribution by the Pulitzers of $500,000 to World employees who have not found other work. Nor should the attempt on the part of these same employees themselves to buy and operate the papers be overlooked. This spontaneous and sincere effort to keep the World from an untimely death was infinitely heart-warming, even though probably predoomed to failure. Messages came in from all over the globe pledging money and other assistance to the proposed venture. Everybody on the staff down to the last office boy was eager to help, not only because this was a way of preserving a job, but because the World stood for something above and beyond its mere paper and ink. The World was an institution; it was even a grand institution, not without faults, not without many virtues. Reluctantly and with a full heart we bid it an honorable and affectionate farewell.

A Living Judge

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES is just completing his ninetieth year. March 8 is the anniversary of a great judge, a great American, a great human being. Distinguished as volunteer soldier, as lawyer, as professor, as justice and chief justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, Justice Holmes came to the Supreme Bench of the United States in 1902, at an age when the ordinary man is already thinking of retirement. Since that time this extraordinary man has put in almost three decades of the most exacting labor, contributing to the work of the Supreme Court a long series of opinions—too often, alas, in dissent—whose grasp of relevant fact, whose divination of underlying issues, whose keen logic in dividing the true from the false have been matched only by their luminous exposition of legal principles and their unfailing beauty of literary style. No man has contributed in more important fashion to the social thought of the United States during the twentieth century; none has influenced more profoundly the minds of those men whose thinking is to shape the America of the future.

Justice Holmes has been a great judge because he was first a quietly great man, filled with an irrepressible intellectual zest and unflagging enthusiasm for life. As he put it in one of his sparkling occasional addresses:

> The chief worth of civilization is just that it makes the means of living more complex; that it calls for great and combined intellectual efforts, instead of simple, uncoordinated ones. . . . Such efforts mean more life. Life is an end in itself, and the only question as to whether it is worth living is whether you have enough of it.

For ninety years this eternally young man has had "enough of it":

> With all humility, I think "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might" infinitely more important than the vain effort to love one's neighbor as one's self. If you want to hit a bird on the wing, you must have your will in a focus, you must not be thinking about yourself, and, equally, you must not be thinking about your neighbor; you must be living in your eye on that bird. Every achievement is a bird on the wing.

The influence of Justice Holmes has been due, however, not only to his character, to the quality of his thought, and to his sympathetic understanding of the modern world in which we live, but also to his rare power and skill of literary expression. Truly enough does Felix Frankfurter say: "He has built himself into the structure of our national life. He has written himself into the slender volume of the literature of all time." In the midst of one of Justice Holmes's legal opinions we read: "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged; it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used." Compare the hammer-like force of this sentence: "But whatever the consequences we must accept the plain meaning of plain words." How often has he managed in a single phrase to illumine a whole realm of facts and ideas: "The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics"; "It will take more than the Nineteenth Amendment to convince me that there are no differences between men and women, or that legislation cannot take them into account"; "There is nothing that I more deprecate than the use of the Fourteenth Amendment beyond the absolute compulsion of its words to prevent the making of social experiments that an important part of the community desires, in the insulated chambers afforded by the several States."

But after all it is as a judge that Justice Holmes has made his deepest impress on our life and thought—and that because he has had so sound a conception of the place of law and the judge in the process of living:

> There is, too, a peculiar logical pleasure in making manifest the continuity between what we are doing and what has been done before. But the present has a right to govern itself so far as it can; and it ought always to be remembered that historic continuity with the past is not a duty, it is only a necessity.

Over and over, when his brethren of the bench have swept aside some mere legislative enactment for its contravention of those absolute principles of justice of which they are the sole repository, Holmes has set up against them his marvelous fiction of what a reasonable man might believe, and their absolutism has crumbled into dust—even though their decision, not his, was the law.

He has stood always for the right of social experiment. But if he has never been a dogmatist or an absolutist, yet he has always clung passionately to the basic principle of freedom on which a worthy society must be built. In his dissent in the case of Rosika Schwimmer he declares:

> Some of her answers might excite popular prejudice, but if there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate.

And again in the Abrams dissent:

> Every year if not every day we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purpose of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country.

Never was there a time when we Americans and the peoples of the world at large needed more than today the profound faith in freedom that lies at the heart of the work of Justice Holmes. From both the left and the right that faith is assailed. In the East is heard the muttering thunder of revolution; in the West men watch in terror the threatened collapse of old economic arrangements and political institutions. And in the intervals they hear siren voices that sing of something sweeter than liberty. But they are false voices. Well for America and for the world if our people turn a deaf ear to their song and listen instead to the words of this wise, strong, and fearless American.

England Fights On

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, February 18

HOW fares England? Is her situation as grave as it appears to the outsider who reads that there are more than two and a half million unemployed, with the Treasury facing at the moment a deficit of at least $150,000,000 and the probability of a much larger one in the coming fiscal year; with one industrial dispute after another to engross the time and drain the strength of the leading ministers; with the insurance fund, which pays the doles, about to borrow $100,000,000 more; with innumerable wails from captains of industry, heads of banks, and chairmen of railroads to the effect that the country is going to the dogs, and that the splendid old English character has undergone a sea change? Well, it would be idle to deny the gravity of the situation. For one thing Mr. Snowden has just officially vouched for it. England is a part of the European economic system, and that means that there cannot be health here if there is depression and retrogression in the economic life of other parts of Europe. But he would be foolish indeed who would yield to complete pessimism. One notices that the English have begun to complain, as they did not before; that they are finding it enormously difficult to adjust themselves to their new and secondary place in the world of finance and trade; that they have begun to lose faith somewhat in themselves and their manifest destiny. But that is a long way from saying that they are in as parlous a state of nerves as is Germany, or that their situation is as menacing as that of Italy.

England Will Muddle Through

For one thing, whatever the economic and political troubles, no one would think of suggesting that there is the least danger of revolution. That is in the air in some countries on the Continent, but no one dreams of it here. The Englishman does not think in terms of violence. If he is beginning to feel that he has got his back to the wall, he is none the less not in the least bit interested in those who urge him into revolutionary socialism, for example. Communism is making no headway here. So slight a menace to law and order is the huge army of unemployed that, as many of the readers of The Nation are aware, England has closed since the war twenty-one of its prisons for lack of occupants —a magnificent testimony to the most truly law-abiding and orderly people on earth. If it were not for the dole, of course—let Mr. Hoover take note—this record could not be cited. Indeed, everybody admits that there would be revolution here if the government did not recognize its every obligation to keep those of its citizens above water who through no fault of their own are unable to obtain any employment.

So one is far from saying that England will not muddle through, barring an economic catastrophe on the Continent which would draw the whole world into a fellow-suffering. Take the cotton dispute, which has just been settled by the amazing action of the employers in suddenly receding from there entire position, and castigating themselves in so doing in an almost unheard-of way. No one has maintained that the weavers were wholly in the right, but after reading the sensational speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of February 11, with its picture of the gravity of the British situation, the employers publicly apologized for their share in a dispute which they themselves stated centered upon a matter that was by no means important enough to cause the stoppage of an entire industry. The coal dispute in Wales, too, has been ended; no longer do the men stand idle in rain or shine in the streets of some of their hopeless villages without a single thing to do to pass away the time, yet bearing it all with a resignation and a fortitude equaled only by the amazing patience and long-suffering of the army of German unemployed. Somehow or other, one gets the feeling that England will muddle through if it is humanly possible.

Labor Party Prestige

Politically, the stock of the MacDonald Government has risen as a result of the India conference and the success of the Foreign Secretary, Arthur Henderson, at the last meeting of the Council of the League of Nations. The India conference was another example of the ability of the Englishman to succeed when the outlook seems darkest. No one thought there was a ghost of a hope of reconciling the diverse elements that went to make up the conference. It became an extraordinary personal triumph for Ramsay MacDonald, because of his unending patience, his sagacity and skill in presiding. Within the conference itself the honors went to Lord Sankey and Lord Reading, and that extraordinary Indian Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. But in the last analysis the honors will go to MacDonald, who called the conference and bore the brunt of organizing it and outlining its work. It is too early, of course, to say that the recommendations will be accepted by the Indian Nationalists, yet the fact remains that the seemingly impossible task of reconciling diverse Indian elements was achieved, and that the decisions arrived at have the approval of the Liberals and the great bulk of the Conservatives, with the exception of Winston Churchill and some other diehards. Who would deny the genius of the Englishman in such matters, or despair of his future when he can meet such a crisis? It is all the more striking because the results, while far from being what India will eventually achieve in the way of independence from Great Britain, were none the less far in advance of the recommendations of the report of Sir John Simon's commission. Poor Sir John! He is a sad figure. For two years he put his heart and soul into that study of India. It was acclaimed by conservative newspapers on both sides of the ocean as a great contribution to the literature of the government of peoples, yet when the conference met, Sir John Simon was not a member of it, because the British government was notified that if he were, the conference would meet without a single Indian delegate present. And not once in all the discussions of the conference was the Simon report ever mentioned or cited.

Mr. Henderson's success at Geneva has rightly added to his prestige. It places him, as Henry W. Nevinson stated at a Queen's Hall disarmament meeting the other night, right alongside of Ramsay MacDonald as a great foreign minister. He, too, has tact and skill in presiding. He has also persistence and directness and clear vision on many topics, and in this case he served not only his country well, but all of Europe also. There is no doubt that his prestige within his own party has greatly increased and that his achievement has helped to produce the existing situation, in which, so far as one can foresee, the Labor Government will hold office for at least another year after Mr. Snowden's budget is presented. It is, of course, possible that it may go down suddenly on some issue which may be, like the Zinoviev letter, of small import. But the fact is that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives wish to go to the country just now—Lloyd George is, moreover, markedly friendly at this moment and has urged Snowden on to defy the great capitalists of the "City." That the Laborites will lose a number of the coming by-elections is indisputable. I have not met a single Labor man to whom I have put the question who does not believe that if a general election were to be held now the Labor Party would lose a tremendous number of seats, and that the Conservatives would gain largely, and the Liberals somewhat.

Discontent Within the Ranks

One reason for this is the very great disappointment within the Labor Party with its government's achievements. It is impossible to conceal this, or the fact that a great deal of the enthusiasm which animated the rank and file of the party in the last election has evaporated. The party is not worried by Sir Oswald Mosley's defection. Its leaders do not believe that he has in him the stuff to make a dangerous leader; he is personally unpopular and they are certain that his following will comprise only a handful. It is announced that only fifteen members of Parliament will join him in the "nation-wide attack" which he is soon to begin upon the MacDonald Government, even though he is on somewhat firm ground when he maintains that the Prime Minister is not so excited about unemployment as he should be, or, he could have added, as he was when he was leading the Opposition. What is serious is the disheartenment and disillusionment of many of the ablest younger workers in the party, who feel that they had a right to expect a great deal more constructive work from their government despite the fact that it has been a minority government. They are of the opinion that it has not been radical enough; that it justifies, in considerable degree, the sneers of the New York Times that this is not a revolutionary Socialist Party, but merely a Liberal Party with a very slight tinge of socialistic interest in the working classes. They had hoped for something startling and bold like the nationalization of railroads or of coal mines. They got legislation on coal which went by no means so far as Lord Sankey's famous report—legislation which cannot even be said to be successful since it is not being put to work effectively.

It is also not to be denied that much of the criticism centers around MacDonald himself. It is alleged that he is far more interested in foreign affairs than in domestic. That he is much more successful in dealing with foreign policies is beyond dispute. No one should ever forget that in his first administration he was the ablest and best foreign secretary that England has had in generations, and that it was he himself who made Locarno possible. The first time that the Germans and French shook hands was when MacDonald brought them together and made them do so. Against him it is asserted that he is naturally aristocratic in temper and tendencies, that he does not dig down deeply into a domestic problem, and does not attack it so vigorously as would Snowden or Henderson. Whatever justice there may be in this charge, it is undeniable that this has not been a radical government, and that the party has had another cold douche, this time at the hands of Snowden himself, who in his very gloomy speech of February 11 declared there must be no further government expenditures "however desirable . . . until prosperity returns," and that "an increase of taxation in present conditions which falls on industry would be the last straw," thus condemning his party to masterly inactivity with respect to the carrying out of any further social-service schemes as long as it remains in office this time. Indeed, it is hard to see how after this blast the government can champion any schemes for great public works, such as road-building, with which to combat unemployment—schemes favored by the Liberals and especially by Lloyd George. Where is the money to be found? British productive capacity, Mr. Snowden says, has now fallen off 20 per cent, which means 20 per cent loss in those resources from which the Exchequer must draw its revenue, while capital values have correspondingly dropped. Said he: "No budget in the world could stand such an excessive strain as that which has been placed upon it by the increase of unemployment during the last twelve months"; and it is undeniable that if something radical is not done to help general world conditions, unemployment is more likely to increase here than to decrease.

Minority and Compromise

The difficulty with the Labor Party is, of course, that it took office as a minority party, and its leaders had to decide whether they should go out soon on some radical proposal or seek to remain in office a long time at the price of compromises, and, as has happened, seek to convince the financial interests of the nation that the Labor Government was not a dangerous revolutionary affair. Had it been revolutionary, British credit would have fallen, and the Labor Government's financial difficulties would have been enormously increased. At the same time it is undeniable that some of the ministers were tremendously interested in holding on to their offices. The flesh-pots of office are as alluring here as in other countries, and Labor ministers are no less susceptible to the prestige and emoluments of office-holding than officials in other countries. I remember calling on one minister in June, 1929, just after the MacDonald Government took office. I was prepared then for what has happened since, for when I asked that minister what single radical or socialistic measure the government was going to put through while in office this time, the minister looked perfectly blank and replied: "Why, Mr. Villard, we would lose office at once if we tried anything of the kind." The suggestion that it might be well for the party to lose office on a clear-cut radical issue, such as the nationalization of the mines or the railroads, met with no response.

As the MacDonald stock has gone down within the party, the Henderson stock has risen. I find many who openly say that when the party goes out Henderson must become the party leader, and also the next Labor Prime Minister whenever the party gets back into office. No other name is suggested. It is a fact that these two men—MacDonald and Henderson—are in a class by themselves, and that no one else has come forward to challenge their leadership. That Mr. Henderson has in any way encouraged this movement is not for a moment believed; no one questions his loyalty, just as no one questions his intense desire to achieve great results at the disarmament conference in February, 1932. But even here one notes the timidity of office-holders. His speech at the disarmament meeting in Queen's Hall last week was an admirable statement of the case for disarmament and of the terrors of the next war, but it contained not a single definite pledge as to what his government would propose or as to how bravely it would fight. Indeed, when one heard him insisting in the same old politician's way that the government could not accomplish anything unless backed by the public opinion of the country, one had the feeling that an alibi was being carefully prepared in the event of a failure. None the less, as I have said, Henderson is a great asset to his party, to his country, and to Europe. The reason why the demand for his leadership has grown is that he has in mind an extensive program for domestic reforms and reorganization, the sort of thing that the rank and file of the Labor Party are longing for. Henderson has, of course, the advantage of having long been president of the Labor and Socialist International and having been very deeply concerned for many years with international and labor problems. It by no means follows, however, that the change from MacDonald to Henderson will take place. It is far too early to guess.

Despite the weakness of Labor and the disaffection within the party because of the government's failure to fulfil pre-election promises and expectations, it is an interesting fact that some of the papers report a considerable Liberal drift to Labor. Highly interesting are two recent happenings. A director of one of the biggest engineering and shipbuilding firms in the country has just joined the Fabian Society and accepted a candidacy for Parliament on the Labor ticket at the next election. This is much as if President Grace of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation had announced that he had joined the American Socialist Party and would run for Congress in the next election on the Socialist ticket. More than that, Sir Ralph Wedgwood, the managing director of the London and Northeastern Railway Company, is reported to have declared that he will vote Labor in the next election. Note his reason: it is that the game is up for capitalism; that in social control of business lies the hope of the future. But incidents like these only intensify the regret of the ardent members of the Labor Party that no great measure of social control stands to the credit of the MacDonald Government. They declare that the most advanced and useful measure yet passed is the Electricity Supply Act of 1926, which is to be credited to the Baldwin Government. That did away with private control of the generation of electricity. A Central Electricity Board now controls that, and will hereafter without doubt lead in the direction of government manufacture of light and power and control of the entire process. Here is confirmation of the old gibe that the way to get a radical reform is to have a Conservative Government in office driven to action by the attack of a radical Opposition!

OTHER PARTIES, OTHER TROUBLES

Aside from the fact that neither of the other parties would care to take office under the existing highly depressing economic conditions, they are neither of them entirely happy within their own ranks. Winston Churchill has left the Conservative "shadow cabinet" because of Baldwin's attitude on the India conference. Lord Beaverbrook's attacks upon Baldwin grow more bitter. Two days ago he promised that he would have "a lot more to say to him" before he had "done with him." He added, "We cannot repudiate Mr. Baldwin's settlement of the American debt, but we can repudiate Mr. Baldwin [cheers and groans]." This at a meeting in East Islington, where there is a by-election tomorrow in which Beaverbrook has entered an Empire Crusade candidate against Conservative, Liberal, and Labor candidates. In view of the rise of protectionist sentiment in this country, all this hardly makes a happy situation for Baldwin. In the Liberal camp things are not too pleasant, either. There is a widespread belief that Lloyd George has reached the bottom of his campaign chest, out of which he has for years defrayed a large portion of Liberal Party expenditure. I have already spoken of a certain amount of Liberal defection to Labor. In addition, it is confidently expected that Sir John Simon will ere long find his way into the Conservative camp, and with him any such following as he may have. The Liberal press, too, is suffering a great deal. It is only a short time ago that the Daily News and the Chronicle were combined, but Fleet Street believes that the new paper is having hard sledding, and one regrets to hear that the Liberal Manchester Guardian, the greatest of all English dailies, is not having the prosperity which it so richly deserves. The combination of the Nation and New Statesman is another sign of the journalistic times; the new management announces that it will be independent of any party. Whether it can maintain itself on this basis is perhaps open to question. Meanwhile, the Labor Daily Herald, which has been vulgarized and popularized to a degree, has reached the extraordinary circulation of a million and a quarter copies a day. Editorially it still stands for Labor—after a fashion.

On the whole, it is not surprising that MacDonald seeks successes in the international field. It is vital that Europe should cooperate to end the existing crisis and restore world trade to its normal flow. England would render a great service should it call an international conference to that end. Sooner or later such a meeting must be held. It will be interesting to see if Mr. MacDonald is first to recognize the opportunity and first to act. He is in a position to render a greater service even than that which he performed when he pointed the way out of the chaos which existed in Europe after the French invasion of the Ruhr. He may, indeed, have the opportunity to be the savior of Europe.

Meanwhile, humor and sarcasm have not departed from the British Empire. Witness the question asked in the House of Commons yesterday as to whether there were any Englishmen or Englishwomen among the starving in Arkansas and Oklahoma!

Hard Times and Hard Facts

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

FIVE facts stand out in this second winter of the Hoover depression. First, all the optimism of official Washington has failed to check the spread of unemployment, which is continuing to increase. Second, the promise made to President Hoover by numerous industrial leaders on November 21, 1929, that they would not "initiate any movement for wage reduction" has not been observed; pay rolls have been slashed by one means or another throughout most of the country. Third, private charity in altogether too many communities has been found unequal to the task of coping with the present emergency. Fourth, public-works construction has, thus far at any rate, proved ineffective as a means of relieving the unemployment strain. Fifth, few of our public men have any notion as to how they might best deal with the problem of unemployment and relief. Authority for these statements is drawn from the replies of 127 municipal officials who during the past fortnight have given The Nation the facts in response to a general questionnaire. Thirty-five States and every important economic area of the country are represented in the survey, and the replies may fairly be said to portray with unusual accuracy the unemployment situation as it exists throughout the nation. The Nation's questionnaire was based upon a similar survey made last December by Senator La Follette of Wisconsin with the help of Senator Walsh of Massachusetts. The questions and a summary of the replies follow.

1. Has there been any change in the unemployment situation since your reply of last December to Senator La Follette?

Fifty-six mayors replied that there had been no change; thirty-one reported a slight improvement; one mayor reported a marked increase in the number employed; thirty-two said that the situation had become worse instead of better; and six replied that there had been a sharp increase in the number of unemployed workers. It is worth noting that virtually all the cities reporting a decrease in unemployment were small communities, whereas those reporting increases were for the most part large industrial centers. Speaking for Detroit, Josephine Gomon, secretary of the Mayor's Unemployment Committee, writes that "the conditions in Detroit are as bad as, if not worse than, they have been at any time during the depression." Fred K. Hoehler, Commissioner of the Department of Public Welfare in Cincinnati, reports that "there has been a considerable increase in the amount of unemployment in this vicinity since last December." From Dayton, Ohio, comes one word describing the change there: "Worse."

2. Have pay rolls in your city been noticeably reduced during the past year by part-time employment or by any other means?

On this question city officials are generally agreed. No less than 102 replies state that pay rolls and also in some cases wages have been reduced, and of these sixteen declare that there have been unusually heavy reductions. Edward P. Reidy, Director of Public Aid in Providence, Rhode Island, answers: "Yes, decidedly so." Mayor J. Henry Stump of Reading, Pennsylvania, says: "Pay rolls have been greatly reduced as many plants are only working part time; in addition there have been wage cuts." Mayor H. A. Hill of Wichita, Kansas, writes: "Yes, both through part-time labor, reduced scale paid, and with some permanent shortening of forces." Mayor S. A. Hughart of Mattoon, Illinois, declares: "It has been alarmingly decreased." Mayor H. M. Swift of Mount Vernon, Illinois, says that one of the biggest factories in his city "cut wages 25 per cent on all steady employees." However, the great bulk of the returns show part-time employment responsible for most of the pay-roll cuts; in many of the reporting cities workers' earnings have been reduced by half or more in this manner. Only eighteen communities boast that their pay rolls have been maintained, while one, Jacksonville, Illinois, reports pay rolls "10 per cent above normal."

3. Are private agencies giving adequate service in providing relief?

Every one of the officials responding recognizes that the sharp decrease in the earnings of the workers has added greatly to the task of providing relief. Less than half of these officials, fifty-two to be exact, declare that private charity is giving adequate service. All the others say that the private charities have proved inadequate in the emergency or are compelled to fall back upon municipal or county governments for help. In Waltham, Massachusetts, for example, the city is furnishing nine-tenths of the funds used in unemployment relief. Twelve of the replies state flatly that the private organizations are not giving adequate service. In Cincinnati relief is being confined to the distribution of food and clothing. Mayor Walter E. Batterson of Hartford, Connecticut, simply replies, "No." The Director of Public Welfare of Dayton, Ohio, says that private agencies are giving remarkable service "with the funds available." In Providence, Rhode Island, the "private agencies are getting low on funds." Harry Hesselbein, managing secretary of the Johnstown, Pennsylvania, Chamber of Commerce, says that the private agencies are unable to do much "because of insufficient funds." Mayor R. K. Davis of Oskaloosa, Iowa, considers that the private organizations are not working efficiently "on account of lack of funds." In Mount Carmel, Illinois, according to Mayor John Coleman, these agencies are "not getting enough funds to furnish relief if we should have a bad spurt of weather." M. Parrent, City Clerk of Frankfort, Kentucky, expresses doubt as to whether private relief "is at all sufficient to meet the requirements." Mayor George O. Marshall of Niles, Ohio, says that "we have not been able to give 100 per cent relief." Mayor J. W. Hickman of Nelsonville, Ohio, asserts that "private agencies are doing good work, but cannot meet the situation." William J. Unfried, Comptroller of Oak Park, Illinois, thinks that the private agencies "may be doing all they possibly can, but indications lead us to believe that they are not cooperating as fully as possible."

4. Is public-works construction in your city or vicinity proving of any tangible benefit in dealing with the employment problem?

Less than a third of the officials reporting hold that public-works construction has been of any tangible benefit. Against these forty-two favorable replies, twenty-three state that public works have been of only slight assistance and twenty-five say that such construction has been of no help whatever. In thirty-six other communities no public building has been undertaken and therefore these cities must be considered as having derived no benefit from this suggested solution of the problem. However, about twenty of the reporting officials say that construction work of one kind or another will be started with the approach of milder weather. Only a half-dozen of the replies even as much as mention a federal building program, most of those who agree that this method has helped declaring that the local governments have supplied the necessary jobs. The Mayor of Hartford, Connecticut, describes public building as "the only instrument which has effectively aided employment this winter." On the other hand, Detroit answers: "No. The public-works program has been reduced to a workable minimum." In Cincinnati the "program has at its best provided work for only a fraction of the men laid off by private industries." In Johnstown, Pennsylvania, "able-bodied men applying for emergency relief are required to work for the city. Thus a large amount of public work is being done without cost to the taxpayers." Knoxville, Tennessee, agrees that public work has helped, "but this is city and county work. Why can't Washington get busy on the Tennessee River storage dams?"

A similar sentiment is expressed by Mayor Speer of Sapulpa, Oklahoma, who says that "the government has been contemplating building a post-office building, but has not started yet. Herb had better hurry this matter along or he will sure be blowed up here for the 1932 campaign." Mayor Roger T. Sermon of Independence, Missouri, declares that public works have helped "some, but not much. Our experience has been that contractors on these jobs bring men in from the outside to do the work." The Mayor of Oskaloosa, Iowa, reports that "there are hundreds of floaters following up the construction." City Manager Henry Traxler of Janesville, Wisconsin, not only says that public building has not helped, but adds that in his opinion such construction "never will solve the problem or even make a dent. Cities with the largest programs are suffering the most. Industry is the only salvation."

5. Have you any suggestions as to how the problem of unemployment and relief might best be dealt with?

Frightened by the hostility of the daily press, most of which can be traced to White House inspiration, Congress has refused to vote funds for immediate relief of the unemployed and other needy workers. Business and industry have come forward with nothing substantial in the way of a solution; indeed, they have merely succeeded in aggravating the situation by continuing to lay off workers while preaching confidence and optimism to the people. Mr. Hoover appears to have washed his hands of the whole business by declaring that the problem must be left to "the producers and consumers themselves" and that therefore the government must not interfere. Mr. Hoover's "American way" of providing relief, though functioning fairly well in some communities, has fallen down in many others. Public-works construction, another of the official solutions, has for one reason or another failed to solve the problem. A number of the local officials responding to The Nation's questionnaire suggested remedies of their own, but while a few of these suggestions appear logical and practical, more of them are quite obviously visionary or otherwise hopeless. However, they do in the aggregate reveal a willingness to face the problem realistically and honestly, an attitude that has been strangely lacking in Washington.

Commissioner Hoehler of Cincinnati would, for example, have the federal government approach the problem of unemployment and relief

> . . . with the idea that it is a more or less permanent problem rather than of temporary nature. During the years when the federal government is accumulating a surplus revenue it might also be advisable to set up some sort of machinery to set aside a part of this surplus for relief purposes and to distribute this over the population during the depression. All of this would apply not only to the federal government but also to our larger cities.

Mayor Batterson of Hartford, on the other hand, would "let each community handle its own problem and cut out talk of federal assistance." Mayor M. E. Dillon of Ashland, Wisconsin, gives it frankly as his opinion that > . . . the political and industrial leaders of the nation are at the present time on trial as to their ability to find a way out of the present trouble and also to prevent its recurrence. Whether labor conditions can be stabilized or whether unemployment insurance should be worked out, I do not know, but I do believe that the division of profits in nearly all lines of industry is not fair to the worker. In a government like ours it should be made impossible for an industrial leader to make a profit of twenty-five or thirty million a year and through his business methods cause all of his agencies and distributors to go broke and his employees to be out of work.

Mayor Martin Miller of Fort Scott, Kansas, would take the burden off industry and government and place it on the workers fortunate enough to have jobs by assessing the latter 3 per cent of their monthly salaries. Mayor Lee R. Robbins of Norwich, Connecticut, thinks the situation would improve if the workers would voluntarily reduce their wage demands; on the other hand, Mayor F. W. Suitor of Barre, Vermont, suggests that "if a universal six-hour day with at least our present daily wage could be put into effect at once that would set men to work and in a short time take up the slack." Several others take the position that wages should be maintained, while Mayor Carl Hari of Alliance, Ohio, urges that each employer "be required to create an unemployment reserve fund, to be used in times of depression instead of dismissing their employees." Numerous other remedies are suggested, running all the way from further subsidies to the farmers to government operation of the railways, and from city ownership and management of overall factories to repeal of "our obnoxious tariff." Many of the mayors appear at least to be doing some thinking about the problem, and individually several of them have succeeded in solving it so far as their own communities are concerned. But the problem is nation-wide, and cannot be met by a narrow solution applicable to a single community.

Hoover Suffers in the House

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 28

NOTHING illustrates the tremendous decline in the fortunes of the Hoover Administration more clearly than the remarkable series of reverses it has just suffered in the House. Except for occasional lapses the Senate can be depended on to maintain a respectable degree of independence; consequently the House, with its penitentiary discipline and convict morale, has been compelled to do the legislative dirty work for the last three Presidents, including the incumbent. But prison mutinies are the rule nowadays and the action of the House on the veterans'-loan, Wagner, and Muscle Shoals bills proves it is no exception. Not since Taft was President has an Administration majority in the House become so intractable. There are several very good reasons. The House Republicans are weary of White House dictation, especially when it compels them to go against their own convictions and more especially when it forces them to go against the wishes of their constituents. They know that Herbert the Unhappy is "in bad" with the country. They are able to draw a moral from the fact that the last election produced a stunning number of casualties among the faithful, whereas the insurgents almost without exception won with ease. The reaction is not only natural; it is inevitable. An interesting feature of the situation is the astounding loss of prestige suffered by Secretary Mellon. It fairly curdled the blood to hear the hoots and howls which greeted mention of his name as "the greatest Secretary since Hamilton" during the bonus debate. The truth is that Uncle Andy has outstayed his welcome. He should have emulated the canny Calvin by retiring when his star was at its zenith. Every day he remains will witness further shrinkage in his reputation. He has made too many tax refunds, juggled too many figures, and issued entirely too many misleading and disingenuous statements. Congress does not trust him any more. If he holds on until the next session Jack Garner is sure to force an investigation of his Internal Revenue Bureau. The best possible day for him to quit is today.

* * * * *

WHATEVER the merits of the veterans'-loan bill, miscalled "bonus"—and I cannot quite agree with the editors of The Nation on the number and gravity of its demerits—the honest observer is irresistibly prejudiced in the bill's favor by the transparent dishonesty of the Administration's efforts to defeat it. In one breath it declares that thousands of veterans need no assistance and resent the effort to assist them; in the next it argues that they will fall all over themselves to borrow the money and squander it. The bill is pictured as destroying the "'only safeguard" of veterans' families against old age and poverty, although it requires no imagination to realize how long a family could live on $1,000. Congress is told there is not a penny in the Treasury to meet the cost, although every member knows there is a reserve fund of more than $770,000,000 available for that purpose. Congress is accused of abandoning the plan adopted in 1924, although a child can see that it has only accelerated the loan feature of the plan. The truth is that the bill probably will not help the veterans much and will not harm the country at all. Indeed, the Treasury stands to make money on the transaction. Moreover, the service certificates must be cashed not later than 1945, and no living soul can safely predict that conditions will be more propitious then than now. On the other hand, no discerning person will suppose that the hard-boiled tories who fought so bitterly against lending $15,000,000 to the starving farmers were actuated by humane motives in voting to lend $750,000,000 to the veterans. The veterans simply are better organized for political action. And Congress was really affronted by the shabby tactics of the Administration.

* * * * *

FURTHER evidence that the House leaders have not entirely succumbed to the contagion of decency is found in their attempt to maim or scuttle the lame-duck amendment and to rob Senator Norris of credit for its authorship. As passed by the House the resolution contains certain jokers, one of which would prevent many State legislatures from ratifying it before the end of two years, and another estop it from taking effect until nearly two years after its ratification. Last and worst, it would arbitrarily fix May 4 as the date on which the second session of Congress would have to adjourn, thus perpetuating the biennial legislative log jam with its attendant danger of filibuster and its standing threat of extra sessions. There is not the slightest sense or reason in putting a constitutional limit on the length of any legislative session within the term for which members are elected. For the Seventy-first Congress to decree that the unborn members of the One-hundred-seventy-first Congress shall adjourn at noon of May 4, 2121 A. D., regardless of the state of legislation prevailing then, would be sheer lunacy. Fortunately it is not likely to occur. Norris will never consent, which means that the amendment must wait until the next Congress for submission.

* * * * *

ANOTHER Norris victory which is likely to be postponed until the new Congress meets is that involving the fate of Muscle Shoals. Unless all signs fail, President Hoover will have vetoed the bill or given it a pocket veto before this is printed. It is true that both houses of Congress have passed it by heavy majorities. It is true that the last pretense of objection on the ground of desiring to use the nitrate plant for the production of cheap fertilizer has been eliminated by compromise. There remains only the influence of the power companies and their determination that the property shall not become a "yardstick" by which the government can measure the real cost of generating and distributing electricity on a large scale. I suspect that this will be sufficient to prevent the bill from becoming a law. If the suspicion is unjust to Mr. Hoover, events will vindicate him. It may be noted in passing that the famous New Jersey liberal, Senator Dwight Morrow, kept his record clean by voting against the bill. Thus far he has voted consistently with that little group of back-bench reactionaries ribaldly designated in the press gallery as the "Unspeakables," which includes in its number such intellectual and parliamentary giants as Goldsborough of Maryland, Hastings of Delaware, Patterson of Missouri, and the ineffable Dr. Bingham, patron saint of the Connecticut Manufacturers' Association. It appears after all that history may recall Senator Morrow as the grandfather of C. A. Lindbergh, Jr., but let us hope a while longer. He cannot be quite so bad as his voting record to date indicates.

* * * * *

UNLESS something unexpected happens, Congress will adjourn Wednesday under circumstances containing no promise of an extra session. In other words, the chances are that before this appears the legislative branch of the government will have departed on a nine months' vacation in the middle of the worst depression this generation has produced, with its work less than half done, and with no adequate provision made for emergencies that are certain to arise in its absence. For this cowardly abdication of responsibility, Administration Republicans and bourbon Democrats are almost equally to blame. The duty of calling an extra session to deal with the multitude of existing problems rests primarily, of course, with the President, but we know this Administration too well to hope for anything so frank or courageous. The fact next in importance is that the Democrats could have forced the President to do what he should do but fears to do, and that for reasons of political expediency they decided against that course. It is difficult to distinguish between the political morals of Republican leaders who take their orders from the United States Chamber of Commerce and Democratic leaders who take theirs from Baruch, Raskob, and Owen Young. The truth is that Joe Robinson, Pat Harrison, and Claude Swanson are separated from Jim Watson, George Moses, and Reed Smoot by nothing except a narrow Senate aisle and a narrower conflict of personal interest.

The Chicago Circus

By W. A. S. DOUGLAS

Chicago, February 25

SIME SILVERMAN, the editor of Variety, thinks vaudeville and other forms of "flesh" entertainment are slipping in popularity. He ought to know what he is talking about. But so far he seems to have overlooked what may be one reason, namely, that the politicians, statesmen, rulers, and lawmakers of this world are providing bigger and better vaudeville entertainment than was ever dished up by a Palace Theater expert. Take Washington. Why should I spend my money at Keith's or the Fox or the Earle when I can get a seat in the Senate press gallery and listen to Tom Heflin or Thaddeus Caraway or Tooth-Puller Shipstead or any one of a dozen other comics? Why, for the same reason, should I push into a theater in any State capital while the local legislature is in session?

I'm all in favor of bigger and better clowning in politics. It saves me money and makes the pursuit of my profession a joyous thing. I've been reporting the Chicago mayoralty primary campaign for three weeks now and I don't think I've ever had such a good time in all my life. This was the supershow. To begin with, we had just one clown—but what a master-performer! Big Bill Thompson, without a make-up, comes on cold in a business suit and knocks you out of your seat. It looks easy. But that's just the art that's in the man. He fooled his competitors. They mistook born showmanship for a lot of gall superinduced by highballs. So they took up clowning too. Terrible!

Big Bill gave Chicago a taste of his histrionic abilities four years ago when he played straight man to King George of England. His Majesty was not there in person but Thompson's art made it easy to visualize the little bearded figure in crown and ermine right there beside the Mayor, having his nose tweaked every now and again and being warned to keep out of Chicago, to the delight of the Germans and the Irish. The Negroes didn't understand what it was all about, but Big Bill already had their votes safe in his pocket.

And so Big Bill Thompson came to be mayor for a third time. The four-year period which will come to a close in April has been a tempestuous one for Chicago. It has marked the rise to supreme power of Scarface Al Capone. There have been daily killings and robberies which have blazed the word "Chicago" to the far corners of the earth. And the blame—there are always people who will blame others for conditions such as these—has been laid on the broad shoulders of Big Bill Thompson.

Big Bill did not appear to take his reelection overseriously. He moved his offices from the City Hall to the Sherman Hotel across the street—it is reported that he found it easier to get ginger ale and cracked ice in the latter place. He was all set to have a good time with the minimum of bother to himself when the newspapers and law-and-order societies and that mysterious and ineffective mass known as the Better Element began to buzz about him like a lot of mosquitoes. They wanted to be rid of this slumbering behemoth and they went about their task in divers ways: law suits for recovery of city funds, allegedly misused; charges of malfeasance in office, of collusion with the criminal elements—all sorts of accusations; formation of vigilance committees; a determination to be rid of "Thompsonism"; a decision by the Better Element that one of their number should sacrifice himself for the public good and become mayor of the nation's second city.

If they had left Big Bill alone he probably would not have run for a fourth term. His health is none too good, he is no longer a young man, he has money, and he has a yacht, and before he dies he greatly desires to prove his theory that somewhere around the warm waters of the Caribbean Sea there exist flying fish that climb trees, build nests in branches, and there hatch their young.

But it was not to be. The reformers burned up Big

Bill, and he leaped into the arena with a war whoop: "To hell with the Chicago Tribune." The Better Element had its hand called. The "roughneck" Mayor of Chicago—by the way, in the matter of family, he comes of as good a breed as any of his critics—became a candidate to succeed himself.

The Better Element of Chicago proved to be not unlike the Better Element of New York or Philadelphia or Cleveland or New Orleans. Everyone, it seemed, was personally too busy to be patriotic and lift the blight of "Thompsonism." And while they hemmed and hawed, there leaped into the breach Municipal Judge John H. Lyle, ex-alderman, ex-State representative, who had made a name for himself by insulting gangsters who had been dragged before him and imposing enormous bail bonds upon them. His platform was simple—he promised to clear the city of Capone and all his works. The Chicago Tribune, Big Bill's bitterest foe, didn't want the Judge as a candidate, but the Better Element had lain down on the job. Lyle became the standard-bearer of the forces of righteousness.

The behemoth over in the Sherman Hotel considered the news—Lyle. "That palookah!" he observed to his henchmen. "Boys, we're going to have a circus."

And a circus it has been.

In all, nine candidates entered the Republican primary. First there was Big Bill, then the Judge, then Alderman Arthur Albert, sponsored by the lame-duck Senator, Charles Deneen, who owed the Mayor a wallop long before Hizzoner went Democratic at the last national election and helped Jim Ham Lewis whip Ruth Hanna McCormick who had first whipped Deneen for his Senate seat. Next in prominence came ex-City Controller George Schmidt, who ran as "the only Republican candidate with a reputation." The other five don't count. The Democrats bowed to the ambition of their party boss, Anton Cermak, born in Prague, Bohemia, and gave him the nomination. It looks at this writing as though Mr. Cermak will achieve his desire to be mayor if the Better Element doesn't mess things up.

The first thing Big Bill did was to borrow the Cort Theater from his old crony "Sport" Herrmann, who at the beginning of the Mayor's present term served as public executioner of all books found in the public libraries which could be set down as pro-British propaganda and were conceivably planted there by King George's minions. He soon tired, however, of the uncomplimentary remarks of the daily press and went off on a long fishing expedition. Even now he is in the shark-infested regions of the South perfecting a rubber fishing rope. (The idea is that the shark grabs the hook, puts up its fight, draws a momentary breath, and, while doing so, releases the tension. The rubber rope immediately tightens, yanks the shark out of the water, and shoots it against the side of the boat with a wallop sufficient to knock it senseless.)

It has been the custom in Chicago for the candidates to wind up the last week of their campaigns in the Loop—the business district—exhorting the wage-earners during their lunch hours. Big Bill opened his show at the Cort Theater a full three weeks before primary day. He opened it with a bang—eighteen clowns, a school of monkeys, two boxing ponies christened the Wickersham twins, Yes and No, two jackasses, an elephant and a camel, trapeze artists and jugglers. What this retinue had to do with electing Chicago's next mayor was Big Bill's own business. He won an election four years ago clowning about King George and he was out to win this one with some superclowning. He had the jump on his opponents. His street parade was allegorical and crudely insulting. The voters, aside from the Better Element, required something obvious, easily understandable, and amusing.

Along Randolph Street every day for three weeks there wound a cavalcade of half a dozen cowboys, mounted, booted, and spurred; a calliope braying forth Big Bill's private anthem, "America, First, Last, and Always"—the Mayor has his own poet laureate in the person of Milt Weil and his own master-of-the-horse or parade-organizer in the person of Louis Golen; an elephant; a camel; a dozen Shetland ponies; a cage of monkeys; a lean mule ridden by a cadaverous individual labeled "The Judge"; a tiny burro ridden by a small fat boy labeled "Little Arthur"—meaning Alderman Arthur Albert; an old-time brewery wagon concealing in its innards a high-powered phonograph which played "Happy Days Are Here Again."

The parade halted at the Cort Theater, drew its crowd, and filed inside. There the Mayor took the stage as master of ceremonies, introduced his two jackasses as his two leading opponents, the Judge and the Alderman, and then proceeded to ask them embarrassing and personal questions.

Lyle and Albert rushed to the Loop and rented a theater apiece. Big Bill responded by hiring another one and then a third. He concentrated his fire on Judge Lyle. From the stage of his three theaters he termed the judge a wife-murderer (the late Mrs. Lyle died following a fall off the steps of her home) and said he could prove him to be a degenerate. Whereupon the Judge lost his temper, forsook his attitude of dignity, got a battery of machine-guns and sawed-off shotguns, and tried to out-clown the master-clown, exactly as Big Bill had hoped he would.

Every day the Loop was a bedlam. The roars of the candidates, carried on loud speakers to the streets, were so intermingled that no one voice was distinguishable. Big Bill overcame that difficulty by having city electricians put his opponents' amplifiers out of commission. In answer came a bombardment of eggs with himself as target at the Apollo Theater. Big Bill looked on while his attacker was brutally kicked out of the place and warned the Judge that if any more eggs hit him, Big Bill, he would go across the way and "stamp hell" out of his rival. There were no more eggs.

Lyle's clowning went flat. He said himself he couldn't be dirty but he could be nasty. He was nasty, but in an unfunny ponderous way, while Big Bill got dirtier and funnier. The crowds at his circus show at the Cort were so big that the Mayor decided to charge twenty-five cents admission, with free sofa pillows to the first hundred women to pass the box office. And still they kept pouring in to look at the jackasses and the monkeys, to watch Big Bill's talkie of what he claims to have done for Chicago. The picture was entitled "Thompsonism" in honor of the slogan of his opponents: "Drive Out Thompsonism"—yards upon yards of street improvements all carrying the title: "If This Be Thompsonism Make the Most of It."

Little Arthur Albert also tried to do some clowning. He bought an old four-in-hand coach which Mrs. Albert has been driving around the Loop. But who would want to look at an old coach when there are jackasses, camels, elephants, and monkeys just around the corner? Mr. and Mrs. Albert and their coach have been a terrible flop.

Clown Thompson has won over Clown Lyle, Clown Albert, and all the other lesser Republican clowns. He becomes now the opponent of Anton Cermak, the Democrat, at the mayoralty election six weeks hence. Cermak looks like the winner against any Republican candidate, including Thompson. But the Better Element itself may turn the trick for Big Bill. It is now grooming as an independent candidate Coroner Herman Bundesen, Democrat, who like Royal Copeland of New York has acquired political prestige and place by writing a daily newspaper column of advice to mothers. The women of Chicago will vote solidly for Coroner Herman, and their votes will come mostly out of Cermak's total.

The result? Big Bill, the master-clown, will be returned to power. Big Bill would be not only willing but tickled to death to pay Bundesen's campaign expenses.

Negro Chain Stores

By H. M. FOSTER

HARLEM, the largest city of colored people in the world, has seen during the past year the organization of a voluntary chain of retail grocery stores to teach colored retail grocers to become better business men. It is an adaptation of a plan that has already succeeded in other parts of the country. For the benefit of those who do not know what a voluntary chain is, it should be explained that it is a frank imitation of the regular old-fashioned chain stores, except that in the newer plan individual ownership is retained.

The plan of operation is simple. The wholesale grocer makes an arrangement with a selected group of his customers, with or without an actual contract, by which they agree to buy all or most of their wares from him, in return for which he sells them staples at or near cost and adds three or four specials as "loss leaders" each week. He advertises for them in the local newspapers, remodels their stores on modern scientific lines, keeps their buildings fresh, clean, and well painted, and gives them a uniform sign with a common name, such as "Red and White," "Clover Farms," "I. G. A." But on each sign is the name of the proprietor. The wholesaler turns his salesmen into supervisors who teach the retailer to keep his store clean, his stock in order, and his store well lighted. They also trim windows and put up displays. Price tags are used just as in chain stores. In fact, everything that the chain stores do is done, but the retailer still owns his store, and the wholesaler still owns his business.

In the last four or five years these voluntary chains have grown in number to some 400 or 500 groups operating all over the country and including 60,000 retail stores. The Independent Grocers' Alliance is the largest organization of the kind, having over 50 wholesale firms and about 10,000 retailers. Now the plan has been adapted to the colored retail grocers of Harlem and other sections of the country.

In 1928 a dozen Negro grocers met in Montgomery, Alabama, and organized a Colored Merchants' Association, agreeing to run their stores as a voluntary chain and call them the "C. M. A. Stores." A. C. Brown, a successful grocer of Montgomery, is credited with having originated this plan. The original dozen have by this time nearly doubled their membership, and these grocers report that they have increased their sales from 40 to 60 per cent. The needs of the group are combined, and the wholesale grocers in Montgomery are invited to bid on one combined order. Unlike many of the associations of retail grocers, the theory on which these stores operate is not merely to buy cooperatively, but to sell intensively. The association teaches its members to sell as rapidly as possible, so that they accelerate turnover and increase profits. Advertising, too, is done cooperatively, and every week a three-column advertisement in Montgomery newspapers announces the special bargains of the C. M. A. stores. Another phase of the association's work is the installation of a uniform system of record-keeping in Colored Merchants' Association stores.

The Colored Merchants' Association in Montgomery is affiliated with the local Negro Business League, a branch of the National Negro Business League started in 1900 by the late Booker T. Washington when he was principal of Tuskegee Institute. The National Negro Business League is now national in scope, and the Colored Merchants' Association is fast becoming so. Dr. Robert R. Moton has succeeded Dr. Washington both as principal of Tuskegee Institute and as president of the National Negro Business League. Through the efforts of Albon L. Holsey, secretary of the National Negro Business League and national organizer of the Colored Merchants' Association, the work of the league and the association has spread from Alabama to the following cities: New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Detroit, Chicago, Omaha, Richmond, Hampton, Norfolk, Winston-Salem, Nashville, Montgomery, Selma, Jackson, Tulsa, and Dallas. The reason for selecting the grocery business as the first one to be attacked in solving the Negro's commercial and economic problem is, according to Mr. Holsey, that trends in the grocery industry show so striking a change as compared with a few years ago. He believes that within the next ten years grocery distribution will be in the hands of chain stores and voluntary chains.

The Colored Merchants' Association is distinctly practical and has its feet on the ground. Its three primary objects are to organize the local retail grocers into a study club on modern selling, to study the Negro consumer, and to tie up with local jobbers and wholesalers. The results already attained have been striking. For example, Winston-Salem, which was the second city to organize, reports increased business and more rapid stock turnovers, with greater and quicker profits for the colored grocers. The C. M. A. stores, paying cash for their goods and securing larger discounts, are selling mostly for cash on their big days, Friday and Saturday. Eventually their whole business will be cash in both selling and buying. The rapid sale of advertised merchandise has aroused among national advertisers a real interest in the purchasing power of Negroes.

The association realizes that it must lead its members step by step to become prosperous business men. Mr. Holsey says:

> In order to give the grocers the necessary business for cooperative effort, an intensive study of modern merchandising methods is our first step. Evening meetings two or three times a week are arranged, and illustrated talks are given by experts. For example, in our Harlem campaign we were fortunate in having with us such men as Gorton James, editor of the Business Week; Robert F. Miller, vice-president, Associated Grocery Manufacturers; Wroe Alderson, J. W. Millard, and J. A. Jackson, of the Department of Commerce; Samuel Kirsh, legal specialist in trade associations; George C. Loomis, cashier, Dunbar National Bank; Carl W. Dipman, editor, and William L. Butler, associate editor, of the Progressive Grocer; and F. R. Snapp, assistant sales manager, Royal Baking Powder Company.

In the Harlem campaign a questionnaire also was prepared by the National Negro Business League and sent to a large number of Harlem housewives, asking their main reasons for not giving more of their patronage to Negro stores. The most common answer was insufficient variety of stock and higher prices, though a few women raised the question of convenient location. As a result, says Mr. Holsey:

> One thing that we have definitely undertaken is to impress upon the men that the day of mere sentiment in business departed with the old-fashioned corner grocery and that Negro housewives will not buy from Negro stores simply because they are operated by Negroes. We have made plain that the modern housewife, irrespective of race, does her shopping on the basis of quality, price, and service.

The Colored Merchants' Association began operations on this basis in Harlem in October, 1929. It has twenty-five member stores, including two model stores and a number of others that are rapidly making plans to become model stores. One of the remodeled groceries has increased a business of $400 or $500 a week to more than $1,200. These stores are succeeding in this time of business depression by showing to colored men better merchandising methods.

A recent survey of Negro business by the National Negro Business League shows that the race is much under-organized in the retail merchandising field, and those who are engaged in retail business are suffering because of inadequate training to cope with competition. The opportunities in this field would seem to be very wide; for the survey reveals that the Negroes' annual food bill is $1,650,000,000. To distribute this quantity of food a personnel of nearly 471,000 is required, divided thus: 727 major executives, at salaries ranging from $12,000 to $50,000 a year; 4,645 minor executives, at $5,000 to $15,000; 12,416 superintendents and foremen, at $3,000 to $5,000; 391,251 clerks and salespeople, at $1,000 to $3,000; and 61,749 drivers, messengers, and truck drivers, at $600 to $1,200.

The Business League has already spread this cooperative idea widely and is making plans for the further expansion of the C. M. A. stores. In this expansion program the league has had the whole-hearted support of the wholesale grocers—a situation which must be recognized as a new and important point of contact and cooperation for Negro business. If this project succeeds, it will mean at least a thousand more jobs for Negroes in the next few years.

In the Driftway

IT is only when a Lillian Leitzel falls or a famous clown grows old that we realize how enduring the circus ring is. Like a magic hoop it rolls on forever. And everything within it, animate or inanimate, shares its never-ending glamor, its persistent unreality. The circus is a mass affair, gaudy and spectacular, sentimental without shame as its golden trappings are obviously not gold. Here is no place for fastidiousness or intellectual pride. The first unabashed notes of the calliope send them scuttling. The circus is intemperate, resplendent with false splendor. Take it or leave it. Most of us take it. And the reason lies deep and secure. There is probably no single other medium which caters to a greater variety of human frailties or satisfies a wider range of human desires; which offers such complete relaxation from things as they are.

* * * * *

ANIMALS come first, in any circus. The impossibility of giraffes, the sleek, now unavailing cunning of leopards, the hugeness of elephants, the agility of monkeys—here is an array that any emperor might envy, all caged and labeled for our pity and our delight. "Isn't it awful to put anything so fine and fierce as a lion in a cage?" we exclaim, thinking upon our own freedom (we are careful not to think too fiercely). "But then no doubt they get used to it. They have no consciousness." We pass on, preoccupied with popcorn and life in the jungle. We look deep into the eyes of the supercilious and ridiculous camel, searching for the fascination of deserts. And the Drifter, at least, always spends a long time with the ostrich. The Drifter often wishes that he could look as unrelievedly—though not as permanently—cranky as that ungainly bird. It might prove an excellent defense. As for the ostrich's reputed habit of hiding his head in the sand, why is it that humans regard that trick with such superiority and amusement? Is it because we are all so much more expert at the device than any ostrich could ever be?

* * * * *

AND the sideshows! Here is the boldest, the crudest, the most canny form of showmanship. We are all cripples of a sort. Each carries about with him the knowledge of some defect. One is too plump, another is not beautiful enough, one is too tall, another too short. The ugliest man in the world, the fattest woman, the bearded lady, the giant, and the pigmy—these extremes induce a sense of normality beyond words soothing to the human spirit. Inside the big tent the clowns take us in hand. But the Drifter will not go into that. Like the ice barrier on which Byrd established Little America with so many and such frequent wave lengths, the secret of the success of clowns has been dwelt on too many times to need further comment.

* * * * *

IT is when the show is actually on, of course, that the most subtle ministrations of the circus begin. And it is the "kinkers"—the acrobats—who perform them. On their trapezes and their tight ropes high above a solid earth they act out a dream of perfectibility. Defying space and gravity and human weakness they weave a fantasy of human infallibility. And the spectators? There are no spectators. Every last one of us, svelte and lithe and sheathed in silk, is swinging in space, walking on air, leaping to the backs of plunging white horses. There is not a flabby muscle, not an awkward limb, not a sagging knee in the whole tent. And over all the band plays, and the loudest voice in creation proclaims the biggest, the most amazing, the most stu-pendous show on earth.

* * * * *

LILLIAN LEITZEL, whirling at the top of the big tent, without even a net beneath to cast a doubt upon her perfection, spun out to its finest one of the shining threads by which men throw themselves toward the unattainable. For that she deserved the acclaim and the long roll of the drums that were always hers. And the manner of her death was not inappropriate. She was thrown to the earth because an iron ring, and not a human nerve, gave way.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

It Is Not a Bonus

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am much chagrined that The Nation should have published the two editorials Cash for the Veterans and The Bonus Raid.

In the first place, the word bonus is misleading for what has been properly and legislatively called adjusted compensation. The stipulated pay in the army was $30 per month and board. Qualified men within the age limits were compelled to enter the army regardless of their profession or earning capacity, and to take their chances of becoming cannon fodder or permanent inmates of hospitals. At the same time common laborers were receiving from $4 to $6 a day and mechanics from $6 to $10, with nearly unlimited overtime, which was not allowed in the service. Let the profiteers be left out of the reckoning.

After five years Congress enacted legislation providing compensation at the rate of $1 per day for service in this country and $1.25 per day for service overseas. But in spite of the fact that this compensation constituted wages for services rendered, and wages are recognized as having the first lien on capital in nearly all States of the Union, the federal government, on the advice of the Greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton, evaded responsibility by issuing certificates of indebtedness to the veterans, now worth only 22½ per cent of their face value with interest computed at 6 per cent. The face value, by the way, varies from about $30 to $1,789, not $1,000 to $2,000 as stated in your editorial.

"Hard-headed" business men foresee economic disaster if the veterans are paid now. But how foresighted are they? It was they who recommended the reduction of supertaxes to stimulate business. Yet general business went steadily down while stock brokerage went up until it was so topheavy it fell of its own weight. As for the forecasts of our perennial Secretary of the Treasury, in spite of his annual predictions of a deficit, the government has paid off $3,500,000,000 of United States bonds out of annual surpluses and returned to large corporations and wealthy individuals $1,250,000,000 in supposedly overpaid income taxes—although there is no doubt that the incomes were very carefully scrutinized by batteries of overpaid lawyers and underpaid accountants. Forecasts, in fact, have failed so repeatedly and completely that it would be safer to class them with dreams, mules, and weather predictions and go contrary.

As I see it, there is no proposal which would stimulate business so much as the liquidation by the government of its obligation to the veterans in small amounts that were due eleven years ago. The money would be distributed in almost every channel of trade, mainly through the lower strata of society, and afford relief from what will be a continued depression if heroic measures are not taken to change the business methods now operating in this country.

Philadelphia, February 15 F. W. BURGESS

On the Air

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Like the writer of The Nation's editorial On the Air, in the issue of February 11, I have scant patience with those who are patently abusing their radio wave-length privilege by constantly offending good taste and common sense with their advertising blatancies and fatuities. But I have even less patience with those who look to a government-owned-and-operated system of broadcasting, like the British Broadcasting Corporation, as the ideal for this country.

Karl Bickel, in the all-too-few chapters devoted to radio in his recent book, "New Empires," makes point of the necessity of maintaining the freedom of the air as zealously as we have sought to maintain the freedom of the press. To the credit of the private American radio enterprises—especially the two big national networks—be it said that they have thus far pursued rather astute policies in their handling of discussions of public affairs via their microphones. They have given rather good breaks to all sides of big public questions in their Half-Hours in the Nation's Capital, National Radio Forum, and like "editorial" features, considering the limitations of time and the congested wave lengths and the well-known preferences of the average American audience.

I know of at least one instance where a radio representative had to go to the mat—and won out, too—with high-placed officialdom seeking to bulldoze him into withdrawing the opportunity he gave a well-known and eminent liberal leader to go on the air. Not even Senator Norris, the man most of us newspapermen admire and respect above all others on Capitol Hill, has had occasion to complain about his treatment at the hands of radio.

But I wander afield. My point is that private enterprise (which is only now beginning to reap the fruits of blind and expensive venturing into what a few years ago was a highly unpromising commercial field) is conducting and can conduct broadcasting far more independently and unrestrainedly than would a governmentally, and hence politically, controlled and operated monopoly.

Radio is a natural adjunct of the press, but only a few farsighted publishers have realized this—some of them to their financial profit, too, during this last year, when advertising lineage went way down while radio "space" sold in higher quantity and at higher premium than ever. I should like to see the American press control radio, but, unhappily, our publishers just won't seem to awaken to the fact that the audible and the visual media of conveying intelligence and entertainment are natural kinsfolk.

Washington, February 7 MARTIN CODEL

The Bright Lights

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Much as I enjoyed Douglas Haskell's irony in The Bright Lights, in your issue of January 14, I should like to see a blunter challenge to a profession which can so triumphantly divert any but a frontal attack. Of course the important cleavage between the modern architecture of Europe and America is not along the line of acceptance or rejection of nature, but along that of clear or befuddled thinking. European architecture is seeking, and I think finding, a defined intellectual basis, while American architecture is toying with romantic stage sets. It is a common misconception to assume that American architecture is intellectual because a large amount of specialized knowledge is required in its production. For all its impressive structural and mechanical paraphernalia, it remains quite without rational intellectual basis as that is understood by such European thinkers as Oud, Gropius, Le Corbusier, and others, and as it has been understood by significant architectural creators in the past.

Is it not amusing that the people which prides itself on being preeminently practical and hard-headed lapses inevitably into sentimentality wherever art is concerned?

San Francisco, January 31 Irving F. Morrow

That New Party

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I sincerely hope that your editorial on A Party for the People in your issue of January 28 is typical of liberal opinion. Your expression of the facts that a new party must be founded on the interests of the producing masses and that these masses must recognize that their interests are in conflict with the interests of the owning class is a clear recognition of the class struggle. The failure heretofore on the part of most liberals to recognize the class struggle as the dominant factor in our political life has been the most serious barrier to complete cooperation between liberals and Socialists.

Cambridge, Mass., January 30 Alfred Baker Lewis

An Important Conference

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The International Conference on the World Economic Crisis to be held in Paris April 14, 15, and 16 under the auspices of the Women's International League promises to be very interesting. William Martin, of the Journal de Genève and of the International Labor Office, is one of the speakers who has promised to take part, and among the other speakers who are expected are M. Quesnay, director of the International Bank at Basle, and Mr. Keynes and Mr. Wise, of London. Mr. Charles Rist has been proposed as leader of the discussions. It may be remembered that he was concerned with the stabilization of Austrian currency.

The committee in charge of arrangements is anxious to secure the nomination of delegates or representatives from organizations which would naturally be interested in such a conference. Moreover, anyone whose interest lies in this field and who is planning to be in Europe at the time is urged to attend. Further information may be secured from the Women's International League, 1805 H Street N. W., Washington, D. C.

Washington, February 14 Emily G. Balch

Contributors to This Issue

Paul Y. Anderson is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

W. A. S. Douglas is the Chicago correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

H. M. Foster is former food editor of the New York Journal of Commerce.

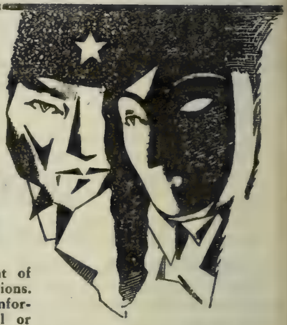
Eugene Lohrke is the author of "Deep Evening," a novel to be published in the spring.

John Collier is the executive secretary of the American Indian Defense Association, Inc.

Matthew Josephson is the author of "Portrait of the Artist as American."

MAY FIRST in MOSCOW

Be present



Watch the national pageant of Russia's May first celebrations. Colorful, history making, unforgettable. Tours, individual or group. Interesting itineraries. As low as $255 round trip.

Write for Booklet "N"

AMALGAMATED BANK TRAVEL DEPT.

11-15 Union Square, New York City
and 111 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

PIATILETKA

RUSSIA'S 5-Year Plan

by MICHAEL FARBMAN

$1

Just published in the Dollar Series

Based on the much-discussed Supplement to the London Economist, everywhere applauded as the most competent summary of the 5-Year Plan available. Mr. Farbman has an unusual gift for condensing voluminous facts. He writes from a true understanding of the Soviets' policies and the Russian people. "A splendid achievement," says Maurice Hindus. First edition sold the first week. Illustrated. At all leading booksellers, or direct, by sending one dollar to:

NEW REPUBLIC, Inc. 421 West 21 New York

Books, Art, Music, Drama

Praise

By MARK VAN DOREN

Praise is no crust of snow
That fell long since and formed,
And now one day will enter the shut earth—
Stale wine, and warmed.

Praise is directest rain
That comes when it is needed—
Cool in its newness, and descending where Desire has seeded.

Praise is merest water—
Nothing, but enough.
Nor makes it any choice of how it feeds
Smooth ground or rough.

Praise falls on both alike,
And is at once beloved.
There is no good that is not prospered then—
Nor evil proved.

Counterblast

[In its issue of February 18 The Nation printed an article by Isidor Schneider called The Fetish of Simplicity, in which Mr. Schneider pointed to what were in his opinion the unfortunate effects of the self-consciously bare and simple writing of the "Hemingway school." As one novelist who exemplified the "unnaturalness of the new technique" he cited Josephine Herbst, "a writer with definite narrative gifts. But to know how genuine and abundant are these gifts one should hear her tell a story." In her conversation, Mr. Schneider remarked, Miss Herbst is "unashamedly rhetorical," but when she sits down to write she is "overcome by scruples" and avoids the literary effects that she uses naturally in her speech. "As a result, her novels have not realized to the full her narrative powers." Below is Miss Herbst's reply.—LITERARY EDITOR THE NATION.]

Key West, February 18

Dear Isidor Schneider: Kind neighbors who are always on hand with bad news brought me copies of The Nation and the World with Hansen's copy of your article in the former paper. I can only speak for myself and I am somewhat confused by the term "Hemingway school." Do you mean by this the same classification that Malcolm Cowley made in his article entitled The New Primitives? You appear however to be working from the outside while Cowley took their attitude toward life as his basis for the grouping. He included writings of E. E. Cummings, John Dos Passos, Hemingway, John Herrmann, Nathan Asch, and myself and nameless others. From what you say, it seems to me you have chosen arbitrarily only certain writings which will fit in most with your fetish idea of simplicity. They are all external qualifications and reinforce my notion that you are more concerned with the skin than the juice of the fruit. To refer to a conversation we had on the subject of Proust, I remember your saying that you liked him best when you were most conscious of his prose, and the passages relating to tastes and smells, to the place-names were your favorites. Much as I might enjoy the same passages, they failed to impress me in that way and I was most moved when I completely forgot his style, when the substance itself seemed to leap at me and turn me cold. That passage where Swann calls on the Duc and Duchesse de Guermante as they are about to step out to a party, she is wearing the wrong kind of shoes and he keeps nagging at her to go put on the right pair while she stands there half listening to why Swann cannot go to Italy with her, the reason being, as he manages to inject into the talk, that he is going to die. The Duc, refusing to be uncomfortable or to have his party spoiled, puffs this away as nonsense and the entire frivolity of their world is at the moment more stark and grim than Swann's approaching end. There are no metaphors, no involved figures in this part, and, in fact, the most impressive parts of Proust for me are those where his language is direct and deals quite concretely with incident. The power that the incident has to evoke emotional responses may depend on the reader as much as the writer and I must conclude that such is the case when you deny emotional attributes to the kind of writing under discussion and even claim the writers themselves are uninterested in it. If you mean false emotional effects, you are quite right, but if you mean emotion as an element to be felt by the reader and courted by the writer by his selection of incident, I do not see how you can deny it to "A Farewell to Arms" or to my own "Nothing Is Sacred." If you do deny it, many people must find something you have not found. If the emotional response was entirely ruled out, why did reviewers all over the country without prompting from any blurb, mention the emotional qualities of my book or if they did not actually use that word, how did they come by exactly the emotion I intended to evoke? The same is not true of "Money for Love." It seems to me the only work of mine to fall under your definition of the type of writing you undertake to discuss. I wrote it deliberately with the intent of discovering just how far a rigid acceptance of a certain method would take me. I never liked the book, do not like it now, and have always considered it pinched. But the people were pared to the bone, not to be realistic or natural, as you claim, but to suggest an even completer bareness of life than the actuality of the characters could portray. I believe you assume too much when you conclude that the end and aim of my writing, at least, is to be natural. Frankly I think it is quite unimportant, to be natural or not to be, to use colloquialisms or not to use them, so long as you attain what you set out to attain. In "Money for Love" and in a story called "Once a Year" I meant to get an overtone that would be more convincing than "reality." I succeeded so well that I never want to do this sort of thing again. But in adhering to this method I was under no compulsion to exalt "simplicity" but to attain a certain end. The machinery dominated the content in this case, and not by chance. I believe such a procedure always fails although Flaubert would never admit his "Madame Bovary" was superior to his polished and limited later works. I know of no one among the actively creative writers of this group who considers "simplicity" an end or who would sacrifice anything to it. It seems to me your complaint has more to do with reviewers who pick up words for convenient labels and toss them back and forth to one another. (They, not the writers, have made a fetish of simplicity.) Certainly when a critic can see only simplicity in the writings you have undertaken to discuss and nothing more, I should say the point of view was very limited. I believe that there is much more of a menace in loose criticism today than in the writings of the group you label "Hemingway." Your very use of Hemingway's name as a complete and comprehensive label for a group of people, many of whom were writing in the identical manner they employ today, before Hemingway was known, proves what I mean. I begin to understand very clearly why Hemingway had to write a cruel parody of Sherwood Anderson in order to rid himself of the burden of that name. I would be the last person in the world to deny the influence of Hemingway on my writing. He is a very excellent writer and I would be a fool if I did not read him to advantage. The same can be said for the writings of Stephen Crane, James Joyce, Ring Lardner, and Sherwood Anderson. I am quite certain that if "The Open Boat" by Stephen Crane appeared in print today for the first time it would be jumped on by a dozen athletic critics and Crane would be dubbed a "Hemingway follower." I have at my hand "A Sportsman's Sketches" by Turgenev and I am shocked to discover on page after page typical Hemingway dialogue. I am afraid Chekhov was also under the influence as I see some of the same repetitive effects in much of his conversation. Balzac was a writer with a monotonous, if not declarative, sentence structure and he was sloppy with grammar. He liked to write in the language of the day rather than the high literary tongue in vogue at the time, and I don't doubt this was due to the Hemingway influence. But oh, oh, the worst is this dreadful thing of Joyce. In his story "The Dead" I am afraid he has copied almost word for word, or certainly emotion for emotion, the end of "A Woman of Andros." This is all very sad and goes to prove that no one is strictly original, not even Joyce. Unfortunately we are born in a world that is full of influences and of young men and women who have used the word "swell" on and off the stage for well-nigh twenty years. Considering the vast numbers of people who have used that word as well as many hardier and tougher and the comparative few who could read "The Sun Also Rises," even assuming it was a best-seller, I should say that some other influence than a book was at work in the world, and Hemingway merely showed a genius for seeping up the life of his time, something usually considered laudatory, especially after a writer is dead.

Looking the thing straight in the face, I must say I do not understand why you are making a scare head of this group of writers, a very small group compared with the many who are at it, and a group whose pooled successes would be a very small part of the big successes of the day. You have the nervousness of the Mr. Palmers of the world who nose out alarming symptoms in harmless minorities. The Mr. Joneses of the world are a poor lot if they cannot draw down a single Nobel prize or a single book-club selection and where only one of their number is, so far as I know, a best-seller. (And only one commercial magazine that I know of welcomes their work.) It seems to me that in selecting this group for an alarmist pogrom you have taken the wrong bull by the horns. I nominate the reviewers and critics, whose confused and bungling efforts are doing more to confound the budding writer than any example of actual creative work. But even at that, why show such concern for budding writers? Those that have anything to say will go right on saying it; those that have not will go on writing reviews. Those who live by imitation will fall as always by the wayside, and I cannot see that it is important whether they fall by imitating Mr. Marcel Proust, Mr. William Carlos Williams, or Mr. Ernest Hemingway. Even those who have something to say of their own must be prepared for the club on the head as soon as that head emerges from the water, and it is well to be prepared and to know that the literary game, so far as niceness is concerned, is about on the level of Al Capone's operations in Chicago. Writers are supposed to sit quietly back and to take what is handed to them and it is well if they can do that. Reading backwards, it seems to me that Defoe, Fielding, Balzac, Stendhal, to name a few, were too much engaged in wranglings with their critics. They never drew the choice plums of the Thornton Wilders. I think it is a significant thing that the "Hemingway group," as you so uncomprehensively call them, have never developed a critic. It is a temptation better to forego. Another book is the soft answer and a pile of books turneth away wrath.

JOSEPHINE HERBST

Men in Ships

The Kaiser's Coolies. By Theodor Plivier. Translated from the German by Margaret Green. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

FOR reasons that are not at all obvious, the point of view of the average sailor during the late Great War has been lost amid the bewildering multitude of vociferations and outcries which, with a thin strain of sheer poetry and some very solid prose achievements, make up the body of war literature. "The Kaiser's Coolies" is the first effective and vivid challenge to this silence.

The spirit of its conception is commonplace enough, since it is merely an outcome of that fatigue and disillusion which thoughtful people are forced to accept as a natural consequence of four years of organized destruction on land, sea, and in the air, but the method is startling and unique, and the material is both dreadful and beautiful. No consequence in individual ignominy and suffering can quite blot out the majestic display of forces that attends an engagement between modern battle fleets. Ordinary human values dwindle to nothing beside the appalling effects of the striking and murderous power of the mechanically directed human brain. The planets in their regular orbits seem to move with scarcely less precision to purposes hardly less inhuman. Mathematical formulas possess, stunningly, the power of life and death, and speaking through the smoke of their own destruction, the great guns reduce time to nothing and space to a mere matter of sighting and elevation.

The result is not here the question, except in the nerve-racked and acid disillusion which, whether in war or in peace, is the bitter negation of all the promised glories of the mechanical age; and for the artist who can render the picture the moral values must remain as truly subsidiary in war as in peace. This Plivier is aware of, and he is content to paint his picture, rendering to giantism its due, to the battles of the machines their full measure of smoky and mathematical glory, to the great fleets under steam the ignominious majesty of their purposes, and to the men who serve in them the necessary bitterness of their fate. Lacking in all ordinary richness of style, his crude, flimsy prose takes strength from the lean force of his own conviction, and his battle of Jutland, where the major fleets of Germany and England were engaged in a long running battle, is assuredly one of the remarkable prose epics that the Great War has produced. Beyond that it is useless to go. There are pages in "The Kaiser's Coolies" of sheer boredom and monotony, for the book ranges over the whole scene of four years' life in the imperial navy. But whenever the great machines spring to life they speak effectively, to a more wide-ranging purpose, perhaps, than they have ever spoken before.

> The impacts approached nearer. The jets of water they threw up were of a poisonous green and yellow at the base, gleaming white at the summit. When they received a direct hit the steel bodies vibrated and reverberated like strange, gigantic musical instruments. Suddenly the wind played on the steel shrouds as on a harp. A tall wave dashed over the bows. It was a summer afternoon, and the sea was transparent like green glass.

This is prose without beauty; but the beauty that is pitiful and terrible comes to light between the harsh shadows of the ines, and the men in the ships are nothing and the ships and guns are all. Plivier's style lacks the grace to raise his epic at all times to perfection. It is black-and-white drawing with a leaning toward the macabre and grotesque. But that again s a question of taste and definition; and here is a book which s as effective as a caricature by Daumier, and that, perhaps, s enough.

Eugene Löhrke

Exploiting the Indian

Massacre. A Review of Today's American Indian. By Robert Gessner. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

"MASSACRE" is extraordinary in its positive values. There is no book like it dealing with the American Indian, and there has been none since Helen Hunt Jackson wrote her "Century of Dishonor," fifty years ago. Mr. Gessner has assembled an indictment of the Indian-affairs system which rolls like a storm-wind through four hundred pages. The storm-wind continues to blow, inasmuch as this is a down-to-the-minute book which treats the President Hoover Indian regime as a continuation of its predecessors. Mr. Gessner has lived among the Chippewas of Minnesota, has journeyed among the Wisconsin and Dakota tribes, and has assembled the records dealing with all the tribes and with Indian Bureau practices at Washington. He dedicates his book "to the first Congress that will eradicate what Lincoln seventy years ago called 'an accursed system.'" He calls for a crusade, and his book is a crusade.

Mr. Gessner is twenty-four years old, and his book, philosophically and aesthetically, is immature. There is a weakening overemphasis at many points. There is some crassness of imagery, and too much consciously fine writing. There is naivete about the things government can or should do. There is an immature view of Indian human nature. True, for example, some Indian women do carry their babies papoose-like on their shoulders. The circumstance does not prove that the Indian Bureau has failed in its duty toward the Indians. The government, indeed, has not "educated the Indian into a Caucasian." Unfortunately, the government has tried, and still tries. Indian depravity, whether or not caused by the government, reaches no such average depths as Mr. Gessner suggests, and Indian virtue did not pass from the earth with Sitting Bull. There are pages in "Massacre" which are reminiscent of "Mother India," but of "Mother India" with an inverted application.

These are minor criticisms. Dealing with the system of Indian affairs, Mr. Gessner combines a documentation usually adequate with a swiftly moving and at times a breathless narrative. The values are true and the facts are supported. Mr. Gessner correctly derives the Indian Bureau system from the federal statutes and Indian Bureau regulations which have systematized the exploitation of Indian property. He utilizes the classic report of the Institute for Government Research, issued in 1928, along with the eleven volumes of hearings of the Senate Indian Investigation Committee and a multitude of Indian Bureau and Congressional documents. Nearly, though not quite, always he stays within the documented evidence and within facts not controverted.

Noteworthy and adequate chapters deal with the Flathead power-site struggle, and with the continuing scandals of the Klamath Reservation, whose Indians are taxed by the Indian Bureau a per capita amount that would mean, if applied to the whole United States, an annual tax budget of twenty-five billion dollars. The struggles over Pueblo lands and Pueblo water rights are brilliantly and accurately narrated. The swift melting away of the Indian estate, through actions by Congress and the Indian Bureau, is portrayed with details from records not disputed. The cumulative breakdown of the Indian Bureau's irrigation and reclamation system is depicted, and the author discusses adequately the $42,000,000 reimbursable debt placed by the Indian Bureau and Congress on the tribes and allotted Indians—a debt still rapidly mounting, and represented by few tangible benefits.

A hundred pages of "Massacre" are devoted to the Indian Bureau's boarding-schools. The record is a horrible one—past and present—and is thoroughly sustained by documents. Inasmuch as the boarding-schools are being increased and are at present more overcrowded than heretofore, and the forcible abduction of children from their homes to overcrowd the boarding-schools is being continued, Mr. Gessner's indictment has instant relevancy. The chapters on Indian health are distressing because true. Mr. Gessner asserts, for example, that the Wisconsin Indian death-rate from tuberculosis is forty times greater than that of the general population of Wisconsin and that "the Menominee tribe, 100 per cent under Indian Bureau control, has the highest tuberculosis death-rate of any group of human beings—2,540 per 100,000 per year." His authority is the Institute for Government Research.

Toward his last chapters Mr. Gessner outlines various programs for Indian relief. His constructive pages are sound and suggestive but not exhaustive. His description, on page 408, of the existent denials of civil liberty to Indians is rigidly accurate and yet difficult for the unfamiliar mind to credit. None who read the book as a whole will doubt that the government's 250,000 Indian wards are essentially serfs, valued by the government not as human lives but as justifications for the exploitation of properties still huge though fast dwindling.

All in all, the book has no competitor, and it does accomplish a literary synthesis of facts as strange as any in human society, gathered by many agencies through the last ten years. It proves the continuing dominion of statutes enacted to despoil a helpless race, and of administrative policies derived from unexampled and bloodthirsty statutes. It charges that the present officers of the Indian Bureau have yielded to the "system" and are working against legislative reform. It is, throughout, specific. A rejoinder by the Indian Bureau, equally specific, would appear to be mandatory.

John Collier

Lafcadio Hearn

Blue Ghost: A Study of Lafcadio Hearn. By Jean Temple. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

CONSISTENTLY unfortunate in his biographers, poor Lafcadio Hearn has won at length a more adequate and intelligent interpretation than heretofore in Mrs. Jean Temple's short study of his career. Since our chief sources of knowledge in this field have been, first, a voluminous, partisan work by a never-attained sweetheart (Mrs. Bisland), second, a poisonous one by an outraged friend (Gould), third, a pedestrian and trivial newspaperman's, (Tinker), fourth, that of book speculators who piously believed that Hearn would become "as legendary a figure as Poe," one would think it time for a compendious and rigid labor of old-fashioned German pedantry, filled with authenticated, documentary evidence, and with balance clearly drawn. But perhaps Mrs. Temple was right in confining herself to an "impression" of Lafcadio. On careful examination his deficiencies glare at one, his letters seem more often petty than philosophic. Dr. Gould of Philadelphia, who was for a time his patron, may have been himself puritanical and rather limited; he grew enraged at Hearn's softness, and, I have sometimes thought, with good cause. Hearn was certainly a "mysterious figure"; but it would have been better for his immortal future if he had been more so.

Unhappy immigrant and waif, he was during twenty years an American artist engulfed in the cave-man years of 1870 to 1890. We know that he impersonated the romantic and individualistic revolt against middle-class social life, with much attendant scandal. But what of his place as a man of letters, which Mrs. Temple estimates so high?

After all, the Greek-Irish wanderer was but a distant outpost, perhaps unconsciously, of the later phase of French romanticism. If he had stayed in Paris, we should have been able to tuck him away in the annals of French literature among twenty charming and minor writers of the fin du siècle era. In our own turbulent States, with no literary conversation, no "schools" of poetry, no Latin Quarter, no academies even, he was a sad anomaly. I use the term romanticism as a popular convenience; this movement in art, from the period of Rousseau to that of Delacroix and Baudelaire, made vigorous and truthful contributions. For its later phase, Hearn, who was quite cosmopolitan, may stand as being as representative as anyone else.

"He put too much importance to Beauty or Nicety perhaps," Hearn's Japanese wife commented, at the end, in her halting but shrewd English. "He was too enthusiastic for beauty, for which he wept and for which he rejoiced and for which he was angry." The sense of beauty overpowered him always as in a swoon or a dream. Its drama was associated poignantly with some dim race-memory and with an "Oedipus complex" as well, as Mrs. Temple plausibly suggests. His response was always in the monotone of rapture and trance. Myopic and disfigured, he sought always the colors and scents of the tropical zones; but are not the greatest masters of color drawn from north of the line of latitude of New York?

The profound weakness of his style, from which we have severely turned ourselves away, is perceptible in such a passage as the following, describing the sounds emitted by a Chinese gong:

> The gong glimmered pale and huge and yellow like the moon rising over a Southern swamp. My friend tapped its ancient face with a drumstick, and it commenced to sob, like waves upon a low beach. He tapped it again, and it moaned like the wind in a mighty forest of pines. Again, and it commenced to roar, and with each tap the roar grew deeper and deeper, till it seemed like thunder rolling over an abyss in the Cordilleras . . .

We trust the simile of waves on a beach; we accept that of a forest of evergreens; but when we come to "thunder rolling over an abyss in the Cordilleras," we halt. Now poor Lafcadio had never, in all his travels, visited the Cordilleras of the Andes; he had only read about them, as of the thousand and one perfumes, drugs, beverages, plants with which he fills his pages, to achieve thereby only a total effect of neutralization. And we end by recoiling angrily from such artistic insincerity. But what of Marlowe and Shakespeare and Keats, and so many other great artificers? the reader will protest. It was in spite of such extravagant devices, we would maintain, that Marlowe and his fellows were successful. In them the sound and fury, the debauchery of rhetoric, convinces us; whereas Hearn's exoticism is couched in an impoverished prose, flaccid and pale, accented by the single, short breath and monosyllabic language of a monotonous sentence structure. Going back toward the purer springs of English prose rhythm, how much greater variety and life we may find in any single page of Laurence Sterne, where each sentence seems to start off in a different direction, or strike a different tone, while holding bravely to the central design of the work.

But the late romantics who so greatly vitiated the good work of Rousseau, Madame de Staël, and Chateaubriand gav rise in turn to a deadly satirist of the twentieth century, wh ridiculed them into limbo. This was Guillaume Apollinair whose chief sport was to punctuate his resonant and ironic verses with exotic nouns discovered in old American mail-ord catalogues, which he devoured at leisure in the cafes of Mon parnasse. Thus we find in his poems rivers with beautif Indian names mingled with foliage that grows only in th Fleas' Market of Paris. It was the wild clownery of Apo linaire as much as anything else that brought low the pr tentious symbolists, or late romantics.

Lafcadio Hearn becomes an even more shadowy figu in the last ten years of his life, the period of his Orient adventure in Japan. Farther from English speech, his a scarcely improved after the West Indian phase. And Mr Temple, too, grows more vague and lyrical at once in dwellin on this phase of his "life on an old fan." The fruits o these years were chiefly his work in folklore, though it wa poorly organized, and his last book, "Japan: An Interpretation. Shaking off his inferiority complex he became, on the whole, better man, and even a better thinker. "Japan" is a valuabl introduction to the Orient, one agrees; but the mixture o Spencer's synthetic philosophy with Buddhist mysticism is ir trinsically a poor marriage. His love and knowledge of Japa were both greatly qualified. And as for us, poor sodden Occidentals, we often wonder in our ignorance whether Japan ma have been the best possible gateway to Oriental ideas. Wa not Japan the first to break away from the old moorings, t Lafcadio's eternal chagrin?

The picturesque story of Hearn has been pieced togethe with good taste, as well as enthusiasm, in Mrs. Temple's stud However, we should like to see a great confirmed skeptic, i he had the patience, go over the whole disputed ground.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Notes on Fiction

Our Gods Are Not Born. By Charles R. Walker. Jonatha Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

This volume of short stories is worthy of praise for it attempt to write about Americans affected by America and t do this with the simpler things taken for granted. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Walker's way of seeing and writin keeps the attempt from being successful. The writing strive too hard for a needless indirection and creates complicatio and subtlety not implicit in the material by going round abou it with many words and careful vagueness. The same inflatio that he gives to emotions of no very great interest Mr. Walke gives to characters of no great significance. He sees the hurt by America and their time, and remains blinded by hi verbal inflation to the fact that they are merely unintelligen and hysterical.

Oklahoma Town. By George Milburn. Harcourt, Brace an Company. $2.

These are not short stories. Or if they are, they ar short stories in the one valid and legitimate sense of tha form, being extraordinarily vivid sketches, running only a fe pages each, wherein the character or the simple situation i treated with an economy and realism of touch which we canno sufficiently praise. One thinks in comparison of Sherwoo Anderson, whose name and technique will undoubtedly be mentioned in connection with those of Mr. Milburn; one think of all that Chekhovian plumbing and peering into the shabb lives and sorry souls of a few impossible people; and in recalling Mr. Anderson and others who have dealt with muc he same milieu, one feels like hailing Mr. Milburn as somehing very like a new genius. The author is still extremely oung, and his apprenticeship for the writing of these remarkble tales of small-town life has been that of bumming the ountry from coast to coast and acting as bus-boy on a banana oat plying the Gulf route. Of these stories God Smote a hoemaker, Mabel Barclay, Banker Brigham, Clark Peavey, nd the poignant sketch which closes the volume, Hail and Farewell, are perhaps the most appealing. They are, by the ame token, extremely cruel. That milk of human kindness recently extolled by Mr. Chesterton as being so abundant in he Middle West is strangely absent from these incisive and rather heartless tales. We admire them extremely, and trust hat their author will soon produce a novel as good as almost any one of them.

Festival. By Struthers Burt. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Burt's latest novel is distinguished by a prose that s of a rich Meredithian texture and by a deal of tortured and tortuous thinking on many subjects—chiefly nationality, sex, love, America, nature. For his central figure is a man who, having recently retired as president of a big Philadelphia bank, thinks his way along gropingly in the reflective world where he has so long wished to live. His mind is like a slow flame which never destroys in a great conflagration but which licks about such subjects as his desire for a place of his own with a garden, his wife who is so cool and untouchable, his idyllic platonic love affair of many years' standing with Elsie Holt, and most of all his daughter married to an Italian prince and not quite happy. Indeed, it licks about everything that comes its way. But in the end Dorn Griffiths accepts defeat when he accepts from the President an ambassadorship to Italy. He must go back into harness. The secondary story of the Princess Rezzonica, her husband, and her American lover is more exciting but less powerful. Mr. Burt has written a fine and mature study which seems, however, in the end to come to precisely nothing. One comes out by the same door where in one went, as the conflicting thoughts and emotions cancel one another. But one has had a stimulating experience on the way.

Music

Stravinsky

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has recently given us performances of the Stravinsky "Capriccio" and of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." They throw the strange history ot this strangest of composers into vivid relief against the background of other contemporary composers whose works we have been hearing.

Sibelius, who has had a burst of recognition from all quarters this season, with performances of two symphonies, two symphonic poems, and a violin concerto; Loeffler, whose seventieth birthday was recently celebrated with performances of his "Pagan Poem" in New York, Boston, and Cleveland; Elgar and Bloch, represented on recent programs by an "Introduction and Allegro" and the "Schelomo" rhapsody, respectively—these are men who have been interested more in the perfection than in the originality of their idioms, who have grown naturally and non-violently out of the music of the past. Although none of them is a slavish imitator of his predecessors, none has been very deeply concerned with individualizing his style by technical innovation. These men are prophets or poets, in the same sense that their forerunners were. Their importance is personal rather than historical; it lies in the content of their music itself rather than in new roads of expression opened for followers to travel on.

Contrast them, then, with the portrait of Stravinsky as "a commercial genius, a kind of musical bank director," drawn by Leonid Sabaneyeff in his admirable book "Modern Russian Composers." "Stravinsky's fame," he writes, "is based not only on his musical gifts . . . but chiefly on his virtuosity in making full use of musical conditions and taking full account of fashions and fads, those two wavering and changing elements on which, nevertheless, fame in one's lifetime almost exclusively depends. . . . Stravinsky is immeasurably more a genius of musical business than purely of music." The old virtues, Sabaneyeff says with a bitterness not quite concealed, are out of date; épater les bourgeois has become the aim of the modern composer. And since Stravinsky has had unequaled success in startling the musical world into frightened admiration and imitation, he has become the most brilliant figure of our time. This is a very civilized way of crying "humbug," which is what many less brilliant critics than Sabaneyeff have been crying all along.

But is Stravinsky nothing but a splendid mountebank? It is not difficult, at any rate, to see how that impression arose. Early in his career (in 1911, and he is only in his forty-ninth year now) he had poked good-humored but devastating fun, in "Petrouchka," at most of the music that had preceded him. Two years later he shook the foundations of the musical world with "Le Sacre du Printemps," a work of the utmost imaginable rhythmic, harmonic, and orchestral radicalism. There followed a series of works that jumped from one tendency to another in bewildering and apparently aimless succession: "Les Noces," continuing the primitivism of the "Sacre"; "L'Histoire du Soldat," an acid miniature; the Sonata and the Concerto for piano, combining elements of jazz with a "return to Bach," a still acidulous combination; "Oedipus," an oratorio for male chorus and orchestra with soloists, borrowing liberally from Handel, Verdi, Wagner, and many others; "Le Baiser de la Fée," a ballet acknowledging Stravinsky's debt to Tschaikowsky, at the moment when the stock of that very romantic and unmodern master had fallen to its lowest point.

Through them all runs an uncanny talent for the unexpected. Through them all, though, I think, the skilful hand of this unique genius has been pretty clearly visible. And now it seems probable that his wanderings have brought him to something that can be understood and enjoyed even in the light of the traditions he once made such brilliant efforts to destroy. For in the light-hearted "Capriccio" the irony of parts of the Concerto seems completely abandoned. And the "Symphonie de Psaumes," inscribed (doubtless with something less than complete piety) "to the glory of God," seems at first hearing a sincere and moving work. Nor has Stravinsky's unique technical mastery apparently suffered while he has been off on his ironical pilgrimages.

As the distance that separates us from those once enigmatic works increases, I think there is little doubt that we shall be less and less concerned with the motives that inspired them. Beethoven, too, played practical jokes, but today we have to have them pointed out to us. Even when, driven by a need to shock his friends, or by who knows what Dostoevskian urge toward self-destruction, Stravinsky perhaps tried his hardest to conceal, even deform, his virtuosity, it was never successfully hidden. "Oedipus" (which the League of Composers will present in April) is the one work of Stravinsky with which I have not yet been able to feel any real contact; but I think no one could ever have attributed it to anyone else.

The significance of his music has for a long time been overshadowed by its audacity. But if, as seems probable, he has again arrived at the point where his music is as important

Samuel N. Harper
just back from his fourteenth trip to Russia, reveals Soviet Russia's state of mind in MAKING BOLSHEVIKS

$2.00 at all bookstores

The University of Chicago Press

VISIT
THE SOVIET UNION

SEE MAY DAY IN MOSCOW

Sailings, April 8—Mauretania
April 16—Europa

Tour includes 12 days in the U. S. S. R. for only $248.

Other cultural and sightseeing tours $385 and up.

WORLD TOURISTS, INC.

First American travel organization to conduct tours to the U. S. S. R.

175 Fifth Avenue Alg. 4 - 6656 New York

VISITS TO SOVIET RUSSIA

May Day Celebrations

Nine Days in U. S. S. R.

Sail from N. Y. April 16 S.S. EUROPA; arrive Moscow April 27. Six days Moscow; 3 days Leningrad. Round trip from N. Y. $435. From Berlin $210.

The Russian Theatre Tour
under the auspices of the DRAMA LEAGUE TRAVEL BUREAU and the leadership of
SHELDON CHENEY
author "New World Architecture"

21 Days in Russia :: :: :: :: :: Leningrad-Moscow-Kiev

Sail from N. Y. May 9 S.S. ROTTERDAM; arrive Leningrad May 23. Inclusive round trip price from N. Y. $895.

Booklets available on Russian or European Travel

The Open Road
11 West 42nd St., New York City

intrinsically as historically, it cannot be long before what Sabaneyeff a trifle grudgingly admits, will be generally and freely recognized: "However one may evaluate Stravinsky's repeatedly and bizarrely changing style, he undoubtedly constitutes an era in musical art. . . . At present he is the most resplendent and significant figure of contemporary life."

ARTHUR MENDEL

Art

Collectivistic Images

THE object most sharply revealed by the great collection of Russian icons recently on view in the public museums of Boston and of New York, and now in transit among other American treasuries, is Russia herself. These delicate and majestic images unveil a body of prime work hitherto obscured and neglected in churches and convents and lately given the world under Soviet patronage: a whole unknown province of painting roughly related to that of the Italian primitives, but individually exquisite, and startlingly concordant with the modern movement. Still, the sovereign impression of these accurate copies and skilfully cleaned originals is that of a racial, national, and social identity. Six centuries are represented in them, and the labors of various schools, regions, and individuals. The Byzantine influence persists strongly in certain ones; in others, barbaric and Mongolian traits appear. Individual examples of the Stroganoff period suggest, if not the magnetism, at least the touch of profane Western art. And still, amid their almost bewildering splendor, one stands in the presence of a strangely homogeneous expression.

Stemming directly from the traditions of the mosaicists and image-makers of Constantinople, these golden and hieratic symbols are nevertheless inconformable with their Byzantine ancestors. One could not fancy even the most inlay-like of them figuring in San Vitale or Torcello, for example. The drawing is both awkward and vigorous; the coloring somber and strong. At the same time, these paintings exhibit a development ultimately inconsistent with Italian art from Duccio onward. They are non-naturalistic. Chiaroscuro plays no role in them. Their technique is sheerly coloristic: the organization of pure and lacquer-like pigment for the purpose of isolating and communicating form. But neither are these icons Oriental. While it has been alleged that their dominant color scale is "to be matched in Chinese, Korean, and Persian ceramics," it is evident that the particular shades and combinations of color are distinctive. Besides, it has recently been established by the head of the Restoration Workshop in Moscow that, far from being the result of abstract ideals and definite types of artistic taste, the recurrent harmonies are directly borrowed from the landscapes amid which the paintings were made.

Hence, while this collection does not represent all Russian icon painting—the present writer remembers seeing, in Cologne in the summer of 1929, an impressive loan exhibit of late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century images manifestly produced under the influence of Western classicism—its communication of a single, constant root is none the less overpoweringly persuasive. From the first moment of reception one feels Russia herself about one in all her peculiarity: not medieval Russia nor present-day Russia, but the inveterate reality from which sovietism logically developed. Amid these objects of worship we are deep in a world aboriginally communistic, inherently indifferent to the individual, consistently placing greatest worth on the collective life. It comes to us directly, through the manner, the spirit, of this art. One knows it, strangely enough, in the pervasive sense of unearthliness and disembodied spirituality. Indications of volume and tri-dimensionality meet us. But this art is flat; hot of blood but bare of the grand tactility and materiality of the chief Italian primitives—Giotto, for great example; without the very reverent but none the less massive palpation of the flesh. There is organization, but little of Massaccio's dynamic movement. All is staticity, supernaturalism, ideality.

One knows it again in other absences of the pagan affirmation of the world. The slender forms of the expiring Saviors in these icons are infinitely warm, tender, compassionate: their sacrifice for the sake of man's guilty soul is profoundly felt. But the passionate, almost fierce embrace as of all nature, all creation, expressed in the massive expansive form of the crucified on Nicolo Pisano's baptistry pulpit, say, is lacking. Perhaps it is mere Italian melodrama we miss; still, the possibility is slight. A distinct feeling of resignation flows from all the figures, supernormal virgins, archangels, and saints. Weary, knowing, pitiful, the heavenly host have no power over this world. Life is suffering; the passions are brutal. Gravely admonitory, they move the heart to gentleness, worship, humility. The strong traditionalism reinforces the lesson of the flatness, staticity, resignation. Types of form and expression are repeated through the centuries. Experiment is evident, but not abundantly.

Our intuitions are not awry. These traits are really indicative of the fact that the hidden form-giver of this body of art, the unconscious agent of variation from the cast and manner of Italian primitive painting, is to a great extent an appreciation of mutual adjustment and a depreciation of individual adaptation. Fantastic as it may appear, the tactility of the forms in a work of art does indeed constitute an exaltation of the individual will; material touch, direct contact, apparently being the basis of individual adjustment. The broad materiality of Western art, the fierce sympathy with the whole of creation implied in it, actually sanctions the demonic as well as the altruistic elements of the personality, accepting them as agents of a greater good. Conversely, the immateriality and remoteness of forms would seem to reject the individual will, exalting mutual functions and desires; the spirit of resignation, of forbearance, of compassion preparing the road for selflessness, tenderness, and the other social feelings. So, too, traditionalism, and the authority of the priests and elders of the tribe. And while it is probable that the artists themselves were unaware of the bearing of their techniques, it is perfectly conceivable that the spirit of their communities unconsciously dictated their choices.

Let no one think the one civilization merely pagan, and the other religious. Both, it cannot be doubted, flow from the dictations of necessity. The first evidently is the order of littoral, scattered, primitively piratical, latterly trading populations dependent for survival upon individual initiative, like the Ionian Greeks, the medieval Italians, the Hanseatic people, the seventeenth-century Dutch and English. The second must be counted that of continental, pastoral, agricultural populations grouped and herded by the communal nature of their wealth. Possibly the one is essentially Protestant, the other essentially Catholic. In either case, both represent the results of the adjustment of religion to vital needs. And while no community can survive holding exclusively to the one or the other order, the attitude accented is of greatest significance.

Hence the ease with which communism established itself in Russia. Hence, too, the peregrination of these symbols out of Russia and their present appearance among us. They come as affirmations of order, as challenges to an uncomprehending world. Doing so, they reveal much of the Soviets' attitude toward abstract work, art, and symbolic expressions of all kinds.

THE
SECOND OLDEST PROFESSION
●
A STUDY OF THE PROSTITUTE'S
"BUSINESS MANAGER"
BY
BEN. L. REITMAN, M. D.
●
$3.75 All Bookstores
THE VANGUARD PRESS
100 Fifth Avenue :: New York City

Are all our Notions of Morality,
Religion and Science Based on Contradictions? Read—

PARADOXY

THE DESTINY OF MODERN THOUGHT
by Richard Rothschild with a foreword by John Haynes Holmes

"Philosophical reflections on the new developments in science were obviously needed and Mr. Rothschild here supplies them in challenging fashion . . . bringing in illustrative material from well-nigh every department of knowledge."—Boston Transcript.

"Attacking the dogmatism of religion and, more strongly, the less justified dogmatism of science, the author presents, so clearly that any intelligent man can follow him, a comprehensive philosophy."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"Mr. Rothschild has undertaken to formulate the thought-pattern of an age...This book may well prove to be important not merely on its own merits as a work of philosophy, but in its significance as a herald of a new age which lies ahead. Its range, as well as its inherent character is impressive." —John Haynes Holmes.

Richard R. Smith, Inc., Publishers, New York. $3.00

☐ FILMS ☐ DANCE ☐

EMBASSY
THE NEWS REEL THEATRE
B'way and 46th Street
ANY TIME 25c ANY SEAT
Continuous 10 A. M. to Midnight
Complete change of Program weekly—Midnight Shows every Saturday

6TH BIG MONTH—The Famous German Screen Operetta
Zwei Herzen im 3/4 Takt
("Two Hearts in Waltz Time")
A Musical Romance of GAY VIENNA!
"This screen work is by all odds the best picture sent from the other side of the Atlantic."
—Mordaunt Hall, New York Times.
Seats Now Available for All Performances
55TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
E. of 7th Ave. Cont. 12 Noon to Midnight. Pop. Prices. Circle 7 - 0129

THE FIRST GRAND OPERA IN FILM
Fortune Gallo's production of Leoncavallo's
"PAGLIACCI"
LEO BRECHER'S
New CENTRAL PARK THEA., Seventh Ave. at 59th St. (formerly Jolson's)

At LITTLE CARNEGIE PLAYHOUSE
57th Street East of Seventh Avenue
"DIE NACHT GEHORT UNS"
(The Night is Ours)
All-talking German Success—Charlotte Ander, Hans Albers and Walter Taussen

SATURDAY, MARCH 14TH, 1931
RENAISSANCE CASINO
144 WEST 138TH STREET, HARLEM
DANCING: 9:30 P.M. TICKETS: $1.50 in advance—$2.00 at the door
VERNON ANDRADE'S ORCHESTRA
Tickets for sale at League for Industrial Democracy, 112 East 19th Street, ALgonquin 4-5865; at Rand Book Store, 7 East 15th Street; at Civic Club, 18 East 10th Street

There has been much confusion about this matter in this cou try, due not a little, we suspect, to the sorry personal mudd of Michael Gold. We have been told of Soviet hostility t pure and abstract expression, even to pure science and math matics. There is no doubt that Lenin had an undevelope understanding of the symbol, and very bourgeois tastes in ar and most of his successors have had little more comprehensio of the immense practical importance of the product of th abstract search for value and reality than their fellows in othe European and American government offices. Not only th artists, but the research workers in Russian physical labora tories as well, are said to find it difficult to get support in thei apparently non-utilitarian labors. But through this collection o wonderfully preserved symbols of value and faith, and object of excellent workmanship and quality, we get the clear sens that what the Soviets are beginning to look for is the symbol of their own order: the present Russia evolved from the pas And finding us at a time of pretty confusion about the America order, it adds another to the many vivid challenges they hav given us.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Drama

Rosalba and Virginio

ELINOR WYLIE'S fragile and frost-blown romance "The Venetian Glass Nephew" (Vanderbilt Theater) has been set to music and adapted to the stage. Ruth Hale has dramatized it, and out of that dramatization Eugene Bonner has made what he calls a "little opera." The most significant criticism of it I can give I must borrow from two unknown ladies who sat behind me, having strayed somehow into this theater rather than into any other, from Chaplin to the Chinese. During a change of scene one of them said: "Queer thing, isn't it?" The other replied: "Yes—but see here. The program says it is based on a novel." "Oh." Both of them then sank back in resignation to watch a spectacle which neither hoped to understand. Neither had read the novel, so neither understood the opera. Nor was there any possibility that either should. The opera was difficult enough to understand for one who five years ago had read Mrs. Wylie's tale of Rosalba and her frangible white lover, and who remembered it as something rather to be admired, perhaps, than to be believed. For there was that about Elinor Wylie's work, whether prose or verse. If one did not admire it, if one did not find perfection of some sort in it, then there was nothing in it at all.

So a dramatization of "The Venetian Glass Nephew" would have either to be perfect or to fail utterly. The performance of which I speak was far from perfect. Of the music I can say little, except that it was tuneful and that it seemed to me much the best thing about the whole business. But of the rest I am bound to report that the dramatization missed every opportunity to be dramatic; that the acting—save for George Houston's as Casanova and, in lesser degree, Raymond Huntley's as Angelo Querini—was hesitant, indeed was almost palsied; that the pace throughout was sluggish; that in a word the illusion was not there. Without this illusion there could be no belief, and so no delight. Mrs. Wylie supplied the illusion in her book by supplying a constant glittering purity of style. With wonderful spirit she carried the thing off, stiffening us at once into an attitude respectful of her art and running the sentences of her text swiftly into one another much as water, one may imagine, runs in among the particles of sand and soda when glass is made. We could believe that tale. We cannot believe this spectacle, which lacks

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □ PLAYS □ LECTURES □ LUNCHEON □

PLAYS TO SEE

*As You Desire Me—Maxine Elliott's—39 St. E. of B'way.
*Dr. X.—Hudson—44 St. E. of B'way.
*Elizabeth The Queen—Beck—45 St. W. of [illegible] Ave.
‡Fine and Dandy—Erlangers—W. 44 St.
*Five Star Final—Cort—48 St. c. of B'way.
*Grand Hotel—National—W. 41 St.
*Green Grow the Lilacs—Guild—52 St. W. of B'way.
‡Meet My Sister—Shubert—44 St. W. of B'way.
*On the Spot—Forrest—W. 49 St.
†Once in a Lifetime—Music Box—W. 45 St.
†Private Lives—Times Square—W. 42 St.
*The Barrets of Wimpole St.—Empire—40 St. and B'way.
†The Greeks Had a Word For It—Harris—42 Sa. W. of B'way.
*The Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47 St.
*The Man with the Portfolio—Yiddish Art—2 Ave. and 2 St.
‡The New Yorkers—Broadway—44 St. W. of B'way.
‡Three's [illegible] Crowd—Selwyn—W. 42 St.
*Tomorrow and Tomorrow—Miller—43 St. E. of B'way.
†Vinegar Tree—Playhouse—48 St. E. of B'way.

---

* Drama. † Comedy. ‡ Musical.

FILMS

Zwei Herzen Im 3-4 Takt—(German)—55 St. Playhouse E. of 7 Ave.
News Reel—Embassy—B'way and 46 St.
Cimarron—Globe—B'way and 46 St.
City Limits—Geo. M. Cohan—B'way and 43 St.
"Die Nacht Gehort Uns"—Little Carnegie—57 St. E. of 7 Ave.
"Pagliacci"—The Central Park—59 St. and 7 Ave.

MUSIC

Philharmonic—Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Wed. eve., Mar. 4; Fri. aft., Mar. 6; Sat. eve., Mar. 7; Sun. aft., Mar. 8; Arturo Toscanini conducting (Seventh Symphony of Bruckner).
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Thurs. eve., Mar. 5; (Stravinsky, Symphonie de Psaumes; Honegger, First Symphony); Sat. aft., Mar. 7 (Stravinsky, Symphonie de Psaumes; Hill, Second Symphony); Fri. eve., Mar. 6, Brooklyn Academy of Music.
Hans Lange String Quartet, Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, Fri. eve., Mar. 6.
Friends of Music, Metropolitan Opera House, Sun. aft., Mar. 8 (Bach, St. John Passion).
Georges Barrere, Flutist, Brooklyn Academy of Music, Sun. aft., Mar. 8.
Hampton Institute Choir, Carnegie Hall, Mon. eve., Mar. 9.
Philadelphia Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Tues. eve., Mar. 10, Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting.
Pan-American Orchestra, New School for Social Research, Tues. eve., Mar. 10, Adolf Weiss conducting.
Percy Grainger, pianist, Carnegie Hall, Sat. aft., Mar. 14.
Sigrid Onegin, contralto, Town Hall, Sun. aft., Mar. 15.
Copland-Sessions Concerts: Music and Films, Broadhurst Theatre, Sun. eve., Mar. 15.

LECTURES AND DISCUSSIONS

Can the Five-Year Plan in Russia Succeed? Discussion by Burton K. Wheeler, Sherwood Eddy and Vera Micheles Dean—L. I. D. Luncheon, Hotel Woodstock—Sat. Mar. 7 at 12:45.
"A Hindoo's Reaction to the London Round Table Conference" by L. H. K. Rezmie—International Club, 2 W. 64 St., Sun., Mar. [illegible] at 4:30 P. M.

Institute
of Arts and Sciences, Columbia University
McMILLIN ACADEMIC THEATER
N.E. Corner Broadway and 116th Street
Tuesday, March 10: HAROLD LASKI
"Authority in the Modern State"
Members Ticket Admits
Guest Ticket $1. - - - Lecture [illegible] 8:15 P.M.
Monthly Bulletin Sent on Request

AS YOU DESIRE ME
LUIGI PIRANDELLO'S NEW PLAY
with JUDITH ANDERSON
"No student of modern drama can afford to miss this electric presentation of the theatre of ideas."—MARC CONNELLY.
(Author and director of "The Green Pastures")
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE, 39th St. E. of Bway. Eves. 8:50.
Mats. Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

The Theatre Guild Presents
Green Grow The Lilacs
GUILD THEATRE 52nd Street, West of Broadway.
Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., [illegible]

LAST WEEK
ELIZABETH, THE QUEEN
Martin Beck Thea. 45th Street, West of Eighth Avenue.
Eves., 8:50. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40.

GILBERT MILLER presents
TOMORROW and TOMORROW
A NEW PLAY BY PHILIP BARRY
with ZITA HERBERT
JOHANN & MARSHALL
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd St. Eves., 8:40.
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:40.

Dwight Deere Wiman presents
MARY BOLAND in [illegible] Osborn's Comedy Hit
VINEGAR TREE
PLAYHOUSE THEATRE, W. 48th St. BRy 9 - 2628
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

Rand School of Social Science
7 East 15th Street ALgonquin 4 - 3094
WILLIAM P. MONTAGUE Mondays, 8:30 P.M., Mar. 9, 16, 23
Prof. of Philosophy, Col. Univ.
"Knowledge, Conduct and Faith" Adm. 50c
PROF. JOHN H. RANDALL, Jr. Sat. aft., Mar. 7, 2 P.M.
Prof. of Philosophy, Col. Univ.
"The Promise of Our Revolutionary Civilization" Adm. 25c

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Luncheon Discussion
AT HOTEL WOODSTOCK, 127 WEST 43RD STREET
SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1931, at 12:45
Can the Five Year Plan in Russia Succeed?
BURTON K. WHEELER
United States Senator from Montana
SHERWOOD EDDY
Author of "The Challenge of Russia"
VERA MICHELES DEAN
Member of the Research Department, Foreign Policy Association
Chairman, REINHOLD NIEBUHR
Members $1.25 Non-Members $1.50
Undergraduate Students 75c
Make Reservations now at office of L. I. D., 112 E. 19th St. Alg. 5865
This discussion will be broadcast over WEAF and stations associated with the National Broadcasting Company at 1:45 Eastern Standard Time

Jewish Social Work a Career and Challenge

Do your criteria of a successful career include also the intangible values of inherent interest, stimulating contacts and social usefulness?

If so, then you should study the advantages of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each academic year are available for especially qualified students.

The Spring Quarter begins March 30, 1931

For full information, address

M. J. Karpf, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

(A graduate school)

71 W. 47th St., New York City

even the sort of style which would make it credible in its own terms. Miss Hale kept the original language wherever she could, and that was fine—particularly when it came from the lips of Mr. Houston. But when Mary Silveira, who played Rosalba, walked out of the furnace at Versailles which supposedly had converted her into a porcelain wife to match her brittle husband, I could not see that she was any different from what she had been before she walked in. There was no music, no lighting, no pantomime, no style to tell us that she was.

Have you seen Ogu? He is an Indian in "The Great Barrington," a play at the Avon Theater which is so thoroughly bad that it is funny—but not funny enough, I fear, to last long enough for you to get there before Ogu is forever gone. Ogu is the funniest thing about the play, which Franklin Russell wrote with some intention unknown to me. The moral of the piece seems to be that we should not lean too heavily on our ancestors, who may, like the seventeenth-century Barringtons and Van Doorns here, have been lecherous liars and murdering braggarts. The twentieth-century Barringtons and Van Doorns are not aware of all this, and so come in for some ponderous blows from Mr. Russell's club, which he labels irony. His fancy, which weighs approximately ten tons, moves two sets of persons, one seventeenth-century and one twentieth-century, simultaneously about the stage, which fairly creaks with so much labor. But his inspiration was Ogu, who ogles a Dutch maid named Phoebe as no maid has ever been ogled, I am sure—saying it all, too, in four words which he repeats and repeats: "Ogu want Phoebe NOW." I thoroughly enjoyed the play, burlesquing it for myself as it went along. If those responsible for it would only call in George M. Cohan to burlesque it for us they might bring down the town. Otto Kruger as the Great Barrington is just as noisy as he needs to be.

MARK VAN DOREN

☐ SUMMER HOMES ☐

FOR SALE

IN ADIRONDACKS, 5-room real Log Cabin, modern, 18 ft. x 24 ft. living room, field-stone fireplace. Price $2,100. Cash $500. 6 years on balance. Earl Woodward. Luzerne, N. Y.

FOR RENT OR SALE

CAMP for sale or lease; bungalows to hire; fully equipped for all sports; mile lake; near Woodstock Art Colony; sacrifice; consider suitable terms; artists, authors, etc. Box 289, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. Commodious 8-room cottage completely furnished, electric light, running water, 3 acres woodland, shore. Will rent for season. James T. Kemp, Orange, Conn.

FURNISHED APARTMENTS

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS. 15 minutes from Times Square, charmingly furnished 2-room apartment, with private entrance. An exclusive home atmosphere for two particular people. Phone Main 4-3682.

UNFURNISHED APARTMENT

UNFURNISHED APARTMENT: entire floor, three rooms, will redecorate, complete kitchenette, refrigeration, roof playground, privileges of cooperative garden in small group of artists' and writers' homes; Greenwich Village. Chelsea 3-7970, or Box 290 c/o The Nation.

ROOMS

CHARMING room with small refined family for one or two gentlemen, or couple. In quiet beautiful neighborhood in Bronx, adjacent to N. Y. University. Share all home privileges. Kellogg 5-1155.

HOUSE WANTED

WELFARE agency will appreciate use at cheap rental, of house of 30 to 50 rooms, in lower Manhattan, suitable Community purposes. Address Brotherhood House, 324 Pleasant Ave., New York City.

STUDIO FOR RENT

DANCE STUDIO, 20 x 50, well equipped with shower and dressing room, for rent by the hour, or part time. Write to Arthur Faber, 77 Fifth Avenue. Algonquin 4-2746.

? A Summer House?
A Place for the Children?
Sublet Your City Apartment?

State your wants in a small classified advertisement in The Nation. (Gets results.)

Minimum 30 words, $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents.

"I believe you would like to know that through a classified advertisement in THE NATION I rented my furnished apartment for the summer to most reliable people.

It is a great satisfaction to use a medium which eliminates a large class of undesirables and focuses the attention of the NATION-reader type."

THE NATION

20 Vesey St. Fitz Roy 8-9074

POSITIONS WANTED

WELL known Little Theatre director (woman) available for summer camp proposition in dramatics, either adult or girls camp. Write Box 286, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

ADULT camp, now considering applications from young men for Social Director, Musicians, waiters. Apply in detail, stating age, qualification and references. Box 292, c/o The Nation

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

ASSISTANT Director, college instructor or social worker, to join cultural group doing unusually interesting work, non-profit making, but yielding sufficient to compensate for effort. Investment of $1,500 necessary for further development. Box 294, c/o The Nation.

KINDERGARTNER

KINDERGARTEN teacher takes children to park mornings, afternoons; called for and taken home; automobile service; large playrooms for rainy weather; hot lunches served. 156 West 93rd St., N. Y. C. Phone Schuyler 4 - 6438.

PHILANTHROPISTS

IS there anyone interested in helping two brothers supplement earnings to complete first year in medical school? Promising students; highest references regarding scholarship; character. $400 needed. Will repay. Box 295, c/o The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18, 1931 No. 3428

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 285
EDITORIALS:
  Two Years of Hoover 288
  The Muscle Shoals Veto 289
  Progress in India 289
  Can America Play? 290
WANTED: ANOTHER WORLD CONFERENCE. By Oswald Garrison Villard 291
WHY MOTHERS DIE. By Mary Sumner Boyd 293
DOAK THE DEPORTATION CHIEF. By Gardner Jackson 295
PRESIDENT HOOVER ON THE DEPRESSION 297
IN THE DRIFTWAY 297
CORRESPONDENCE 298
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
  Egrets. By Max Eastman 299
  Goethe and Dr. Johnson. By Henry Hazlitt 299
  No Men Wanted. By Henry Raymond Mussey 300
  A Study of Genius. By Eda Lou Walton 301
  Graves and Aldington Again. By Horace Gregory 301
  Our Vanishing Liberties. By Mauritz A. Hallgren 303
  Books in Brief 303
  Films: Nature and Artifice. By Alexander Bakshy 305
  Drama: The Road Not Taken. By Mark Van Doren 306
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  The Cuban Dictatorship. By Malwon Kaufman 309
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 311

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,* EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DRAMATIC EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
LITERARY EDITOR
HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
HEYWOOD BROUN FREDA KIRCHWEY CARL VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT LUDWIG LEWISOHN MARK VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON H. L. MENCKEN ARTHUR WARNER
NORMAN THOMAS
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

* Absent in Europe.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

RECENT WASHINGTON DISPATCHES declare that "Secretary of State Stimson has decided to make a special study of Russian affairs, and because of the importance of the subject will probably place the direction of this study in the hands of an Assistant Secretary of State." Just why the State Department should suddenly become so seriously concerned with the Russian problem appears at first glance somewhat mystifying. The Secretary's action does not, of course, mean that the United States is about to recognize the Soviet regime. That, in the opinion of most American officials, could not be done without a marked loss of prestige, and it is certain that the present Administration has neither the intention nor the graciousness to swallow its pride to this extent. It is more likely that we shall find Mr. Stimson's decision to have been inspired by a growing conviction that the Russian Five-Year Plan is succeeding and that Russia must be reckoned with in world affairs. In other words, the Communist experiment is no longer being pointed to as a fantastic dream; it is at last being taken with that seriousness which is its due, and here and there individuals and governments are finally beginning to consider ways and means of dealing with successful communism as a challenge to capitalist economy. We do not know where Mr. Stimson's study will lead him, but if it results in the adoption of a more intelligent attitude toward Russia and serves to turn American criticism upon the weaknesses in our own system as well, it may go down in history as a major achievement of the Hoover Administration.

THE FEELING that the capitalist world must reconsider its own economic position is not confined to the United States alone. Through the past several months this question has been increasingly agitated in the conservative press of Canada and Europe. Unfortunately, however, the agitation has thus far produced little of tangible value, if we agree that the renewed belligerency being displayed toward Moscow is not conducive to an improvement in international economic relations. Canada, for example, has barred virtually all Russian goods that compete with Canadian products. Numerous British financiers, industrialists, and politicians, including Lord Brentford and Winston Churchill, want England to follow suit. France and other European countries had previously laid down embargoes or adopted tariff regulations designed to hamper Russian trade. On the other hand, the directors of the International Bank at Basel have concluded that they must explore the problem of how the banking interests of the world may best meet the new Russian competition, and they are apparently about to do this in conjunction with a discussion of the world-wide economic depression. A fair examination of both problems should go far toward revealing the impracticability of attempting to shut Russia out of the world economic picture. In Germany there appears to be a positive desire not only to improve trade relations with Russia, but also to strengthen capitalist economy so as to enable it to meet Communist competition. The German debate has not been directed by the Marxians or other enemies of capitalism, but by the heavy industrialists and by such conservative organs as the Deutsche Bergwerks Zeitung. Their speeches and editorials make clear their belief that capitalism, as well as communism, is on trial.

SECRET DIPLOMACY by itself is bad enough, but it becomes a good deal worse when it is harnessed to publicity stunts, resounding political declamations, and speculation and dust-throwing in the daily press. The Franco-Italian naval agreement is the latest instance in point. After some days spent in hurrying from London to Paris for an interview with M. Briand arranged by telephone, conversing at high speed at the French Foreign Office, catching the next train for Rome to converse some more with Signor Grandi and Premier Mussolini, and hastening back to Paris to make sure that France would accept what Italy had agreed to, Mr. Henderson, British Foreign Secretary, announced that the controversy between Italy and France had been patched up and that those Powers would shortly adhere to the London naval treaty. Nothing of the terms of the agreement, however, was divulged, and the newspaper correspondents were left to create hypothetical terms out of hints, speculation, and the mistakes of the past. Now, it appears, the agreement is not so perfect as the world was given to understand; not so perfect, at least, as to keep Great Britain from fearing that its own naval position has been jeopardized and that France has conceded less than was supposed. Mr. Stimson will be right in withholding further comment upon the agreement until he learns exactly what the United States is expected to approve, and in insisting that the terms of the London treaty be strictly adhered to.

WHEN THE NATIONAL SOCIALISTS and the Nationalists walked out of the German Reichstag, relief was expressed by the government leaders. It was felt that with these obstructionists absenting themselves the government parties could go ahead with their financial and social-reform program unhampered by a dangerously large opposition. The National Socialists announced that they would "go to the country" in their own fashion with their program, call thousands of mass-meetings, and thus arouse the people against the present government; but so far nothing seems to have come of this plan. Now, however, the strategy of the fascist walkout is becoming apparent. Berlin cablegrams report that whereas the heterogeneous groups making up the Brüning coalition had heretofore been kept together by a common fear of "the demagogic Nationalist opposition," with the removal of this opposition the natural antagonisms existing among the government factions are coming to the surface. The Landbund, representing the Junkers of eastern Germany, is said to be drifting toward open warfare with Brüning. The Social Democrats are reported "becoming ever more restive under the yoke of supporting the government." The trade unions, backbone of Socialist strength for many years, are showing increasing dissatisfaction with Brüning's rule and with Socialist support of his government. In the recent Brunswick elections the Socialist vote decreased by 20,000 compared with the national elections in September, a goodly part of these voters going over to the Communists. Hence one result of the withdrawal appears to have been an increase in dissension among the enemies of fascism—a result that can profit only the fascists themselves.

CHAIRMAN JOHN J. RASKOB of the Democratic National Committee has at the same time revealed the weakness of the Democratic party and the strength of its present management. The meeting of the committee conducted by him in Washington the other day was probably arranged with this purpose in mind. By precipitating a row over prohibition eighteen months in advance of the national convention Mr. Raskob has most likely averted an even worse controversy, which, had it been postponed until then, might have split the convention and the party. Instead, he has brought out into the open the seriousness of this cleavage between the two major wings of the Democratic organization, and it is reasonable to suppose that those leaders of the party on both sides of the prohibition fence who are anxious to press to the utmost the unusual chances of success that they will have in 1932 will use the intervening months to work out some sort of compromise acceptable to wets and drys alike before the convention meets. Whether or not they can do this appears to depend upon the willingness of the South and West to accept two more years of Mr. Raskob's rule along with the prohibition compromise. Should he and his wet friends of the East be forced out of the party management before or during the convention, it would almost compel the Democrats to take a positively dry stand. Such action could, of course, have but one result: loss of the East and of the chances of a national Democratic victory.

IT IS HARD to be patient with the President's veto of the Wagner employment-exchange bill. The measure would not help, but rather would do harm in the present crisis, we are told. (We are glad at least to have an admission that there is a crisis.) As it is not emergency legislation, the matter demands more consideration; therefore we will do nothing now. Of course it is not emergency legislation; the bill is a carefully wrought measure, approved by most expert students, designed to embody the first steps in a permanent policy specially adapted to American conditions. Why has not the Administration come forward with a real plan of its own, if the Wagner scheme is bad? It has had years in which to do it. Does Mr. Hoover expect us to "consider" forever? Anything to prevent action, seems to be his motto. As for Secretary Doak, his action is beneath contempt. For years as labor lobbyist he supported the Wagner bills. Elevated to the Cabinet, he becomes absolute yes-man to the President, and after vainly trying to wreck the present measure by introducing an eleventh-hour substitute measure, signs his name to the President's argument against this bill he long supported. The American people, millions of them out of a job, ought to note the kind of leadership President Hoover gives them in this crisis, and to scrutinize sharply his use of facts. Senator Wagner, Industrial Commissioner Frances Perkins, who last spring convicted the Administration of misuse of unemployment figures, Mary Van Kleeck, Paul U. Kellogg, and John B. Andrews all call attention to shocking inaccuracies of fact and inference in the veto message.

CHARLES M. SCHWAB'S DEFENSE of the Bethlehem Steel Company's bonus system, recently attacked in a court action, raises interesting questions about the relation of work and pay in present-day America. Twenty Bethlehem executives get fixed salaries ranging from $6,000 to $12,000 a year; one receives $3,000. Most of their pay comes in bonuses. E. G. Grace, the president, gets a salary of $12,000, and his bonuses over a period of seventeen years have averaged $814,993. Seven other men have had bonuses ranging from $108,000 to $230,000 on the average and twelve have received from $14,000 to $76,000. Mr. Schwab stoutly defends this system of payment by results, as he calls it, pointing out that the administrative, selling, and general expense of Bethlehem has averaged only 3.24 per cent of gross earnings over a six-year period, while the figure for United States Steel is 3.84 per cent and for Youngstown 4.06 per cent. Mr. Schwab is doubtless right in asserting that "the right man may well be worth $1,000,000 a year and more" to a big company; but only a perverted psychology would assert that it was inherently necessary to pay him any such sum in order to get the best out of him. It may be necessary in a society where money is the only proof of success, but business is in great need of moving forward to the stage attained by some of the professions, where success is measured not solely or even chiefly by financial return, but by eminence in the performance of function. A reduction in the money rewards of business success, indeed, might result in a higher social esteem for the business man, even if in fewer million-dollar bonuses.

TRANSFER TO THE STATES of what is left of the federal public domain, except such lands as may be reserved for national defense, reclamation purposes, reservoir sites, national forests, parks, monuments, and refuges for migratory birds, is recommended by Mr. Hoover's commission on the conservation and administration of the public domain. The area of unreserved and unappropriated public land covered by the recommendation aggregated on June 30, 1930, 178,979,446 acres scattered over seventeen States. The transfers are to be made only where the State legislatures vote to accept them, but when so accepted the lands will be subject to sale, lease, or other disposition, provided only that sales shall be made at public auction and that subsurface minerals shall be reserved. This latter reservation is made in order to fit in with the commission's proposal of a general policy for the conservation of mineral resources in which the federal and State governments are to cooperate. The commission believes that the States are "conscious of the value" of conservation. Perhaps they are, but in any contest between a State and private or corporate interests over the control of oil or other deposits the State is pretty certain to lose. The transfer plan is just as bad today as it was when Mr. Hoover and Secretary Wilbur championed it in the summer of 1929. It means that the landed wealth will probably be dissipated and conservation left with nothing to conserve.

THE TEACHERS UNION of New York is celebrating its fifteenth anniversary. Organized in March, 1916, it was one of the locals of the American Federation of Teachers established two months later and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The association of groups of teachers with the organized labor movement has been the occasion of much criticism; it is a fairly safe guess that opposition to the Teachers Union of New York has rested far more largely on its consistently progressive educational and social program. Courageously opposing the unlamented Lusk bills during the hysterical period just after the war, the union has likewise opposed attempts to introduce military training into the school system, has persistently fought against political control of the public schools, and has attacked discrimination against teachers on the ground of race or of political or economic views. It has been of service in forwarding programs of experimental education, and has sought to maintain the highest professional standards in teaching. The dislike of school administrators for trade unionism among teachers is understandable enough, but we believe that the close association of teachers with labor groups is a wholesome thing, and there is no question of the value of independent criticism of the educational machine from within the system itself. The record of the Teachers Union during its fifteen stormy years is an honorable one, and gives hope of its enlarged usefulness during the next fifteen years.

A YOUNG MAN walked into a police station in Memphis, Tennessee, on February 21 and asked three questions: "Do you know of any Communist organization operating in Memphis? Is there any headquarters here for Communist propaganda? If so, where is it?" For this crime he was immediately and forthwith taken into custody, questioned, locked up and held incomunicado for thirty-six hours, and made to stand in the police "show-up" on Monday morning. This story, however, has a happy ending. It appears that the young man, Henry R. Fuller by name, was not without friends in Memphis. He is an honor graduate of the University of North Carolina, a salesman for Houghton Mifflin Company, and, best of all, the great-grandson of Tennessee's first great man, Governor John Sevier. All this, when some thoughtful person brought it to the attention of the commissioner of police, made that official very, very polite to Mr. Fuller and occasioned his speedy release. Certain intellectuals and prominent citizens and the Memphis Press-Scimitar have displayed considerable agitation and chagrin over the affair; Mr. Fuller has even been advised to bring suit against the city of Memphis. But Police Commissioner Davis has a very simple explanation to make: "Of course," he said, "when he came in and wanted Communist headquarters, they locked him up." The Press-Scimitar comments: "Don't ask the policeman where the pesthouse is or he is likely to arrest you on a charge of having the smallpox."

A SIXTEEN-YEAR-OLD GIRL recently committed suicide out of shame and chagrin. She was the daughter of a woman who had been strangled a few days earlier in New York City, just as she was about to offer herself as a witness in the inquiry into vice conditions being conducted by Justice Seabury. It is reported that the daughter could not bear the stories she read in "the more sensational newspapers" about her mother's career. This vividly recalls Louis Weitzenkorn's play "Five-Star Final," now in its third month in New York. Mr. Weitzenkorn directs his lance at the tabloids for dragging into print for purposes of circulation the intimate details of the life of a woman with a "past," who is now living a quite ordinary and respectable life. In the play the woman and her husband are driven to suicide, just as the schoolgirl was in fact. The cases are not strictly parallel, of course. Mr. Weitzenkorn's play deals with matters of purely private concern; the Gordon case is part of a public matter of the highest importance, namely, the partnership of courts and police with vice and crime. None the less, the handling of this case, even by the high-class newspapers, indicates once more the disagreeable fact that sensational scandal news is a circulation-getter. Incidentally, it is an interesting commentary on the people of New York that the man chosen by them for mayor with the largest plurality in the city's history, at this point in the vice scandals is about to take a month's vacation. Mr. Walker, however, expresses himself as being "more or less shocked" by the disclosures daily being made. That, we suppose, is something.

IN THE ISSUE of The Nation for February 18 it was stated on the authority of the Berlin Tagebuch that the Frankfurter Zeitung had recently disposed "of a large part of its stock to the German dye trust." The New York representative of this newspaper has informed us that the statement "does not correspond with the facts." He cited a denial of this report published by the Frankfurter Zeitung, in which it was asserted that the majority of the capital stock is still held by the Simon-Sonnemann family, and that not a single share "is to be found in the hands of the I. G. Farbenindustrie [German dye trust] or any other industrial company."

Two Years of Hoover

BACK in 1928 we were assured in many quarters that Herbert Hoover would never amount to much as a politician, but that as President he would outshine most, if not all, of his thirty predecessors. He was to be the great scientific executive, the engineer President; his intellect would solve our social and economic problems in a manner decisive and just, and far beyond the mental or moral capacity of our political office-holders. We were to have an intelligently liberal government unfettered by petty politics. Hundreds of speakers and writers promised us "four more years of prosperity," and even Mr. Hoover himself declared that "given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this nation." A perfect President Mr. Hoover was to be, a politician never. Two years of his benevolent rule have, however, proved the reverse to be nearer the truth. Herbert Hoover has revealed himself as sadly unfitted for the high office he occupies; his widely advertised intelligence and courage have failed him; he has spent twenty-four months trying to play the kind of politics necessary to win him reelection in 1932.

Mr. Hoover's record on the tariff question affords one example of his tendency to desert his avowed principles when he deems it politically expedient to do so. He called the Seventy-first Congress into early session in 1929 for the announced purpose of revising the tariff in order to aid the farmer. Earlier he had declared that what he desired was a scientific tariff; his extra-session call asked for limited revision. Yet he sat idly by, not once lifting his voice in defense of his original position, while Senator Grundy, with the able assistance of Senators Smoot, Reed, Bingham, and others, maneuvered Congress into accepting the highest tariff rates in the history of the country.

It is in connection with the economic depression, however, that Mr. Hoover's record is most discouraging. Immediately after the stock-market crash the Engineering Mind swung into action to prevent the Wall Street collapse from turning into a nation-wide tragedy. On November 15, 1929, he announced:

> I have, during the past week, engaged in numerous conferences with important business leaders and public officials with a view to the coordination of business and governmental agencies in concerted action for continued business progress. I am calling for the middle of next week a small preliminary conference of representatives of industry, agriculture, and labor to meet with the Secretaries of the Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor, together with the chairman of the Federal Farm Board, to develop certain definite steps.

Other conferences were held at the White House; there were promises that wages would be maintained at the levels then obtaining, that unemployment would be checked, and that prosperity would be restored in short order. Two weeks later in his message to Congress Mr. Hoover said he was "convinced that through these measures we have reestablished confidence. Wages should remain stable. A very large degree of industrial unemployment and suffering which would otherwise have occurred has been prevented." Somehow or other the magic of words failed to meet the emergency. It was necessary to repeat them again and again throughout 1930. In another place in this issue The Nation publishes one of the many Hoover statements of the year. The flow of words (Mr. Hoover's substitute for concrete and intelligent action) continued until December of last year, when the President apparently washed his hands of the whole business by declaring in his second annual message that "economic depression cannot be cured by legislative action or executive pronouncement. Economic wounds must be healed by the action of the cells of the economic body—the producers and consumers themselves."

Unfortunately, there were certain men in Congress who disagreed with Mr. Hoover in his contention that the organized state has no responsibility to the individual members of the state. They insisted that the government should bear its full share of responsibility in the economic crisis, and they were rewarded for their honesty by being accused of "playing politics at the expense of human misery." After the long and disgraceful fight over the use of government funds for the relief of the unemployed and the drought victims, Mr. Hoover's views finally prevailed, not because they were wise and just, for that they most certainly were not, but because he had the prestige of official position, which he employed to bring public opinion as expressed by the daily press to his side, and because he had learned a great deal about politics in his twenty months in the White House.

Mr. Hoover's political and economic philosophy is one of extreme individualism, one might almost say of anarchy. Society as a whole has no privileges or rights; government is but an umpire; only the strongest individuals are important, and it is to them the honors must go. Thus spoke Mr. Hoover in his King's Mountain speech of October 7 last, and thus he has spoken many times before and since. It is a philosophy that would do credit to a Jay Cooke or a Morgan the Elder, or even to a Proudhon the anarchist. It explains the President's bitter opposition to the Muscle Shoals plan, to the government's feeding the hungry and clothing the needy, and to all similar proposals to have the state help its members collectively in any way that might impinge upon the privileges of a few of them as individuals.

It is too early to inquire into the effect upon his political fortunes of Mr. Hoover's record to date. It appears that he has recently strengthened rather than weakened his chances of reelection in 1932. His tariff stand, his veto of the veterans'-loan measure, the Muscle Shoals bill, and the Wagner employment-exchange bill, his position on railway consolidation, and his extravagant defense of the Treasury (meaning, of course, the wealthier taxpayers) against Congressional raids have enhanced his standing with the industrialists and financiers who actually control national politics in this country. And he can always lead the voters away from a too critical scrutiny of his domestic record by pointing to the much-advertised London naval treaty and his other activities in the foreign field.

The Muscle Shoals Veto

DISAPPOINTED though we are at the loss of the Muscle Shoals bill, we are glad to see the President in his veto message raise a fundamental issue concerning public operation. On that issue, we believe, he is absolutely wrong. We are none the less grateful to him for making the issue clear and inviting public judgment.

His examination of the engineering and financial aspects of the project we do not find at all convincing. It is easy to set up figures. Estimating the total value of the old property for the electrical project at $42,000,000 and the new capital required at $85,000,000, a total of $127,000,000, Mr. Hoover figures interest and amortization at nearly $7,000,000 a year, with operating and maintenance costs bringing the total annual expense up to $9,145,000, or a cost of 9.1 mills per kilowatt hour for production and distribution of power on an estimated salable output of 1,000,000,000 kilowatt hours per year. Selling this output at the 7.2 mill rate realized by the private companies in this district, the President is able to figure out an eminently satisfactory loss of at least $2,000,000 a year as the inevitable result of public operation. With all deference we submit that Mr. Hoover's public use of figures during the two years of his Presidency has unfortunately not been such as to command instant confidence. Furthermore, a great capital was irrevocably sunk at Muscle Shoals in pursuance of war purposes, and the accounting is materially affected thereby. Without entering upon detailed criticism, we simply remind our readers, by contrast with the President's figures, of the army engineers' report cited by Senator Black, estimating the total cost of producing Muscle Shoals power at 1.36 mills a kilowatt hour and that of distribution within 350 miles at 4.16 mills—a total of 5.52 mills. Senator Norris points out that with the completion of the Cove Creek dam the actual cost of production would be below one mill. (On power used locally—for example, in producing fertilizers—there would of course be no transmission cost.) We forbear to figure on the President's alternative proposal to turn the plant as it stands over to Alabama and Tennessee for lease, though we could, with a little ingenuity, calculate an annual loss to Uncle Sam for interest and amortization under it at either $2,300,000 or $6,000,000, as happened best to suit our fancy.

The real issue, the President says, is "federal government ownership and operation of power and manufacturing business not as a minor by-product but as a major purpose." With regard to power, we believe this statement to be strictly accurate, though we realize that Senator Norris does not see the question in this light. We are glad to have the issue squarely presented. For the government to enter on such an undertaking, we learn, "is to break down the initiative and enterprise of the American people; it is destruction of equality of opportunity among our people; it is the negation of the ideals upon which our civilization has been based." Here we disagree flatly. We do not concede that American civilization is and must be essentially a hard-fisted, hard-headed, hard-hearted grabbing for gain. That appears to be the President's conception, for he is "firmly opposed to the government entering into any business the main purpose of which is competition with our citizens." But the primary purpose of government operation of Muscle Shoals would be, not to compete with citizens, but to furnish them with cheap power and fertilizers. Despite Mr. Hoover, we insist that that is a perfectly legitimate and desirable end of government activity, and an end more important than maintaining the existing profits of private power companies.

Power, the President insists, must be furnished by private enterprise alone. But it can be provided economically only by linking power units into great unified systems, whereupon that competition of citizens so dear to the President becomes a vain and imaginary thing. This fact he recognizes himself; for instead of appealing to competition he declares that the remedy for abuses in the power industry lies in regulation by State and federal authority. Again we believe he is wrong. Experience indicates with increasing clearness that regulation does not and will not cure the abuses of the power business, because the companies, with their great wealth and immensely valuable privileges, constantly manage, in the unashamed pursuit of profits, to circumvent or control the regulating authorities. Witness the Federal Power Commission itself. We entertain no illusion as to the ease of getting efficient and economical public administration of power systems, but we can no longer cherish the romantic idea of satisfactory control of private companies through regulatory commissions. Behind the Muscle Shoals fight lie two conceptions of the American government—the President's view that it is simply a referee to see that the rules of a contest among its citizens are observed, and the contrasted belief that it is, and increasingly is to be, an agency of public service. Over that issue we shall continue to wage war on the President.

Progress in India

THE agreement between Lord Irwin and Mr. Gandhi which brings at least a temporary peace to India after a year of intense and bitter strife seems to us to constitute a firm beginning toward a solution of the British-Indian dilemma. By the terms of the agreement, the civil-disobedience campaign is to be called off and all prisoners not charged with violence are to be released, while repressive measures promulgated in connection with the campaign are to be withdrawn. Non-payment of land taxes is to cease and confiscated property is to be returned except when it is no longer in the possession of the government. It is intimated that the government will facilitate the recovery of property if it is found to have been illegally disposed of. The boycott against British goods as such "as a political weapon" is abandoned by the Congress Party, but encouragement of Indian industries as part of an economic and industrial movement designed to improve the material condition of India is approved by the government, and the discouragement by lawful means, that is, unaggressive picketing, of consumption of intoxicating liquor and drugs will not be interfered with. While the government refused to abandon the salt monopoly and the salt tax, it agrees to permit local residents in villages immediately adjoining areas where salt can be collected or made, to collect and make salt for domestic consumption or sale within such villages. With regard to Mr. Gandhi's demand for a public inquiry into the conduct of the police, the words of the agreement are worth quoting as an example of the conciliatory tone in which delicate questions are handled.

> Mr. Gandhi has drawn the attention of the government to specific allegations against the conduct of the police, and has represented the desirability of a public inquiry into them. In the present circumstances the government sees great difficulty in this course and feels it must inevitably lead to charges and counter-charges which would militate against the reestablishment of peace. Having regard for these considerations, Mr. Gandhi has agreed not to press the matter.

The agreement, which is expressly confined to activities directly connected with the civil-disobedience movement, does not go into the matter of the constitution but provides for a round-table conference on that question at which the Congress Party shall be represented and which is referred to in Paragraph 2 of the agreement as follows:

> As regards constitutional questions, the scope of future discussions is stated with the assent of His Majesty's government to have as its object consideration of a further scheme for constitutional government in India, to be discussed at a round-table conference. Of the scheme outlined federation is an essential part. So also are Indian responsibilities, and reservations or safeguards in the interests of India for such matters as, for instance, defense, external affairs, the position of minorities, the financial credits of India, and the discharge of obligations.

It would seem from the foregoing that the principle of federation is the only finality which will be carried over from the first round-table conference to the second. Logically, the left wing of the Congress Party, urging complete and immediate independence, will find obnoxious Mr. Gandhi's indicated admission of safeguards and reservations even as subjects for discussion. Yet Jawaharlal Nehru has approved the agreement. We shall probably know better the meaning of the paragraph and of Mr. Gandhi's position after the party meeting at Karachi. Meanwhile, we feel inclined to say with Tagore, "Let me believe in his [Gandhi's] firmness, not my doubts."

Certainly his statement, issued after the agreement had been signed, declaring that "I must confess that what seems to have been yielded by them [the British] to India at the London conference is not even half enough" is indication enough that all the decisions and many of the difficulties are still ahead. But at least some of the difficulties have been left behind. For the first time the two dominant forces in this struggle—the British government and the Congress Party—have met; they have met on the real battleground—not London but India itself. In words, at least, Britain, through Lord Irwin, has made important concessions. If it proves to be actually so, it will indicate that India has demonstrated to British business men in India if not to the Empire-savers in London that it can take away a great market which Britain cannot afford to lose. Only a romantic Tory like Winston Churchill, and least of all a business man with money to lose, can see the logic of saving the name of empire at the price of losing its economic substance. What the new Indian conference will bring forth no one can tell. It may mean deadlock and a resumption of civil disobedience. But at least it will mean that the real combatants will meet. And that is a step forward.

Can America Play?

THE National Recreation Association on April 12 celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary. In that time organized play in America has grown from a total of forty-one cities which could report public playgrounds to nearly a thousand communities which conduct some form of public recreation. The association's annual income has grown from $7,700 to $427,000; its membership from 408 to 14,538. At its beginning funds for public recreation were raised by tag days, by bazaars, by public subscriptions; these funds now come honestly and properly from taxation. It has spread from a group of children's playgrounds, voluntarily administered, to recreational activities that include playgrounds, athletic fields, parks, swimming pools, tennis courts, golf courses, and camps, in the main under municipal auspices.

It should not be necessary to stress the importance of this movement. In the cities, where the majority of Americans now live, recreation ranges all the way from the movies, the dance halls, the skating rinks, and the soft-drink parlors to the gambling houses and speakeasies. Each of these enterprises is privately operated for gain. Neither the health of the mind nor that of the body is considered; in many cases the age of the participant is not considered either. It is a familiar sight in any town or city, during summer vacations and after school hours, to see a queue of children at the movie houses, waiting to be "taken in" by some good-natured adult, since children under sixteen are not supposed to be admitted without adult companions. There can be no question of the relative merits, on the one hand, of the motion pictures, with their cheap melodrama, their insistence on sex, their vulgarity expressed even more plainly now by speech, and, on the other hand, of organized play. In large cities where space is at a very high premium, recreation for children is probably best connected with the schools. The Recreation Association has insisted on the need of building new schools in large free areas; sites permitting three to five acres of play space are favored for elementary schools; the standard for junior and senior high schools is ten to twenty acres.

The need for adult recreation, for adult, creative community activity, is no less pressing. Here the Recreation Association is striving—successfully in many places—not only for indoor and outdoor sports, but for handicrafts, dramatics, music under public auspices. The little-theater movement, which has given birth to as lusty an offspring as the Theater Guild, is a phase of the public recreation movement. Community choruses, popular in smaller cities and numerous throughout the country, are another. Public-health activities flourish under it. The removal of "keep-off-the-grass" signs from public parks and the metamorphosis of those parks from "scenery" to areas of free land which the public may enjoy is the result of organized recreational activities. Westchester County, New York, has one of the finest recreational centers in the country; Detroit, Minneapolis, Houston, Los Angeles, Cleveland deserve mention, with many others. Started with the encouragement of President Roosevelt in 1906, the Playground Association—now the National Recreation Association—has seen a public need, has gone a long way toward meeting it, and is now busily engaged in furthering and amplifying its activities.

Wanted: Another World Conference

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, February 18

EUROPEAN conference has followed upon European conference. And so many of them have ended in total failure or a flimsy pretense of success that people everywhere are cynical or disgusted, declaring that "they always end in talk." Fortunately there are exceptions to the record—first of all, the notable success of the late Indian conference, which achieved the apparently impossible, thanks to the courage, skill, and persistency of Ramsay MacDonald. But if there were no favorable precedents whatever, it would still seem to me that another conference ought to be called at the earliest possible moment.

What kind of conference? A conference among the heads of a small group of nations—Italy, the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Belgium—for the purpose of examining immediately the actual situation in Europe and taking some steps to end the present world-wide economic crisis. Here again I hear dissent: Has there not just been an economic conference at Geneva, which gave to the press of the world an excellent statement of economic conditions, signed by twenty-seven nations? The answer is that this is not the time for statements, whether they are signed by twenty-seven nations or by all the nations on earth. What the hour calls for is action, and action before it is too late. As I have pointed out before in this correspondence, there is no time to be lost. This is, of course, not simply my own humble opinion. It is the deliberate judgment of the leading economists with whom I have talked in Germany and Austria this winter, and it is the opinion of a number of people whom I have seen here in England. And it must be a conference of heads of governments because it must be a gathering of men who can act, or can give reasonable assurances that their governments will be bound by whatever decisions are arrived at. That this makes the participation of the United States practically impossible is plain. Probably nothing on earth would induce Mr. Hoover to follow Mr. Wilson's precedent and cross the seas to attend such a meeting, even if he were to become aware of the gravity of the world situation, as he gives no sign of being today. He would undoubtedly have to send a substitute—woe betide should it be Mr. Stimson or Mr. Mellon—and whoever it might be would be handicapped by having to ascertain not only the opinions of Mr. Hoover, but perhaps even the wishes of the Senate. None the less, a conference is needed and needed badly, with or without the United States. Upon this point all thoughtful men here not in office agree.

The primary reason is, of course, that the present economic crisis is a world crisis. There are those here, like Maynard Keynes, who think that it may last as long as the economic depression which followed the Napoleonic wars. The world was an infinitely smaller entity then. It is a commonplace that the World War made us realize for the first time the world's present economic unity and the absolute dependence of one nation upon another. The crisis is driving this truth home with irresistible force: it seems impossible for America to return to its previous prosperity without Europe's complete restoration to economic health, while, conversely, everybody here feels that there can be no hope of overcoming the crisis on this side of the Atlantic until recovery is assured in America. Why should there not be a conference to deal with this unprecedentedly dangerous situation?

The minute one raises the question in official circles the obstacles are presented. What, it is asked, can Europe do if America will not move, since America holds the key to the whole situation—the golden key? What practical thing could such a conference achieve? Well, perhaps an agreement to reduce the tariffs which everywhere in Europe and in America hinder the progress of the world's trade as beaver dams block the flow of mountain streams. But the French are unyielding on the question of tariffs. What is the use? The answer is that the first advantage to be gained would be a psychological one. The entire business world of Europe would breathe anew if it learned that governmental heads were conferring upon emergency measures. In Germany especially, the summoning of Chancellor Brüning to such a conference would have immediate and far-reaching reactions. It would come at a happy moment, on top of his parliamentary successes and the relatively favorable action taken at Geneva upon Germany's anti-Polish protests. It would refute the arguments of the Hitlerites that the Chancellor is without influence in international affairs, and that nothing whatever is being done by him to improve Germany's international situation. To all this the doubters reply that if such a conference met and returned empty-handed the result would be far more discouraging than if it had never been called together. They overlook the fact that a free interchange of opinion between the heads of governments could not be other than valuable, even though the foreign ministers of the same countries met less than two weeks ago in Geneva.

Next comes the question of precedents—precedents are the joy of an office-holder when he cannot conjure up any other obstacle. It is explained that such a conference must have Briand in it to be successful, and you could not have Briand if other countries were represented by their prime ministers or chancellors. Nobody seems to want the attendance of Mussolini. I have already referred to the hampering American precedent. The others at least could be brushed aside. It is easy to prophesy that they will be brushed aside if the crisis becomes serious enough. But this question of America is more difficult. Onlookers here have been struck by the many signs of a changing public opinion in America. Bush, Hurley, Owen Young, Nicholas Murray Butler, Outerbridge, Warburg, Speyer, Wiggin—the list of those asking a reexamination of our relations to Europe is growing every day. Europeans are properly impressed by it. Naturally, they do not always understand that the bankers cited are under suspicion, first, because they are international and Wall Street bankers, and, secondly, because some of them have made loans to Germany and it is therefore felt that their advice is not unbiased—a consideration which cannot apply to Bush, Butler, or Outerbridge. But if responsible opinion is changing in the United States, the process is too slow to be really helpful. There is no time to wait, not even for a year, at the end of which time Mr. Hoover will be facing the question of his renomination and reelection. If the crisis in America continues to be as severe as it is now, or the recovery is extremely slow, the politicians will surely be much more ready to understand that they cannot hope for a return to normal times until America has helped to put Europe on its feet. Even then there will be the difficulty of forgiving debts when there is a large Treasury deficit, with the danger of an increase of income taxes clearly in the offing.

None the less, if things continue as they are in Europe, the day will come when Mr. Hoover, the politicians, the press, and the public will have squarely to face anew the question of reparations and debts, which Mr. Hoover, in his unhappy speech to the American Legion in Boston only last fall, declared to be an accomplished fact which no proper American would seek further to discuss or to reopen. The reason for this is that if things continue as they are, Germany will ask for her moratorium, to which she is entitled under the Young Plan, and the French and English will find themselves in an immediate quandary as to how they can continue to pay America when Germany ceases to pay them. If there is one thing which is keeping Philip Snowden awake at night it is surely the dread lest he suddenly hear that he must include in his extraordinarily difficult budget the amount of money for the United States which now automatically flows from Berlin to Washington by way of London. It would seem an impossible task to obtain this additional amount—£38,000,000—from the British taxpayer.

But what will the American government do if, after Germany defaults, the British and French refuse to go on with their payments? Mr. Hoover will certainly then discover that reparations and debts are after all not a finished fact, and that it will be quite in order for a loyal and patriotic American to discuss these questions, and even to take part in a conference which would not only consider them, but would see if something could be done about moving the mass of gold accumulated in the United States and France, and would deal with the question, among others, of leveling all tariffs. Let no one underestimate the seriousness of the situation which will arise if England and France also ask for a moratorium in their debt payments. That it will cause anger and bad blood in America there can be no doubt. To the average American who does not know what the real situation over here is, it will doubtless seem like wilful defaulting on a debt of honor—a poor reward, indeed, for the financial rescue of the Allies when they were bankrupt in 1917. All the more reason for the proposed conference, if it can do anything whatever to head off any such outburst of feeling in America, or at least prepare the public for what may prove to be the inevitable, and make it clear that every consideration of self-interest should make the American taxpayer eager to get rid of debts owed to him which are largely contributing to the terrible losses being inflicted in America by the present crisis, with its dreadful unemployment, poverty, suffering, and complete dislocation of our social and economic life.

